

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

P R E F A C E.

THE following work was undertaken and begun by the late Rev. J. H. Blunt. On his death the publishers were good enough to invite me to complete the book. I have done so with much diffidence, considering the importance of the subject and the difficulty of expressing fairly the differing, and oftentimes conflicting, views with which men regard religious questions. But I can honestly claim for myself that, whatever success I may be judged to have attained, I have taken pains to be full and accurate.

With regard to the scope of the work, the biographical articles are exclusively of persons whose course on earth is ended, though of necessity it is impossible to avoid references to living men who have taken part in current controversies. Articles of purely Scriptural History, Topography, and Exegesis, are excluded, as they are already treated of in what are known as "Bible" Dictionaries. The present volume has to do with Ecclesiastical History and Doctrine, and with the known Religions of the ancient and modern world, and the topics and the persons connected with these subjects. Even with these limitations, the difficulty has been to compress what was required within a manageable compass; and it is believed that the dedication of the space at command to information, much of which is not otherwise readily accessible, was preferable to occupying a large portion of it with details which can be easily referred to elsewhere.

The intended method of treatment may be simply described. The standpoint is, as will be naturally expected, that of orthodox Christianity, as generally understood by intelligent members of the Church of England. But endeavour has been made to accurately and fairly describe doctrines and practices far removed from that, in a simply informative rather than dogmatic spirit. As regards other Christian denominations, it has been deemed right that they should be described as they themselves would desire, and that their own views and reasons should be fairly given, rather than any view taken of them by others. Considerable trouble has been taken to secure this, and to fairly set forth the Nonconformist view of those great questions which divide their communions from that of the Church of England. Such a task is of peculiar delicacy and difficulty, but I trust that the book may not be found lacking in that charity which is "the very bond of peace and of all virtues," the presence of which will unite together those whom smaller things divide.

Finally, it may be said that special care has been taken with the articles dealing with those questions which are most keenly discussed at the present day, bearing on what has come to be known as the Great Controversy. The result of much fruitful discussion has been gathered up, with a desire always to find if possible the point of unity in things differing, and good wherever it is to be found; and I put it from me in the hope that my fellow-labourers and myself may be found to have afforded in these pages some real help towards an intelligent reconciliation of the most recent knowledge with the Faith delivered to the saints.

THE DICTIONARY OF RELIGION.

Aaron, St. (1) [d. about A.D. 304].—This name has come down to us from the sixth century as that of a British martyr who suffered during the Diocletian persecution. Gildas, the earliest of our national historians, wrote, in A.D. 560, that among the martyrs in that time of persecution, when St. Alban suffered at Verulam, Aaron and Julius, citizens of the City of the Legions, with others of either sex in divers places, were put to death with the sword, for their great constancy in the faith of Christ. In the Venerable Bede's "Ecclesiastical History," written A.D. 731, the statement is repeated. Authentic British records of the ninth century, which are preserved in "the Book of Llandaff," give the place of St. Aaron's martyrdom as Caerleon-upon-Usk, the great Roman "City of the Legions" of South Wales, of which extensive remains yet exist. Mediæval tradition respecting these early martyrs may be given in the words of Giraldus Cambrensis [A.D. 1147-1222], who wrote that "Julius and Aaron, after suffering martyrdom, were buried in the city of Caerleon, and had each a church dedicated to him. After St. Alban and Amphibalus they were esteemed the chief proto-martyrs of Britannia Major. In ancient times there were three fine churches in this city, one dedicated to Julius the martyr, graced with a choir of nuns; another to Aaron, his companion, ennobled with an order of canons; and a third distinguished as the metropolitan see of Wales." There is good reason for regarding Aaron and Julius as historical personages, but as Caerleon-upon-Dee was called "the City of the Legions" by the Romans, as well as Caerleon-upon-Usk, there is some doubt whether their martyrdom occurred at the former, now called Chester, or at the place in South Wales, which still retains its British name. In ancient calendars their names were commemorated on July 1st.

Aaron, St. (2) [d. 580].—A missionary hermit who was associated with the Welsh bishop, Maelog, or Machutus, best known by his French name of St. Malo, in the foundation of the first monastery established in Brittany. This was erected on a small island, afterwards known as the Isle of Faron, and formed part of the seaport of Aleth, the city of which Machutus was bishop, and which is now known as St. Malo. Aaron became the first abbot of this monastery, and as such is commemorated in French calendars on June 21st; the name of his companion, St. Machutus, Bishop of Aleth, occurring in the calendar of the Prayer Book on November 15th. [MACHUTUS.]

A.B.—The initial letters of Artium Baccalaureus, the Latin form of the University degree of Bachelor of Arts. The degree is more commonly signified by the letters B.A.

Abacuc, St. [d. 270].—This name appears in ancient martyrologies as that of a martyr who was put to death with his father Marius, his mother Martha, and his brother Audifax, in a persecution which occurred during the short reign of the Gothic Emperor Claudius II. He is commemorated on January 20th, and must not be confused with the Old Testament prophet, whose name occurs in Western calendars on January 15th, and in Eastern on December 2nd.

Abailard. [ABÉLARD.]

Abba.—The Aramaic, or late Hebrew, word for "Father." [Mark xv. 36; Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6.] It is a modified form of the more ancient Hebrew word "Ab," and expresses reverent affection. But it was probably used more generally by the Jews than its sacred use in the New Testament indicates, and thus passed into ecclesiastical language among the Christians of Palestine, Egypt, and Ethiopia, as the designation of a bishop or of the head of a monastery [Gr., Abbas], just as "Father in God" is one of the designations of an English bishop. Through the intermediary forms, "baba" and "papa," the word was the original of the title "Papa," or "Pope," assumed by the Bishops of Rome. [POPE.]

Abbadie, James [A.D. 1658-1727].—A French Protestant minister who eventually became Chaplain of the Savoy, and Dean of Killaloe in Ireland, and attained much fame as a modern apologist for Christianity by his work, "On the Truth of the Christian Religion," originally published in French, in three quarto volumes, in 1684-9, but afterwards translated into English and German. Abbadie was born at Nay, in the then French province of Béarn, and after passing through the Universities of Saumur, Paris, and Sedan, received the honorary degree of D.D. from the latter, on account of his great learning, at the age of seventeen. He became pastor of the French Protestants in Berlin in 1680, and was much in favour with the Elector Frederick, upon whose death, in 1688, he accompanied Marshal Schomberg to England. There he became a warm and efficient supporter of the Revolution, and after being appointed to the Chaplaincy of the Savoy, was further rewarded with the Irish deanery, which he held, though non-resident, till his death, in St. Marylebone parish, on September 25th, 1727. Although a prolific writer, he was chiefly known by his "Treatise on the Christian Religion," which passed through many editions in several languages, and was popular among Roman Catholics as well as among Protestants.

Abbat. [ABBOT.]

Abbé.—This was formerly a title belonging to the head of a French monastery, corresponding to that of Abbot in England. [ABBOT.] In the age preceding the French Revolution it became the designation of a multitude of sinecurists, who drew large incomes from the monasteries, and who were not always even priests, dispensations from Holy Orders being frequently granted to lay Abbés by the Popes. In more modern times the title of Abbé has been given to secular priests (that is, priests not belonging to any monastic order), who have no cure of souls, those who are parish priests being called Curés.

Abben, Sr.—This name has come down by long tradition in the English martyrology as that of a Briton whose father, a nobleman, was slain by Hengist at Stanhengeast, and who became a hermit in the forest between Oxford and Abingdon, the remains of which are known as Bagley Wood. He is said to have died in Ireland, and was once commemorated on October 27th.

Abbess.—A title formed by an abbreviation of the Latin word "Abbatissa," and designating the Mother Superior of a community of nuns. Her office, authority, and duties corresponded with those of an Abbot, except as regarded ministerial functions, which her sex rendered her incapable of performing. Abbesses were usually elected by the sisters over whom they were to rule, but were admitted to office by the bishop of the diocese with a special service of benediction and ceremony of installation. Thus Clifford, Bishop of London, wrote to Henry V. in 1421: "On Sunday, the fifth day of May, I was at your house of Syon, and there confirmed the elections of Dame Joan North, Abbess, and of Sir Thomas Fyscheborne, my well-beloved cousin, confessor of your said house; and the same day I blessed and staled the foresaid Abbess. The which persons I trust, by God's grace, shall much profit in that place, in that holy company both of men and of women, the which God of His mercy grant."

The Abbesses of Shaftesbury, Barking, St. Mary's at Winchester, and Wilton ranked as baronesses, but were not summoned to Parliament as the mitted abbots were. [ABBOT.]

Abbey.—This name, like that of "college," signifies both an institution consisting of persons, and the buildings in which the institution has its home. Thus, before the dissolution of monasteries, an abbey was—[1] a corporate body of monks or nuns, so called because they were presided over by an abbot or an abbess; [2] the church in which those monks or nuns held their services, and the domestic buildings in which they lived and carried on the various pursuits in which they were engaged.

Since the dissolution of the monasteries and the destruction of most of their buildings in the sixteenth century, the designation has been most generally used, in an ecclesiastical sense, for the church of such a monastic institution when it has not been constituted a cathedral, as in the case of Tewkesbury Abbey or Westminster. In some cases the ancient name still clings even to a cathedral, and thus the Cathedral of Durham is often called "the Abbey." [ABBOT, MONASTERY.]

Abbo.—Two distinguished men of this name are known in history. [I.] Abbo Parisiensis [about A.D. 880], a monk of St. Germain-de-Prés, who was present at the siege of Paris by the Normans in 887, and wrote a history of it, which has come down, with some of his sermons, to modern times. [II.] St. Abbo of Fleury [A.D. 945-1004], a Benedictine monk of great learning, born at Orleans, and much distinguished in the Universities of Paris and Rheims. He was associated with England by the assistance which he gave to his friend Oswald, Archbishop of York, in the foundation of Ramsey Abbey, where he was engaged for two years [A.D. 985], by the invitation of the archbishop, in settling and instructing the first members of that abbey. After his recall to France he was looked up to with great respect, was consulted on matters of religion by people from all parts of that country, and was present in synods at Basle, Mouson, and St. Denys. After being Abbot of Fleury for sixteen years, he was murdered by a Gascon at Réole, whither he had gone to carry out some reformation, and is commemorated as a martyr in the French calendars on November 13th, the day of his death. He left many literary works to posterity, including a Life of St. Edmund, King of East Anglia, whose name is perpetuated in the town of Bury St. Edmunds, or Edmondsbury.

Abbondio, Sr. [about A.D. 450], was a native of Thessalonica, who eventually became fourth Bishop of Como, in Italy, and is commemorated as the patron saint of that part of Lombardy. He was present at the Council of Constantinople, and represented St. Leo at that of Chalcedon.

Abbot.—The President or Father [see ABB] of a monastery, the name implying that the office was intended to be one of a paternal character, like that of the father of a family. Both the office and the name are traced back to St. Antony, under whom solitary ascetics first gathered themselves into communities, about the end of the third century. [MONASTERY.] In small monasteries which were "cells" of large abbeyes, the local superior was called the Prior, and the same was the case also in some large abbeyes, where, as at Durham and Ely, the bishop was Abbot ex officio. The name was not adopted by the Friars or the Jesuits.

Abbots were elected by the monks over whom they were to preside, but in the case of those mitred abbots who sat in the House of Lords the assent of the Sovereign was also necessary, and was probably given by a consent d'élire as in the election of bishops by cathedral chapters. [CONSENT D'ÉLIRE.] The election was then confirmed by the bishop of the diocese, who also instituted the new abbot to his spiritual charge by a formal service of benediction, and by the delivery of a pastoral staff, the ceremony taking place wherever the bishop might happen to be. Lastly, the newly-elected and instituted abbot was installed in the abbey over which he was appointed to preside by the archdeacon or his deputy, and was thus placed in actual and legal possession of the rights and privileges belonging to his office.

The duties of an abbot consisted of the general superintendence and control of the spiritual and temporal affairs of his monastery, but his jurisdiction was not without limit, for he was required to take the advice of the monks assembled in chapter on all important affairs, and an appeal might be made from his decision to the bishop of the diocese as visitor, who also made, or was entitled to make, periodical visitations of the abbey, unless it was exempted from the bishop's jurisdiction and placed under that of the Pope. But the abbot's jurisdiction did not extend over any other persons than the monks of his own monastery; and hence, while he bore a pastoral staff like that of a bishop as a symbol of jurisdiction, he carried it with the crook turned inward, to signify that his authority was thus limited within the bounds of the monastery.

Permission to wear mitres was often given to abbots, but it was a rule, apparently disregarded in England, that the mitre should be worn with the open part over the forehead instead of the broad side; and also that it should be of silver ornamented with gold, and unjewelled, instead of being made of pure gold ornamented with jewels, as was the mitre of a bishop. Such mitres were worn in England only by those abbots who sat in the House of Lords, and who were all of the Benedictine Order.

It is said that as many as a hundred mitred abbots were summoned to Parliament by Henry III. in A.D. 1264, but about A.D. 1330 the number was restricted to twenty-six by Edward III., though just before the dissolution the Abbot of Tavistock was added by Henry VIII. These twenty-seven abbots, with the Prior of Coventry, sat in the House of Lords by the right of baronies which they held of the Crown; the Abbesses of Shaftesbury, Barking, Wilton, and St. Mary's at Winchester also holding such baronies and ranking as peeresses, but not being summoned to Parliament. The following were the abbeyes whose abbots were thus Lords of Parliament at the dissolution of the monasteries:—St. Albans; Glastonbury; Westminster; Bury St. Edmunds; St. Bennet Holm, Norwich; Bardsey; Shrewsbury; Croyland; Abingdon; Evesham; Gloucester; Ramsey; St. Mary's, York; Tewkesbury; Reading; Battle; Winchelsea; Hyde, Winchester; Cirencester; Waltham; Malmesbury; Thorney; St. Augustine's, Canterbury; Selby; Coventry; Peterborough; Colchester; Tavistock. [The Prior of St. John of Jerusalem sat in the House of Lords, but as the Premier Baron of England, not as a cleric].

The twenty-seven mitred abbots and the mitred Prior of Coventry sat on "the Spiritual side" of the House of Lords, that on the right of the Throne, and behind the bishops; not being attired, however, in episcopal robes, but in black cassocks with gowns and hoods. On the dissolution of the monasteries the mitred abbots disappeared from their places, leaving twenty-eight vacancies, which have since been occupied by temporal peers; but the tradition of their presence is still kept up in the printed Votes of the House, where the spiritual peers, however few, have a column to themselves on that which is still called "the Spiritual side" of the House, that on the Sovereign's right hand; and the temporal peers who occupy the benches on the same side are named, with the other temporal peers, as on "the Temporal side," that on the left of the Throne. There is an old folio engraving of the House of Lords at the opening of Parliament in the beginning of Henry VIII.'s reign, in which the mitred abbots are in their seats behind the bishops, and which is reproduced in Fiddes' Life of Cardinal Wolsey. In the Irish House of Lords twenty-five abbots and priors sat as spiritual peers.

Abbott, GEORGE, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., was born at Guildford, on October 29th, 1562, and died in his palace at Croydon on August 4th, 1633. He was the second of three distinguished brothers, Robert, the eldest, becoming Bishop of Salisbury, and Maurice, the youngest, Lord Mayor of London, knighted by Charles I.: their father, Maurice Abbott, being a cloth manufacturer at Guildford. The archbishop was educated in the free school of his native town, and in Balliol College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow, and his brother Robert, Master. He became well known as a Puritan preacher and leader in Oxford, and in 1597 was elected Master of University College. In 1599 he was appointed Dean of Winchester, and the next year was Vice-Chancellor of Oxford. In the latter office he used his authority for the destruction of all sculptures and stained glass in which the Crucifixion and kindred subjects were represented, and used his influence with the Corporation of London, though unsuccessfully, to prevent the re-erection of the cross in Cheapside, which had been destroyed by a mob. Soon afterwards he came into collision with Laud, then a young man, and procured his censure by the University of Oxford for an anti-Calvinistic sermon, preached at St. Mary's, and these two were afterwards opposed to each other for many years as leaders of the two opposite parties in the Church.

Abbott became chaplain to the Earl of Dunbar, Treasurer of Scotland and a great personal friend of James I., and was recommended to the favour of the king on account of the assistance which he rendered to the earl in his attempt to restore Episcopacy in Scotland. This led to his promotion from the Deanery of Winchester to the Bishopric of Lichfield, to which see he was consecrated on December 3rd, 1609. A few weeks afterwards, on January 20th, he was translated to London, and on the death of Archbishop Bancroft, in 1611, he became Archbishop of Canterbury, to the great disappointment of the majority of the clergy, who expected that the venerable and learned Andrewes, then Bishop of Ely, would have succeeded Bancroft. "The Bishop of London," wrote Calvert, Secretary of State, in a letter to Sir Thomas Edmonds, "by a strong north wind coming out of Scotland, is blown across the Thames to Lambeth, the king having professed to the bishop himself, as also to the Lords of his Council, that it is neither the respect of his learning, his wisdom, nor his sincerity (although he is well persuaded there is not any one of them wanting in him) that hath moved him to prefer him before the rest of his fellows, but merely the recommendation of his faithful servant Dunbar that is dead, whose suit on behalf of the bishop he cannot and will not suffer to lose his intention."

Under the rule of Archbishop Abbott, and by his favour, the Puritan party made great strides towards that power and pre-eminence which they attained in the next reign, and it is on this account that his name is best known in connection with the great position to which he attained. But he soon lost favour with the king, was much disliked by the bishops, and became unpopular with the multitude through the haughty moroseness which grew upon him with the infirmities of age. On July 24th, 1621, he also met with an extraordinary and unhappy misfortune, such as no English bishop probably had ever met with before, and one which was most incongruous with his position. The archbishop was singularly fond of hunting, being the only sporting bishop of his own or of subsequent ages, and while following his favourite pursuit in Lord Zouche's park at Bramshill, in Hampshire, killed one of the keepers by transfixing him with an arrow which he had intended for the stag. By the law of the Church this unfortunate homicide rendered the archbishop incapable of performing any ecclesiastical function, and by the law of the State all his personal estate was forfeited to the Crown. The king issued his pardon, which relieved him from the latter penalty, and appointed a commission of bishops and judges, who recommended that the archbishop should be restored to his ecclesiastical position, by an absolution and dispensation given to him by some of his suffragans. But although this was done, the unhappy position into which Abbott had been brought by his ghastly misadventure continued to be a matter of discussion both at home and abroad; few persons approved of his conduct in resuming his duties as the chief bishop of the Church of England; and some bishops elect declined to be consecrated by him. Many pious and learned men considered that he should have retired from his office and spent the rest of his days in privacy. It was partly on account of this widespread feeling, but nominally because he was much incapacitated from the performance of his duties by the gout, that in 1627 a commission of five bishops was appointed to perform them. But two years afterwards the archbishop appeared again at Court and in Parliament, and had, indeed, consecrated three bishops during the latter half of the year 1628. For the remaining four years of his life he lived in much retirement at his palace at Croydon, and there he died at the age of seventy-one. He was buried, by his own direction, in the Lady Chapel of Trinity Church, Guildford. He left a few unimportant lectures, sermons, and pamphlets behind him, but his chief claim to a place among learned and literary bishops is founded on his position as one of the revisers of the English Bible.

Abbott, ROBERT, the elder brother of Archbishop Abbott, was born at Guildford in 1560, and died at his episcopal palace in Salisbury on March 2nd, 1617. He preceded his brother to Balliol College, Oxford, became a Fellow of that college in 1581, and in his later life, in the year 1609, was elected to its Mastership. At this time he had won the special approval of James I., by his works against Bellarmine, and in defence of the Reformation, and having been appointed a Fellow of Chelsea College, he was further, when a vacancy occurred, appointed Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. In 1615 he was promoted to the See of Salisbury, where he gained for himself the reputation of an active chief pastor and a hospitable prelate, and where he urged forward the restoration of the cathedral, which had become much dilapidated through neglect and spoliation. Occupying the see for only two years, he died at a comparatively early age from a very painful disorder to which studious men were then especially liable; but his death is said to have been hastened by the indignation which his brother, the archbishop, expressed at his second marriage. His works were chiefly in Latin, and were not of any lasting interest, some still remaining in manuscript in the Bodleian Library.

Abbreviators.—Officers of the Pope's chancery, who are so called because they are charged with the formal drawing up of breves, or briefs, bulls, and other official documents which proceed from the Court of Rome.

Abdias, St.—He is commemorated in the Eastern Church on October 28th, and is said to have been the first Bishop of Babylon, consecrated by SS. Simon and Jude.

Abdon and Sennen, SS. [A.D. 250].—Two Persian princes, who suffered martyrdom at Rome under the Emperor Decius. In the ancient calendars of the Churches of England and Rome they are commemorated on July 30th, the name being found in the former as far back as A.D. 730. In one of the catacombs, that of Pontianus [CATACOMBS], there exists a fresco painting, of not later date than the seventh century, in which our Lord in glory is represented as placing crowns upon the heads of the two martyrs; and it is supposed that the tomb on the front of which this is painted contains their remains, which are recorded to have been removed to this cemetery in the time of Constantine, about seventy-five years after their death. In Spain, superstitious people are accustomed to invoke the protection of SS. Abdon and Sennen during hailstorms.

Abecedarians.—A sect of Lutherans, otherwise known as the Zwickau prophets. They separated from Luther about 1521, under the leadership of Nicholas Stork, a weaver of Zwickau; Thomas Münzer, the Lutheran pastor of the town; Mark Thomas, another weaver; and Mark Stübner, a student of Wittenberg. Their distinctive principle was that Christians should abstain from human learning, even from the A B C, or alphabet, and thus leave their minds open to receive direct Divine guidance by inspiration. The sect became seditious and troublesome—Münzer being the leader of a rebellion in which he proclaimed himself the head of a spiritual kingdom—and on the death of its leaders was absorbed into the general body of German Anabaptists.

Abecedarian Psalms and Hymns.—Those which were so composed that the successive letters of the A B C, or alphabet, formed the initial letters of the successive verses. [ALPHABET PSALMS, &c.]

A'Becket. [BECKET.]

Abel, THOMAS [d. 1540].—One of Queen Catherine of Aragon's chaplains, who became a victim of her husband Henry the VIII.'s cruelty. He was a Doctor of Divinity of Oxford, a man of much learning, well acquainted with Continental languages, and a great master of instrumental music. His faithfulness to the queen involved him in the controversies respecting her divorce, and in 1534 he printed a tract against it, which brought him to the Tower. On the wall of the Beauchamp Tower in that fortress he has left an interesting memorial of his imprisonment in the shape of a sculptured rebus of his name—a bell, with the letter A upon it, and THOMAS above. Dr. Abel was burned in Smithfield on July 30th, 1540, "for denying the king's supremacy, and affirming his marriage with Queen Catherine to be good." Three Protestants—Dr. Barnes, Gerard, parson of Hovey Lane, and Jerome, Vicar of Stepney—were burned at the same stake.

Abélard, PETER [A.D. 1079-1142].—The name of Abélard has been made familiar to modern times by the romantic story of his intrigue and marriage with a young, beautiful, and learned lady named Héloïse, or Louisa, by the translation of their correspondence into French and English, and by Pope's poetical version of it. But his place in these pages is as one who greatly influenced the theology of the Middle Ages, and who may be said to have originated that school of thought which in modern times has been called Rationalism.

Abélard was the eldest son of noble parents, and was born at Palais, near Nantes, in Brittany, twelve years after the Norman Conquest. His ardent love of learning induced him to give up his right of inheritance to his younger brother, and to establish himself in Paris. At that time, the learning which was at a later age to be found in an university had its home in the "schools," or lecture-rooms, of cathedrals and monasteries; and it was under William of Champeaux, the head of the cathedral school and Archdeacon of Paris, that Abélard's great genius was developed. Eventually, the pupil set up a lecture-room for himself, first at Melun and Corbeil, and afterwards at Paris, in which he propounded a system of philosophic theology much opposed to that of his teacher—a system which, divested of abstruse philosophical terms, may be called one of free inquiry. His eloquence and learning, and the novelty of his principles, drew thousands of students to his lectures from all parts of Europe, and at the age of forty he had long held a position of the greatest popularity and authority as a leader of thought. Among his pupils were trained one Pope, Celestine II., nineteen cardinals, more than fifty archbishops and bishops, French, English, and German, and many of those, such as Arnold of Brescia, who afterwards caused trouble to the Christian world by carrying Abélard's principles to a much greater extreme than he did himself.

It was when he was at the height of his popularity and influence that Abélard's passionate intrigue with Héloïse arose. After the birth of a son, they secretly married, Héloïse being then about eighteen years of age; but the marriage was shortly followed by the perpetration of a brutal outrage upon Abélard by some of her relatives, which led the husband to retire from the world in the Monastery of St. Denys, and the wife in the Convent of Argenteuil. Twenty years later, having in the meanwhile migrated to the Monastery of St. Gildas, in Brittany, he again began to lecture in public, and was soon surrounded by crowds of auditors. But the boldness of his theological statements brought him into collision with the ecclesiastical authorities. His first principle all through had been that nothing is to be believed but what has first been understood—a principle the general acceptance of which would cause all mysteries to vanish from religion. The subtle and eloquent arguments with which Abélard applied this principle to the received doctrines of Christianity were very attractive to young students, but experienced theologians saw that his teaching was in reality a revival of old heresies in new forms. "When he talks of the Trinity," said St. Bernard, "Abélard savours of Arius; when he talks of grace he savours of Pelagius; when he talks of the Person of Christ he savours of Nestorius." Hence, the rest of his life was spent in weary endeavours to explain away his language before tribunals at which he was accused of heresy, his constant protest being that he taught in novel language, and with strict regard to logic, not heresy, but the very truths which had always been maintained as the orthodox principles of theology. Having been condemned to perpetual retirement, and inhibited from teaching or writing, by the Council of Sens, in 1140, Abélard appealed to the Pope. But Peter the Venerable, the Abbot of Clugni, brought about a compromise; and the last two years of his life having been spent at the Monastery of Clugni, Abélard died at that of St. Marcellus, near Chalons-on-the-Saône, whither he had gone for change of air, on April 21st, 1142. His widow survived him for twenty-two years, being, from 1129 until her death in 1164, Abbess of the Convent of the Paraclete, which he had built for her and her nuns when they were driven from Argenteuil. There they lay buried in the same coffin for seven centuries and a half; but the convent having been destroyed during the Revolution, their remains were transferred, in 1817, to the Cemetery of Père la Chaise. There the grave of the aged ascetics is sentimentally regarded as that of two romantic young lovers; but Abélard the philosopher and theologian is known to few of the many who visit it.

Abelites, ABELIANS, ABELOITES, ABELONITES, ABENONITES.—These are the various forms of the name by which a small sect designated itself in the fifth century. Nothing is known of their history beyond the statement of St. Augustine, that some of them lingered on till his time [d. 430] in his diocese—that of Hippo, in North Africa. Their distinctive principle was that of compulsory marriage, with compulsory abstinence from the procreation of children; and they named themselves after Abel, alleging that he dwelt with his wife in this manner. To continue their sect, each couple adopted a boy and a girl, whom they brought up under an obligation to follow the same course. The object of the sect was not that of ascetic life, but that of preventing the perpetuation of original sin, the obvious fact being apparently lost sight of that heaven is replenished by those who, having been born in original sin, are yet sanctified to become the children of God. As might be expected, the sect was not numerous, and was short-lived.

Abgar [Lat., Abgarus].—This was a titular name borne by the Under-kings or Toparchs of Edessa, a small kingdom in the south-west of Mesopotamia, assumed on coming to the throne, apparently in the same manner as Pharaoh among the Egyptians, or Cæsar among the Romans. The name is interesting in Christian history on account of a very early tradition connected with the fifteenth of the kings who bore it—Abgar the Black [A.D. 9–46], who was contemporary with Christ's ministry. Eusebius, the Church historian [A.D. 265–338], found the narrative of it in the archives of Edessa, in which it was stated that Abgar, having suffered much from an incurable disease, heard of the miracles of healing wrought by Christ, and appealed to His mercy in the following letter:—

"Abgar, Prince of Edessa, sends greeting to Jesus, the excellent Saviour, Who has appeared in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

I have heard the reports respecting Thee and Thy cures, which are effected without the use of medicines or herbs. For, as it is said, Thou dost cause the blind to see, the lame to walk: Thou dost cleanse lepers and cast out unclean spirits and demons: Thou dost heal those that are tormented by long disease, and Thou dost raise the dead. And hearing all these things of Thee, I conclude that one of two things must be true: either Thou art God Himself descended from heaven, to be able to work such wonders as are reported of Thee; or else Thou art the Son of God. Now, therefore, I have written beseeching Thee to visit me, and to heal the disease with which I am afflicted. I have also heard that the Jews murmur against Thee, and are plotting harm against Thee: but I have a kingdom which, though very small, is a noble one, and it shall be sufficient for Thee and me."

To this letter of Abgar the following alleged reply was found by Eusebius:—

"Blessed art thou, O Abgar, for having believed on Me without seeing Me. For it is written concerning Me, That they who see Me shall not believe in Me, in order that they who see Me not may believe and live. But as to thy request that I should come to thee to heal thee, it is necessary that I should here fulfil all things for which I am sent into the world, and when they are fulfilled, return to Him who sent Me. But after I have been received up I will send unto thee one of My disciples, who shall heal thee of thy disease, and give life to thee and to thy people."

The narrative found by Eusebius went on to say that after our Lord's ascension Thaddeus, one of the Seventy, visited Abgar, healed him of his disease, and converted him and his subjects to the Christian faith. A later historian, Moses of Chorène [d. A.D. 470], in his history of Armenia, adds to the narrative, as given by Eusebius, that our Lord sent His portrait to Abgar, either at the time or on the visit of Thaddeus, and also gives a correspondence between Abgar and the Emperor Tiberius respecting the Crucifixion of our Lord. Two pictures—the one in the Church of St. Sylvester, at Rome, and the other in that of the same dedication at Genoa—claim to be the original of this portrait. The former is thought to be a copy of some very ancient Byzantine picture, and represents a beautiful, calm, and rather youthful face, with a forked beard, straight nose, and hair parted in the middle.

In the Syrian Church King Abgar is commemorated as a saint on June 20th.

Abjuration.—A formal act, by which heretics and those suspected of heresy repudiated and renounced their errors, and were thus prepared for absolution and restoration to communion. Four kinds of abjuration are distinguished by the canonists:—[1] de formali, by a notorious apostate or heretic; [2] de vehementi, by one strongly tainted with heretical opinions; [3] de violenta suspicione, by one strongly suspected of them; and [4] de levi, by one only slightly suspected. The first of these was made publicly, the others in more or less privacy before witnesses. There is no provision for such discipline in the modern Church of England.

Ablavius.—A famous orator, who lived in the time of Theodosius the Younger, who joined the Novatians, and eventually became Novatian Bishop at Nicæa, about A.D. 430. He adopted the principles of the Novatians in their utmost severity, denying that there could be any forgiveness of sins except in baptism. [NOVATIANS.]

Ablution. [WATER, CEREMONIAL USE OF.]

Abracadabra.—This strange word is supposed to have been the Persian name for Mithras, the sun-god. In Christian times it was used by the Basilidian heretics as an amulet to charm away fever. It was written in a triangular form on a square piece of paper, thus:—

A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A B R
A B R A C A D A B
A B R A C A D A
A B R A C A D
A B R A C A
A B R A C
A B R A
A B R

The paper was then folded with the writing inside, stitched into the form of a cross, and worn in the bosom for nine days, when it was thrown away into a running stream with some absurd ceremonies. Amulets of a somewhat similar character are in use to this day for the cure of toothache among country people in England.

Abrahamites (1).—A local sect of the Paulicians, formed at Antioch, about A.D. 805, by a native of that city, named Abraham, or Ibrahim. The sect was very short-lived.

Abrahamites (2).—A modern sect, which existed in the last century at Pardubitz, in Bohemia. They took their name from the patriarch Abraham, professing to have adopted the religion which he practised before his circumcision. The Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments were the only parts of the Bible which they accepted.

Abraxas, or Abrasax.—A mystical name for the First Cause in the system of Basilides [BASILIDIANS]. In Greek notation the numbers signified by the letters of which it is composed make up 365, as also do those which spell the name of Mithras, the Persian sun-god :—

β	2	ε	5
ρ	100	θ	10
α	1	θ	9
ε	60	ρ	100
α	1	ρ	1
ς	200	ς	200

And the same sum is arrived at when the word is spelt Abrasax. This indicates some connection between the mystic superstitions which Basilides attempted to graft on to Christianity and the light or fire-worship theology of the Persian Magi. The mystic name is found engraved on great numbers of precious stones, by itself or in combination with symbolical figures; and these stones, which vary greatly in their design, have received the generic name of "Gnostic gems," or "Abraxas gems." They were probably used as amulets.

Abrenunciations.—A name given to that part of the baptismal vow in which the person to be baptised renounces "the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh," so as not to "follow or be led by them."

Absolution.—The act and the form by which a person is absolved. The verb "absolve" is derived from the Lat. solvere, to loosen, absolvere, to set free; and in mediæval English it is found in the French form "assoile."

Absolution was a familiar term in the Roman Civil Law, signifying the formal pronouncement of acquittal or release by a judge having authority to pronounce it; and in a similar way it is used as a term of Ecclesiastical Law for the release of a person from Church censures, and from the penalties which belong to them. In a spiritual sense absolution is the pronouncement, by an authorised person and in the name of God, of the pardon and forgiveness of sins to those who repent of them.

Absolution, or remission of sins, thus follows confession of sins, as when the penitent David confessed in the form, "I have sinned against the Lord," and Nathan the prophet absolved him with the words, "The Lord also hath put away thy sin" [2 Sam. xii. 13]. Whatever form is used, it is regarded as authoritative, and as intended to convey to the penitent sinner that loosing from the position of a sinner under condemnation for sin which its name implies. But there has always been some variety in the forms of absolution, some being much more authoritative in tone than others. Hence they have been classed as Precatory, or Optative, and Declaratory, or Indicative; the key-note of the former being "May the Lord absolve thee," that of the latter, "I absolve thee in the Name of the Lord."

The precatory form of absolution has been most generally used in all ages of the Christian Church for public services, and a good example of it is found in the Communion Service of the Church of England, in which, after the general confession of sins, "the priest (or the bishop being present) is directed to stand up, and turning himself to the people, pronounce this absolution :—

"Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Who of His great mercy hath promised forgiveness of sins to all them that with hearty repentance and true faith turn unto Him; Have mercy upon you, pardon and deliver you from all your sins, confirm and strengthen you in all goodness, and bring you to everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The indicative form of absolution is associated with individual confession of sins—a use which may be illustrated from the Anglican service for the visitation of the sick. "Here," the rubric reads, "shall the sick person be moved to make a special confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter. After which confession, the priest shall absolve him (if he humbly and heartily desire it) after this sort :

"Our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath left power to His Church to absolve all sinners who truly repent and believe in Him; of His great mercy forgive thee thine offences : And by His authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

A form very similar to this is also used in the Eastern Church :—

"May Jesus Christ our Lord and God, through His grace, bounty, and love to mankind, forgive thee my child N. all thy sins : And I, an unworthy priest, by the power committed to me, do pardon and absolve thee from all thy sins, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

It need hardly be observed that in these, and in all other forms of absolution, the person pronouncing them is understood to act ministerially, all sections of the Christian Church agreeing fully with the principle stated in the question of the Jews, "Who can forgive sins but God only?" [Mark ii. 7]. Beyond this, no reference need be made to controversies as to the spiritual value of absolution.

Abstainers. [TEETOTALLERS.]

Abstinence.—That form of fasting in which no animal food is eaten, but in which other kinds of food are partaken of without any ecclesiastical restriction, and in which eggs, cheese, and butter are not included under the designation of animal food. The "days of abstinence" in the calendar of the Church of England are the Rogation Days, the 40 days of Lent, the eves of certain saints' days, and all Fridays except a Friday on which Christmas Day occurs. In the Roman Communion Saturday is also a day of abstinence.

Abstinentes.—A sect which existed for a short time in France and Spain at the end of the third century and beginning of the fourth, during the persecution carried on under the Emperors Diocletian and Maximian. They assumed the name they bore because their leading principle was that of abstinence from marriage and from animal food: marriage being considered as a hindrance to holiness, and animal food as an invention of the Evil One. Little is known of the history of the sect under this name, and it is probable that it developed into that of the Priscillianists in the fourth century. [PRISCILLIANISTS.]

Abstract.—This is a term imported into theology from logic. It is opposed to "Concrete," and denotes quality as distinct from person. Thus the Jews are called "the Circumcision," or the captive Jews of Babylon, "the Captivity." So also God is called Wisdom, Goodness, rather than wise and good; and Christ is called our Salvation and our Redemption.

Abuna.—The title given to the Metropolitan Patriarch and only Bishop of the Abyssinian Church. It is equivalent to Abbas, and Papa, or Pope.

Abyssinia, CHURCH OF.—Christianity was originally introduced into Ethiopia, a country now represented by Nubia and Abyssinia, in the Apostolic age, Irenæus [A.D. 130–200] and Eusebius both recording that it was first made known through the preaching of Queen Candace's Treasurer [Acts viii. 26–40], known traditionally by the name of Indich. But it appears at that time to have taken no permanent hold upon the country, and the existing Church of Abyssinia owes its foundation to missionaries who were sent there from Alexandria in the first half of the fourth century. The story of this second conversion of Ethiopia is a romantic one. A Christian philosopher of Tyre, named Meropeus, undertook a voyage for scientific purposes, carrying with him his two nephews, Frumentius and Ædesius. Returning to Egypt by the Red Sea, the crew landed on the coast of Abyssinia to obtain a supply of fresh water, when the whole of the voyagers were murdered except the two boys, who were retained as slaves in the service of the king. Both of them attained to high offices at court, Ædesius becoming cup-bearer to the king, and Frumentius secretary. On the death of the king, Frumentius became guardian to his two young sons and successors, and his influence being very great, he provided a Church for the Christian merchants who traded with Abyssinia, and otherwise prepared the way for introducing Christianity into the country. The younger brother, Ædesius, had now returned to Tyre, where he had been ordained priest, and this suggested to Frumentius that he himself might assist the cause he had at heart more effectively as a Christian minister than as a layman. He accordingly visited Alexandria in the year 326, and by the persuasion of the great St. Athanasius, then Patriarch of Alexandria, Frumentius was consecrated to the Episcopate, his see being fixed at Axum, now known as Auxuma.

On his return to Abyssinia, Frumentius found his former pupils, Abreha and Atzbeha, reigning as joint sovereigns, and they showed so great zeal in assisting him to propagate Christianity that they are commemorated as saints on Oct. 1st in the Abyssinian calendar. Frumentius continued his good work for many years, converting great numbers, organising churches, and translating the Holy Scriptures into the Ethiopic language. He died about A.D. 360, and is commemorated in the Abyssinian calendar on Dec. 14th, July 20th, and Sept. 20th. His Abyssinian name, Fremonatōs, though he is also called Salama, is perpetuated in that of the city of Fremona. The Ethiopic, or Abyssinian, Bible is a translation of the Alexandrine Septuagint. The Liturgy is also derived from that of Alexandria, being of the same family with the Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril and the Greek Liturgy of St. Mark.

Since the time of St. Frumentius Christianity has never again become extinct in Abyssinia. The Church is so far dependent on that of Egypt that its Abuna, or Metropolitan Bishop, is always appointed and consecrated by the Patriarch of Alexandria, and is always an Egyptian, not an Abyssinian. It is, however, singularly Jewish in its character, the Sabbath being observed, Christians being circumcised, and Mosaic distinctions of clean and unclean food being kept up. Its creed was also corrupted in the sixth century by the Monophysite heresy respecting the two natures of our Lord [MONOPHYTES]. In other respects Abyssinian Christianity is of the same type as that which is found in the principal Churches of the East. Attempts were made in 1177 and in 1441 to bring the Abyssinian Church under the control of the Pope, and for a time a decree of Eugenius IV., passed in 1441, uniting the two Churches, was accepted in Abyssinia; but the union did not long continue, and in later times the Abyssinians have received their Abuna, as in more ancient days, from the Egyptian, or Coptic, Church.

A.C.—The abbreviation for "Anno Christi," in the year of Christ, or for "Ante Christum," before Christ. But "B.C." is more commonly used to signify the latter.

Acacians.—The followers of Acacius [A.D. 336–367], Bishop of Cæsarea, in the Holy Land, who succeeded Eusebius, the Church historian, in that see. They adopted a form of Arianism which differed little from the principal heresy itself [ARIANS]. Among the many parties into which the Arians broke up, the Acacians are classed between the SEMI-ARIANS and the ANOMÆANS; but they professed orthodoxy during the reigns of the orthodox Emperors Jovian and Valentinian, and subscribed to the Nicene Creed. They are lost sight of as a distinct party after the death of their leader.

Acca, St. [A.D. 688—740].—The fifth of the Bishops of Hexham [HEXHAM]. He was educated by Bosa, Archbishop of York, and afterwards became the intimate and devoted friend of the celebrated WILFRID. He accompanied Wilfrid to Rome as his chaplain, and made good use of his travels by diligently acquiring such knowledge as he could not have obtained at home, and thus unconsciously training himself for his future position as bishop. On the death of his friend, in 709, Acca was appointed to be his successor at Hexham, and he ruled the diocese for twenty-five years. He was a contemporary and friend of the Venerable Bede, and in one of the latest chapters of his Ecclesiastical History the latter writes warmly in his praise. Besides completing and adorning the magnificent church and monastery which Wilfrid had begun, (and part of which still remains) Bishop Acca took great pains to revive the knowledge and use of good Church music, he himself being an expert singer. He invited to Hexham, and kept him there for twelve years as precentor and musical instructor, a celebrated singer, named Maban, who had himself learned Church music from the successors of St. Augustine and his missionary brethren, the disciples of St. Gregory, so celebrated as the composer of the Gregorian tones in their present form. Acca also collected a large number of books, for which he erected a noble library adjoining his cathedral. Bede adds respecting his character that Bishop Acca "is most learned in Holy Writ, most pure in the confession of the Catholic Faith, and most watchful in maintaining the discipline of the Church; nor does he intend ever to cease to be so until he shall receive the reward of his pious devotion." About A.D. 733, St. Acca was driven from his see for a time, but under what circumstances is not known. He returned to Hexham to die on Oct. 20th, 740, and was buried at the east end of his cathedral church. Two crosses which are supposed to have stood at the head and foot of his grave are preserved in the Chapter Library at Durham. St. Acca is commemorated on Feb. 19th in the ancient calendar of the Church of England, and the parish church of Aycliffe, in the county of Durham, is dedicated in his name. Several of his writings are still extant, and he seems to have taken much interest in the writings of his friend, the Venerable Bede.

Accaophari.—This name was assumed by, or given to, a sect of heretical ascetics of the third or fourth century, who held the then common error that everything which is material or which gives pleasure is necessarily evil. Perhaps they were identical with the Saccophori, who would wear nothing but sackcloth; those known by either name being again HYDROPARASTATÆ, or water-offerers, so named because they offered water instead of wine in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist.

Accendite.—The first word, and thus the title, of a short anthem, sung in some foreign churches on lighting the tapers for any solemn service. The words are, "Accendite facies lampadarum; eia: psallite, fratres, hora est; cantate Deo; eia, eia, eia."

Accensorii.—A name, "Lighters," used in the Primitive Church for those who were afterwards called Ceroforarii, or Acolytes. [ACOLYTES.]

Accidents.—A philosophical term which is used to express the non-essential qualities of a substance, such as taste, appearance, or colour, any of which may change or cease to exist, and yet the substance itself remain. Thus Roman Catholic theologians consider that the sensible qualities of the consecrated elements in the Eucharist are accidents of that into which those elements have been transubstantiated: the natural bread and wine appearing to exist, and being thus called the "species," or appearance of natural substances, but having in reality passed out of existence, the supernatural substance having taken the place of the natural substance.

Accommodation.—This term is used in Biblical science to signify the manner in which figurative or parabolical language is sometimes used to bring Divine truths within the reach of human understanding. Thus it is a Divine truth that God is a Spirit, "without body, parts, or passions;" but as it is impossible to form a definite conception of such a Being, the truth is accommodated by the representation of God as walking, sitting on a throne, having eyes, arms and feet: as repenting, being jealous, or angry. Our Lord's Parables are a similar accommodation of truth. It is important to remember that no Divine revelation can misrepresent, or be inconsistent with, truth; and that the use of actual untruths for the purpose of making truths intelligible is not a kind of "accommodation" to be found in the Holy Bible.

Acephali.—A word derived from the Greek privative "a" and "cephale," and signifying without a head or chief. The designation is used in Church history for several ecclesiastical parties which refused to follow their recognised leaders [MONOPHY-ists]; but its most general application is to priests who repudiate the authority of their bishops, or bishops who repudiate that of their metropolitans. To speak of clergy as "acephalous" is therefore to stigmatise them as assuming an independence contrary to the principles of the Church to which they belong.

Acindynus.—A monk of Constantinople in the middle of the fourteenth century, who was associated with Barlaam in opposing the strange mystical theories of the Greek Quietists, or HESYCHASTS.

Acisclus and Victoria.—Two martyrs of the Diocletian persecution, who suffered at Cordova, in Spain, and the first of whom appears sometimes in English martyrologies, under the name Acyldy. There is a pretty and very ancient legend that sweet and fresh roses spring up on their graves every year on the day of their martyrdom, the day on which they are commemorated, November 17th.

Accometes.—A name, the Sleepless [Gr. a koimētai], given to those communities of monks who told off a portion of their members into watches, so that the prayers and praises of the monastery might be continually offered, "without ceasing," day and night. The practice is said to have originated with a Syrian monk named Alexander, who lived in the fifth century, and built a monastery on the Euphrates for the purpose of carrying it out. Another large monastery was shortly built for the order near Constantinople; and they also occupied that of St. John the Baptist, which had been built by a nobleman named John Studius, from whom the Accometes are sometimes called Studites. The system became common in the West under the name of "laus perennis," and lights were kept burning all night before the altar of Durham Cathedral, "to signify that the" great Benedictine "House was always watching unto God."

Acolyte.—The name of the highest of the four minor orders of the Western Church. It is derived from the Greek word [akolouthos] for an attendant, the duty of the acolyte being to wait upon or serve the deacon and sub-deacon at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, to prepare the cruets of wine and water, to carry the incense, and to light the candles. The office is a very ancient one, being mentioned in the third and fourth centuries, and a form for the ordination of acolytes being given in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory [A.D. 590–604]. In the ancient Church of England the acolyte was commonly called the “ceroferarius,” or “taper-bearer,” this name representing his principal duty during Divine service: that of bearing a taper in processions, at the singing of the Gospel, or behind the clergy when standing at the altar. He was also called a “Colet.”

Acolyth. [ACOLYTE.]

Acolythist. [ACOLYTE.]

Acrostic.—A word or name formed by combining in order the initial letters of successive verses or words. It was a favourite form of composition in the early ages of Christianity, being much used for hymns. The following imitation of such acrostics may be given by way of illustration :—

Jesus, who for me hast borne
Every sorrow, pain, and scorn,
Standing at man's judgment seat,
Unjust judgment there to meet :
Save me by Thy mercy sweet.

Christ, who on the cruel tree
Hanging all the day for me,
Reigned at eve in victory :
In Thy victory let me share,
See Thee now Thou reignest where Thou our mansions dost prepare.

Lord, I look to Thee alone,
On Thy cross and on Thy throne,
Raise my heart to Thee above,
Draw me heavenward by Thy love.

The acrostic was also very commonly used for sepulchral inscriptions, many such epitaphs being preserved.

But the most striking and famous of all ancient acrostics is one that was used by the primitive Christians as a secret symbol of the faith. This is the Greek word Ichthys—that is, Fish—a word formed from the initial letters of five titles of our Lord, which form the sentence, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour."

Ἰησοῦς	[I ēsous].
Χριστὸς	[CH ristos].
Θεοῦ	[TH eou].
Υἱὸς	[U ios].
Σωτὴρ	[S ôtēr].

This symbolic name is referred to by Tertullian [A.D. 150—220], who writes, in his Treatise on Baptism: "We little fishes are born in conformity with ΙΧΘΥΣ, our Lord Jesus Christ." It is also referred to by Clement of Alexandria, St. Augustine, and other early Christian writers; and is explained by Optatus [about A.D. 370] in the following words: "This is the Fish, by which is meant Christ: which by the invocation in baptism is introduced into the fontal waters, that what had been water might from the Word Fish become a fish-pool. The name of which Fish, in Greek, comprehends in one Name, by each of its letters, a collection of holy names, ΙΧΘΥΣ, which in Latin is Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, Salvator." It is also found in a long memorial inscription on a marble tablet discovered underground in an ancient cemetery at Autun, commemorating Pectorius, son of Ascandius, and belonging to some period between the third and the fifth centuries. This inscription is itself an acrostic, each verse of the Greek beginning successively with one of the letters of the word Ιχθύς.

Act of Faith (1).—A short devotional formula, well known or extemporised, in which the person using it solemnly declares before God his or her belief. Such an Act of Faith is the rehearsal of the Creed in Divine Service and at other times. Such Acts of Faith were also the ejaculations of St. Peter, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God" [Matt. xii. 16], and St. Thomas, "My Lord and My God" [John xx. 28].

Act of Faith (2). [AURO DA FÉ.]

Acta Sanctorum.—This title, "The Acts of the Saints," belongs especially to a vast collection of the histories and legends of all persons recognised as saints in the ancient martyrologies and in the modern Roman Calendar. It was begun early in the seventeenth century and is still going on, the work at present numbering sixty large and thick folio volumes, and taking in the lives of all the saints who are commemorated from January 1st to the end of October. Many of the volumes contain more than a thousand closely-printed pages in double columns, and the month of October alone occupies twelve volumes.

The history of this great work is a record of the most devoted and persevering literary labour that was ever undertaken, and extends over nearly three centuries. It was originally planned, about the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, by a learned Jesuit of Bois-le-duc, in North Brabant, named Heribert Rosweyd, who made large collections of books and materials, which he proposed to work up into seventeen folio volumes. On his death, in 1629, his collections were placed, by the order of the Jesuits, in the hands of John van Bolland [A.D. 1596—1665], a learned monk, thirty-four years of age, whose great ambition was to serve as a missionary in China, where martyrdom would have been his fate. He much extended the original plan, and commenced that systematic organisation of research and labour by which alone so enormous a literary scheme could be accomplished. A great library was formed, literary tours were undertaken, and provision was made for training up a succession of scholars, the famous Bollandists, whose learning should be specially adapted for the work. Bollandus laboured at his task for thirty-four years; after six years, he received a coadjutor in the person of Godfrey Henschen, known as Henschenius, who worked with equal zeal for forty-six years. In 1659 their labours were taken up by Daniel van Papenbroek, who continued to be the head of the Bollandists until 1714, having thus accomplished a long course of literary toil extending over fifty-five years—a toil which he continued even after he became blind, and which he was still engaged on when death came to him, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. The Acta Sanctorum had reached the fifty-first folio volume and the beginning of the October calendar when, in 1773, the Jesuits were suppressed by a Bull of Clement XIV., and the work was stopped. Shortly afterwards the Empress Maria Theresa gave the surviving Bollandists a home for themselves and their library in the Abbey of Caudenberg, but this abbey was suppressed by the Emperor Joseph in 1780, and they removed with a much-diminished library to Brussels. A fifty-third folio was printed in 1794, and then the French Revolution put an end to the labours of the Bollandists for forty years. They were revived once more in 1837, a new library being collected, and scholars training themselves for the work. But although only two months of the calendar remain, the modern Bollandists are accustomed to say that the grandfathers are not yet born of the men who will see the end of this wonderful serial.

Acts, Apocryphal. [APOCRYPHAL BOOKS OF EARLY CHRISTIAN TIMES.]

Actistetes.—An early sect of heretics, who took their name from their leading tenet, that the human nature of Christ was not created [ἐκτίστος], a tenet contrary to the clause of the Nicene Creed, which states that He "was made man." As nothing is uncreated but God, this was a denial of the Incarnation, being a denial that Christ was man.

Actual Grace. [GRACE.]

Actual Sin. [SIN.]

Acuanites.—This was a name given to the MANICHEES of Mesopotamia, from their leader, Acuan.

A. D.—The abbreviation of "Anno Domini," "in the year of our Lord." This means the year which reckons as so many years from the birth of our Lord, A.D. 1884 being thus reckoned as the eighteen hundred and eighty-fourth year from that event, or the eighteen hundred and eighty-fourth year of the Christian era.

When this era was first adopted it was supposed that the birth of our Lord occurred, according to Roman reckoning, in the year from the foundation of Rome [A.U.C.] 754, that is, the year of the world [A.M.] 4004. But it is now ascertained that a mistake was made by early chronologers as to the length of Herod the Great's reign, and that the actual date of our Lord's birth was A.U.C. 750, or A.M. 4000. To avoid infinite confusion, however, this year is called B.C. 4, and not A.D. 1, and thus the conventional A.D. is the year when our Lord was really four years of age.

The Christian era was first used in Italy in the sixth century, but was not generally adopted in Europe until the eighth century. In the East it did not come into universal use until after the capture of Constantinople, in the middle of the fifteenth century.

Adalbert. [ADELBEET.]

Adamantius. [ORIGEN.]

Adamites.—The earliest of several fanatical sects, which adopted the practice of worshipping in a state of nudity, such as that of Adam before the Fall, under the idea that carnal desires would be entirely extirpated when temptation in its most extreme form was necessarily brought under control by publicity and devotion. Both sexes removed their clothes at the door of their places of worship, and replaced them at the end of the service, and hence they called every such place of worship Paradise. The Adamites are spoken of by Epiphanius [A.D. 310—403] as existing in his own time, but religionists of a similar character were known at a still earlier date, under the name of PRODIGIANS; and the superstition was revived in the Netherlands by Tanchelin in the twelfth century [TANQUELINIANS], in Dauphiné and Savoy in the fourteenth century, and by the BISHARDS and BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT in the fifteenth.

Adocerdites.—A name given by some early heresiologists to those who believed that our Lord's descent into Hades was the means of saving many departed souls. The opinion was, and is, common among Christians, and is by no means to be condemned as an erroneous one, though there is no positive evidence in support of it. [DESCENT INTO HELL.]

Adelaide, Sr.—Two female saints of this name are commemorated: [1] Adelaide of Bergamo, wife of St. Lupo, Duke of Bergamo, about A.D. 300; [2] Adelaide, wife of the Emperor Otho II., A.D. 999.

Adelbert.—A religious leader of the eighth century, who professed to have divine revelations through the Archangel Michael. He headed a party opposed to the missionary labours of St. Boniface, the Englishman Winfred, the "Apostle of Germany." By birth Adelbert was French, but his ministrations were carried on in Franconia. There he persuaded the people to leave their churches, and to form congregations around crosses and oratories which he set up in the fields. By deceit he obtained Episcopal consecration from some bishops, and from that time made extravagant claims to sanctity and authority, dedicating places of worship in his own name, and giving his hair and nail-parings to the people as sacred relics. The fanaticisms and errors of Adelbert and his followers, the "Adelbertines," being brought before the Provincial Synod of Soissons by Boniface, in A.D. 744, the leader was condemned and silenced. This decision was confirmed at Rome by a sentence which was signed by the Pope, seventy bishops, and seventeen priests. Adelbert was condemned to perpetual seclusion in the Monastery of Fulda, but escaping thence, he was murdered by robbers. Some writers have classed Adelbert among the precursors of the Reformation, but there is no evidence either that he attempted to reform any abuses, or that he was other than a fanatic and impostor.

Adelbert of Prague, St. [PRUSSIA, CONVERSION OF.]

Adelbert the Deacon, St., fellow-worker of St. WILLIBROD (q.v.).

Adelfius.—This is the name of one of the three British bishops who attended at and signed the canons of the Council of Arles, A.D. 314. His signature appears in the words, "Adelfius Episcopus, de civitate Colonia Londinensium:—Exinde Sacerdos Presbyter, Arminius Diaconus." It is supposed that "Londinensium" is a copyist's mistake for Legionensium, that is, Caerleon-on-Usk, the signature of Restitutis, Bishop of London, having already been subscribed. [Haddan & Stubbs Councils, &c., i. 7.] Lincoln, "Colonia Lindum," and Colchester, "Camalodunum," also lay claim to Adelfius.

Adelm. [ALDHHELM.]

Adelophagi.—An obscure sect, mentioned by heresiologists of the fourth and fifth centuries. Their name is derived from their practice of refusing to eat in the presence of others, but what meaning they attached to this curious custom is not known. They held orthodox belief respecting the First and Second Persons of the Holy Trinity, but maintained that the Holy Spirit was a created being.

Adelphians. [EUCHITES.]

Adelphius. [ADELFIUS.]

Adelwold. [ETHELWOLD.]

Adodatus.—The son of St. Augustine. [AUGUSTINE, ST., OF HIPPO.]

Adessenarians.—A controversial term, once used by Roman Catholic theologians to designate those who believe our Lord to be present [Lat. adesse] in the Holy Eucharist in a "real" and not a "figurative," sense, but who deny that the consecrated elements are transubstantiated in such a manner that their natural substance is annihilated.

Adhelm. [ALDHHELM.]

Adiaphorists.—Those Lutherans of the Reformation period who maintained, with Melancthon, that many of the customs and doctrines for or against which the stricter Lutherans contended were things in themselves indifferent [Gr. adiaphora], and not worth making a cause of division. Among these things indifferent the Adiaphorist party included the Eucharistic vestments, the elevation of the host, the use of choral services and of intonation, the use of Latin in Divine Service, the observance of saints' days, the use of extreme unction, the doctrine of salvation by faith alone without works, and the recognition of the primacy, as distinguished from the supremacy, of the Pope.

Adlabert. [ADELBERT.]

Admission. [BENEFICE.]

Admonition.—The warning which precedes the execution of an ecclesiastical sentence. [MONITION.]

Admonitionists.—A party of Elizabethan Puritans, who signed what they called an "Admonition to the Parliament," respecting alleged errors and abuses in the Reformed Church of England, in the year 1572. There was much temporary controversy respecting this admonition, a reply being written to it by Archbishop Whitgift, who was again answered by Cartwright, the leader of the Puritans. Two writers of the Admonitionists, two London clergymen named Field and Wilcox, were imprisoned, and others set up a secret religious meeting at Wandsworth on the Presbyterian system. This was the first Dissenting chapel established in England.

Adoption.—St. Paul borrowed this law term from the Romans, to express the relation which God establishes between those who are made Christians and Himself. Under the Roman law there was a formal process by which a child could be handed over by its parents to another person, who adopted it in such a manner that the same legal relation was established between the child and its adopted parent as would have existed if they had been naturally parent and child. So St. Paul speaks of admission to the Christian body as being adoption into the family of God, those who were not sons becoming sons, and those whom God adopts as his children becoming "heirs: heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ" [Rom. viii. 15, 23, ix. 4; Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5].

Adoptionists.—Those who maintained the theory that our Lord, as Man, was the son of God the Father by adoption, although as God He was the Son of God. This opinion was held by some as early as the fourth century, and is opposed in the writings of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and St. Hilary of Arles. It prevailed much in Spain, being mentioned in a canon of the eleventh Council of Toledo [A.D. 675], and it was in Spain that it became distinctly formalised as an heretical opinion. There is some probability that it was taught as a means of conciliating the Mahometans, and making Christianity acceptable to them; but the idea that Christ as Man was not that which the angel said He should be called, the Son of God [Luke i. 36], is so contrary to the fundamental principle of Christianity, the Mediatorship of our Lord, that it was vigorously opposed by theologians. The leaders of the Adoptionist party were Elipandus, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel, in Catalonia. Their principal opponent was the great English scholar and theologian, Alcuin, the friend of Charlemagne, at whose desire he wrote a treatise on the subject in A.D. 794, and the error was condemned at the Council of Frankfort in that year. Felix argued with Alcuin for six days before the Council of Aix la Chapelle in the year 799, was convinced of his error, and renounced it before the Council, but Elipandus was never called to account, as Toledo was at that time in the hands of the Saracens. The error itself has occasionally been revived in later ages, but it has not definitely appeared in the literature of theology since the seventeenth century, when it was advocated in a work of Calixtus.

Adoration.—This word has been adopted into Christian language to signify the highest form of worship, that which is to be offered to God alone, and is called Divine Worship. Some very highly spiritual persons are able to offer adoration to God solely by the devotion of the mind and heart, and this is called mental, or interior, adoration; but most persons require the aid of words or gestures, expressing their mental adoration by prayer, praise, standing, kneeling, bowing the head, and other ceremonial actions, which are called bodily, or exterior, adoration. The most perfect form of adoration is obviously that of the angels and saints in heaven; and this, we may believe, does not consist only of mental adoration.

Adrian, Sr. [A.D. 300].—One of the soldier-saints of the early Church. He was one of the Praetorian guards of the persecuting Emperor Galerius Maximian, and married to a Christian named Natalia. As he was superintending the execution of some Christian martyrs, he was converted by the sight of their constancy, and declaring himself a Christian, was carried off to prison. His wife visited him there, and encouraged him to persevere, even to the endurance of any suffering that lay before him. Being condemned to die, Adrian persuaded his keeper to let him visit his wife the night before his execution. At first she thought he had fled from martyrdom, and grieved that she should "be called the wife of a coward and apostate, who for fear of death had denied his God." But on being undeceived, she joyfully welcomed him, and returned with him to prison. Great tortures were inflicted upon Adrian, his limbs being broken to pieces on an anvil with a sledge hammer, as criminals were afterwards broken on the wheel, previous to his being beheaded. But before the axe could do its work he had died, sweetly comforted in his last agony in the arms of his heroic wife. His body was taken to Byzantium, or Constantinople, and there buried by faithful friends, Natalia dying in a few days, and being laid beside him. St. Adrian was once the chief military saint of Northern Europe, and the patron saint of soldiers in Germany, Flanders, and the north of France. He is commemorated, together with St. Natalia, on September 8th, and is usually represented in full armour, with an anvil in his arms or at his feet.

Adrian IV.—This was the only Englishman who ever became Pope. His original name was Nicolas Breakspere, and he was the son of a labourer at Langley, near St. Albans, who was also a lay brother of that great monastery. The future Pope attempted in vain to obtain admission to the monastery, his education being considered insufficient, but going abroad, he became a lay brother of St. Rufus, in Provence. There he applied himself to study, and being ordained to the priesthood, he was, in 1137, elected abbot. In 1146 he became Cardinal Bishop of Albano, and was sent as papal legate to Denmark and Norway. In 1154 he was elected to the papedom, and assumed the name of Adrian. Although he was personally an excellent and pious pope, he introduced several abuses of papal authority through a too-exalted estimate of the position occupied by the Bishops of Rome. Among others, he exempted the Abbey of St. Albans from episcopal jurisdiction, making it subject to the Pope only; and he also made a grant of Ireland to Henry II., thus claiming dominion over the kingdoms of the world. He reigned for five years only, dying on September 1, 1159.

Adrianists.—The followers of the Dutch Anabaptist Adrian Hamsted. He was minister of the Dutch congregation in London, but was deposed, and eventually excommunicated by Bishop Grindal in 1561, for denying the miraculous conception of our Lord by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary. Leaving England, he then gathered a congregation in Holland, and the name of their founder was assumed by his followers.

Adrumetians.—Certain monks of Adrumetum, in the province of Byzacene, in North Africa, who founded Antinomian notions on St. Augustine's teaching respecting grace and predestination.

Adult Baptism. [BAPTISM.]

Adultery.—Conjugal intercourse between a wife and a married or unmarried man who is not her husband; also of a man, married or unmarried, with the wife of another man. It was forbidden by primitive, natural, or patriarchal law [Gen. xii. 12, 17—20, xx. 3, xxvi. 10], and also by the seventh of the Ten Commandments, "Thou shalt not commit adultery" [Exod. xx. 14]. This latter law was afterwards supplemented by the penal enactment, "And the man that committeth adultery with another man's wife, even he that committeth adultery with his neighbour's wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death" [Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22]; but the habitual relaxation of this penalty was sanctioned by our Lord's judicial act of mercy towards the woman taken in adultery [John viii. 11], and it has never been inflicted under the laws of Christian countries. Under modern English law, the penalty is divorce; and by an extension of the Scriptural idea of adultery to conjugal intercourse between a married man and an unmarried woman, the penalty of divorce is also extended to such cases. The extension of the sin to any and every breach of the original institution of marriage in Eden is recognised by all Christians, in accordance with the plain teaching of Christ.

Advent.—This name, derived from the Latin word adventus, "a coming," has been given for many ages to the four weeks, more or less, which precede Christmas, the coming of our Lord in the flesh. Collects, Epistles, and Gospels for five Sundays before Christmas, and for the Wednesdays and Fridays of the weeks included, are found in the early sacramentaries, and in the Comes, or Lectionary of St. Jerome [COMES]; and there are also sermons extant "concerning the advent of our Lord," which were preached by Maximus, Bishop of Turin, in the year 450. From these remains it may be inferred that the season of Advent was observed in the primitive Church. As far back as it can be traced, the season of Advent was always regarded as a season introductory to Christmas, in the same manner as Lent is introductory to Easter, but it was never observed with the same strictness as to fasting. In the Western Churches it begins the ritual year, as may be seen by the arrangements relating to holy days in the Prayer Book. Advent Sunday is the nearest Sunday to the festival of St. Andrew [Nov. 30th], whether before or after, or on the day itself, and may thus occur on any day between November 27th and December 3rd inclusive.

Advertisements.—The title given to some injunctions, "partly for due order in the public administration of common prayer and using of the holy sacraments, and partly for the apparel of all persons ecclesiastical," which were issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1566, for observance within the province of Canterbury. They have obtained a fictitious importance with respect to modern controversies from the mistaken impression that they had the authority of the Crown; but it is now known that although Parker applied for that authority, and expected to obtain it, Cecil, the Queen's Prime Minister, absolutely refused to submit them to the Queen for her signature.

Ædesius. [ABYSSINIA, CHURCH OF.]

Ægidius. [GILES, ST.]

Ælfric (1), Archbishop of Canterbury [A.D. 994—1005], was born of parents of high rank in the county of Kent, about A.D. 940, his step-father being Eardwulf, Earl of Kent, whose name is recorded as a benefactor of the cathedral of Canterbury. While very young he became a monk of Abingdon, and when Ethelwold, Abbot of Abingdon, was made Bishop of Winchester [A.D. 963], Ælfric was selected as one of the monks who were to replace the secular canons of that cathedral. Here he undertook the translation of the Bible into English. How far he carried the work is not known, but the whole of the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua and Judges, and the four Gospels, have come down to us, together with fragmentary portions of other books of the Old Testament. In A.D. 987 Ælfric became abbot of the newly-founded Abbey of Cerne Abbas, in Dorsetshire; in the following year Abbot of St. Albans; the next year [A.D. 989] he was appointed Bishop of Wilton, from which see he was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury in A.D. 994. As archbishop, he acquired lasting praise for the wisdom and judgment with which he ruled the Church. He also left behind him many homilies and other religious works, which have come down to modern times, and are a monument of his piety and pastoral zeal.

Ælfric (2), Archbishop of York [A.D. 1023—1050], known by the surname of Putta, or Puttock the Kite, and by that of Withune the Wise. He had previously been Prior of Winchester, a position of political as well as ecclesiastical importance; and while he was archbishop he also held for a year or two the see of Worcester, apparently for the purpose of opposing his great influence against that of Earl Godwin. Ælfric assisted at the coronations of Canute, Harold Harefoot, Hardicanute, and Edward the Confessor. He died at Southwell, to the minsters of which and of Beverley he was a great benefactor, and was buried at Peterborough, of which he had originally been a monk, and to which he had also made munificent gifts of rich vestments and jewelled gold plate. The works of Ælfric of Canterbury have sometimes been assigned to this Archbishop of York by mistake.

Ælurus. [TIMOTHEANS.]

Æon.—An "eternal being"; the name given to the "emanations" from the Supreme Being in the Gnostic system. [Gnostics.]

Æor.—The name given to the outermost of the three veils which are used for covering, separately and conjointly, the offered but unconsecrated elements in the Eastern Church. It is also called "nephele," or "the cloud." The symbolical meaning assigned in each case is, that as the air surrounds the earth, and as the three disciples were overshadowed by a cloud at the Transfiguration, so does this veil surround and overshadow the holy gifts. The term was adopted for the chalice veil by Bishop Andrewes in the ritual arrangement of his chapel.

Æra, CHRISTIAN. [A.D.]

Ærians.—A sect formed in the latter half of the fourth century, by Ærius, a monk of Pontus. It had but a very short duration, and did not spread far beyond the place of its origin. The distinctive principle propounded by Ærius was that there is no difference between a bishop and a priest, the revival of which in Reformation times received the name of Presbyterianism.

Æschines.—The founder of a sect of Montanists in the second century. [CATÆSCHINETANS.]

Æternales.—A sect of this name is alleged to have existed about the fourth century, whose principal tenet was that the world will remain eternally in its present condition.

Ætians.—A sect of Arians, taking its name from Ætius [d. A.D. 366], who was for the last four years of his life bishop of some see near Constantinople. The sect was more commonly known by the name of Eunomians, from Eunomius, the disciple of Ætius, or Anomœans, from their distinctive principle, the most extreme form of Arianism, that the second and third Persons of the Holy Trinity are entirely different [Gr. anomoios] from the first Person in substance and will; and hence, that our Lord is not God in any true sense.

Æfra, St. (1).—One of the four patron saints of Brescia, the others being Saints Julia, Faustina, and Giovita. She is said to have been a lady of high birth belonging to Brescia, who was converted to Christianity by witnessing the fortitude of the brothers Faustinus and Jovita when cast to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre, by order of the Emperor Hadrian. St. Æfra also suffered martyrdom about A.D. 121, and is commemorated on August 6th.

Æfra, St. (2).—The patron saint of Augsburg. She had led the life of a courtesan, but was converted to Christianity during the Diocletian persecution by the teaching and example of a Spanish priest, named Narcissus, who had sought refuge in her house without knowing its character. On the escape of Narcissus to his own country, Afra was accused of the crime of harbouring a Christian, and of having become a Christian herself, and was condemned to death. "It is true," she said to the judge: "I am not worthy to be called a Christian, but He who did not reject Mary Magdalen when she washed His feet with her tears will not reject me." St. Afra was burned to death at the stake on August 7th, 307. Her mother, Hilaria, and her three handmaidens, Digna, Eunomia, and Eutropia, were put to death by suffocation in her tomb for burying what remained unconsumed of her body. She is often represented in German art in company with Bishop Ulrich, the other patron saint of Augsburg, who lived in the tenth century. In ancient German martyrologies this St. Afra was commemorated on August 7th, but by a confusion between her name and that of her earlier namesake her festival is now kept on August 5th.

Africa, South. [COLONIAL CHURCH.]

Affusion.—The administration of baptism by pouring water upon the person, as distinguished from sprinkling [ASPERSION], or dipping [IMMERSION].

Affinity.—Relationship with a husband's or wife's relations acquired by marriage, as distinguished from relationship acquired by birth. [MARRIAGE.]

Affinity, SPIRITUAL.—It is laid down in the ancient canon law that some spiritual acts establish a relationship between the persons concerned which forms an impediment to their marriage. Thus there is alleged to be such a spiritual affinity between a god-parent and a god-child, the affinity being extended even to the natural parents of the god-child. A similar affinity is said to be contracted between a person baptizing and the person baptized.

Agape. [LOVE FEASTS.]

Agapé, St. [A.D. 304].—One of three sisters who had received from their parents the significant Christian names of Agapé, or Charity, Chionia, or snowy Purity, and Irené, or Peace, and who suffered martyrdom at Thessalonica during the persecution under Maximian. One of the methods adopted for the extinction of Christianity was the destruction of the books containing the Scriptures and liturgies, and the penalty of death was inflicted upon those who refused to deliver them up to be destroyed. [TRADITORES.] These three Thessalonian ladies were among those who refused to give up some portions of the Scriptures which were in their possession, and after escaping for some time by living concealed on the hills around the city, they were apprehended and condemned to die. Agapé and Chionia were burned to death on April 1st, 304, and Irené on the 5th of the same month, the resolute martyrs singing psalms and hymns as they lay on the funeral pile. They are commemorated on April 1st.

Agapemonites.—The members of a strange institution, called the "Agapemoné," or "Abode of Love," which was established at Weymouth, about the year 1845, by a clergyman named Prince, who professed to be an incarnation of the Holy Spirit. [PRINCETES.]

Agapetæ, or Dilectæ.—A title meaning "the beloved," which was assumed in the fourth and fifth centuries by communities of recluses, in which men and women professing a celibate life associated under the same roof, as in the double convents of later times, such as that of Sion, but apparently with a freedom of intercourse which was then impossible. This institution of double communities was condemned in the strongest terms by St. Jerome, who charged the Agapetæ with great profligacy. They were forbidden by the first and second Councils of Carthage [A.D. 348, 397].

Agatha, St. [A.D. 251].—A virgin martyr, who suffered during the Decian persecution at Catania, in Sicily, of which city she is regarded as the patron saint. The story of her martyrdom is one that in its main circumstances is not uncommon in the records of the persecutions, and one that is sadly probable. The Prætor of Sicily, Quintianus, had endeavoured to win over Agatha to his wicked will, but in vain, even when he had placed her in the hands of profligate women for the purpose of corrupting her mind. He then sent her to prison for the crime of being a Christian, and when, on her trial, she refused to renounce Christianity, subjected her to the horrible torture of cutting off her breasts with shears, or tearing them off with pincers. "Art thou not ashamed, O tyrant," she is said to have exclaimed, "to tear my bosom thus? thou who wast fed at the bosom of thy mother." During the following night she is said to have been miraculously healed of her dreadful mutilation, but if she was sustained under it by God's help, as other martyrs were supported to bear the end, that miracle sufficed for her. On the following day she was again sent for by the tyrant, and repeating her faithful confession, was bound hand and foot and thrown on to a pile of wood, which stood ready kindled. At that moment there was an alarm of earthquake; it was under the shadow of Mount Etna, and the people rescued her, through fear that the cruelties inflicted on her were bringing down on them the wrath of God. But, scorched as she was with the flames, she survived only for a day or two, and then died in prison. St. Agatha is commemorated on February 5th, and she is usually represented as wrapped in a long veil, bearing in her hand a pair of shears or pincers, the instrument of her suffering, or as carrying her breasts in a charger or great round dish.

Age. [CANONICAL AGE.]

Agenda.—A liturgical term, expressing that aspect of Divine service in which it consists of things to be done, as distinguished from things to be believed, or “creden^{da}.” An analogous term in English is the “performance of Divine Service.” It was used principally as a title for the Holy Eucharist, in which sense it is found in a canon of the Council of Carthage [A.D. 390].

Aginenses. [AGIONITES.]

Agionites.—A sect of which little or nothing is known beyond the fact that it is named among some sects of false ascetics, who were condemned as heretics by a council of Gangra [A.D. 360—380]. The name is possibly derived from the Greek word hagios, holy, and may have been assumed in a similar way to the name “Puritan,” in later times, with pretensions to more than ordinary purity and holiness.

Agnes, St. [A.D. 305]. A virgin saint who suffered martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution. She is spoken of by St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and many other early writers, and is also celebrated in the very early hymns of the Church, which were written by Prudentius. The story which has come down to us respecting her is a very touching one, and was so widely spread in the fourth century, that St. Jerome says every Christian nation was acquainted with it through the homilies and hymns that were extant in all languages respecting her. According to this story, St. Agnes was the daughter of Christian parents, and only about thirteen or fourteen years of age at the time of her martyrdom. The son of the Prefect of Rome saw her as she went to and from school, and was so moved by her beauty and sweetness that he offered her marriage, endeavouring to win her over by costly presents and the exhibition of a devoted love. She rejected his love and spurned his gifts, declaring that she was already dedicated to Christ by a vow of virginity. The treatment which he received brought her lover to a bed of sickness, and when the physicians discovered the cause of his malady, they acquainted Sempronius, the Prefect, with it. The father's persuasions were as unavailing as those of the son, and he then used his authority in a vindictive manner by endeavouring to make her transfer her vow of virginity, which she pleaded, from Christ to Vesta. When dragged to the altar of Vesta, however, to be dedicated as a Vestal virgin, Agnes made the sign of the cross as a confession of her Christianity, instead of sprinkling incense upon the flame. She was then most cruelly exposed naked in the public streets, but even profligates took pity on her and turned their eyes away. At last she was cast upon a burning pile of faggots, and when life lingered long, one of the surrounding soldiers ascended the pile, and put an end to her sufferings with his sword.

The memory of St. Agnes is much revered by the women of Rome, who pray at her shrine for the gifts of meekness and chastity. There are two churches dedicated to her memory, one within and the other without the city; the former, in the Piazza Novaria, being built upon the supposed site of her sufferings. The other, beyond the Porta Pia, was originally built by the Emperor Constantine, at the earnest request of his daughter, on the spot where St. Agnes had been buried a few years before. In this latter church the Pope blesses the lambs whose fleeces are to be made into palls for archbishops [PALL], the ceremony taking place annually on January 21st, the festival of St. Agnes, with whose name [Lat. Agnus, lamb] it is obviously connected.

Agnoëtians.—This was the controversial designation which distinguished a branch of the Alexandrian Monophysites [MONOPHYSITES] in the sixth century. Their particular principle was that our Lord as God was not omniscient, there being some things of which He was ignorant [Gr. agnoeō, to be ignorant]. This error arose from the misapplication of certain sayings which our Lord uttered, such as, “Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father” [Mark xiii. 32], which were words that obviously referred to His human nature while on earth; or, “Where have ye laid him?” [John xi. 34], in which case He conformed Himself to the ordinary circumstances of human knowledge in the sense of words which He subsequently used, “because of the people which stand by I said it” [John xi. 42]. There does not appear to have been any separate sect of the Monophysite Agnoëtians, but their opinion survived its originators of the sixth century.

Agnoëta.—A sect which appeared in the fourth century, which acquired their name from holding opinions respecting the limitation of God's omniscience, without special reference to our Lord. They were a branch of the Eunomians, an extreme branch of the Arians. [EUNOMIANS.]

Agnostics.—A name given to Positivists about the year 1869, as indicating their special attitude towards Christianity and revealed religion. That which is not known [Gr. agnōstos] is, according to this system, not to be believed. But the class of persons thus indicated have probably existed in every age, for as far back as the time of St. Chrysostom they are referred to in the remark, “Lest we should say then, as many often do, 'No man knoweth anything,' what has just been said may suffice to remove all perplexity on this point" [Chrys., Hom. on Stat., i., 28; Oxf. Tr., p. 24]. But it is obvious that we "know" most of the things which we believe only through the testimony of those whom we consider to be trustworthy informants; and that if agnosticism were to be adopted in other branches of human knowledge, as well as in matters of religion, the statements of historians respecting the past, of travellers respecting the present, or of men of science respecting the phenomena observed by them, would be reduced to an exceedingly small compass. [Positivists.]

Agnus Dei.—A title of our Lord, indicated in prophecy, where it was said of him by Isaiah, "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter" [Isai. liii. 7], and adopted by St. John the Baptist when he saw Jesus coming to him, and said, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" [John i. 29; comp. Rev. v. 6, 12]. Prayer is offered to Christ under this title in the Litany, in the words, "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, Grant us Thy peace—Have mercy upon us." And the same form has been used from very ancient days after the consecration of the Holy Eucharist.

Our Lord is often represented in the symbolical form of a Lamb, holding a small triumphant banner, or standing on an altar "as it had been slain;" and such representations occur in the catacombs and ancient basilicas among the most ancient specimens of Christian art. The same symbol was also stamped upon medallions of wax, which were distributed to the newly-baptised on the First Sunday after Easter. Such medallions were also placed in the tombs of the departed, and some have been discovered which antiquaries believe to have been so placed in tombs as early as the seventh and eighth centuries. They were sometimes made from the remains of the great Paschal taper which had been blessed on the Easter Eve of the preceding year; sometimes from a mixture of oil and wax prepared for the purpose, over which a benediction had been used. In modern times, there is a special solemnity of blessing such medallions of the Agnus Dei—made of wax, silver, or gold—by the Pope on the Saturday in Easter week in the first year of his pontificate, and on the same day in every seventh year.

Agonistics.—A name, meaning contenders, or men of strife, given by the Donatists to members of their sect who roamed about Africa in bands about A.D. 317, nominally for the purpose of winning converts, but actually engaged in deeds of violence and rapine. They were also called Catrophites, Circuiti, Circumcellions, Carophites, and Montenses.

Agonizants.—A charitable confraternity in Italy, which undertook the duty of praying for those who were in the agony of death, and especially for criminals about to be executed.

Agonycrites.—A fanatical sect of the seventh and eighth centuries, called "Anti-knee-benders" [Gr. a. gonu, elinô]. They objected to the posture of kneeling in prayer, and used dancing as a religious ceremony; and were condemned by a synod of Jerusalem in the year 726.

Agynians.—A sect of Manichees of the seventh century, who held the principle that marriage was an evil, and not a Divine institution, and hence held no intercourse with women. From this circumstance of being "without woman" [Gr. a. gunê] they took their name.

Aidan. St. [A.D. 635—651].—This great North of England missionary was the first of that long line of bishops who were seated originally at Lindisfarne and eventually at Durham. The first we hear of him is as a monk of Hy, or Iona, the great missionary centre of the north. [COLUMBA, St.] When, in the year 635, Oswald had succeeded in recovering his father Ethelfrith's kingdom of Northumbria, after the death of his elder brothers, he immediately took measures for restoring Christianity among his subjects, and his natural impulse was to send to Iona, where he himself had been converted and baptised, when a refugee among the monks in his youth, for a missionary teacher. One was sent to him named Corman, who shortly returned to Iona, declaring that the Angles, or English, of Northumbria were so stubborn and barbarous that their conversion was impossible. His report was made in a great chapter of the monks, and Aidan therefore heard it. "Brother," he exclaimed "the fault was yours. You exacted from the Pagans more than they were able to bear. You should have adopted the apostolic plan.

and given them first the milk of gentle doctrine, till they were gradually nourished with the truths of the Gospel, and they became capable of receiving stronger meat, and practising a Christian life." At these words the eyes of all the monks were turned upon Aidan, and they designated him by acclamation as the one man among them fit to undertake the great mission. He was at once consecrated bishop, that he might go among the people whom he was to convert with the fullest spiritual gifts and authority, and was sent to the Northumbrian king. On the arrival of the missionary bishop at the court of Oswald he was warmly received by the king, who himself became the interpreter into English of Aidan's Irish or Gaelic sermons and catechising. "Often," says Bede, writing from a Northumbrian monastery in the next century, "might be seen a beautiful sight. While the bishop, who was but imperfectly acquainted with the English tongue, preached, the king and his officers, who, owing to their long exile in the land of the Scots, had learned their language, interpreted his words to the people." No see had been appointed for him by the brethren of Iona, for they had no authority over the lands of the Northumbrian king, but Oswald at once assigned him the whole of Northumbria as his bishopric, and appointed the island of Lindisfarne—an island very like that of Iona, and close to Bamborough, the then royal city—with which he endowed it, as the place where the see was to be established. There Aidan built a monastery, the church of which was the cathedral of the great bishopric, and the monks its clergy, and also the missionaries by whom the bishop was assisted in his unwearying work of traversing the north country from the Forth to the Humber. So unwearying was the work of St. Aidan, so self-denying his life, and so holy his example, that the country was won over to the faith even in his own lifetime. "Nothing more commended his doctrine to the attention of his hearers," says Bede, "than the fact that as he taught so he lived, that he sought for nothing, and attached himself to nothing which belongs to this world. All that the king gave to him he quickly distributed to the poor, and never, unless when compelled so to do, did he travel through his diocese except on foot." So effectually did this first bishop of Northumbria re-establish Christianity in the North that soon after his death the church of York, which Paulinus had founded and then deserted, was restored, and the bishopric of York permanently founded, another bishopric being also formed in the north-west of Northumbria, of which the see was at Hexham. St. Aidan survived King Oswald [Oswald, St.] nine years, but was equally venerated by that king's successor, Oswy, and by Oswin, who for those nine years exercised a subordinate sovereignty in Deira, the southern part of Northumbria [Oswin, St.]. The death of the latter by a cruel act of treachery so grieved St. Aidan that he survived him only twelve days, dying on August 31st, 651. "Aidan," writes Bede, "was in the royal residence, not far from the city of Bamborough, at the time when death separated him from the body; for having a church and a chamber there, he was wont often to go and stay there, and to make excursions thence for the purpose of ministering in the country round about; which he did likewise at other of the king's houses, having nothing of his own besides his cathedral, and a few fields around it. When he fell sick they set up a tent for him close to the wall at the west end of the church, so that the tent touched the church wall, by which means it happened that he gave up the ghost leaning against a post that was on the outside to strengthen the wall." The church was built of wood, and Bede records that when it was burned down some years afterwards this post remained unconsumed, and was used in the construction of a new one. St. Aidan's body was originally buried in the "cemetery garth" or churchyard of the monastic church at Lindisfarne, but when a larger cathedral was built the it was removed to the right hand of the altar. When the monks were driven from Lindisfarne in the ninth century the bones of the saint were disinterred and carried about with the body of St. Cuthbert [CUTHBERT, St.] until they finally rested in the chapter house of the cathedral of Durham. He is commemorated on August 31st, the day of his death; but although his name appeared in the Calendar of York, it seems not to have been noticed in those of southern England, and so does not occur in that of the modern Prayer Book.

Ainsworth, HENRY.—A divine of the Brownist sect, who was born in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and died in 1622, and remembered chiefly for voluminous annotations on the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Song of Solomon, which are of some value as an account of their author's profound Hebrew learning. Leaving the country at the end of the sixteenth century, Ainsworth became a pastor of an English congregation of Brownists at Amsterdam in conjunction with another Englishman named Johnson. Differences arose between the two which ended in the dissolution of the congregation, each section remaining, under the respective leadership of Ainsworth and Johnson, excommunicated from the other. Johnson and his followers having migrated to Embden, Ainsworth was obliged to leave Amsterdam for a time and return to Ireland; but eventually he returned to Holland and again became the pastor of an old congregation till his death. Just before he died Ainsworth found a diamond of great value, and having found its owner, a Jew, restored it to him, refusing any reward, but asking the Jew to obtain for him a conference with some of the rabbis of his nation. This the Jew promised, but found himself unable to accomplish, and it was believed that Ainsworth died of poison administered to him by an agent of the man whom he had benefited.

Aisle, or AILE.—The "wing" [Lat. ala], or side passage or part of a church, attached alike in large churches to the nave, transepts, and chancel. In English churches there are commonly two aisles to the nave—one on the north, and the other on the south. In small churches there is often only one aisle, which is generally on the south side of the nave, while in larger ones there are sometimes two or even more on either side of the nave. A similar name is found in connection with the Temple at Jerusalem, for it is said that in the Temptation of our Lord Jesus the devil set Him "on the wing [not "pinnacle"] of the Temple" [Matt. iv. 5]; and Eusebius says that it was from the wing of the Temple that James the Just was cast down by the Scribes and Pharisees [Euseb., Ecc. Hist., ii., 23]. This "wing," or aisle, was probably, however, a "porch" or a cloister with several rows of pillars which overhung the valley of the Kedron. Aisles are almost always found also in the ancient basilicas or halls of justice which were turned into churches in Italy and elsewhere. [BASILICA CHURCH.]

Aitkenites.—The name sometimes given to a party in the Church of England who combine High Church practices with the extreme Methodist doctrines of sensible conversion and assurance of salvation. They derive their name from Robert Aitken, who had been a Methodist preacher before his ordination, but was Vicar of Pendeen, in Cornwall, from 1849 until his death in July, 1873. Aitken published a series of voluminous tracts entitled, "The Teaching of the Types," and his development of Wesley's original principles has had considerable influence, especially in Church of England "missions" held among the poor and uneducated classes of the people.

Alaric. [PAPACY.]

Alascans.—A Puritan party in the Church of England which adopted the opinions of John Lasco or Lasco, a Polish refugee of noble birth, who had become minister of a congregation at Embden, but was invited to England by Cranmer, and became an inmate of Lambeth Palace for six months in the year 1550. In that year he was appointed "superintendent," or bishop in the Presbyterian sense, of all foreign congregations of Protestants in London, the church of the Austin Friars in Broad Street being assigned to him. Here he established a regular form of Presbyterian government, but with a service-book of his own making, in which he carefully avoided the principles and practice to which the Puritan school objected, such as all reference to sacerdotal and sacramental doctrine, the use of the surplice and kneeling at the Communion being abolished. The German congregations were broken up at the accession of Queen Mary, and after settling for a short time with some of his followers, A'Lasco returned to Poland where he died in 1560. But the principles of A'Lasco spread far and wide in England among that section of clergy and laity who were eventually known as Puritans.

Alb, or ALBE.—A long coat of white linen [Lat. tunica alba] reaching down to the feet, and having sleeves reaching to the hand. It is spoken of in records of the fourth century as being used in Divine Service, but was probably worn in common life also, at least by priests and bishops. The latter still wear it in a modified form, and under the name of "rochet," in Divine Service, and also in the House of Lords. The albs used in common life appear to have been flowing garments like long surplices, but with the sleeves tied in, like the "lawn sleeves" of a bishop, at the wrists. For ministrations in church it was used in a less flowing form, the sleeves fitting close and the body of the alb being bound round the waist with a girdle. In this form it is used under the chasuble instead of a surplice by those clergy of the Church of England who use the ancient vestments in celebrating the Holy Communion.

ALB.

The alb was originally made of white linen only; but at a very early date a peculiar form of ornament was added, called, in later times, "apparels." These are square or oblong pieces of embroidery attached to the skirt of the garment just over the feet, and above each wrist. With these apparels the alb was called "alba parata," without them, "alba pura," the latter being the "white alb plain."

Alban, St. [A.D. 304].—A saint who has been honoured for many ages as the proto-martyr of Britain, or of England. The earliest notice of St. Alban's name is found in a Life of St. Germanus, written in the last quarter of the fifth century. In this it is stated that when St. Germanus first visited Britain [A.D. 429], to contend against the Pelagian heresy [GERMANUS], and was about to return home to Auxerre, he caused the sepulchre of "the blessed martyr Alban" to be opened, and having deposited there some relics of the Apostles and other martyrs, received in return some of the dust on which the blood of Alban was still to be seen. A century later [A.D. 560], the British historian Gildas names St. Alban, of Verulamium, as one of those who suffered in the Diocletian persecution [AARON]; and a few years later the hymn-writer, Venantius Fortunatus [A.D. 580], records the name of "the illustrious Alban, born in Britain," among those of the martyrs who had been taken out of all lands to the Lord. The Venerable Bede [A.D. 731], gives the story of St. Alban's martyrdom at some length, the substance of his narrative being that while the persecution was raging, and while he was yet a pagan, Alban sheltered in his house a certain clergyman who was flying from his persecutors, and whose holy example and prayers led to the conversion and baptism of his courageous and humane host. After a few days it became known that a Christian was being thus concealed, and soldiers were sent to search the house. St. Alban immediately presented himself to the soldiers instead of his guest and teacher, and clad in the clerical habit which that guest had worn, having apparently, as so often occurred in such cases, exchanged clothes with his friend for the purpose of deceiving the soldiers, and so giving time for escape. When the prisoner was taken before the judge the mistake of the soldiers was at once discovered, and in reply to the angry words which were cast at him, Alban declared himself to be a Christian. They endeavoured to shake his constancy by scourging, and when he bore this without yielding, sentence of death was passed upon him. He was led through the gate of Verulamium to a hill, afterwards named Holme-hurst and Derswold, and there he was beheaded. It was on this hill that the great monastery of St. Alban's was afterwards erected, and the existing cathedral church is reasonably supposed to cover the site of the martyrdom. When the persecution was over "a church of wonderful workmanship" was built on the spot where the martyr's body had fallen and where it was buried, and there many sick persons came, even in the time of Bede, in the hope that they should be miraculously cured of their maladies.

St. Alban's Day in the old Calendars of the Church of England was June 22nd, but, apparently by mistake, it is marked as the 17th in the Book of Common Prayer.

Alban's, St., BISHOPRIC OF.—This diocese was formed out of portions of the dioceses of London and Rochester by an Act of Parliament passed in 1874, and comprises the counties of Hertford and Essex. The income of the see is fixed at £4,500.

The first Bishop of St. Alban's was Thomas Legh Cloughton [accession, 1877], who was translated thither from the see of Rochester, over which he had presided from 1867.

The CATHEDRAL of St. Alban is the ancient church of the Benedictine monastery of St. Alban, which was originally founded by Offa, king of Mercia, in A.D. 793. The original church was pulled down shortly after the Conquest, and a new one was then erected out of the bricks or thick tiles of which the ruined Roman city of Verulam had been built. The new abbey church was dedicated in the year 1115, and a large portion of it still exists in the fabric of the present cathedral, the tower exhibiting its construction of Roman tiles in a very conspicuous manner. The western portion of the nave, extending to four bays, was rebuilt in the Early English style between 1195 and 1235. Between this time and the end of the thirteenth century the present beautiful choir was built in the place of the ancient Norman presbytery and apse. The Lady Chapel was erected in the first quarter of the fourteenth century. The modern restoration was of a very interesting character, and was made still more so by the discovery of many fragments of the shrine of St. Alban, which have been cleverly pieced together as they stood in the original structure.

The cathedral foundation consists only of the bishop and twenty honorary canons.

Albanenses.—A small sect which revived Gnostic and Manichæan opinions about A.D. 796, and was named from Albano, the city where its principal bishop originally resided. Its adherents were found principally in Verona and Bergamo, and are said not to have numbered more than five hundred, but they were probably absorbed into the widely-spreading body of the Albigenses, which is first traceable in Northern Italy and Southern France. The Albanenses believed in two first causes, the one evil and the Deity of the Old Testament, the other good and the Deity of the New Testament; and that under the former no good man ever existed, Jesus being the first, and He not having any Divine nature. They rejected the practice of infant baptism, but administered it as a mere ceremony to adults. Marriage was considered by them to be sinful, and they theoretically maintained, and perhaps practised, community of goods. The sect of the Albanenses or Albanais is often confused with that of the Albigenes or Albigeois.

Alban's Hall, St. [OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF.]

Albati. [WHITE BRETHREN.]

Albert, St. [A.D. 780].—An Archbishop of York, the teacher of the celebrated Alcuin, who writes highly of his good qualities. He was commemorated in ancient calendars on November 25th.

Albigenses.—This was a name popularly given to a great body of mediæval Manichæans which sprang up in the north of Italy and the south of France in the twelfth century, and who were known among the learned as "Cathari" or "Puritans." The name appears to have been derived from Albige, now known as Alby, an important city of Languedoc, where a council was held against these heretics in the year 1176, and from the district around which the "Albigeois" spread through Languedoc, Provence, and Italy. But "Albigenses" was a generic name eventually given to a great number of sects whose principles differed greatly, somewhat in the same manner as the designation of "Protestant" was used in later times. Hence it has happened that very different views have been taken by historians, some regarding them in a more favourable aspect as being distinguished chiefly by their opposition to the Papal power and mediæval superstitions, and others looking chiefly at the Manichæan errors by which the theology of the Albigenes was so deeply infected. From the one point of view they may be regarded as mediæval Protestants; from the other as a body which was antagonistic to some of the fundamental principles of Christianity.

The authentic history of the Albigenes as a body does not really extend over more than eighty years [A.D. 1163—1244], although there can be little doubt that their principles were held by small bodies of persons at an earlier date than the middle of the twelfth century, and that some who had held them in secret were put to death by the Inquisition as late as the fourteenth century. In the fourth canon of the Council of Tours [A.D. 1163] it is forbidden to frequent the society of the Albigenian heretics. In a council held at Lombères, near Alby, in 1165, some of their number were heard in defence of their opinions, and those opinions were again condemned. But their numbers still increased, and their opinions possessed a great fascination for multitudes who were living alienated from the clergy and the Church by the abuses which sprang up in the twelfth century. Languedoc was overrun with them to such an extent that its ruler, Raymond V., Count of Toulouse, appealed to the Pope, Alexander III., for the assistance of divines to confute their errors; and this proving ineffectual, Raymond began an active persecution against them.

The principles of the Albigenes began now to be either more developed, or better known, and are set forth at length in the decrees of the third Council of the Lateran [A.D. 1179]. At the root of all their errors lay the oriental dualism which attributed the creation of all things to two omnipotent First Causes instead of one; a Creator of evil and a Creator of good, the former being the Creator of the world and the God of the Old Testament. They rejected the authority of the Old Testament as Holy Scripture, and had certain sacred books of their own, "The Vision of Isaiah," and a new gospel entitled "The Narrative of questions asked by St. John and answered by Christ," now lost, upon which they placed their chief reliance. They put aside sacraments as useless, although using some form of adult baptism to signify the admission of converts to their community. Women were looked upon as in themselves evil, and marriage was declared to be sinful. The use of ritual in Divine service, the consecration of churches, the use of oaths in courts of law, the payment of tithes, were all considered sinful; and the ordinary doctrines of Christianity, so far as they were accepted at all by them, were accepted only in very modified forms. Lastly, dividing themselves into two classes, the Auditors and the Perfect, they gave to the latter a kind of ministerial authority, requiring them to adopt a life of celibacy, to eat only vegetable food and fish, to fast often and long, and practice a very strict asceticism all their lives.

On the accession of Innocent III. to the Papacy in 1198, he initiated a policy of general persecution against the Albigenes, which for a time consolidated their many sects into one vast community, and convulsed the south of Europe with bitter wars for thirty years, but which in the end exterminated them. At the very beginning of his reign this Pope sent to Languedoc two Cistercian monks, Rayner and Guido, whom he recommended to the ecclesiastical and secular authorities, calling them to sustain the authority of his envoys in every possible way. The two monks received unlimited power from the Pope to proceed against the heretics, and were enjoined first to endeavour to convince them of their errors by argument, and if argument was unsuccessful, to pass sentence of excommunication upon them. The governing authorities were enjoined to follow up the missionary envoys by sending those who were obstinate and contumacious into exile, having first confiscated their property; and if the exiles ventured to return they were to be visited with still more severe punishments. The same penalties were to be inflicted upon those who harboured heretics as upon heretics themselves: but to those who employed their swords in the defence of the faith were promised the same indulgence which was granted to pilgrims who visited the tombs of St. Peter, at Rome, or St. James, at Compostella. It was soon found, however, that neither the censures nor the rewards of the Pope's delegates were sufficient to exterminate the Albigenses. The delegates, those first named, and subsequently Peter of Castelnau, Raoul, and Arnold, abbot of Cîteaux, laboured for eight years at their work, but laboured almost in vain, until at last the murder of Peter of Castelnau brought matters to an unexpected climax. The Pope charged the Count of Toulouse, Raymond VI., with the murder; and, having excommunicated him, called upon the King of France and the great nobles to avenge it by a crusade against the Count and his Albigensian subjects.

A very large force (contemporary accounts say it amounted in number to 500,000) was collected to carry on this war; which, in imitation of the then recent wars against the Mohammedans, was called a "Crusade." Count Raymond, notwithstanding object submission and his want of sympathy with the religion of the Albigenses, was forced into the position of their leader, since nearly all his subjects were amongst them, but he found himself quite unable to resist the invading army. Under the direction of the Papal Legates fire and sword desolated Languedoc, the Duke of Burgundy, the Counts of Nevers and Poitiers, and eventually Simon de Montfort, the fourth count of that name in France, and also Earl of Leicester in England, joining in the "crusade." The last-named received a grant of Languedoc from the Pope and the title of Count of Toulouse, and carried on the war with singular ferocity from the year 1209 to 1218, when he was killed by a stone flung from the walls as he besieged Toulouse. On his death the Count of Toulouse endeavoured to maintain his claim against Montfort's son, the leader of the English barons in their wars with Henry III., by giving up his independent sovereignty and acknowledging himself a vassal of the King of France. Thus the war against the Albigenses was taken up by Louis VIII. as a war for the conquest of a revolted part of his dominions, and was continued after his death in the name of the boy king, his son, Louis IX., who became known to after ages as St. Louis. It was at last arranged by the Treaty of Paris that Raymond VII. agreed that Languedoc should be annexed to the dominions of the kings of France, upon condition of his retaining a subordinate sovereignty under his hereditary title, that of Count of Toulouse. But the war continued to break out frequently for several years afterwards.

The cruelties which characterised this long "crusade" against the Albigenses, and by which they were, as a religious community, sect, exterminated, were such as to throw into the shade the errors of those who drew it upon them. "In their more merciful moments," says a recent writer, "the order was given by the crusading chiefs that those who recanted should be spared, and those who refused should be burned. Few avail themselves of the former alternative; more boldly confessed their faith, and accept martyrdom with cheerfulness. The crusade soon grew tired of leniency. The strife was marked with atrocities remarkable even for religious war." When Catholics and Albigenses were crowded together at the siege of Beziers, "Slay all; God will know His own," was the saying of the Legate Arnold. Labour the lady paramount was thrown into well and stones rolled upon her; eight hundred nobles were hanged on trees or hewn pieces; four hundred of the 'perfect' were burned in one pile; the rest, men, women, and children, were massacred." So it was through the bitter struggle, the Albigensians holding their ground at all rather by their numbers than their military skill, and near every attack upon them ending in a massacre. They made their last stand in the year 1244 at Mount Segur, "a strong castle perched on the edge of a ravine in the Pyrenees, to which most of the 'perfect' with their bishop had fled. It was forced to surrender to the Archbishop of Narbonne, Bishop of Alby, and the Seneschal of Carcassonne. All the heretics, with their bishop and the noble lady Esclarmonde, were burned alive in a vast enclosure of stakes and straw."

These cruelties were due in no small degree to the influence of the Dominican Friar St. Dominic himself, who had failed in efforts to convert the Albigenses by preaching, having stimulated the Popes to stir up war against them. The system of that hateful institution, the Inquisition, was already in course of development in the hands of the Dominicans during the earlier part of the struggle, and was established throughout Languedoc by the Council of Toulouse the year 1229. At that council "a complete code of persecution was developed. In every village one clerical and three lay inquisitors were to be appointed. The property of those on whose lands heretics were found was to be forfeited; the harbourers of heretics were to be reduced to personal slavery; heretics who recanted were to be removed to Catholic cities, to wear two crosses of different colours on their dress, to abjure Albigensian tenets and to make a public confession of faith. The suspected were incapable of holding office, of practising medicine, or of nursing the sick. But even these decrees were considered of dangerous mildness, and amplified and made more stringent by subsequent councils, which were levelled against the true Albigenses, or Manichæes."

as against the Leonistæ, or Waldenses, many of whom had shared the sufferings of the Crusade." A few of their number still remained even after these merciless severities had been practised against those whom the wars had not destroyed; but "the persecution was devised with such political shrewdness, and so well executed, that the heresy was actually stamped out in southern Europe. In fifteen years, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, the Tolosan Inquisition, at their various 'sermones,' or sessions, handed over to death by the civil power twenty-nine of the Albigenes, and punished with various severity of imprisonment nearly five hundred others. . . . Slowly, and in secret, the last remnant of the Albigenian heresy was strangled by the strong hand of the Inquisition. A few escaped and joined themselves to the Waldenses, attracted more by the comparative security of their Piedmontese homes than from any community of religious opinion. Others, it is said, escaped to Bosnia and the provinces of the Danube, where, favoured more by their obscurity than by any international toleration of either Western or Eastern Rome, they preserved a harmless and precarious existence, until they were reconciled to the Church in the fifteenth century by the eloquence of the Cardinal Carvalho." But the historical importance of the Albigenes as a community passed away in the middle of the thirteenth century, and their strange revival of Gnostic and Manichean opinions was not represented among the sects into which the last of them were absorbed.

Albinus (1), or AUBIN, Sr.—A bishop of Angers, born of an ancient and noble family, of Vannes, in Brittany, in A.D. 469. He became a monk, and subsequently for twenty-five years abbot, of the monastery of Cincillac, since called Tintillant, where his own austerities and the discipline which he maintained spread his fame far and wide. In 529 the people of Angers came to the monastery to insist that he should be their bishop, and compelled him to undertake the office. He died in A.D. 550, and is commemorated on March 1st, the day of his death, as well as on June 30th, the day on which his body was afterwards translated to the Church of Stephen, henceforward called the Church of St. Aubin.

Albinus (2).—A softened form of the name Alcuin. [ALCUN.]

Albis, Dominica in.—The Sunday after Easter, which was called in full, "Dominica in albis depositis," because on that day the newly-baptised brought to church, to be left there, the white robes, or "albe," in which they had been christened on Easter Eve, and which they had worn during Easter week. The day was also called "Dominica post albas," the "Sunday after" the evening on which "the white robes" had actually been laid aside, which was the octave of Easter Eve. [AGNUS DEI.]

Alcuin [A.D. 735-804].—This great and learned Englishman, the friend and adviser of the Emperor Charlemagne, was born in or near York, of noble parents, about the year 735. His original name was Alcuin, but he softened its harshness of sound when using it in a Latin form, and was known among his learned contemporaries as Albinus Flaccus, although that is not the name by which he has been best known to succeeding ages. In his boyhood Alcuin became a member of St. Mary's Abbey, York, and was there a pupil of two learned men, Egbert and Ethelbert, who successively became Archbishops of York. When about thirty years of age he himself became the head of the monastic school, and librarian of an important library which had been founded by Archbishop Ethelbert. Fifteen years later [A.D. 780], Alcuin was sent to Rome by Archbishop Eanbald to obtain the pall [PALL] from Pope Adrian I., and as he passed through Parma on his return he came under the notice of Charles the Great, who was so struck with his vast learning that he begged him to take up his abode at the great Imperial court. Alcuin made a short visit to Charlemagne after he had fulfilled his mission at York; and, eventually, with the consent of King and Archbishop, he took up his permanent residence at the great Emperor's court. There he was employed as head of the Palatine, or Palace, Schools, in the foundation of others of a similar character, in writing many learned works, and in influencing the education of his own and the next generation after a manner and to an extent similar to that of Arnold at Rugby in the middle of the nineteenth century. In A.D. 790 Alcuin returned to his native north country, remaining there for two years, and much entreated to remain by Ethelred, King of Northumbria. But at this time the Adoptionist heresy [ADOPTIONISTS] was making great progress, and Charlemagne desired the return of Alcuin, as the most learned man of his day, to oppose it. He was nominally the head of several monasteries, and especially of that of St. Martin at Tours, though he was only in deacon's orders; and on account of his great learning and reputation he was appointed to represent the English bishops at the Council of Frankfort. But he obtained permission to resign his preferments some years before his death, which occurred on Whitsunday, May 19th, 804, at Tours, in the cathedral of which city he was buried. Alcuin was born in the year of the Venerable Bede's death, and he worthily developed the ecclesiastical learning in which his brother north-countryman led the way. Like Bede, he was a most voluminous writer; and among works of his which are still preserved there are large collections of epistles, commentaries on the books of Holy Scripture, doctrinal writings, chiefly on the Blessed Trinity, liturgical works, poems, and many writings of a more miscellaneous class, of which those on education may be specially mentioned. Among his poems there is one on the Church of York and its bishops, which forms a valuable historical record. An interesting memorial of Alcuin may be seen in the British Museum, where a magnificent illuminated Latin Bible belonging to the Emperor Charlemagne is preserved, and publicly exhibited, which is said to have been prepared under his superintendence, with a revised text, for the Emperor's own use. It is also said in an old chronicle that he made an English version of part of the Old Testament.

"Alfred the Abbot,
Whom we call Alcuin,
He was a scholar,
And translated the . . . books,
Genesis, Exodus,
Deuteronomy,
Numbers, Leviticus.
Through these were taught
Our people in English."

Aldate, St., or sometimes St. Old.—There is no trustworthy account of any saint of this name; and there is a high probability that the few churches which are so named were originally known popularly by the name of Aldgate, or Old Gate [i.e., Old Street] Church, the name being eventually mistaken for that of a person, the prefix "Saint" being added as a matter of course, and the letter "g" dropped in colloquial use until it was dropped altogether.

Aldbert. [ADELBERT.]

Aldhelm, St. [d. 709], belonged to the royal family of Wessex, and was born in the earlier half of the seventh century. He was educated in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew by an Irish scholar named Mailduff, the original founder of the great monastery which was afterwards known as Mailduff Burgus, or Malmesbury. Of this abbey St. Aldhelm became abbot about 670; and when the kingdom and diocese of Wessex was divided into two dioceses by King Ina in 705, St. Aldhelm was appointed Bishop of Sherborne. [SHERBORNE, BISHOPRIC OF.] He is the earliest English author known, and many of his works are extant written in Latin. English hymns, which he wrote for the purpose of inducing the people to endure better the long services of holy days are, unfortunately, lost; but a translation of the first fifty psalms, some in prose and some in verse, is still extant in a contemporary MS. in the National Library at Paris, and has been printed. It is the oldest of all those many attempts to give a vernacular Bible to the English people, which culminated seven centuries later in that noble version known by the name of Wycliffe, the version out of which our present English Bible was developed in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Alexander of Hales [d. 1245].—A Franciscan monk of Hales, in Gloucestershire. He studied theology and the canon law both in England and Paris, and acquired such a reputation that he was called "The Irrefragable Doctor." Some of his works are still extant, including commentaries on the Psalms and the Revelation.

Alexander Natalis. [NOEL, ALEXANDER.]

Alexander Neckham. [NECKHAM, ALEXANDER.]

Alexander, St., was Archbishop of Alexandria [A.D. 313—326] during the great struggle between the orthodox and Arius and his followers, and at the Nicene Council.

Alexander, St.—A soldier of the Theban Legion, who was beheaded outside the city of Bergamo, and is there specially commemorated.

Alexandria, CATECHETICAL SCHOOL OF.—This famous home of theological learning is said to have been originally founded by St. Mark the Evangelist. The earliest head of it whose name is handed down to us is Athenagoras; but there is no authority of very high antiquity for this. Eusebius, however, mentions Pantenus, a Stoic philosopher and the disciple of apostolic men, as its head about A.D. 179. He was succeeded on his death by the great Clement of Alexandria, whose successor was the still greater Origen. After the time of Origen, the School of Alexandria produced no specially learned theologians; but its influence extended far into subsequent ages through the personal teaching and literary works of Clement and Origen.

Alexandria, LITURGY OF.—One of the primitive liturgies, which is said to have been composed by St. Mark the Evangelist for the use of Christians throughout Egypt, and the substance of which is still extant. [LITURGIES.]

Alexandrine Codex.—A fine copy of the whole Bible in Greek, which was written in the fourth century, and originally belonged to the patriarchal library of Alexandria, but is now in the British Museum. It was presented to Charles I. by Cyril Lucar, then Patriarch of Constantinople, in 1628, and passed from the Royal Library to that of the Museum in 1757.

This manuscript of the Bible consists of four large quarto volumes, and is known among Biblical critics as Codex "A." It is one of the only three early Bibles in a nearly complete form which exist, and is far less mutilated than either of the other two—the Vatican ["B"], at Rome, and the Sinaitic [α], at St. Petersburg. It is written on thin vellum, in double columns, in Greek capital letters, and is easily readable. A volume of this priceless Bible is always open to inspection under glass, in the Library of the British Museum. The whole manuscript was printed in facsimile in 1786, and in a more portable form in 1816 [O. T.] and 1860 [N. T.]. Cowper's edition of the New Testament, published at the latter date, gives a full account of the manuscript in the introduction.

Alerians. [LULLARDS.]

Alexis, Sr., or ALEXIUS.—The patron saint of pilgrims and beggars. The Roman legend respecting him is probably a mere fiction intended to enforce the lesson that we are strangers and pilgrims upon earth, and there is no certain evidence that there was such a person as it refers to. He is said to have been a young Roman nobleman who lived about A.D. 400, when the Empire was drawing to an end, who forsook his home and his bride on his wedding day, went on "pilgrimage" for seventeen years, and then returned, unrecognised, to Rome, where he received alms daily at the door of his father's house, to support life.

Alford, HENRY [b. 1810; Dean of Canterbury, 1857; d. 1871]. This very accomplished and learned divine was distinguished as an earnest and attractive preacher, and wrote several hymns which have become popular. But the chief work of his life was his edition of the Greek Testament (1849-1861), the best which up to his time had ever appeared in this country; and though more learned commentaries on separate books have appeared since, Alford's edition of the New Testament as a complete work, taking into consideration text and commentary, remains the best.

Alfred, KING [A.D. 849-901].—This good king is specially connected with the religious history of England as a translator of part of the Holy Bible into English. It is well known that he placed the Ten Commandments and the four chapters of the Book of Exodus which are associated with them at the head of his code of English law, and his name has also been connected with an English version of the Psalms. He translated also a noble treatise on ministerial duties, The Pastoral of St. Gregory, and in his preface to this the King expressed a wish that "all the freeborn youth of his kingdom might be able to read the English Scriptures."

Alien Priors.—Communities established in England as CELLS of Norman Abbays. They were exempt from the jurisdiction of English bishops, and were looked upon with disfavour as colonies of foreigners whose interests were not those of the country in which they were settled. When the great war with France was carried on by Henry V., the alien priories were abolished by Act of Parliament [2 Hen. V., A.D. 1414]; but their property was used in the foundation of the noble monasteries of Sheen and Sion, and in augmenting the revenues of New College and Winchester College.

Alkmund, St. [A.D. 800].—Of this saint there is very little known beyond the name. He is said by Simeon of Durham to have been a son of Alchred, King of Northumbria, and to have been put to death, under circumstances which gave him the character of a martyr, by the servants of Eardulf, apparently at Lilleshall, in Shropshire. Ethelfleda, daughter of King Alfred, built a church to his memory at Shrewsbury, which was afterwards made a collegiate church, with ten prebendaries, by King Edgar. A church was also dedicated in the name of St. Alkmund at Derby, to which his remains were removed, and where a famous shrine was erected. Several other churches with the same dedication exist in the counties of Derby and Shropshire. He is commemorated on March 19th.

Allatus, LEO [1586-1669].—A very learned physician of Greek birth, but Roman by education and long residence in Italy, who devoted himself to the promotion of union between the Greek and Roman churches. He never took orders, but was a voluminous writer on theological and liturgical subjects; and for the last eight years of his life was librarian to the Vatican. He was a constant and laborious student, and was possessed of a surprising memory, stored with all kinds of knowledge. The curious anecdote is told of him, that he wrote for forty years with the same quill pen, and that he shed tears when it was at last lost by accident.

Allegorical.—The expression or explanation of one thing under the image of another, the allegory differing from the parable in always using that which is historically or literally true for the purpose. Thus St. Paul explains certain differences between the Jewish and the Christian Dispensations by allegorising the history of Ishmael and Isaac [Gal. v. 22-31].

Allein, JOSEPH [1623-1668].—The author of a work entitled "The Alarm to the Unconverted," which was once exceedingly popular and sold by hundreds of thousands. Allein was son of Tobias Allen of Devizes, and was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He became one of the original Non-conformists in 1662, and was one of the few who suffered imprisonment for contumacy: but it is said that he greatly regretted his separation from the Church.

Alleluia.—The Greek and Latin form of the Hebrew Hallelujah, the English form of which is, "Praise ye the Lord." It was adopted in Christian worship in very early ages, especially at Easter. In the English form it is familiar in the Book of Common Prayer, in the versicles, "Praise ye the Lord; R The Lord's Name be praised." It is thus translated also throughout the Psalms; but in the book of the Revelation the Greek form is retained.

Alleluatic Psalms. [HALLEL.]

Allen, CARDINAL [1532—1594].—This zealous Roman Catholic was born in Lancashire and educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow during the reign of Edward VI. In Queen Mary's reign he was made Principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and Canon of York. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth he retired to Louvain and received foreign preferments, being eventually created "Cardinal of England" in 1587 and consecrated Archbishop of Mechlin in 1589. During the whole reign of Queen Elizabeth Allen's zeal, learning, and administrative abilities were used in the endeavour to establish Roman doctrine, customs, and authority, in England, in the place of the Reformed Church. For this purpose he set up a college or "Seminary" at Douay in the year 1568, for the education of young Englishmen or Irishmen, who were sent into England as "seminary" or "missionary" priests, and thus to form a "new English clergy," who should gradually convert the country to Rome and lay the foundation of a Roman hierarchy which should supersede the bishops and clergy of the Church of England. In 1576 this college was driven from Douay by rioters, but was reinstated there in 1593, and continued there until the French Revolution, when it migrated to Ware, in Hertfordshire, where it is still existing. Similar seminaries were founded at Rome, Seville, and Madrid in 1578, and others at Valladolid, St. Omer, Paris, Liège, Lisbon, Louvain, and Ghent, during the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and James I. The movement was vigorously maintained by Cardinal Allen as long as he lived, and many of the young priests whom he thus sent into England to convert it to Romanism gave up their lives in their enthusiasm for the hopeless cause which they had undertaken. He also supported the invasion of the "Great Armada" in two works entitled "An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England," in which he urged his countrymen to consider themselves absolved from their allegiance to Queen Elizabeth and to support Philip of Spain, the widower of Queen Mary her sister. Cardinal Allen was the most vigorous and practical opponent of the English Reformation that lived in those times, and did much to establish in England the small body of Roman Catholics which sprung up during the Elizabethan age and has survived to the present day.

All Hallows.—An old name for the festival of All Saints, "halowe" or "halwe" being a mediæval English word in common use for the later Latinised word "saint." So Hallowmas used to be the familiar name of All Saints Day, the form being analogous to that of Christmas; and the designation the even or vigil preceding, that of "All Hallow E'en," has not yet become altogether obsolete.

All Saints, FESTIVAL OF [Nov. 1st].—There are traces of a festival for the commemoration of all martyrs and saints not otherwise commemorated as far back as the time of St. Chrysostom, who refers to the Sunday after Pentecost as such a festival. In the Sacramentary of St. Gregory there is also collects and scriptures appointed for two such days, one of All Martyrs on May 13th and one of All Saints on Nov. 1st; these two days appearing likewise in the Calendar of the Venerable Bede. The formal institution of the festival is usually associated, however, with the dedication of the temple of the Pantheon at Rome as a Christian church on Nov. 1st, 608.

All Souls, FESTIVAL OF [Nov. 2nd].—appears to have been the custom of the primitive Church, even as early as the time of St. Cyprian, to commemorate annually "the souls of all those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of our Lord," annual communions, for the same purpose being also mentioned by Tertullian, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and others. The commemoration, known in the mediæval Church of England as "the year's mind," was probably the origin of a general commemoration following that of All Saints, such a festival being found in existence in the tenth century. In the old calendars of the Church of England it appeared as "The commemoration of souls," or "of the souls of the departed," until the Reformation, when it was not retained in the calendar on its construction for the Book of Common Prayer.

All Souls' College. [OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF.]

Almanack.—For the religious use of almanacks see the article under the word CALENDAR.

Almaricians. [AMALRICIANS.]

Almighty.—This word is a title of God used by Himself in the earliest history of mankind [Gen. xvii. 1], and put into the mouths of angelic beings and saints when they are worshipping Him in heaven at the end of all things [Rev. iv. 8, xix. 6]. The English form of the word is traceable as far back as the English language, the first article of the Apostles' Creed standing in the form "Ic gelyfe on God Fæder Ælmyhtig" in the ninth century: nor has it been to this great extent superseded by the equivalent Latinised form "Omnipotent," which has been in use since the days of Chaucer. In either form it signifies the comprehensive power of God as the Creator and Preserver of all things: so that nothing is beyond the range of that power. All other power has limits beyond which it cannot go. The power of God is illimitable, and can be restrained only by His own will. This mightiness to do all things is beautifully illustrated in the 38th, 39th, 40th, and 41st chapters of the Book of Job.

Almoner.—An official [Lat. eleemosynarius] appointed to distribute alms on behalf of a community or of a person. Thus the "Lord High Almoner" is a court official of the sovereigns of England, and part of his duties is to distribute the alms of the sovereign during a special service at the Chapel Royal on Maundy Thursday.

Almuce. [AMESS.]

Alms.—Money or goods given to the poor as a religious duty. The word is contracted from the Anglo-Saxon and mediæval "almesse," which itself is an Anglicised abbreviation of the ecclesiastical Latin "eleemosyna," originally Greek, and signifying "mercy." It is properly a word in the singular, as in the narrative of the mendicant at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple, who "asked an alms" [Acts iii. 3]. The giving of alms has always been insisted upon as a very essential part of religious duty in every age of the Church, and it is evident from St. Paul's writings that it was associated with Divine worship on "the first day of the week" from Apostolic times [OFFERTORY]. The Divine recognition of almsgiving as a good work is also shown by the message delivered to Cornelius, "Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God" [Acts x. 4].

Alms Dish.—The shallow "basin" or dish in which the priest at the altar receives, for presentation thereon, the money and other gifts which have been collected from the congregation. They are almost always made of "latten," that is, bell or gun metal, and are often very beautifully chased or engraved. Fine examples are to be seen at Westminster Abbey, and in many English cathedrals; as also in not a few parish churches.

Allogi.—A general term given by some ancient heresiologists to all who rejected the doctrine of St. John respecting the "Logos," or "WORD." It does not appear that there was ever a distinctly organised sect so called.

Alphabet, CEREMONIAL USE OF THE.—This formed part of the ancient ceremonies in the consecration of churches, as it still goes by the Latin rite. As the bishop came to the midst of the nave on entering the church in procession, he found a few square yards of the pavement spread with white wood ashes. Upon these he wrote the alphabet twice with the end of his pastoral staff, first in Greek letters from the north-east to the south-west, and then in Latin from the south-east to the north-west, thus placing the two lines in the form of a St. Andrew's cross. The ceremony signified that all Divine revelation was conveyed by the letters of the alphabet, and that the Gospel comprehends under the shadow of the Cross men of all nations, and peoples, and tongues. In very ancient times three alphabets were written, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, as the title placed over our Lord's head upon the cross was written in those three tongues; but the Hebrew was early discontinued, probably because bishops were not often able to write in that character.

Alphabet Psalms and Hymns.—

This peculiar form of acrostic poetry [ACROSTIC] occurs in the Psalms and elsewhere in the Old Testament, and was occasionally adopted by early Christian hymn-writers. Instead of the initial letters of the verses forming a word or a name, as in the case of ordinary acrostics, they occur in regular alphabetical order, the object of this being probably that of assisting the memory, as beads are used by Roman Catholics in the rosary to recall to mind particular prayers. There are eight alphabet psalms, namely, the 9th and 10th, which form one psalm in the Hebrew, the 25th, 34th, 37th, 111th, 112th, 119th, and 145th. The 119th has the most elaborate structure of all these, for it is divided into twenty-two stanzas, or sections, of eight couplets each, and every couplet of each stanza begins with the letter of the alphabet which stands at its head. To represent this faithfully in English all the eight verses under aleph should begin with A, all under beth with B, and so on through the twenty-two sections of the psalm. The same alphabetic structure is to be found in the Lamentations of the prophet Jeremiah. In that book the 1st, 2nd, and 4th chapters consist of twenty-two verses each, the initials of the verses forming the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. The 3rd chapter consists of sixty-six verses, every three successive verses beginning with the same letter.

Alpha and Omega.—The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, which are used in the book of the Revelation [Rev. i. 8] to symbolise the infinite eternity of God's existence as "the First and the Last," and His relation to all created and finite beings as "the Beginning and the Ending" of all existence. A similar expression is also found in the Old Testament [Isai. xli. 4, xliv. 6], and was known as a proverbial saying among the Jews, who would say of a thing complete and perfect that it was "from aleph to tau."

Among the early Christians the letters alpha and omega were frequently placed on either side of the cruciform monogram formed from the letters chi and rho, the first two letters of the name Christ in Greek [ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ]. In this form it occurs in sepulchral inscriptions in the Catacombs, and, at a later date, on the coins of Constantine the Great and his successors. It has also been found on deserted houses on the banks of the Orontes, in Syria.

Alphege, St. [A.D. 954-1012]. — An Archbishop of Canterbury, who was cruelly put to death by the heathen Danes at Greenwich, on April 19th, the Saturday in Easter week, 1012. Alphege was a West-Saxon of noble birth, and, having been a monk of Glastonbury, became at an early age Abbot of Bath. He was made Bishop of Winchester in 984, and was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury in 1005. In the sixth year of his primacy the city of Canterbury was taken by the Danes, the cathedral greatly injured, nearly all the clergy massacred, and the Archbishop himself carried away prisoner in the hope that a large sum of money would be offered for his ransom. He was kept in captivity in the Danish camp at Greenwich for seven months, and at length, on April 19th, 1012, brought before the Danish chiefs at one of their riotous banquets with a fresh demand for gold. The Archbishop firmly refused to sanction the use of Church money or goods for his own ransom, and was then pelted by the revellers with the bones which remained from their feast until he was half dead. One of them, a godson of his own, named Thrum, then struck him on the head with an axe, and so put an end to his life. The body of the murdered Archbishop was bought of the Danes by the people of London, and was at first buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, but was translated to Canterbury by King Canute. The parish church of Greenwich is dedicated in his name, and he is commemorated on April 19th in the calendar of the Prayer Book.

Alphonso A'Castro [1495-1558]. — A Spanish Franciscan monk, who came to England as confessor to Philip of Spain on his marriage with Queen Mary, and whose influence contributed largely to the persecution of the Protestants during their reign. A'Castro had published a Latin work on heresies as early as 1534, and in 1547 had published another on "the righteous punishment of heretics," both works being reprinted for the use of King Philip, when the writer was resident in England "serving the king in public sermons, and in matters of business connected with the faith." In the later work A'Castro advocates the burning of heretics as the best way of putting them to death, and justifies it by the example of the destruction of Korah and his company. It was immediately after King Philip had been thus instructed by his spiritual adviser that the statutes against heretics were revived, and the persecution began a short time later by the burning of John Roger Canon of St. Paul's, Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, and Taylor, Rector of Hadleigh. A'Castro also interfered personally with the accused persons, and Foxe records a visit which he paid to Bradford while the latter was a prisoner in the Compter, on February 26th, 1556. "Here was the Friar," writes the Martyrologist, "in a wonderful rage, an spake so high (as often he had done before that the whole house rung again, chafing with om and cho. He hath a great name for learning, but surely he hath little patience. A'Castro was appointed to the Archbishopric of Compostella, and left England at the end of 1557, but he died at Brussels, on February 2nd, 1558, being then on his way to take possession of his see.

Altar. — A name given to the table whether of stone or of wood, used in the celebration of the Holy Communion or Eucharist [EUCCHARIST]. (1) The term appears to have been employed in this sense very early in the history of the Church. (2) It has always been so used by the Roman Catholic Church, as indicating that upon which the sacrifice of the Mass is offered. (3) It appears in the Rubric of the Early Prayer Books of the Reformed Church of England, but "the Lord's Table" was substituted for it in 1552, and it is now found only in the Rubrics of the Coronation Service. [See p. 47.] "The Lord's Table" is a name that was given to the "table" the shewbread," which is called an "altar" by the last of the prophets [Mal. i. 7], the altar of incense [Ezek. xli. 22], and the altar of burnt offering [Ezek. xlii. 1 Mal. i. 12].

Many English Divines have habitually written of the Holy Communion as a "Feast upon a Sacrifice," and books of devotion in use at the service have commonly been called by the title of "Companion to the Altar." The word "altar" is also used by members of the High Church party in the Church of England, to specially indicate their belief in the sacrificial character of the Holy Communion.

It is possible that in the first and unsettled years of the Christian Church "the breaking of the bread" often took place in private houses, and on part of the domestic "triclinium," which was a table forming three sides of a square; but it is certain that when "upper rooms," and other fixed places of assembly, began to be set apart for Divine worship, a "Lord's table" for the purpose became a distinct feature in them. When St. Paul wrote to the Jews, "We have altar" [Heb. xiii. 10], he seems to be using language which is associated with that Table of the Lord from which Christians received the Christian peace-offering, as the Jews had received their peace-offerings from the altar in the Temple; and not very long after St. Paul's time, St. Ignatius, who was the contemporary of some of the Apostles, wrote in his Epistle to the Philippians, "In every church there is one altar." The earliest detailed description of a Christian church is, however, contained in a sermon preached about the year 315 by Eusebius, the historian, at the dedication of the Cathedral of Tyre. Here he speaks of the architect having arranged seats around the semicircular end of the church for the use of the bishop and clergy, and having at last placed the holy altar in the midst [Euseb., Ecl. Hist., x., 4]. From that time, the word is the one most commonly found in use in Christian literature as the designation of the Lord's Table, the Greek term being theusiastērion, the Latin altar, and the languages of Europe all using some term derived directly from the latter.

In the earliest ages of the Church, altars appear to have been usually made of wood. One is enclosed within the stone altar of St. John Lateran, at Rome, which St. Peter is alleged to have used. Fragments of wood are preserved also at the Church of St. Pudenzia, which are similarly said to be part of an altar of apostolic date. At Durham there is a small portable altar of wood, covered with silver, which was used by St. Cuthbert when visiting his diocese, in the seventh century; and many references are found to wooden altars in early Christian writers. They are generally used in the Eastern Church, and William of Malmesbury says that they were used in England down to the eleventh century, but that Wulstan, the then Bishop of Worcester [1062—1095], caused all in his diocese to be changed for altars of stone. It is probable that although altars were long made of wood, as part of the furniture of the church, it was found that they could be too easily destroyed in troubled times, and that thus altars of stone came to be introduced, often to be replaced by still more costly material, as in the silver altar of St. Ambrose, at Milan, which dates from A.D. 835.

The altar of early Christian times appears to have been mostly, if not always, placed under a canopy, supported by columns, and called a sidorium, the name being Greek, and meaning a covering of cup-like form, a "cupola," or "dome." [BALDACHINO.] In England it was more common to surround the altar on three sides with hangings, leaving the front or west side only unenclosed. But from the Reformation until quite recent times, a form of the ancient cupola or dome was very commonly used in English churches, heavy pillars occupying the north and south ends of the table, and an angular or dome-shaped pediment surmounting them. This addition to the altar served the purpose of adding to the dignity of its appearance, and giving it prominence in its position at the east end of the church, where it would otherwise be almost lost to sight in large churches. For the same reason, it was also placed upon an elevated platform, approached by several or many steps; and for the sake of protection from profanation, a low wall, or some similar form of enclosure, was placed at some distance in front of it, though this latter was not often used when there was a choir screen, it being considered that the whole chancel was then sufficiently enclosed for the purpose in view.

Altar Cloths.—From very ancient times Christian altars have been covered with what were called "altar-palls," or rich cloths of some kind of tapestry, and also with linen cloths. The Emperor Constantine gave some rich tapestry for the altar of a church at Jerusalem, but whether for covering it or for curtains around it cannot be determined with certainty. St. Chrysostom speaks, however, in one of his homilies, of altar coverings of silk, often ornamented with gold, as if they were common in the fourth century. In the sixth century, a letter speaks of such an altar cloth at Apamea as being purple in colour; and in the following century many such cloths were destroyed by the iconoclasts because they were decorated with embroidered figures of saints and angels.

Fine linen cloths have also been used from the first in the celebration of the Holy Communion, and are spoken of in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, by St. Isidore, by Optatus, and by St. Gregory, in whose Sacramentary there is a prayer to be used at their benediction. It seems very probable that the primitive covering of the altar was a fine linen cloth, and that the ornamental cloths of silk or woollen material were originally used for covering and protecting the linen cloth when not in use.

However this may have been, it is well known that such ornamental cloths have been in use as the visible covering of English altar shelves both before and since the Reformation, under the names of frontal and super-frontal, and that they have been of different colours at different seasons according as the latter were of a festival or penitential character. For detailed information as to colours, see the article on COLOURS.

Altar Lights. [LIGHTS, ECCLESIASTICAL USE OF.]

Altar Tomb.—A monument built in the form of a stone altar, and sometimes surmounted by a canopy. Such a tomb commemorates Chaucer, the poet, in Westminster

Abbey; one, which covers the grave of the Duchess of Northumberland, mother of Lord

Rome, and in that of St. Apollinaris at Ravenna.

CHAUCER'S ALTAR TOMB.

Guildford Dudley, is also to be seen in old Chelsea church; and a fine one, in memory of Sir George Clerke, is in St. Mary's Church, Thame.

Altruism.—A fanciful term originating with Comte the founder of Positivism [Positivists], and adopted by Herbert Spencer, to indicate a moral principle opposed to egoism, that it is a duty to live for others (altruist), denying ourselves and bestowing all our love upon others. [BENEVOLENCE, BENEFICENCE.]

A.M.—(1) An abbreviation used in chronology for "Anno Mundi," the year of the world.

A.M.—(2) The abbreviation used for the Latin words "Artium Magister," more commonly known in English as "Master of Arts."

Ama. [AMPULLA.]

Amalricians.—Those who adopted the opinions of Amalric of Bena (Amaury of Bené) a mediæval teacher of Pantheistic doctrine, who was expelled from the University of Paris in the year 1204. He appealed to Pope Innocent III., but his sentence was confirmed and he was ordered to return to Paris and recant his heresies. Amalric died, it is said of grief, in 1209; and soon afterwards his remains were burned and the ashes scattered to the wind by order of a council of Paris. By order of another council ten of his followers were burned as heretics. Among other strange doctrines which the Amalricians held in opposition to Christianity was one that the Father became incarnate in Abraham, the Son in the Blessed Virgin, and the Holy Ghost in ourselves.

Ambon.—This is the Greek name of a large desk, or "pulpit of the readers," placed at the west end of the choir, from which the Lessons, Epistle, and Gospel used anciently to be said or sung. Fine early specimens exist in the churches of St. Clement, St. Lawrence, and St. Mary in Cosmedin at Ambrose, Sr. [A.D. 340—397].—One of the Latin fathers, who was Bishop of Milan for twenty-three years [A.D. 374—397], and, on account of his great learning, accounted one of the four "Doctors" or principal theological teachers of the Western Church, the others being St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and St. Gregory. St. Ambrose was the son of a father of the same name, who held very high office in the Roman Empire, being Prætorian Prefect or Governor-General of the province of Gaul, which included Spain and Britain, and was one of the four most important governments of the Empire. He was born three years after the death of the Emperor Constantine, the place of his birth being probably Treves, though Arles and Lyons both also claim him. In a "Life" which was written by his secretary Paulinus, two anecdotes of his early days are given which were probably told to Paulinus by Marcellina, a sister of St. Ambrose, and which were regarded as prophetic of his career. In his infancy a swarm of bees settled near to him as he lay asleep in his cradle in the open court of his father's palace, and some of them flew in and out of his mouth without doing him any injury; an incident which was considered by his father as an omen foreshadowing (as in the case of Plato) future eloquence. Later on, when he was a boy, living at Rome with his widowed mother and his sister, observing that they kissed the hands of bishops, he held out his own hand to them, telling them that he also should one day be a bishop. For some years, however, he practised at the Roman bar, where he attained a position, and from which he was advanced in A.D. 369, to be consular magistrate of the provinces of Liguria and Æmilia, a district which contained his future diocese of Milan, Liguria, Turin, Genoa, and Bologna. When the prefect, Anicius Probus, was dismissing Ambrose to his government, he is said to have used the far-seeing, or the unconsciously prophetic, words, "Go then, and conduct yourself rather as a bishop than a judge." The young consular made Milan his residence, and so won the high respect of those whom he governed that the words of his friend and patron soon received an unexpected fulfilment. The bishop of Milan, Auxentius, who had been elected under Arian influences, died in the year 374, and the Catholic party endeavoured to obtain an orthodox prelate for his successor. Something approaching to a riot occurred in the keen struggle which attended the election, and the governor Ambrose visited the church in which the election was taking place, to suppress the disturbance by his official presence. As he was speaking to those who were assembled there, a voice was heard to exclaim, "Ambrose for bishop," and the cry, which was afterwards said (with little probability on such an occasion) to have come from a child, was at once taken up by the multitude, "Ambrose for bishop." It was with very great reluctance that he gave up his high civil office, and when a messenger was despatched to obtain the sanction of Valentinian, the Emperor, he concealed himself in the house of a friend named Leontius. The Emperor's reply was an entire approval of the popular election, and when a proclamation was issued by the vice-prefect, Ambrose was discovered, and at length yielded to the wishes of the Milanese. He was then baptised (for though brought up as a Christian, his baptism had been delayed), ordained deacon and priest, and a week afterwards, on Dec. 7th, 374, he was consecrated bishop.

The earlier life of St. Ambrose as a civil magistrate and a lawyer seems to have proved an admirable training for him as a bishop. His intellect was of that high order which enables a man to take a quick and firm grasp of principles, and it had been educated by his experiences as a conscientious advocate, judge, and ruler, into a prudent and wise application of those principles in the practical work of his later office. He lived for the duties of that office, and, as he himself says, taught himself, that he might teach others. He kept a firm hold upon those who had learned to respect him as a layman by his constant and untiring ministrations, by his unswerving adherence to the received and authoritatively expressed doctrine of the Church, by his self-denying and holy life, and by his bold maintenance of high Christian principle, even when it obliged him to assert it in the face of an emperor. A conspicuous illustration of the last feature in his character, which was illustrated on other occasions also, is found in the discipline which he exercised in the case of the Emperor Theodosius. In A.D. 390 the people of Thessalonica had, in one of those popular tumults for which they were evidently notorious even in the days of St. Paul, put to death some officers of the Roman garrison, and, in a hasty fit of vengeance, the Emperor had put down the insurrection with so severe a hand that as many as seven thousand of the people were slain. St. Ambrose at once wrote a letter to the Emperor, rebuking him for the inhuman character of this Imperial act, exhorting him to penitence for it, and declaring that he would not celebrate the Eucharist in his presence or administer it to him until the Emperor had given proof of his repentance. The end was that the Emperor came to the church, and, putting off his royal robes, performed some act of penance in the sight of the congregation, and asked for pardon from God and man. Such brave Christian conduct as this won for the Bishop of Milan the highest reverence of rulers and people.

He was often employed by the Emperors in political matters, but always apparently for the purpose of putting an end to variance and bringing about peace and quietness. In a similar manner the people constantly appealed to him in matters of law; and his knowledge of law was always employed to end differences and prevent lawsuits. So dear did he become to the Emperor Theodosius that when the latter died the name of Ambrose was the last word on his lips, and there is a well-known saying of his, "I have known no bishop except Ambrose."

In the latter part of his life [A.D. 383-387] there were some years of friendship between St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, their intercourse being that of a spiritual father and his "son in the Lord," such as may have been that between St. Paul and Timothy. It was, indeed, under the teaching of St. Ambrose that the doubting Augustine was fully converted to Christianity, and by him that the convert was baptised. A memorial of their spiritual association has come down from at least as far back as the eighth century, in the form of a tradition, which attributes the composition of the "Te Deum" to the two conjointly. This beautiful hymn is probably older than the time of St. Ambrose, but as the earliest liturgical references to it are connected with his name, so, at a more recent date, and more than a thousand years ago, it was sometimes entitled "The Hymn which St. Ambrose and St. Augustine composed between them." Many other hymns are also, and with the highest probability, attributed to St. Ambrose. [HYMNS.]

His works are very voluminous, most of them having been originally composed as discourses to be preached in his cathedral, or as epistles to his friends. As to the former class, they have shared the fate of all good popular sermons; and, while it is certain that they were exceedingly attractive and influential, and regarded as possessing the highest qualities of eloquence among his contemporaries, they have not ranked with the highest class of Patristic writings among students of later ages. They are also deficient in originality: for, like many other eloquent preachers, St. Ambrose had in a high degree the gift of assimilating the thoughts of others, and giving them stronger point or greater beauty by making them his own.

St. Ambrose died, immediately after receiving the Communion of the Sick, on April 4th, 397, which was Good Friday in that year. He was buried in the Cathedral of Milan, where he lies under the high altar, a costly structure of gold and silver, dating from A.D. 835; the great Basilica, which has ever since borne his name, being filled with a crowd of his own flock, mourning his loss but reverencing his memory. The same day on which he died, April 4th, is that on which he is commemorated in the Church of England; but in the Roman and Eastern Churches his festival is December 7th, the day of his consecration as bishop.

Ambrosian.—This occasionally occurs in ancient service books as the name of the Te Deum, and also still more rarely as the name of hymns in general. So they were said by St. Isidore to have been called in the 7th century.

Ambrosian Chant.—The term "Cantus Ambrosianus" indicates the mode of church singing introduced into the Western Church by St. Ambrose, and not any particular melody or melodies, as in the case of the Gregorian Chants, although it is indeed connected with a well-known ancient melody, which has been used for the Te Deum almost from his time, the "Ambrosian Te Deum." It is still uncertain what was the peculiar form of church singing which was thus called the "Cantus Ambrosianus." St. Augustine says in his Confessions that the Eastern mode of singing was introduced into the Church of Milan, and that from thence it spread throughout the churches of all Europe; and it has been conjectured that by this he meant the antiphonal mode of singing from side to side, the origin of which was attributed to St. Ignatius, in the Church of Antioch. A better opinion is that Ambrosian chanting was a modification of a more simple mode, nearly approaching monotone, which had previously been used, and which itself was further developed into the more elaborate Gregorian system of two hundred years later.

Ambrosian Rite. [LITURGIES.]

Ambrosians.—The followers of a French fanatic of the name of Ambrose, who professed to have received revelations of much higher value than the Holy Scriptures. He lived in the middle of the 16th century.

Ambrosiaster.—The name given for literary and critical purposes to the unknown author of a Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul, which was formerly believed to be one of the works of St. Ambrose, but which is now known to have been written some years before he was baptised, between A.D. 366 and A.D. 384. It is a work of high value as an early interpretation of St. Paul's writings, and also as containing many quotations from the ancient Vulgate, a Latin version of the Scriptures earlier than that of St. Jerome.

Ambulatory.—Literally, a place to walk in, from the Latin word ambulare. It is used ecclesiastically to designate a covered cloister outside of a church, or the aisles within, principally the aisle around the choir in cathedrals and other large churches, which was used as a "procession path."

Amen.—A Hebrew liturgical word, the use of which was ordained in the Law given to the Jews at Sinai, and which has passed into the services of the Christian Church, sometimes in a translated form, as in the Greek "Alêthos," the Latin "Fiat," and the English "So be it," but mostly in its untranslated form "Amen." Its liturgical use among the Jews is illustrated by the response assigned to the woman in the trial by the water of jealousy [Numb. v. 22], by that of the people in the great Communion at Mount Ebal [Deut. xxvii. 15-26, comp. Neh. v. 13], and after the Psalm of Thanksgiving given by David to Asaph at the placing of the Ark on Zion [1 Chron. xvi. 36, comp. Neh. viii. 6], and by its occurrence in the doxologies, with which the first four books of the Psalms end [Psa. xli. 13, lxxii. 18, lxxxix. 52, cvi. 48]. Its liturgical use in the Apostolic age is attested by St. Paul when arguing against the use of non-vernacular languages in Divine Service: "Else when thou shalt bless with the Spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?" [1 Cor. xiv. 16.] St. Chrysostom says that the layman, or "unlearned," cannot say Amen at the celebration of the Holy Communion, because he does not know when the concluding words of the consecration prayers, "world without end," which should be followed by a general "Amen," are spoken. But far earlier than this the use of Amen in this place is referred to by Justin Martyr, and it occurs here in all ancient liturgies. The liturgical use of it may indeed be inferred to have direct Divine sanction, since our Lord Himself enjoined it on the Apostles when He gave them the Lord's Prayer [Matt. vi. 13].

In liturgical use the word "Amen" has always borne two senses: that of emphatic assent, as at the end of the Creeds, where it means "So it is," or "So I believe," and that of ratification, "So be it," as when it is said after prayers that have been spoken in our name. "The rules for its use in the Prayer Book appear to be these: [1] When it is used after acts of worship in which the minister alone has spoken, as in Absolutions, Benedictions, and 'other prayers,' it is to be taken as a ratification by the people of what the minister has said, and is to be said by the people only, in which case the word is printed in italics; [2] When it is used at the end of formularies which the people say with the minister, as in Confessions, the Lord's Prayer, Doxologies, and Creeds, it is to be said by both minister and people as part of the formularies, and is then printed in Roman type; [3] In the Lord's Prayer at the beginning of the Communion Service, in the formulæ of Baptism, and in the reception of the baptised into Christian fellowship, it is a ratification by the speaker himself, and is not to be said by the people." [Annot. Pr. Book, page 185.]

Amess [Lat., Alaumium], ALMUCE, or AMTSE.—A tippet of fur worn by canons and other dignitaries of cathedrals during cold weather. It was usually shaped like a flat "boa," with ends hanging down in front like the ends of a stole, but it also appears to have been sometimes of a form somewhat similar to that of a B.A. hood, the furred portion being drawn over the head. The Grey Friars' Chronicle, written early in the reign of Edward the Sixth, notices that late in 1548 the canons of St. Paul's Cathedral "left off wearing their grey amesses with the calober." [Grey F. Chron., Camd. Soc. ed. page 59.]

Amice [Lat., Amictus], also called the Humrale and Super-humrale.—An oblong piece of fine linen, tied round the neck by two strings. It is worn over the cassock and under the alb, stole, and chasuble, and was spoken of as early as the ninth century by Amalarius as the first of the vestments which were put on by the bishop or priest at the celebration of the Holy Communion. It was originally worn upon the head like a hood, and was afterwards worn in the same manner by the priest while preparing to go to the altar, but turned back over his shoulders when the short service of preparation was over. The amice often had an "apparel," or small piece of rich embroidery, sewn on to it, which formed a kind of collar when in use.

Ammonians.—A name sometimes given to the followers of the philosopher Ammonius Saccas, the founder of the Neo-Platonist school of theology in the second century.

Ammonian Sections.—Certain divisions of the four Gospels made by Ammonius of Alexandria in the second century for the purpose of constructing a "Diatessaron," or Harmony of the Gospels. [HARMONY.]

Amphibalum, or AMPHIBALUS.—A name used in the Gallican Church for the vestment worn by the celebrant at the Holy Communion. It was the same vestment as that known to later ages by the name of "chasuble."

Amphibalus, St.—This is the name given by tradition to the priest by whom St. Alban was instructed in Christianity, and for whom he suffered death. [ALBAN, St.] From the identity of the name with that of the vestment mentioned in the preceding article, it is thought by some that the word used to designate the priest's cloak which St. Alban put on came to be taken by mistake for the name of the priest himself. Yet a modern clergyman who wore a cope might also be named Cope; and caracalla, not amphibalus, appears to be the word used for this cloak in the original story. It is certain that there was a shrine of St. Amphibalus as well as a shrine of St. Alban in St. Alban's Abbey, and that St. Amphibalus was commemorated as a martyr on June 23rd, the day following the feast of St. Alban. In popular language the name was corrupted into Saint Affabel.

Ampulla.—A flask or cruet of precious metal for holding the consecrated oil or chrism used in ceremonies of unction. The name is in use in the English Coronation Service. The same name was also given to the cruet for holding the wine and water used at the Holy Communion. Ampullas of very early date exist, one at Monza belonging to the 7th century. Similar vessels were also called by the name of Ama, and some of these of a still earlier date are preserved in the Vatican Museum.

Amsdorfians.—Those who held the opinions of Nicolas Amsdorf, a Lutheran bishop of Nuremberg, in A.D. 1552. In the course of a vigorous controversy with George Major, a Lutheran divine of Wittenberg, Amsdorf maintained an exaggerated form of the doctrine of Luther respecting the inefficacy of good works to salvation, declaring that they were not only not necessary but were even a hindrance to salvation. The parties of the two divines were reconciled by a "Formula of Concord," which was drawn up at Bergen in the year 1577.

Amyraldists.—The followers of Moses Amyraut, a Calvinistic Professor of Divinity at Saumur, from A.D. 1633 to A.D. 1664. Amyraut attempted to promote union among the many parties of Calvinists, and under the sanction of Cardinal Richelieu to re-unite them with the Church of France. He combated the Calvinistic doctrine of the Divine decrees, or the predestination of part of mankind to eternal damnation as well as of others to salvation; and maintained that all Christians had salvation placed within their power. The Amyraldists were called "Hypothetical Universalists," and perhaps carried the opinions of their leader further in the direction of actual Universalism—the doctrine that all men, good and bad, will eventually be saved—than Amyraut himself had done.

Amyss. [AMESS.]

Anabaptists.—This name, signifying "Re-baptisers," is derived from two Greek words [ana-baptizein] which mean "to baptise again," and was used as the designation of a sect which sprung up in Germany, Holland, and Switzerland during the earlier years of the Reformation. Some of them emigrated to England, chiefly to the Eastern Counties, and gathered many followers there, but this sect of the sixteenth century is not to be confused with the Baptists of the last two centuries. [BAPTISTS.]

The original Anabaptists were rather political insurrectionaries than a religious sect, and although they took their rise among the followers of Luther, they were very heartily repudiated by him, as they afterwards were by the leading Reformers of England. The earliest of their leaders who are historically traceable, were some fanatics known as the Zwickau Prophets, who claimed to be directly inspired, and rejected the Bible as part of that human learning which they held to be a hindrance to religion. Among the chief of them were Nicolas Stork, a weaver, of Zwickau; Mark Thomas, also a weaver, Thomas Münzer, Lutheran Pastor of Zwickau; and Mark Stübner, a student of Wittenberg. The political aim of these so-styled "prophets" was soon manifested, for Stork declared himself to have seen a vision of the Archangel Gabriel, who declared to him "Thou shalt sit on my throne," from which time [A.D. 1521], the "prophets" predicted the overthrow of all existing governments to make way for the "millennial reign of the saints," with Stork for their king, and twelve "apostles," and seventy "evangelists" acting under him. Münzer was dismissed from his pastorate at Zwickau, and making Altstadt, in Thuringia, the centre of his operations, propounded as his leading principles—[1] that the true Word of God is not an external revelation, but an internal inspiration; [2] that infant baptism is unlawful; [3] that there must be a visible Kingdom of Christ upon earth; and [4] that in this Kingdom all must be equal, having a community of goods. The league which Münzer formed for the establishment of a universal kingdom on these principles, and which he called on the nobles to join under pain of civil war, did not meet with the success he expected at Altstadt, and in 1524 its centre was removed to Waldshut, on the borders of Switzerland, where it was at first encouraged by Zwingli, though afterwards vigorously opposed by him, when he saw their fanaticism, so that he wrote a work against them.

About this time the "Peasants' War," broke out in Southern Germany, this being a rebellion against the extortion and tyranny of the feudal nobility, mixed up, as all such movements used to be, with alleged religious grievances. The peasants expected to find a leader in Luther, but he severely condemned their rebellion, charging them with breaking their allegiance, plundering monasteries and castles, and then cloaking their evil deeds with the pretence of obedience to the Gospel. "Therefore, dear masters," he wrote to the nobles, "come hither to deliver, hither to the rescue; have pity on the poor folk; stab, smite, throttle, who can, and if you perish in the work it will be a blessed death, a better than which you will never accomplish." The leadership which Luther thus vigorously declined was, however, gladly assumed by Münzer. He established his government, such as it was, at Muhlhausen, and signed his decrees "Münzer, with the sword of Gideon," writing to his followers in his proclamation in words as fierce as those of Luther to his opponents, "Let not your sword cool in blood. On! on! on! while ye have the day; God goes before you." He afterwards avowed that the first principle of his league had been to have all things common, and that any duke, count, or lord, who refused to consent to such communism, was to have been beheaded or hanged. The rebellion, however, was crushed at the battle of Frankenhausen, on May 15th, 1525, by an army under the command of the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Duke of Brunswick; the Anabaptist leaders were taken and put to death with much cruelty, and a multitude of their followers were either slain in the battle or executed afterwards.

A second outbreak of this religious communism was organised nine years afterwards at Münster, in Westphalia, under the leadership of a Leyden tailor named John Bockhold, John Matthias, the so-called Bishop of the Anabaptists, and Gerard Kippenbroeck, a bookbinder of Amsterdam. They attacked Münster suddenly in the night, and getting possession of the city proclaimed Matthias as king. He fell in a mad attempt, assisted by thirty followers only, to repel the forces sent to recapture the city. John Bockhold, the Leyden tailor, henceforth known as "John of Leyden," now assumed the royal title as "King of the New Jerusalem," and under him the city of Münster became the scene of fanatic violence and profligacy. It was at last recaptured by the forces of the Count of Waldeck, its prince-bishop, on June 24th, 1535, and the new "kingdom" of the Anabaptists was finally extinguished by the execution, with cruel tortures, of its "king." Insurrections had been organised by him at Amsterdam, Deventer, and Wesel, three cities which John of Leyden claimed to have received as a gift from God, and also in other parts of Holland, but all such attempts to establish the "millennial kingdom of the saints" were quickly suppressed, and the project came utterly to an end. Henceforth the Anabaptists dropped their political character, and became a simply religious sect in 1537, under the leadership of Menno Symons, a priest, and rector of his native village of Witmarsum, in Friesland. The peaceable Baptist sect which thus sprung out of the ruins of the Anabaptist revolutionists still exists under various names in Holland and North America. [MENNONITES.]

The Anabaptists cannot be clearly traced in England until the year 1534, although there can be no doubt that some had come over as early as 1529, when the bishops spoke of "certain apostates, friars, monks, lewd priests, bankrupt merchants, vagabonds, and lewd idle fellows of corrupt intent," who had "embraced the abominable and erroneous opinions lately sprung in Germany." In 1534, however, a royal proclamation was issued, which stated that many strangers had come into the realm who, although they were baptised in their infancy, yet had, in contempt of the sacrament of baptism, rebaptised themselves; and they are ordered to leave the kingdom in twelve days, under pain of death. In 1535 Cromwell made a memorandum in his pocket-book: "First, touching the Anabaptists, and what the King will do with them." What the king did do is shown in Stowe's Chronicle, where it is recorded that nineteen men and six women, all Dutch, were tried at St. Paul's on May 25th, 1535, and that fourteen were condemned as heretics, two being burned in Smithfield, and fourteen in country towns. Three years later—on Oct. 1st, 1538—a royal commission was issued to Archbishop Cranmer and others, in which the principles of the sect are declared to be pestiferous and heretical. An Act of Parliament [32 Hen. VIII., ch. 49] was passed granting a general pardon; but those who rejected infant baptism and the doctrine of our Lord's Incarnation are expressly excepted. Some of them were made to bear faggots, as heretics who had recanted their heresies; but on April 29th, 1540, some were again burned, as is mentioned by Latimer, who speaks of them as "poisoned heretics" in one of his sermons, and as "a certain sect of heretics that will have no magistrates or judges on the earth." In 1549, the middle of Edward VI.'s reign, they appear to have become very numerous, and very bold. The Act of 1549 was re-enacted, and Bishop Hooper writes from London respecting them on June 25th of that year: "The Anabaptists flock to the place, and give me much trouble with their opinions respecting the Incarnation of our Lord, for they deny altogether that Christ was born according to the flesh, of the Virgin Mary." A year later he writes that Kent and Essex are "troubled with the frenzy of the Anabaptists more than any other part of the kingdom." About a year later, at the end of Edward VI.'s reign, a foreign Reformer, Martin Micronius, wrote from London to a friend abroad that they were then "beginning to shake our churches with greater violence than ever, as they deny the Conception of Christ by the Virgin." In the reign of Queen Mary, they were the most numerous victims of the cruel persecution which was carried on, under foreign influences, chiefly in London and the counties between it and the eastern coast. [Blunt's Hist. Reform. ii. 222—225.] The last of the Anabaptists who were actually burned for their heresies were John Wielmacker and Hendrick Ter Woort, who were executed in Smithfield on July 22nd, 1575, when Queen Elizabeth, who signed their death-warrants, had been fifteen years on the throne. This is also nearly the last that is on record respecting the Anabaptists in England. A section of them had taken the name of THE FAMILY OF LOVE; and these lingered on until the few who remained were absorbed by some of the fanatic sects which sprung up during the Great Rebellion. With the suppression of the FIFTH MONARCHY MEN, in 1661, they may be said to have become extinct.

Anabata.—The Greek name for a large processional cope, with a hood. The hood has the form of a small cape in modern times, not being worn over the head.

Anagogical.—A word derived from the Greek anagin, "to lead upwards," and designating that form of the mystical interpretation of Holy Scripture which raises the thoughts from an earthly meaning to a heavenly. Thus, the weekly rest of the earthly Sabbath may be anagogically interpreted of the sabbatismos, or sabbatical and eternal rest of heaven [Heb. iv. 4—11]; or the mystery of the union between man and wife of the union between Christ and the Church [Eph. v. 22—32].

Anagnostes.—The name given to the order of a reader in the Eastern Church.

Analogion.—The name of the pulpit in a Greek or Eastern Church.

Analogy of Religion. [BUTLER, JOSEPH.]

Analogy of the Faith.—This phrase is derived from the words of St. Paul [Rom. xii. 6], "let us prophesy according to the proportion of the faith" [Gr. tên analogian tês pisteôs], and signifies the harmony of the different parts of the Christian creed, which may be disturbed by bringing one part so conspicuously into view as to obscure others, or tend to contradict them. Thus, exaggerated teaching respecting the dignity of the Virgin Mary's relation to our Lord has tended to obscure the doctrines relating to our Lord Himself as the One Mediator.

Anaphora.—That part of the Liturgies of the Eastern Churches which corresponds to the Canon of the Mass in the Western, and contains the prayers and praises connected with the Acts of Consecration and Communion. The corresponding portion of the Liturgy in the English service is that which begins with "Lift up your hearts," and ends with the Benediction. It is the most ancient part of the Eucharistic Service.

Anastasia, St. [A.D. 304].—A noble lady of Rome, who suffered by fire in Illyria, after being tortured by her husband, in the Diocletian persecution. Her ashes were brought to Rome, where a church was built over them near the Palatine Hill. She appears to have been martyred on Christmas Day, on which day she is commemorated; and it was formerly the custom for the Popes to celebrate the second mass of that day in this church. Her name is one of the few which are inserted in the Canon of the Mass. St. Jerome is also said to have celebrated mass in the Church of St. Anastasia.

Anathema.—A Greek word, representing the Hebrew cherem, which designated things or persons so vowed or devoted to the Lord for the purpose of destruction that they could not be redeemed [Josh. vi. 17]. The word and its corresponding verb occurs about twelve times in the New Testament, and was adopted in the primitive Church in forms of excommunication. In this sense it is used by St. Paul [Rom. ix. 3; 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8].

Anchoress.—A nun living a solitary life, instead of living with companions as one of a community. [ANCHORET.]

Anchoret, or ANCHORITE.—This word is derived from the Greek anachôrêtês, and Latin anachoreta—one who lives apart from the world—and was the name given to the hermits, who originally lived in deserts, altogether apart from their fellow-men. They lived under special religious rules, like other monks, and a set of these, bearing the title of the "Ancren Riwe," is extant, which was written early in the thirteenth century. [HERMITS.]

Andrewes, LANCELOT [A.D. 1555—1626], Bishop successively of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester. This holy and eminent bishop was the son of a master-mariner and shipowner, who became in later life a master of the Trinity House, and claimed alliance with an old Suffolk family. Andrewes was born in Thames Street, not far from the Church of All Hallows, Barking, and went to school first at Cooper's Free School, near the Tower, and afterwards at Merchant Taylors', from whence he was appointed by Dr. Ward, Prebendary of St. Paul's, to one of two scholarships which he had recently founded at Pembroke College, Cambridge. In later life [A.D. 1589—1605], when Andrewes himself was a Canon of St. Paul's, he became also Master of Pembroke College, and, with a grateful recollection of Dr. Ward's kindness to him in his youth, he founded two fellowships at Pembroke, in the election to which Ward's scholars were to have the preference. It was while he was Divinity Lecturer at his College, and when only thirty years of age, that he delivered his celebrated catechetical lectures on the Ten Commandments, to hear which a large audience assembled in the College chapel every Saturday and Sunday afternoon, from the University, the town, and even from the villages around Cambridge. Andrewes returned to London as Vicar of St. Giles', Cripplegate and Canon of St. Paul's, in A.D. 1589, but in the same year he became also Master of his college at Cambridge. Preferences afterwards succeeded each other very rapidly. Having become one of the Queen's Chaplains in Ordinary, he was appointed, in 1601, to the Deanery of Westminster. King James appointed him first to the office of Almoner; in 1605 the same king nominated him to the Bishopric of Chichester, in 1609 to that of Ely, and in 1618 to that of Winchester and the Deanery of the Chapel Royal. But Andrewes does not appear ever to have realised the practical work of a Bishop. "A great part of five hours a day he spent in devotion," we are told by Bishop Buckeridge in his funeral sermon: and much of his time during the remainder of the day was spent in study. Meanwhile the active labours of the Puritans were undermining the foundation of the Church and battering its walls, and it was soon brought to the ground. The pious bishop was exceedingly liberal in his charities, and munificent in restoring or rebuilding the residence houses and episcopal palaces which belonged to his preferment. For the see of Winchester he purchased a house on the north of the Thames, beautiful situated within a furlong of the church, and this house was occupied by the bishops instead of the old palace in Southwark until the year 1820; a fine row of elms which until recently bordered "Bishop's Walk," at the edge of the river, having probably been planted by him. It was in the old palace at Southwark, however, that Bishop Andrewes died, on Sept. 25th, 1626, and it was in the adjoining Church of St. Saviour that he was buried. He left several works behind him on the Roman controversies of the day, but his chief literary memorials are his "Devotions" and his ninety-six Sermons, the latter full of learned theology and rich in devotional thought.

Andronicans.—The Alexandrian sect of ANGELITÆ were so designated after Andronicus, who was their bishop about A.D. 614. [ANGELITÆ.]

Anelo.—To anoint, especially in Extreme Unction. So Shakespeare uses the negative of the word, "unaneled," in Hamlet i. 5, 77. [ANOIDTING.]

Angel.—[Gr. angelos.] This word has the original sense of "messenger," but in the Old and New Testaments it always means a Divine messenger, or messenger sent by God. Thus our Lord is called "the Messenger," or Angel, "of the Covenant" [Mal. iii. 1]; St. John the Baptist "the messenger," or angel, "of God" [Mal. iii. 1, comp. Matt. xi. 10]; and a certain class of bishops "Angels of the Churches" [Rev. i. 20]. But the most common sense in which the word "angel" is used is to designate a created being of a different nature from that of men, and one having special ministrations to perform towards God and towards man.

THE NATURE AND FORM OF ANGELS.—That the angelic nature is not the same as human nature is declared by St. Paul when he says that the Son of God did not take hold of angels by assuming their nature, but took hold of the seed of Abraham, thus assuming human nature [Heb. ii. 16]; words which imply that the two natures are different. He also says that angels are "spirits engaged in sacred service" [Heb. i. 14]; words which imply that angels live under the condition of spiritual beings, not that of corporeal beings. The experience of those who have seen or have been visited by angels, has been that those who have been seen on earth have had the human form, but that they have appeared and disappeared, descended from above and ascended thither again, in a manner which shows that they are not subject to the laws affecting material substances as, or to the same extent as, human beings are. Yet these angelic spirits seem to have some bodily substance as well as bodily form, by means of which they are capable of performing acts in a similar manner to that in which they are performed by material beings. Such appears to be the natural inference to be drawn from statements respecting angels at different periods—that they "put forth their hand and pulled Lot into the house to them, and shut to the door;" or, "laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters," and led them out of the city [Gen. xix. 10, 16]; or, partook of the food which Abraham and Lot prepared for them [Gen. xviii. 8; xix. 3]; or, "rolled back the stone from the door" of the Holy Sepulchre, "and sat upon it" [Matt. xxviii. 2]; or, "smote Peter on the side and raised him up" [Acts xii. 7]; or, spoke with audible voices in human language.

As to their form, it is evident that whenever angels have become visible upon earth they have appeared in the form of human beings, though mostly with some special signs of celestial brightness and glory that distinguished them from human beings. Thus those who appeared to Abraham in the plains of Mamre are spoken of as "three men" [Gen. xvi. 7; xviii. 2, 3; xxii. 16; xxxii. 24]. So also Ezekiel saw a vision of six destroying angels coming to Jerusalem in the form of "six men" [Ezek. ix. 2]; and in later ages Zacharias and the Blessed Virgin saw the angel Gabriel in human form, and heard him speak to them with human voice [Luke i. 11—20, 26—38]. So the holy women at the Sepulchre saw "a vision of angels" as "two men," who stood by them in shining garments [Luke xxiv. 4, 23], whom Mary Magdalene had seen as "two angels in white sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain" [John xx. 12], and one of whom had been seen by the sentinels as he "descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door and sat upon it, his countenance" being "like lightning, and his raiment white as snow" [Matt. xxviii. 2, 3]. Of a similar appearance and form were the angels who appeared to the Apostles at the time of our Lord's ascension [Acts i. 10]; those who appeared to Cornelius [Acts x. 3] and to St. Peter in his prison [Acts xii. 7—10]; and those whom St. John saw in his Apocalyptic visions [Rev. viii. 2, 3; x. 1, 10; xvi. 1, 6; xxi. 9, 17; xxii. 8, 9]. But the human form is not invariably attributed to angels, for we must regard as angels those beings who minister before God as Seraphim [Isa. 2—4] and Cherubim [Ezek. i. 4—25; Rev. iv. 6—8], living creatures (or created beings, as distinguished from the Uncreated Divine Being) whose mysterious form and glory transcends the power of human language to describe, unless it may be generally spoken of as that of winged men with features taken from some of the noblest of animal beings of a lower order.

The general conclusion to be drawn respecting the nature and form of angels seems to be that they are spirits embodied in some pure corporeal substance of a highly attenuated kind, which is not subject to the ordinary laws of matter; that those have most frequently been seen on earth which are in human form, but that others exist which have other forms also, and that all belong to that order of creation to which the "spiritual body" of the resurrection will belong [1 Cor. xv. 44], beings whose natural abode is heaven, and whose nature is fitted to the conditions of life there.

THE MINISTRATION OF ANGELS TOWARDS GOD. Whenever there has been a revelation of the manner in which angels are engaged in heaven, they have always appeared in the immediate Presence of God, bearing up His throne of glory, as the Cherubim [Ezek. i. 26; x. 1], perpetually adoring Him, like the Seraphim hovering above it [Isa. vi. 1-3]; "standing by Him on His right hand and on His left" [1 Kings xxii. 19], "thousand thousands" that "ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand" that "stood before Him" [Dan. vii. 9, 10], waiting to go forth whithersoever He should send them; and all a myriad of adoring spirits, "the number" of whom "was ten thousand ten thousand and thousands of thousands" singing, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing" [Rev. v. 11, 12]. The general picture presented to our minds is that of a vast angelic host, continually attendant on the Divine Presence; constantly engaged in acts of adoration and praise, and ever waiting to do willing and obedient service to Him Whom they adore. The old devotional theology of the Church loved to represent these Hosts of God as consisting of Nine Orders of Angels; namely, SERAPHIM [Isa. vi. 2]; CHERUBIM [Ezek. i. 5]; THRONES; DOMINIONS; PRINCIPALITIES; POWERS; MIGHTS [Col. i. 16; Rom. viii. 38; Eph. i. 21, iii. 10]; ARCHANGELS [Tobit xiii. 15; 1 Thess. iv. 16; Jude 9]; and ANGELS. So from before her altars the hymn of praise continually mingled with that on high, "Therefore with Angels and Archangels, and with all the company of Heaven, we laud and magnify Thy glorious Name; evermore praising Thee, and saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts, Heaven and Earth are full of Thy Glory, Glory be to Thee, O Lord most High."

THE MINISTRATION OF ANGELS TOWARDS MEN.—But for twelve or thirteen centuries the faith of the Christian world has also been expressed in words of prayer as well as of praise. "O everlasting God, Who hast ordained and constituted the services of Angels and men in a wonderful order; Mercifully grant, that as Thy holy Angels alway do Thee service in Heaven, so by Thy appointment they may succour and defend us on earth, through Jesus Christ our Lord." This belief is in strict accordance with the well-known words of St. Paul, "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" [Heb. i. 14], and with many instances of such ministrations recorded in Holy Scripture.

From these instances we may gather that the angels are sometimes sent forth among men on special and extraordinary missions: as when they were sent forth as messengers from God to Lot, or to Jacob, or to the prophets of the Old Testament, or to the Socr of the New Testament, or to those appointed to special service—as the Apostles.

But there is abundant evidence also in Holy Scripture that there are many ordinary ministrations in which the Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him as the hosts of Mahanaim did around Jacob [Ps. xxxiv. 7], and in which the words spoken respecting Christ are fulfilled in respect to His members, "He shall give His Angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways" [Ps. xci. 11; comp. Matt. iv. 6]. Ever and anon they manifested their presence round the Holy Jesus, as when Gabriel, the angel of the Incarnation, was sent to Zacharias to warn him of the coming birth of Christ's Forerunner [Luke i. 11-20]; and to the Virgin Mary to announce her Maternity as the mother of Him Whom the Forerunner heralded [Luke i. 26-38]; and to Joseph bidding him to take the Lord's Mother for his wife [Matt. i. 20, 21]; and to the shepherds to tell them of the glad tidings which they were presently afterwards to hear proclaimed by a multitude of the heavenly hosts [Luke ii. 9-14]; and to Joseph again, to guide him in his care of the Holy Child [Matt. ii. 13-19]. Such ministrations to the Child Jesus lead to the belief that there is sound truth in the old Christian conviction that little children are specially under the guardianship of the angels, and that on the Lord's own words are to be accepted in a literal sense: "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father Which is in heaven" [Matt. xviii. 10]. And tender thoughts comforting faith may thus be suggested to parents in regard to their little ones who have been made children of God and heirs of salvation.

Later on in His holy life, when the Fastings and Temptation of our Lord—the trial of His spiritual life—had weakened His human nature, "angels came and ministered unto Him" [Matt. iv. 11]; and in the depression of His agony "there appeared an angel unto Him from heaven, strengthening Him" [Luke xxii. 43]. They ministered to Him also at the Resurrection [Luke xxiv. 23, John x. 12]; and when He ascended up on high, the chariot of the Cherubim received Him on of the Apostles' sight, and multitudes of the heavenly host surrounded Him, singing some such strain as "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of Glory shall come in" [Pa. xiv. 9]. So, it may be devoutly and reverently hoped, are the "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." Such ministrations are more than implied in the words, "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth" [Luke xv. 10]; in the succour which angels gave to St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Silas [Acts xii. 7—10]; in the charge which St. Paul gives to Timothy, not only "before God and Christ Jesus," but also before "the elect angels" [1 Tim. v. 21]; in the assuring words which "an Angel of God" spoke to Cornelius, "Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God;" and in the directions which the same Angel gave to him respecting the means by which he was to attain to a higher state of grace [Acts x. 4—6].

It has also been revealed by our Lord Himself, in His parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus [Luke xvi. 22], that when the souls of those who die in His faith, fear, and love, go forth into the world of spirits, they do not go forth alone and in darkness, but are received by the hands of the angels appointed to minister to them. And in such a light as the presence of angels brings from their abode of light, the souls of God's children are carried onward to a better light, the light of Christ's own Presence in Paradise.

Angel of a Church. [BISHOP.]

Angelic Brothers.—The followers of George Gichtel, a Dutch Pietist in the beginning of the eighteenth century. They assumed the name of Angelic Brothers from a belief that they had attained that state of angelic purity of which our Lord spoke when He said that there would be no marrying nor giving in marriage in heaven, but that the righteous would there be as "the angels of God." Gichtel died at Amsterdam in the year 1710, leaving behind him a voluminous work entitled "Theosophia Practica," which was published at Leyden in six volumes in 1722.

Angelic Doctor.—A name given to the great theologian Thomas Aquinas. [AQUINAS.]

Angelicals.—An order of nuns, first founded at Milan in A.D. 1530 by Louisa, Countess of Guastalla. The nuns followed the rule of St. Augustine, and each of them prefixed the name of "Angelica" to that of her patron saint as a reminder of purity.

Angelic Hymn.—The "Gloria in Excelsis," the nucleus of which is the hymn which the angels sang in the hearing of the shepherds at Bethlehem on the birth of our Lord—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men" [Luke

ii. 13]. It has been incorporated into the "Gloria in Excelsis" of the Communion Service from the earliest period of Christian liturgies. Another hymn of angels, the "Ter Sanctus," is also used, but it is distinguished from this by the name of the "Seraphic Hymn." [TER SANCTUS, GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.]

Angelic Salutation.—The words of the Archangel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary, when announcing the Incarnation of the Son of God through her means. The words were "Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women" [Luke i. 28]. From an early period this Salutation was sung as an antiphon for the Sunday before Christmas, but the earliest trace of its use in the modern form, as an act of devotion in association with the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, is at the end of the twelfth century on the Continent, and a century later in England. At the latter period also the "Hail Mary" was enlarged by the addition of the Salutation of her cousin Elizabeth, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb" [Luke i. 42], which was ordered to be used by Pope Urban IV. [A.D. 1261]. About the beginning of the sixteenth century the precatory form was occasionally added—"Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen." [ANGELUS.]

The Ave Maria appears always to have been used in England with a more strict limitation to the exact words of Holy Scripture than on the Continent. The form current in the fourteenth century is given in Myrks's "Instructions for Parish Priests":—

"Hail be thou Mary full of grace;
God is with the in every place:
I-blessed be thou of alle wymmen,
And the fruyt of thy wombe Ihesus. Amen."

About a century later a commentary on their daily service, which was written for the nuns of Syon, near Isleworth, remarks upon the habit of expanding it:—"Some say at the beginning of this salutation, 'Ave benigne Jesu;' and some say after Maria, 'Mater Dei,' with other additions at the end also. And such things may be said when folks say their aves of their own devotion, but in the service of the Church I trow it be most sener and most medefull to obey to the common use of saying as the Church hath set without all such addition" [Mirror of our Lady, E. E. Text. Soc. ed., p. 79]. There is also a clear statement on the subject in an authoritative work which was set forth by the Crown and Convocation in 1537, under the editorship of Archbishop Crammer, and in this we doubtless see the view which was taken by the best theologians of the unreformed Church of England respecting the devotional use of this salutation. "We think it convenient," says this exposition of the formula, "that all bishops and preachers shall instruct and teach the people committed unto their spiritual charge, that this Ave Maria is not properly a prayer, as the Paternoster is. For a prayer properly hath words of petition, supplication, request, and suit: but this Ave Maria hath no such. Nevertheless the Church hath used to adjoin it to the end of the Paternoster, as an hymn, laud, and praise, partly of our Lord and Saviour Jesu Christ for our redemption, and partly of the Blessed Virgin for her humble consent given and expressed to the angel at this salutation. Lauds, praises, and thanks be in this Ave Maria principally given and yielded to our Lord, as to the author of our said redemption; but herewith also the Virgin lacketh not her lauds, praise, and thanks for her excellent and singular virtue, and chiefly for that she humbly consented, according to the saying of the holy matron St. Elizabeth, when she said unto this Virgin, Blessed art thou that diddest give trust and credence to the angel's words; for all things that have been spoken to thee shall be performed." [Institution of a Christian Man, A.D. 1537.]

Angelici.—This name was probably given to the worshippers of angels to whom reference is made by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians [Col. ii. 18], and whose error was condemned by the Council of Laodicea.

Angelics.—An Anabaptist sect in Silesia and Bohemia, which arose about A.D. 1596. [Comp. ANGELIC BROTHERS.]

Angelites.—A sect of Monophysites, who so designated themselves after the dedication of their first church in Alexandria, the "Angelium." They were Jacobites, and are said to have held Tritheistic opinions. [TRITHEISTS.]

Angelolatri. [WORSHIPPING OF ANGELS.]

Angelus.—A Roman Catholic devotion which gathered around the ancient form of the "Hail Mary" [ANGELIC SALUTATION] in the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the following form:—"The angel of the Lord announced unto Mary, and she conceived of the Holy Ghost. Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen. Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it done unto me according to Thy word. Hail, Mary, thou that art," &c. "And the Word was made Flesh, and dwelt among us. Hail, Mary, thou that art," &c. "We beseech Thee, O Lord, pour Thy grace into our hearts, that as we have known the Incarnation of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, by the message of an angel, so by His Cross and Passion we may be brought unto the glory of His Resurrection; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." This memorial of the Incarnation is said thrice a day—in the early morning, at noon and in the evening, by strict Roman Catholics and one of the church bells, called "the Angelus Bell," is rung to give warning the time for the devotion, which is said where persons may happen to be.

Anglican Chants. [MUSIC.]

Anglicans.—A distinctive name given in recent times to those High Churchmen who consider that the doctrine and ritual of the Church of England are strictly those of the Post-Reformation Church of England. The term is rather vague, and has been often used to designate the rather narrow school which follows the seventeenth century divines of the High Church type, such as Andrewes, Laud, and Cosin. It is occasionally assumed also by those High Churchmen who look with jealousy and mistrust upon doctrines and practices imported into the Church of England from the Continental churches.

Anglo-Calvinists.—A name given to members of the Church of England by Roman Catholic writers at a time when it was supposed that the doctrine of the Church of England, especially as expounded in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, was essentially Calvinistic.

Anglo-Catholics.—A designation frequently assumed by the earlier members of the High Church party, to indicate the community of faith and practice with the churches in open communion with Rome, as with the Catholic churches of the East and West, rather than with Protestants.

Anglo-Israelites.—The name given to a society founded upon the belief that the English nation is descended from the northern tribes who formed the kingdom of Israel, and were carried captive by Sennacherib. This belief rests upon forced interpretations of certain texts of the Old Testament, and upon a mythical story of the prophet Jeremiah having carried the Jacob pillar to Ireland, whence it was passed on to Scotland to become the coronation stone, and to be finally transferred to Westminster Abbey. As examples of "interpretation" we need only mention that "Saxon" is derived from "Isaac's son." The question has been found amply discussed in a debate between Messrs. Hine and Roberts, published in 1871 by Pitman, Paternoster Row.

Animales.—This name was given to a name of reproach in very early times to Christians, to indicate their belief in the Resurrection of the Body. It seems to have been in use only among a sect who believed in a mere spiritual resuscitation of our nature, their notion originating in an exaggerated form of doctrine taught on the subject of spiritual resurrection by the great Origen.

Anker.—An old English form of the word ANCHORIT or ANCHORITE.

Annalist.—That member of a monastic community who was appointed from generation to generation to keep up a continual record of its annals. These annals are often interspersed with notices of public events, which make them exceedingly valuable to the historian, and several of them have been printed among the volumes published under the authority of the Master of the Rolls.

Annates.—The first year's income of an ecclesiastical benefice. They were also called "First Fruits," and this is the name by which the payment is known at the present day.

This severe tax was, until towards the end of Henry VIII.'s reign, paid to the Pope, and its abolition in that form was one of the first steps taken towards breaking up the relations between the Church of England and the Court of Rome. It appears to have been claimed by the Popes originally from all bishops whom they consecrated with their own hands, the tax being a commutation of presents previously made by them to the Popes. But this form of the tax was abolished by Gregory the Great in the beginning of the seventh century. In a later age, it revived in a more comprehensive form, and in the year 1253 the payment to the Popes of the first year's income was enforced upon all the clergy, of whatever rank; the co-operation of the Crown being secured by a grant of the revenue thus collected to Henry III. for three years. In 1288 Pope Nicolas made a similar grant of the annates to Edward I., towards the expenses of his crusade, thus gaining a still firmer hold on this tribute to the See of Rome. So burdensome was it, that during the forty-five years between 1486 and 1531 it was calculated that a sum amounting to nearly £50,000 a year of modern money was annually sent to Rome by the bishops of the Church of England in payment of annates alone, "beside other great and intolerable sums which have yearly been conveyed to the said Court of Rome by many other ways and means, to the great impoverishment of this realm." In 1531, the bishops and clergy in Convocation petitioned the Crown that the payment of annates should be discontinued; and this was, in reality, the earliest step in the great movement which culminated in the Church of England's entire independence of Rome: for the petition of the clergy contained a prayer "that in case the Pope should persist in requiring such payments, the obedience of England should be withdrawn altogether from the See of Rome." This petition resulted in an Act of Parliament [23 Hen. VIII., ch. 20] which enacted that the payment of annates to the Pope should cease on July 9th, 1533, and that if in consequence he should refuse to grant the usual

Bulls for the consecration of any bishop, the latter, having been nominated by the Crown, shall be consecrated by the archbishop of the province, "according and in like manner as divers other archbishops and bishops have been heretofore in ancient times by sundry the king's most noble progenitors made, consecrated, and invested within this realm."

But although the payments of annates were thus kept from going to Rome, they were not abolished altogether, for they were henceforward to be paid to the Crown. They were now, however, levied in a more just manner, a new valuation of all ecclesiastical benefices being made—now known as "Liber Regis," or the King's Book—which superseded the papal valuation made under Pope Nicolas IV., and which exempted small benefices from the operation of the tax. This valuation of 1535 is still in force, and as it rates benefices by the amount of their income at that time, the payment is far less onerous than it otherwise would have been. Thus, a benefice which was worth £30 a year in 1531 still pays to the Crown £30 as the "first-fruits" or first year's income of a new incumbent, though it may now be worth £500 a year.

But although annates, or first-fruits, are still paid nominally to the Crown, it is nearly two centuries since they ceased to form any part of the Crown revenues. For in the reign of Queen Anne this portion of those revenues was placed in the hands of commissioners, under the name of "Queen Anne's Bounty," for the augmentation of poorly-endowed benefices. Thus, the sums paid by the incomes of the bishops, deans, canons, and the richer parochial clergy are appropriated to the benefit of the poorer parochial clergy, either in the way of loans for the building of parsonage houses, or by a permanent addition to the capital from which the income of the benefice is derived; the grants made by the commissioners being met by contributions, generally of an equal amount, made by or on behalf of the clergy to be benefited. Thus, during the five years 1877—81 Queen Anne's Bounty has added on an average £60,000 to the incomes of the poorer clergy, £26,000 of which was derived from the fund itself, and £34,000 from the voluntary benefactions indicated. [TENTHS.]

Anne, St. [July 26th].—This name is handed down by Christian tradition as that of the mother of the Virgin Mary. The earliest notice of her is in the Apocryphal "Gospel of St. James," which gives Bethlehem as her native place, and speaks of her as the daughter of Matthan the priest. Matthan is said to have had three daughters, Mary, Sobe, and Anna, or Anne; Mary being married to a man of Bethlehem, and being mother to Mary Salome; Sobe being also married in the same village, and becoming the mother of Elizabeth; and Anne being married to Joachim, a man of Galilee. St. Anne and Joachim her husband are said to have been married for many years before they became the parents of the Blessed Virgin, and to have died soon after they had dedicated her, at three years of age, for the service of the Temple at Jerusalem. [MART, THE VIRGIN.] St. Anne was deeply venerated as a saint by the Eastern Church, according to St. Gregory of Nyssa and Epiphanius [Heres. 78, 79], as early as the fourth century. Greek hymns of a very early date commemorate her; homilies, which were preached on the festivals of the Virgin Mary, speak of her in terms of laudation, and the Emperor Justinian dedicated a Church in her name at Constantinople. The Greek Church also commemorates St. Anne upon three days in the year—on Sept. 4th is her festival in conjunction with her husband St. Joachim; Dec. 9th is observed as the day of her conception; and July 26th as that of her death. In the Roman calendar, and in the ancient and modern calendars of the Church of England, she is commemorated on July 26th. St. Anne is mostly represented in sacred art in the touching situation of teaching the Virgin Mary to read the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament.

Annihilation. [ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.]

Annihilation of Eucharistic Elements. [TRANSUBSTANTIATION.]

Anniversary, or YEAR'S MIND.—The day, in the year following their deaths, upon which deceased persons were commemorated by a special mass, or celebration of the Holy Communion. A faint relic of such a commemoration remains in the custom of repeating the advertisement of a person's death on the anniversary of their decease, with the words "in memoriam" added [ALL SOULS, FEAST OF.]

The term "year's mind" was also used as the special designation of a mass offered on behalf of a deceased person every day for a year after their departure.

Annotine Easter.—The day observed by each newly-baptised person in the Primitive Church as the nominal anniversary of the day of their baptism at some time, mostly Easter, during the preceding year. The day was not a fixed one.

Annual.—A popular name given, rather derivatively, to any priest who maintained himself chiefly by offering Year's Minds. [ANNIVERSARY.]

Annual Commemoration.—[COMMEMORATION.]

Annunciation, FESTIVAL OF THE.—[March 26th.]—The commemoration of the Angel Gabriel's visit to the Virgin Mary, when he announced to her the coming birth of our Lord. In the Consuetudinary of Sarum it is called the Festival of "our Lord's" Annunciation. In the calendar of the Prayer Book the title is the "Annunciation of Mary," in the Table of Proper Lessons the "Annunciation of our Lady." The popular designation is "Lady Day." The festival can be traced back beyond the middle of the fifth century, collects for it being extant in the Sacramentaries of St. Gregory [A.D. 590] and St. Gelasius [A.D. 492], and homily on the day existing, which was preached by Proclus, Patriarch of Constantinople, who died A.D. 446. It is also mentioned by St. Athanasius, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and other writers of equally early date. It is one of five days on which the Virgin Mary is commemorated in the Church of England.

Anoil. To anoint. [ANOINTING.]

Anointing, or UNCTION.—The ceremonial use of oil or precious ointment, which has been previously blessed or consecrated for this purpose. Such usages in the Christian Church may be divided into three classes: First, the anointing of persons in the ordinary course of the Christian life, as at baptism, confirmation, and in sickness; secondly, the anointing of persons occupying ministerial positions, as of the clergy at their ordination and a sovereign at his coronation; and third, the anointing of things dedicated to sacred uses, as of churches, altars, and church utensils or "ornaments."

AT BAPTISM.—The use of unction in baptism can be traced back to the earliest ages of Christianity. Tertullian [A.D. 200], describing the rites used in the administration of this sacrament in his own time, writes that persons having been thrice dipped in the font and pledged themselves to obey the precepts of the Lord, "After this, having come out from the bath, we are anointed thoroughly with a blessed unction." St. Cyril of Jerusalem [A.D. 351], who describes the rites of baptism in one of his Catechetical Lectures in more detail, says, "Then when ye were unclothed ye were anointed with exorcised oil from the very hairs of your head to your feet, and were made partakers of the good oil of the tree, Jesus Christ." In the Sacramentary or Service-books of the sixth century it is directed that when the newly-baptised person is taken from the font, he shall be delivered into the hands of one of the priests, who shall make the sign of the cross with chrism on the crown of his head, using the prayer:—

"Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath regenerated thee by water and the Holy Ghost, and hath also given to thee mission of all thy sins, anoint thee with the chrism of salvation unto eternal life. Amen."

The mediæval rites of baptism were founded on these of the Primitive Church, the candidate being anointed with chrism, in the form of a cross, on the breast and between the shoulders.

immediately after the saying of the Baptismal Vows, and again after the putting on of the chrisom, or white vestment [CHRISOM]. In the Reformed Prayer Book of 1649 these two anointings were retained, but upon the head, the rubric and prayer being—

"Then the Priest shall anoint the Infant upon the head, saying, Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath regenerate thee by water and the Holy Ghost, and hath given unto thee remission of all thy sins: He vouchsafe to anoint thee with the unction of His Holy Spirit, and bring thee to the inheritance of everlasting life. Amen."

In the later Prayer Books the anointing was omitted, and only the sign of the cross retained.

AT CONFIRMATION.—The rite of Confirmation was known by the name of "the unction" or "the anointing" in the time of the Apostles [2 Cor. i. 21; 1 John ii. 20, 27], and was retained among the Early Christians for several centuries, being called "chrisma," as late as the time of St. Gregory [A.D. 600]. The name was associated with the ceremony of anointing by several of the fathers, though some slight confusion is caused by the fact that Confirmation was long administered immediately after Baptism, and thus the ceremonies used in the latter sometimes seem to belong to the former. In later days, when Confirmation was entirely separated from Baptism, and administered some time, perhaps years, afterwards, the anointing is clearly marked, an ancient form used in York diocese about A.D. 700 directing after the words of Confirmation (similar to those now in use), "Here he is to put the chrisom on the forehead of the man, and say: Receive the sign of the holy cross by the chrisom of salvation in Jesus Christ unto eternal life. Amen." This was the usage of the mediæval Church of England, but in the first English Prayer Book there was no mention of anointing, and if the custom was continued by some of the bishops, as there is some reason to think, it has been entirely dropped since 1662.

IN TIME OF SICKNESS.—The anointing of sick persons with a view to their recovery was practised by the Apostles during a temporary mission on which they were sent by our Lord during the second year of His ministry, when He commanded them to "heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils" [Matt. x. 8]. Respecting the results of this mission, it is recorded by St. Luke that they went "healing everywhere" [Luke ix. 6], and by St. Mark that they "anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them" [Mark vi. 13]. During a whole generation there is no further reference to this custom, but it is then mentioned again by St. James in the words, "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the Name of the Lord" [James v. 14]. Singular to say, there is no further notice of what seems to have been so familiar a rite, and one ordained by our Lord, for about three centuries and a half, when it is spoken of in an official letter written by Innocent I. in reply to one of Decentius, Bishop of Eugubium, in the year 416. The rite then existing is associated, as a matter on which no doubt had ever been raised, with the rite named by St. James, but St. Innocent adds that as the anointing oil has been blessed by the bishop, it may be used not only by bishops and priests, but also by lay people, who may use it for its intended purpose "in their own necessities or those of their friends." Towards the end of the next century, in the Sacramentary, or Service Book, of St. Gregory [A.D. 590], we come upon an office for the administration of the rite, and the words of it show that it was still used for the healing of the sick. The rubric directs, "Anoint him with holy oil, and say" this collect:—"O Almighty God, have mercy upon this Thy servant, granting unto him pardon of all his sins and recovery from his dangerous sickness by means of this holy anointing and our prayer."

From the time of St. Gregory the rite of anointing the sick has continued to be used in both the Eastern and the Continental Churches, but a popular superstition gradually gathered around it which associated it entirely with the death-bed, and the idea of recovery by means of it was almost or quite lost sight of, although it was still found in theological writings. At the period of the Reformation, the doctrine of the Church of England was declared in the following words, which are found in "The Institution of a Christian Man," officially promulgated in the year 1537:—"All Christian men should repute and account the said manner of anointing among the other Sacraments of the Church, forasmuch as it is a visible sign of an invisible grace: whereof the visible sign is the anointing with oil in the Name of God; which oil (for the natural properties belonging unto the same) is a very convenient thing to signify and figure the great mercy and grace of God, and the spiritual light, joy, comfort, and gladness which God poureth out upon all faithful people, calling upon Him by the inward unction of the Holy Ghost. And the grace conferred in this Sacrament is the relief and recovery of the disease and sickness wherewith the sick person is then diseased and troubled, and also the remission of his sins, if he be then in sin." When the Prayer Book was first set forth, in 1549, this doctrine was also illustrated by the prayer which was appointed to be used, which is here given with the preceding rubric. It was followed by the thirteenth Psalm:—

"¶ If the sick person desire to be anointed, then shall the Priest anoint him upon the forehead or breast only, making the sign of the cross, saying thus.

AS with this visible oil thy body outwardly is anointed: so our heavenly Father, Almighty God, grant of His infinite goodness, that thy soul inwardly may be anointed with the Holy Ghost, who is the Spirit of all strength, comfort, relief, and gladness; and vouchsafe for His great mercy (if it be His blessed will) to restore unto thee thy bodily health, and strength, to serve Him; and send thee release of all thy pains, troubles, and diseases, both in body and mind. And howsoever His goodness (by His divine and unsearchable providence) shall dispose of thee: we, His unworthy ministers and servants, humbly beseech the Eternal Majesty to do with thee according to the multitude of His innumerable mercies, and to pardon thee all thy sins and offences, committed by all thy bodily senses, passions, and carnal affections: who also vouchsafe mercifully to grant unto thee ghostly strength, by His Holy Spirit, to withstand and overcome all temptations and assaults of thine adversary, that in no wise he prevail against thee, but that thou mayest have perfect victory and triumph against the devil, sin, and death, through Christ our Lord: Who by His death hath overcome the prince of death, and with the Father and the Holy Ghost evermore liveth and reigneth God, world without end. Amen."

This short office was not inserted at the revision of the Prayer Book in 1552, nor in that of 1661.

The name of "Extreme Unction" has clung to the rite in popular language and in Roman theology ever since the twelfth century, but in earlier times it was called "the oil of benediction," or "the unction of the blessed oil," just as in the Eastern Church it is still called "the prayer oil," or "the holy oil," and it is never used except for a sick person who is obviously dying or whose recovery is not expected. But the catechism of the Council of Trent explains the effect of its use in a way not far different from the declaration of the Church of England, issued not long before, for it is there said "to remit lighter offences, to rid the soul of the languor and infirmity brought on it by sin, and of all other remains of sin; to strengthen the soul in its last contest with the Tempter, and to alleviate the burden of sin. The recovery of health, if advantageous to the sick person, is also said to be a benefit of the sacrament, but one rarely obtained because of the weakness of faith in these days as compared with the faith of Apostolic times.

It has always been the practice throughout the Western Church to anoint the sick with olive oil which has been blessed on Maundy Thursday by a bishop, the person being anointed in the form of a cross on the organs of the various senses, the eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth, and hands; a suitable form of words being used at each anointing. In the Eastern Church it is the custom to use oil taken from the sanctuary lamp of the church, which is blessed in the sick man's room by seven, or at least three, priests.

AT ORDINATION.—The use of unction as part of the ordination of priests and consecration of bishops is derived from the Levitical Law, and was probably introduced into the Christian Church among other Levitical ceremonies, at a period when it was maintained that the Christian Church was the Divine sequel to the Jewish in most things that were not directly connected with the system of animal sacrifices. This unction of the Levitical priesthood was divinely ordained, however, as an essential part of their ordination and it cannot properly be so regarded in respect to the Christian ministry, there being no evidence that it was used by the Apostles or by their near successors.

The Divine Law on the subject was laid down in the precepts given to Moses by God on Sinai, respecting the ordination of Aaron and his sons:—"And this is the thing that thou shalt do unto them, to hallow them, to minister unto Me in the priest's office;" sacrifices and other rites being then prescribed and afterwards, before investiture with the sacred robes of the priesthood—"The shalt thou take the anointing oil, and pour it upon his head and anoint him, . . . and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons [Exod. xxix. 1-9]. "And thou shalt put upon Aaron the holy garments, and anoint him, and sanctify him; that he may minister unto Me in the priest's office. And thou shalt bring his sons and clothe them with coats; and thou shalt anoint them as thou didst anoint their father, that they may minister unto Me in the priest's office; for their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations [Exod. xl. 13, 14].

The earliest period at which anointing appears among the ceremonies of ordination in service books is in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory [A.D. 590], where directions are given to consecrate with unction the hands of the priests ordained; a similar rite being provided for in the case of deacons as well as priests by the English Pontifical of Egbert the middle of the eighth century, the hands being anointed with CHRISM; the Sacramentary of Gelasius [A.D. 492], where it is directed that the hands of bishops shall be anointed with chrism. In that of St. Gregory [A.D. 590] the anointing of the hands is ordered for both bishops and priests. In the English bishop's service-book known as the "Pontifical of Egbert" [A.D. 735-766], bishops, priests, and deacons are all ordered to be anointed on the hands with chrism, and the head with oil; and this represents a mediæval practice, the prayer used by the ordaining bishop being: "Be pleased, Lord, to consecrate and sanctify these hands by this anointing and our benediction. Amen. That whomsoever they bless may be blessed, and whomsoever they consecrate may be consecrated and sanctified. Amen. The use of anointing in ordination was continued by the Church of England in the year 1549; and it is not used in the Church of the East.

AT CORONATION.—The anointing of kings was also taken up by the Christian Church from the customs of the Jewish. Although it was not, like that of priests, ordered by the Levitical Law, its Divine institution is equally reached for by the commands of God in the case of Saul: "Thou shalt anoint him to be captain over Thy people Israel;" in the case of David: "Fill thine horn with oil, and go, I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemit: for I have provided Me a king among his sons" [1 Sam. ix. 16; xvi. 1]; and in the case of Jehu: "Jehu, the son of Nimshi, shalt thou anoint to be king over Israel" [1 Kings xix. 16].

After the States of the world became Christianised, the ceremony of unction at the coronation of kings appears to have become universal, and has been used in the coronation of English sovereigns time out of mind. During the mediæval period coronations were performed in Latin, as all other services were, but there is comparatively little difference between the old Latin form and the English form of modern times, except in the Communion Service. In the existing coronation office the rite of anointing is still used, and the only particular in which it differs from that of mediæval times is that the benediction of the oil is performed in private and not during the service. The following is the form with which Queen Victoria was anointed at her coronation by Archbishop Howley on June 28, 1838; and it will be observed that the rubric directs the "coronation anthem" to be sung while the anointing takes place.

THE ANOINTING.

The Queen having thus taken Her Oath, returns again to Her Chair on the south side of the Altar; and kneeling at Her Faldstool, the Archbishop beginneth the Hymn, Veni, Creator Spiritus, and the Choir singeth it out.

HYMN.

Come, Holy Ghost, our Souls inspire.

This being ended, the Archbishop saith this Prayer:

O Lord, Holy Father, who by anointing with oil didst of old make and consecrate Kings, Priests, and Prophets, to teach and govern Thy People Israel: Hence and sanctify Thy chosen Servant Victoria, who, by our Office and Ministry, is now to be anointed. Here the Archbishop lays his hand upon the Ampulla, and saith: [consecrated Queen of this Realm: Strengthen Her, O Lord, with the Holy Ghost the Comforter; Confirm and stablish Her with Thy free and Princely Spirit, the Spirit of Wisdom and Government, the Spirit of Counsel and Ghostly Strength, the Spirit of Knowledge and true Godliness, and fill Her, O Lord, with the Spirit of Thy Holy Fear, now and for ever. Amen.

This Prayer being ended, the Choir sing:

ANTHEM.

Zedek the Priest and Nathan the Prophet anointed Solomon King; and all the People rejoiced, and said: God save the King. Long live the King, May the King live for ever. Amen. Hallelujah!—1 Kings i. 39, 40.

At the commencement of the Anthem, the Queen, rising from Her Devotions, goes before the Altar, attended by Her Supporters, and assisted by the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Sword of State being carried before Her, where Her Majesty is disrobed of Her Crowned Robes.

The Queen will then sit down in King Edward's Chair placed in the midst of the Area over against the Altar, with a Faldstool before it, wherein She is to be Anointed.

Four Knights of the Garter hold over Her a rich Pall of Silk, or Cloth of Gold; the Anthem being concluded, the Dean of Westminster taking the Ampulla and Spoon from off the Altar, holdeth them ready, pouring some of the Holy Oil into the spoon, and with it the Archbishop anointeth the Queen, in the Form of a Cross:

On the Crown of the Head, and on the Palms of both Hands, saying:

Be Thou anointed with Holy Oil, as Kings, Priests, and Prophets were anointed. And as Solomon was anointed King by Zadok the Priest and Nathan the Prophet, so be Thou anointed, blessed, and consecrated Queen over this People, whom the Lord your God hath given you to rule and govern, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Then the Dean of Westminster layeth the Ampulla and Spoon upon the Altar, and the Queen kneeleth down at the Faldstool, and the Archbishop standing on the North Side of the Altar, saith this Prayer or Blessing over Her:

Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who by his Father was anointed with the Oil of gladness above his fellows, by his Holy Anointing pour down upon your Head and Heart the blessing of the Holy Ghost, and prosper the Works of your Hands: that by the Assistance of His Heavenly Grace you may preserve the People committed to your charge in Wealth, Peace, and Godliness; and after a long and glorious course of ruling this Temporal Kingdom Wisely, Justly, and Religiously, you may at last be made Partaker of an Eternal Kingdom, through the Merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

This Prayer being ended, the Queen arises, and sits down again in Her Chair."

Anomians. [ANTINOMIANS.]

Anomæans.—The most extreme division of the Arian sect, so named from its distinctive tenet, that the Second Person of the Holy Trinity is entirely unlike [Gr. Anomoios] to the First Person in essence or substance; that is, that the Son is not "of one substance with the Father" [Gr. Homoousios] as is stated in the Nicene Creed; nor even of similar substance [Gr. Homoiousios], as alleged by the SEMI-ARIANS. Their leader was Aëtius, first a goldsmith, and then a physician of Antioch, who, after several abortive attempts to become a priest, was made a bishop at Constantinople in the year 363, under the influence of the Emperor Julian the Apostate. The name of his see is unknown, but he probably never took possession, for after being driven from place to place by the Arians for four years, he died at Constantinople in A.D. 367. His opinions continued, however, to be propagated by his secretary Eunomius, from whom the Anomæans were also called Eunomians. Their exact statement of Arian opinions was as hateful to the great party of Semi-Arians as to the orthodox themselves, the hard logic of the Anomæans carrying the principles of the Semi-Arians farther than they were prepared to go. Their opinions were condemned as heretical by the Semi-Arians in the Synod of Ancyra [A.D. 358], in the Eastern Synod of Seleucia [A.D. 359], in the Western Synod of Ari-minum, and finally and decisively at the General Council of Constantinople [A.D. 381].

Ansano, Sr.—Until the thirteenth century he was the patron saint of Siena in Italy. The legend of his life and acts describes him as the son of a Roman nobleman, and narrates that he had been secretly baptised by the influence of his Christian nurse. At nineteen he is said to have made his religion openly known, converting many of the people of Siena and baptising them. After many sufferings, during the Diocletian persecution, he was at last beheaded at a place on the banks of the river Arbia.

Anselm, Sr. [A.D. 1034—1109.] The thirty-fourth Archbishop of Canterbury, who occupied the chair of St. Augustine for more than sixteen years [A.D. 1093—1109], during the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. Anselm was not an Englishman, but belonged to a noble Italian family at Aosta, in Piedmont, his father's name being given as Gondulph, and his mother's as Hemmeberga. Early in life he desired to take monastic vows upon him, but was not permitted to do so by his father, and travelled as a young gentleman of good estate for several years in France and Normandy. At length he fell under the influence of Lanfranc (subsequently his predecessor at Canterbury), who was then prior of the monastery of Bec, and in A.D. 1060, when he was twenty-seven years of age, Anselm became a monk of Bec; three years afterwards, when Lanfranc was made abbot of St. Stephen's at Caen, Anselm succeeded him as prior of Bec, an office which he held for about fifteen years, when he was elected abbot. He thus spent thirty-three years of his life in a place which was becoming celebrated as an illustrious school of learning, and whence proceeded some of the most distinguished churchmen of that age. It was during Anselm's residence at Bec that he wrote most of his numerous works, and originated that definite and exact system of reasoning on theology, of which the SCHOOLMEN were for several centuries the exponents; Anselm heading the orthodox or REALIST line. To the ordinary reader, however, his connection with England as its primate is the most interesting portion of his life.

His friendship with Lanfranc brought Anselm from Normandy on occasional visits to England, where his reputation rose very high, and where he gained the respect of the Conqueror and his sons. In the year 1093 he visited the country again for the purpose of attending the death-bed of the great Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester; and while at Chester, was desired to visit the king, William Rufus, who was lying dangerously ill at Gloucester. The Archbishopric of Canterbury had been vacant for four years, ever since the death of Lanfranc, and other sees were also vacant, the king delaying his nominations to them that he might the longer receive their revenues. Anselm persuaded William to do his duty by appointing bishops to these vacancies; and eventually, under pressure from all sides, he consented to the nomination of himself as the successor of Lanfranc. He was consecrated on December 4th, 1093, and lived through a stirring primacy of sixteen years, several of which he spent in exile on the continent.

As Archbishop of Canterbury, Anselm did much to rivet on the Church of England those chains of Papal usurpation which it cost so much bitterness and enmity to undo. For Gregory VII., better known as Hildebrand, who occupied the Papal throne from A.D. 1073 to A.D. 1085, had carried the pretensions of the Roman See to a height which they had never reached before in his contest with the Emperor Henry IV. whom he excommunicated, and his policy led to the election of an Antipope, Guibert, Bishop of Ravenna, as Clement III., in A.D. 1080, who was for twenty years recognised as pope by a considerable portion of the Church. Meanwhile on the death of Hildebrand in A.D. 1085, his successor was elected, in the person of Victor III., whose death took place in A.D. 1087, and who was then succeeded by Urban II., who died in A.D. 1099. When Anselm became Archbishop of Canterbury in A.D. 1093, he found that William Rufus and his barons recognised Clement III. as pope, while he himself recognised Urban II. He applied to the king for permission to visit Rome that he might receive the PALL from Urban II. but permission was refused, the pall being eventually sent to the king by a Papal legate in 1096, and delivered to Anselm by the sovereign's own hands. But this was after strife between king and archbishop respecting pope and anti-pope which lasted for a year when Anselm succeeded in forcing a recognition of Urban II. on the king and his friends. The success which the archbishop thus obtained on behalf of the pope who supported the Hildebrandine policy, against the pope who opposed it, led to further disputes between him and William II.; and when at length he was required to take an oath of allegiance, and renounce all right of appeal from the King of England to the Pope of Rome, his refusal made it necessary for him to leave England until the death of his sovereign, and the accession of Henry I.

The Archbishop retired to Lyons, but was soon called to Rome by the Pope who caused him to be so strongly maintained. While he was at Rome, the Lateran Council was held, and, as no Archbishop of Canterbury had ever been present on such an occasion, there were doubts as to the precedence which should be given to him. Urban II. decided the question by placing Anselm on his right hand, with the complimentary saying that appeared there as "alterius orbis Papa," so much a representative bishop, but a brother pope, the Pope of that other world which stretched forth into the unknown West of the Atlantic Ocean.

On the death of William Rufus, in A.D. 1100, the archbishop returned from Rome to that "other world" where his duties lay. But almost immediately the embittered quarrel between king and archbishop again arose, Anselm opposing Henry I. on the question of INVESTITURES, as he had opposed his brother on that of the rival popes. Bishops had been elected to vacant sees during the years of the archbishop's absence, and although not consecrated, they received their episcopal estates from the king by the ordinary ceremony of investiture used under the Norman kings, the delivery by the sovereign to the bishop-elect of the crozier and episcopal ring, which had come into the king's custody on the death of the preceding bishop. When Henry required the archbishop to consecrate these bishops-elect, Anselm refused, pleading that he was prohibited from doing so by the Bull which Urban II. had issued in A.D. 1095. [INVESTITURE.] Anselm once more visited Rome. His appeal from his sovereign was received by the new Pope, Pascal II., and the latter decided in his favour, forbidding the English king to do anything at variance with the Bull of his predecessor. Once more Archbishop Anselm became an exile, and he remained away from England for about seven years, returning only in 1107, two years before his death. When the latter occurred, at Canterbury, in April, 1109, Anselm was seventy-five years old, and had been archbishop for sixteen years, but the greater part of this sixteen years he had been out of the country. Nearly the whole time of his episcopate he was, in fact, working and suffering for the maintenance of novel claims made by the Popes for the exercise of supreme authority in the Church of England. He began the movement which culminated in the first clause of Magna Charta, "Let the Anglican Church be free;" but the movement was far from being so noble a one as these words seem to indicate, for the freedom which Anselm and those who followed in his wake sought was liberation from the ancient constitutional authority of the Kings of England, and slavish subjugation to the unconstitutional authority which the Popes of Rome claimed to exercise in the Church of England. Had he been an Englishman, Anselm would probably have taken the opposite line, in which case the usurpations established by the popes at that time could not have been maintained, and the history of the mediæval Church of England would have been very different from what it was. The archbishop died at Canterbury on April 21st, 1109, and was at first buried in front of the rood-screen, but afterwards in St. Anselm's Tower. Just before the current of English Church affairs set in steadily for the Reformation, he was canonised by the efforts of his successor Morton, April 21st, the day of his death being the day appointed for his commemoration.

Antechapel.—The western portion of a college or other chapel, which is screened off, or otherwise separated, from the part used for Divine Service. Sometimes it assumes the form of a western transept, as in the chapel of New College, Oxford; at others it is similar to the nave of a church or cathedral, as at King's College, Cambridge.

Ante-Communion Service.—That portion of the Communion Service of the Prayer Book which precedes the prayer for the Church Militant. It is sometimes said by itself, according to the directions given in the first rubric at the end of the Communion Service:—"Upon the Sundays and other Holy Days (if there be no Communion) shall be said all that is appointed at the Communion until the end of the general Prayer [for the whole state of Christ's Church Militant here on earth], together with one or more of these Collects last before rehearsed, concluding with the Blessing."

Antelucan Assemblies.—A designation given in times of persecution to the services of the early Christians, especially to the Holy Eucharist, because they were held, partly for safety's sake, at a very early hour, before it was light.

Antependium.—The cloth which hangs in front of the altar. It is also called a "frontal." [ALTAR CLOTH.]

Anthem.—This word is derived from the Latin antiphon, a singular form of the plural Greek word antiphōna, its original form in Anglo-Saxon and Early English being antefn, and antem. The fn became softened into m, as in stefn, the stem of a tree. This original form referred to the mode of singing, that of singing its several divisions alternately from side to side of the choir. [ANTIPHONAL SINGING.] But in course of time this strict sense of the word passed away, and the term became that of a short sacred song in words generally taken from the Bible, which was sung before and after a psalm, to give the keynote of the sense in which the psalm was used. Such an antiphon was anciently sung with the Penitential Psalms when used before the Litany, and is still retained in the Litany and in the service for the Visitation of the Sick, appearing in the latter place in the form, "Remember not, Lord, our iniquities, nor the iniquities of our forefathers. Spare us, good Lord, spare Thy people, whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy most precious blood, and be not angry with us for ever." But further on in the same service an antiphon is still attached to its Psalm, the seventy-first, "O Saviour of the world, Who by Thy cross and precious blood hast redeemed us, save us, and help us, we humbly beseech Thee, O Lord;" the only place in the Prayer Book where an antiphon occurs for use exactly in its original way.

The transition from an antiphon, antefn, antempne, or antem of this kind to an anthem in the modern sense is sufficiently obvious. A practice arose in Queen Elizabeth's days of singing such anthems at the end of the afternoon service, evensong then ending with the third collect. Thus Strype writes, on the authority of a contemporary record, that on Mid-lent Sunday, March 24th, 1560, "in the afternoon Bishop Barlow, one of King Edward's bishops, now Bishop of Chichester, preached in his habit before the Queen. His sermon ended at five of the clock; and presently after her chapel went to evensong. The cross as before standing on the altar; and two candlesticks, and two tapers burning in them. And, service concluded, a good Anthem was sung." This custom was probably a common one in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and is preserved still in the singing of a hymn at the end of our present service. But when the Prayer Book was brought into its present form, in 1661, a rubric was inserted after the third collect at morning and evening prayer, which made the anthem more definitely a part of Divine Service—"In Quire and places where they sing, here followeth the Anthem." In the choirs of cathedrals and collegiate churches the rubric is exactly observed by the singing of an anthem of the kind illustrated above, the words being usually taken from Holy Scripture; and many such anthems are familiar to those who have visited St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, or provincial cathedrals. In parish churches a hymn in verse is generally sung as the anthem, though of late years, owing partly to the improvement in church choirs, and partly to the large number of compositions recently written for this purpose, anthems are frequently to be heard in many churches.

Antholin, St.—A martyr at Clermont, in Auvergne, in A.D. 255, and commemorated on February 6th.

Anthony, St. [ANTONY.]

Anthropomorphism.—The error of attributing man's [Gr. anthrōpos] form [Gr. morphe] to the Divine Nature. It was definitely maintained by a sect called Audians or Audæans, after their leader Audæus or Audius. The sect of the Anthropomorphites flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries, in Mesopotamia.

Anthropopathism [Gr. anthrōpos, man; pathos, an affection].—An error similar to that named in the preceding article, attributing to God the same feelings, affections, and capacity for suffering, as belong to man.

Anti-Adiaphorists. [ADIAPHORISTS.]

Anti-Burghers. [BURGHERS.]

Anti-Calvinists. [ARMINIANS.]

Anti-Christ, THE.—This is the title [Gr. Ho Antichristos] by which St. John [1 John ii. 18, 22, iv. 3, 2 John 7] four times designates a personal opponent of Christ in His Kingdom on earth, who is referred to without being named by other writers of the Old and New Testaments. The idea contained in the title is that of a person who not only opposes himself to Christ, but one who also sets himself up in His place, "The Antichrist" professing to be "the Christ;" this being the full sense of the Greek preposition "anti."

The earliest reference to such an anti-Messiah is in the prophet who speaks more fully of the Messiah than any other except Isaiah—the prophet Daniel. Describing his vision of the last age of the world, and the events attending the coming of the Messiah to judgment, Daniel speaks of a great world power and kingdom which will arise up in opposition to the Kingdom of God. This power is actuated, and the kingdom organised and ruled, by a human person represented under the common mystical figure of a "horn," but a horn, or power, having eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking "great things" [Dan. vii. 8, viii. 8—14] "a king of fierce countenance, who shall dwell according to his will, and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper until the indignation shall be accomplished." It is also represented that this Antitheistic king will wield great military power, being one who shall "honour the god of forces," who shall "enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over;" who "shall enter also into the glorious land," "who shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain," whose "power shall be mighty, but not by his own power," and "who shall come to his end and none shall help him" [Dan. xi. 3—45]. St. Paul can hardly be doubted to be looking towards the same antitheistic person, when he writes of "The Lawless One," "who opposeth and exalteth himself against everything that is called God, (that is an object of worship, so that he sitteth in the temple of God, showing forth himself that he is God" [2 Thess. ii. 3, 4].

But in the writings of the New Testament the antitheistic king who will wield so great a power in the last age of the world is generally set forth as a human person who will simulate the Person and Power of God Incarnate; hence, he receives the distinctive title of Antichrist, not of Antitheos, the opponent of God, and the terms in which he is spoken of are often borrowed from the and respecting Christ. Thus Antichrist has his "Advent," and "Appearing," and "Revelation in his appointed time." As Christ brought into the world "the mystery of the Godliness," so Antichrist brings "the mystery of the Lawlessness;" and as Christ is known in His Kingdom as the "Lamb of God," so Antichrist is represented as having "two horns like a lamb, though he spake like a dragon" [Rev. xiii. 11]. "The Deceiver," wrote Hippolytus [A.D. 220—236], in a treatise on Christ and Antichrist, "seems to liken himself in all things to the Son of God. Christ is a lion, so Antichrist is a lion; Christ is a King, so Antichrist also is a king. The Saviour was manifested as a Lamb, so he too will appear as a lamb, though inwardly he is a wolf. The Saviour came into the world in the Circumcision, so also will he. The Saviour sent apostles among all nations, and he in like manner will send false apostles. The Lord gave a seal to those who believed in Him, and he will give one in like manner. The Saviour appeared in the form of man, and he too will come in human form. The Saviour raised up His holy flesh, and showed it like a temple, and he will raise a temple of stone in Jerusalem." It was also believed by some early Christian writers that Antichrist would be an Incarnation of the Evil One. "For the devil," says Theodoret, when commenting on Daniel vii. 26, "will imitate the Incarnation of our God and Saviour: and as the Lord was manifested by the instrumentality of man's nature, and wrought our salvation, so the devil also shall take a meet instrument of his wickedness, and by means thereof shall show forth his own operation, deceiving such men as are indolent and off their guard, with false signs and wonders, and a parade of simulative miracles." This latter feature in the patristic conception of the Antichrist is in accordance with our Lord's own predictions respecting the last age of the world:—"There shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders: inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect" [Matt. xxiv. 24].

This last characteristic of the Antichrist's work is closely associated with the statement of St. Paul that he will set himself up as a higher object of worship than "all that is called God." "In this crowning feature of the last assault on Christianity, it seems probable that the person, kingdom, and worship of Satan incarnate, or of a man wholly possessed by Satan, will be offered to the world as a substitute for the Person, Kingdom, and worship of God Incarnate, our Lord Jesus Christ. As 'the mystery of the Godliness' is the manifestation of God in the flesh, so a dreadful imitation of it will be 'the mystery of the Lawlessness.'" The "abomination of desolation" may then be truly said to "stand in the holy place," when the man of sin, the son of perdition, "the lawless one, who opposeth and exalteth himself exceedingly against all that is called God, or that is an object of worship, does in his final pride 'sit in the temple of God,' even in the Holy of Holies, by proclaiming himself to be the one only object of Divine worship, and declaring himself that he is God" [Blunt's Annot. Bible, iii. 547]. It is to this climax of Antichristianism, the substitution of himself for Christ, that the words of the Revelation seem to refer, when, writing of such an Antichrist, the prophet says, "All that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" [Rev. xiii. 8].

It is easy to see that powerful princes, who have showed themselves greatly opposed to religion, whether before or after the Incarnation of our Lord, would be regarded in the light of Antichrists. So the great persecutor Antiochus Epiphaneus was generally considered by the Jews; so Mahomet, the great personal opponent of Christ, has always been regarded by a large portion of the Christian world. "As the Saviour," said St. Jerome, "had Solomon and the other saints as types of His coming, so we may rightly believe that Antichrist had as a type of himself that most wicked King Antiochus, who persecuted the saints, and profaned the Temple. The Emperor Nero, the first great persecutor of Christians, was long considered to be one of the "many Antichrists," of whom St. John speaks; and his resuscitation as the actual Antichrist was long expected.

Antidicomarianites.—The name of a sect which arose in Arabia, Rome, and elsewhere, in the latter part of the fourth century, its meaning being that of "Opposers of Mary." They were also called Antidicomarites, Antimarites, and Antimarians, by early writers. They denied that the Virgin Mary remained a virgin ever after as well as before the birth of our Lord, maintaining that those who are spoken of in the Gospels as "His brethren" were her children by a husband whom she married after the death of Joseph, or by Joseph himself. This principal tenet of the sect was revived by many of the early Puritans at the time of the Reformation, but was opposed by the Reformers of the Church of England, who vigorously defended the opinion of Mary's Perpetual Virginity. It may be doubted whether those who held these opinions were ever formed into an organised body.

Antidoron.—The Greek liturgical name for the bread which is blessed but is not needed for consecration. It was originally distributed to non-communicants "instead of the gift" of the Eucharistic bread itself, and hence its name. [PAIN BENI.]

Antigua, BISHOPRIC OF. [COLONIAL CHURCH.]

Antilegomena.—A term used in early Christian times to designate books which claimed to be part of the New Testament, but whose authority was disputed, or "spoken against," as is the literal meaning of the word. Such were the seven General Epistles, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Revelation of St. John the Divine [Euseb., Ecl. Hist., vi. 14]. As there were such books also—those now called "Apocrypha," in the Greek version of the Old Testament—the name of Antilegomena came to be applied to them also. [APOCRYPHA.]

Antimensium, or Antiminsium.—The Greek term, the latter word being always used in the Eastern Church, for a consecrated altar cloth which answers to the "corporal" of the Western Church. Some writers allege that they were intended only for use on unconsecrated altars, like those of oratories, but the modern practice is to consecrate them, or a piece of linen enough to make several of them, at the consecration of a church, and to use them on the altar which is also consecrated at that time. The same name is given to portable altars in the Western Church. [SUPER-ALTARS.]

Antinomians.—Those who hold the opinion that Christianity is so opposed to Law [Gr. anti, against; nomos, law], that a perfect Christian is not bound to obey the precepts of the moral law. An early form of this error is referred to by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. After writing, "For sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace," he exclaims, "What then, shall we sin because we are not under the law, but under grace?" [Rom. vi. 14, 15], and then confutes the error. From this it is evident that there were, even in those early days, persons who alleged that as they lived no longer under the restrictions of the Sinaitic Law respecting ceremonies, they were free from its restrictions respecting morals; as if they had said, "We are so completely under grace that we have nothing to fear; let us live as we like, for grace has set us free and has made us safe." The error never died out, and was current among some of the strange sects which followed the lead of the NICOLAITANES spoken of by St. John in the Apocalypse, making licentiousness a part of their religion; but it has never been made the foundation principle of any organised body, and so no actual sect of Antinomians has ever existed under that name. In theory the principle was revived in the sixteenth century by those (especially a Lutheran named John Agricola) who exaggerated Luther's doctrine of justification by faith; and in England it was commonly taught among the Puritans of the seventeenth century. The error also pervaded the teaching of those who taught in an extreme form the efficacy of faith alone for salvation [SOLIFIDIAN]. Among the Puritans there were some who denied that anything which the elect may do can be regarded as sin, reckoning themselves among the elect, and living accordingly.

Antioch, THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF.—This term is applied to a class of theologians, as in the case of the Alexandrian School [ALEXANDRIA, SCHOOL OF], and, as in that case, it originated in an institution for the instruction of converts to Christianity. In this school originated the errors of Gnosticism, and that teaching of Paul of Samosata which gave rise to Arianism. But it was also the fountain head of the literal interpretation of Scripture as Alexandria was of the mystical, and it was here that St. Chrysostom learned that method of exegesis which has made his writings the source of so much sound theology and practical godliness. Critical details on the subject of Antiochean theology must be looked for elsewhere.

Antipaschal Week.—The week beginning with LOW SUNDAY, or the first Sunday after Easter, is so called in the Eastern Church.

Antiphon.—A short sentence, generally taken from one of the prophets of the Old Testament, sung before and after a psalm and intended to mark the sense in which the psalm is used as a "Proper Psalm." Antiphons are of such ancient use, that an "Antiphonarium," or book of antiphons for the year, is attributed to St. Gregory the Great at the end of the sixth century. Specimens of antiphons still surviving in the Book of Common Prayer are given under the word ANTHEM.

Antiphonale.—A service book, containing the words and music of the ANTIPHONS.

Antiphonarium. [ANTIPHONALE.]

Antiphonal Singing.—The singing of the Psalms verse by verse alternately on opposite sides of the choir. The practice derived from the Temple worship, where some of the singers stood on the right hand and some on the left hand, "ward against ward. Heman, as precentor, standing in the mid [1 Chron. vi. 33, 39, 44: xxv. 8], "to star every morning to thank and praise the Lord and likewise at even" [1 Chron. xxiii. 30] a method of singing indicated also by the form in which some of the Psalms, such as the twenty-fourth and the hundred and thirty-fourth, are composed.

It has been suggested that as David had the pattern of the Temple and its furniture "by the Spirit," and "in writing by the Lord's hand upon" him [1 Chron. xxvi. 12, 19], so he who provided so large a portion of the Psalter should have revealed to him the manner in which the songs of Divine Service in the Jewish and Christian Church were to be sung, hearing in spirit that which Isaiah also heard, the antiphonal worship of the angels in heaven, where "one cried unto another, and said, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts: the whole earth is full of His glory" [Isa. vi. 3].

The introduction of the practice into the Christian Church seems to have taken place very soon after the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem, and in the Roman capital of Syria and of Roman Asia, that city of Antioch which holds so important a place in the early spread of Christianity, and where "the disciples were first called Christians." It is said by Socrates, an early Church historian, that, to use the words of an old English translation, "Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, in Syria, the third bishop in succession from Peter the Apostle, who was conversant and had great familiarity with the Apostle, saw a vision of angels, which extolled the Blessed Trinity with hymns that were sung interchangeably, and delivered unto the Church of Antioch the order and manner of singing expressed in the vision. Thereof it came to pass that every church received the same tradition." The exact truth may be that antiphonal singing was introduced into the principal church of the most important city of the Eastern world as soon as, if ever, it was discovered that the non-sacrificial parts of Jewish Divine worship were to be accepted by Christians as a lawful heritage which was to be handed on to future ages. The churches of Europe did not, however, adopt the custom until a later date, when St. Ambrose is said to have introduced it at Milan, after a visit which he had paid to Antioch, when "he ordained," says St. Augustine, in his Confessions, "that the psalms and hymns should be sung according to the manner in which they were sung in the East."

Antipopes.—Those who have claimed to be popes, but whose election has either been so irregular as to make it evident that their claim was a false one, or so schismatical as to make their pretensions to the papal throne uncanonical. The number of such pretenders has been forty, the number of recognised popes having been two hundred and fifty-seven. But it is not easy to make the enumeration, and some Roman Catholic historians reckon them as few as twenty-four. There has been no such rival to a reigning pope since A.D. 1438. [Pope.]

Antipedobaptists.—Opponents of infant [Gr. païdies] baptism.

Antitactics.—A sect of Gnostics which arose late in the second century. Their name signifies "opponents," and is thus explained by Clement of Alexandria:—"We call them Antitactics or opponents who say that God is indeed our Father, and the Father of all things, and that He made all things good: but that one of those beings whom He Himself had made sowing tares among the wheat originated evil, of which we being made partakers, we ourselves become opponents of God." The name appears to be a controversial one, and to be given to some sect or sects, such as the CARPOCRATIANS or the VALENTINIANS, as indicating one of their leading principles. Antitactics were accused of being Antinomians of the grossest kind.

Antitrinitarians.—Those who deny the doctrine that God is Three Persons in One God—"One God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity"—and oppose to it the tenet of a God without distinction of Persons. The Antitrinitarians of the early Church were the SABELLIANS and the ARIANS: the leading ones in modern times have been the SOCRINIANS and the UNITARIANS, but no doubt Antitrinitarianism is maintained by many who do not definitely belong to either of these sects. [TRINITY, THE HOLY.]

Antitype.—That which corresponds to a type. Thus, St. Peter speaks of the waters of the Flood and the waters of baptism:—"The ark . . . wherein . . . eight souls were saved by water. Which also, being an antitype, baptism, is now saving you" [1 Pet. iii. 21]. Thus, while a type is a figure, an antitype is the reality which the type prefigured, as Christ is the Antitype of the paschal lamb. Many of the Greek fathers called the Holy Eucharist an antitype.

Antonines.—An order of monks established in France in the 11th century for nursing persons afflicted with "St. Antony's fire."

Antony, St. [A.D. 251—336].—The originator of monastic communities among Christians, as distinguished from associations of hermits, each living the life of a solitary in a separate place from others [ANCHORET]. He was the son of noble and wealthy Egyptian parents, who lived at Coma, near Thebes, where he was born. At the age of eighteen he was left without his parents, the possessor of a large fortune, imperfectly educated, religiously trained, and with a strong bias towards an ascetic life. Under the impulse of strong feelings caused by hearing the words of our Lord read in church—"Sell all thou hast, and give to the poor"—he gave away the whole of his large property, not even reserving anything for a little sister who had been left to his care, but turning her over to the care of some devout woman of his acquaintance. Antony then retired from his home to live the life of a hermit, first in an empty tomb, and then for twenty years among the ruins of an old castle near the Nile. In his solitary life he was visited by many on account of the reputation which he acquired for conflicts with the devil, for the working of miracles, and for holiness. This led him to leave his solitude for a time, and collect his followers in a monastery at Phaium, near Aphroditopolis, now Atfieh, where many might live together under religious rules, and earn their bread by manual labour. He also founded a second monastery at Pispir, on the Nile, and his example was followed by others; but Antony would never consent to be placed at the head of any community, and though he spent part of his life in ministering among the crowds who followed him, and in many good acts of charity, he took every opportunity of returning to his cell in the ruined castle and to his solitary and ascetic life. It is not necessary to give any account of his supposed conflicts with evil spirits, which many writers have supposed with reason to be the fancy of a mind which was to a certain extent unbinged by solitary life and severe asceticism. Nor is it necessary to narrate any of the miracles which he is alleged to have wrought, as some of them are obviously false, among which most persons would include the pretty story of the fishes collecting near the shore in a vast congregation to hear a sermon from his lips when the men and women to whom he preached refused to give any attention to him. The effect of his preaching was in reality so great as to lead to the foundation of a system which revolutionised the Christian world, and which, under the hands of men like St. Benedict, arose to such a degree of influence that it left its mark upon every civilised country and upon every age down to our own. That St. Antony was a man of great personal holiness cannot be doubted, and it is probable that some of the many legends with which his memory has been encrusted were the innocent, because almost unconscious, inventions of over-zealous admirers, who misunderstood his meaning when preaching to them; others perverted versions of circumstances much less marvellous in reality than they appear in the ever-growing legend; and others the fruit of the painter's imagination. He lived to the surprising age of one hundred and five years, dying peacefully and happily in his hermitage, probably on January 17th, the day set apart as his festival in the ancient calendars.

The usual symbol of St. Antony is the tau, or Egyptian cross, shaped like the letter T, which has become known as St. Antony's cross, and which is sometimes thought to represent the crutch used by him in his old age. A pig is also a common symbol of the saint, for what reason is not known. A third symbol is that of a bell, which is sometimes carried by the saint, and at others hung round the neck of the pig; perhaps this symbol has originated in the stories respecting St. Antony's exorcism of evil spirits, a bell occupying a conspicuous position in the ceremonies used at exorcism.

Antony of Padua, Sr. [A.D. 1195-1231].—A great Franciscan preacher of the thirteenth century, born at Lisbon, but spending most of his life at Padua, in Italy. He died in the latter city on June 13th, 1231, and was canonised in the same year, the day to which his name is affixed in the calendar being that of his death.

Antosianrians.—The name given by Melancthon and other opponents of Osiander or Hosamann [A.D. 1530], who himself was one of the Protestant opponents of Luther [OSIANDRIANS.]

Antrim, PRESBYTERY OF.—A section of the Irish Presbyterians, which separated from the main body in A.D. 1750. They refused to subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith, and adopted Arian principles.

Apelleians, APPELLIANISTS, or APELLITES.—A Gnostic sect of the second century, which took its name from Apelles, its founder. Apelles had been a follower of Marcion [MARCIONITES], but was repudiated by the latter on account of his licentiousness. He then established a sect which embraced some of the opinions of Marcion but rejected others. The Apellians attributed the creation of the world to a being created by God, not to God himself, and believed that this creator was the author of evil. Christ, who suffered and died, was, in their opinion, a Spirit who descended from Heaven and assumed a Body compounded of the four elements, earth, air, fire, and water, which elements being dispersed, the Spirit called Christ re-ascended heaven. The prophets of the Old Testament were inspired by the author of evil, the creator of the world, and the Law of Moses was also evil.

Aphthartodocetæ.—A division of the MONOPHYSITES; also called, after their leader in Armenia and in Egypt, JULIANISTS, or GAIANITES. They first appear distinctively about A.D. 549; their distinctive principle being that the human part of the one Nature which the Monophysites attributed to Christ, was possessed of the quality of corruptibility [Gr. aphtharsia]. The term docetæ was added to signify that they considered our Lord's Body to be so faint a phantom that it was not really capable of doing and suffering the things which it seemed to do and suffer [DOCETÆ].

Apocalypse [Gr. Apokalūpsis].—A revelation or unveiling of mysteries. The term is generally applied to the last book of the New Testament, the Revelation of John the Divine; but apocalyptic elements pervade the prophetic books in the Old Testament. The word was also used as the title of various uninspired books used by early Christians, and believed by some of them to be inspired. [REVELATION, APOCALYPSE.]

Apocrites.—A Manichean sect which arose about the year 275, the particular tenet in which they differed from other Manichæans being the belief that the human soul is uncreated, divine, and eternal. This belief they grounded on Gen. ii. 7. Their name is Greek, signifying “super-eminence in goodness.”

Apocrypha.—This is a shortened form of the Greek phrase Biblia Apocrypha, the “Hidden” or “Secret” Books. It was originally used in the primitive Church as the designation of false Gospels, and other books put forth by heretics, the idea of secrecy being derived from one class only of such books, those secret books in which, as in the “Book of Mormon” of modern times, the heretics professed to have a revelation over and above that contained in the Scriptures. The books of Old Testament times which are now called apocryphal, were formerly called “ecclesiastical.” The earliest use of the word in English is in the prologue or preface to Wickliffe’s Bible, which says that St. Jerome had declared of the third and fourth books of Esdras, that they “ben apocryfa, that is, not of autoritie of bileue.”

The Apocrypha of the Old Testament are books and portions of books which form part of the Septuagint or Greek Old Testament, but not of the Hebrew. These were first separated from the books in which they had always previously appeared in Greek and Latin Bibles by Bishop Coverdale in his English Bible of 1535, and in making the change he gave this caution to readers:—“Nevertheless, I have not gathered them together to the intent that I would have them despised or little set by, or that I should think them false, for I am not able to prove it. Yea, I doubt not verily if they were equally conferred with the other open Scripture (time, place, and circumstances in all things considered), they should neither seem contrary, nor be untruly and perversely alleged.” The Geneva Bible of 1560 also gives this valuable explanation in its preface to the Apocrypha:—“These books that follow in order after the Prophets unto the New Testament are called Apocrypha, that is, books which were not received by a common consent to be read and expounded publicly in the Church, neither yet serve to prove any point of Christian religion, save inasmuch as they had the consent of the other Scriptures called canonical, to confirm the same, or rather, wherever they are grounded; but, as books proceeding from godly men, were received to be read for the advancement and furtherance of the knowledge of the history, and for the instruction of godly manners, which books declare that at all times God had an especial care for His Church, and left them not entirely destitute of teachers and means to confirm them in the hope of the promised Messiah; and also that witness that those calamities God sent to His Church were according to His Providence, who had both so threatened by His Prophets, and so brought to pass for the destruction of their enemies, and for the trial of His children.” The principle on which these books are included in the English Bible in use in the Church of England is stated in the sixth of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion:—“And the other books (as Hierome saith) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine; such are these following:—

Third Book of Esdras,
Fourth Book of Esdras, Book of Tobias,
Book of Judith,
Rest of the Book of Esther,
Book of Wisdom,
Jesus the Son of Sirach,
Baruch the Prophet,

Song of the Three Children,
Story of Susanna,
Of Bel and the Dragon,
Prayer of Manasses,
First Book of Maccabees,
Second Book of Maccabees.”

The Septuagint Greek Bible, that which is used in the Churches of the East, of Russia, and of Greece, still retains the Old Testament Apocrypha in their original places; and so also do the Latin Vulgate and all English and other versions translated from it, which are in use in Continental Churches and among the Roman Catholics of England, Ireland, America, and other countries. There was a strong disposition at the Council of Trent to separate the apocryphal books from the canonical, as in English Bible, but in the end only the two books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses were so separated, and printed after the New Testament.

Apocryphal Gospels.—St. Luke appears to imply that there were many narratives of the Life of Christ in existence when he wrote his Gospel, his dedication of it to Theophilus, beginning with the words, “Forasmuch as many attempted to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word” [Luke i. 1]. As the narrative of our Lord’s acts and words was delivered by word of mouth to people in all parts of the world, it is reasonable to suppose that these attempts to record it in writing would be very numerous; but if so, they must have vanished before the clearer light of the inspired Gospel, for no works are now known to exist which can be said to correspond with St. Luke’s reference to them. They obviously had no weight in the Church, for they are not mentioned by any of the early Christian writers. A few works have, however, come down from primitive times, which are entitled “Gospels,” and though they have never been included in the New Testament as the Apocryphal books of Old Testament were by the Septuagint translators, yet they have received the name of Apocrypha, as having a certain association with it through their pretension to narrate certain portions of our Lord's Life and Work.

THE GOSPEL OF ST. JAMES, otherwise entitled THE PROTEVANGELIUM or original Gospel, is supposed by the great critic Tischendorf to have been written in the middle of the second century; but no copy of it exists which is of earlier date than the eleventh, though early Christian writers occasionally refer to it. It professes to give an account of the birth and early life of the Virgin Mary, and also the history of our Lord's childhood as far as the death of Herod the Great. Minute particulars of these are given which probably embody traditions that were current among the disciples, and may possibly have been derived from those who had known the Virgin; but some portions are trifling and incredible, and these throw doubt upon the historical value of the whole work.

THE GOSPEL OF THE INFANCY is much longer than that of St. James, but does not profess to go more than a few years further with the narrative of our Lord's Life. It appears to have been written at a later date; and it contains much which is certainly false, such as anecdotes of the Holy Child Jesus striking dead a schoolmaster who smote Him for asking a question, a boy who pushed against His shoulder, and another boy who interfered with His play.

THE GOSPEL OF THE NATIVITY OF MARY is found in the works of St. Jerome, and is probably in its Latin form a work of the fourth century, which was translated from an earlier one in some other language. It seems to represent the belief of the Primitive Church respecting the Virgin Mary. It is a beautiful narrative, and does not contain anything in the least degree inconsistent with Holy Scripture, concluding with the words, "And it came to pass while they were there, her days were accomplished that she should bring forth, and she brought forth her first-born Son, as the holy Evangelists have taught, our Lord Jesus Christ, Who with the Father and Holy Ghost liveth and reigneth God, for ever and ever."

THE GOSPEL OF ST. THOMAS professes also to be an account of our Lord's Infancy and Childhood. Its date is as early as the century after the Apostles, but it is unmistakably a romance. It pretends to record many miracles of our Lord's childhood, which are as plainly mere inventions as those in the Gospel of the Infancy. There is strong reason for believing that it was composed by some heretic.

THE GOSPEL OF NICODEMUS, otherwise called THE ACTS OF PILATE. This work was known to Justin Martyr [A.D. 103-164] and to Tertullian [A.D. 150-220], and was considered by the latter to be a genuine record of facts, though not inspired. It has come down to modern times in Greek, which the Greek writer, Ananias, says that he translated from the Hebrew original in the year 440. In its oldest form the Gospel of Nicodemus narrates the Passion and Resurrection of our Lord as they are narrated in the authentic Gospels, and works up with the inspired narrative a detailed account of what took place between Pilate and the Jewish rulers, and also among the latter themselves in the Sanhedrin. There is nothing in the least contrary to, or inconsistent with, the Gospels in this narrative, and it reads extremely like truth. Some portions are very beautiful, especially a chapter in which some of those who had been healed by our Lord come forward and bear witness in His favour before Pilate, declaring what He had done for them; and another portion (in some copies) in which the Virgin Mother cries, "How shall I live without Thee, O my Son? . . . Bow down, O Cross, that I may embrace Him." In some copies, also, a continuation of the narrative is found, in which two of the saints who rose with our Lord, sons of Simeon, are made to describe the descent of our Lord into hell, and the liberation of the Holy dead from the power of Satan and death. This is a very beautiful work, whether fact or fiction, and was as popular during the middle ages, under the title of The Harrowing (that is, the "harrying," ravaging or despoiling) of Hell, as the Inferno or Paradiso of Dante, or the Paradise Lost of Milton, or the Pilgrim's Progress of Bunyan have been in later times. Some good critics consider that this added portion of the Gospel of Nicodemus was written as early as the second century. Further information, including the texts of the works themselves, may be found in Cowper's Apocryphal Gospels.

Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles.

—The same spirit that led men to write books which were supplementary to the Gospels, calling them also "Gospels," led them to write supplementary Acts of the Apostles. A great number of such works must have existed in primitive times, and although some would probably be mere romances, others would be quite likely to embody floating traditions of more or less authenticity, respecting the full and busy lives of the Twelve. But no such work ever found a place among the books of the New Testament, and few were accepted as trustworthy historical authorities, among the more learned Christians of the early Church. These Acts of Apostles generally profess to give the history of some one Apostle after the dispersion of the Twelve from Jerusalem in A.D. 42 or 43. Hence we have the Acts of Andrew, of Andrew and Matthew, of Peter and Paul, &c.

Most of these Acts appear to have been written by Ebionites, Gnostics, or Manichees, although they were sometimes adopted, with suitable alterations, by orthodox writers. They date from the second century to as late as the sixth; but the later ones were probably based on some Acts of earlier date, or on some written in other languages than those in which they are now extant. Thus the earliest of them, the Acts and Journeys of Peter, as now known, are a Gnostic composition of the end of the second century, but the work is based on an earlier one, of which a fragment remains, written by Linus, his contemporary. The Acts of Thaddeus, chiefly comprising the legend of his ministration to ABGARUS at Edessa, are extant both in Syriac and Greek, but the Syriac version, which dates from the third century, is evidently grounded on one of much older date. The most interesting of all are the Acts of Paul and Thecla, and the Recognitions of St. Clement, which are also called the Acts of Peter. The first of these, the Acts of Paul and Thecla, are said by Tertullian and St. Jerome to have been written by a priest, who was a disciple of St. Paul, and who confessed that it was a romance written to glorify the memory of St. Paul. Portions of it are, notwithstanding this, undoubtedly historical, and the account of Thecla was accepted as authentic by many early Christian writers. The second work, the CLEMENTINE RECOGNITIONS, or Acts of St. Peter, or Journeys of St. Clement, is partly grounded on the earlier "Clementine Homilies," and professes to give an account of St. Peter's disputation with Simon Magus, of his instructions, and of the incidents which occurred during the time when he was travelling with St. Clement. The work is extant in Latin and Syriac, the original, which was in Greek, being lost. It appears to have been written for the purpose of glorifying the memory of St. Peter, and slandering that of St. Paul, the latter Apostle being represented throughout as an antagonist of the earlier Apostles. The work was probably written by one of the EICHESAITES heretics early in the third century.

Apocryphal Apocalypses.—These works are of a different class from those preceding, since they do not profess to narrate historical facts or to deal with historical personages, but to be prophecies respecting the future. Most of them were associated with the names of Old Testament patriarchs or prophets, as the Book of Enoch, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Revelation of the Prophet Eddras, and others. A good and easily accessible specimen of this kind of Apocalypses is to be found in the second book of Eddras, which is included among the Apocrypha of the Old Testament, but is in reality a work written about the end of the first century, "in the thirtieth year after the ruin of the city" [2 Eddr. iii. 1], by an unknown Hebrew Christian living at Rome, the mystical Babylon. The so-called Epistle of St. Barnabas and the work called "The Shepherd," attributed to Hermas, are compositions of a different kind, since they professedly belong to Christian times, but both were probably written about the end of the first century. Of later date, in the second century, another class of such Revelations appeared, named after some New Testament personage, as were the Ascension of Paul, the Revelation of Stephen, and the Revelation of Thomas, all of which are thought to have been of Gnostic origin. Later still, in the fourth or fifth century, were the Revelation of Paul, the Revelation of Peter, the Revelation of Bartholomew, and a spurious Revelation of John, of which little more exists than fragmentary portions.

Apocryphans.—A general name given in the early Church to those sects of heretics who based their special doctrines on secret books for which they claimed the authority of inspiration. Such were many sects of the Gnostics and the Manichees. It was to such books that the term Apocrypha was first applied. [APOCRYPHA.]

Apollinarians.—A sect of heretics, so named after their founder, Apollinaris, who was Bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, in the latter half of the fourth century [d. A.D. 392]. The special tenet of the heresy originated by Apollinaris was that the human nature of Christ consisted of body and animal soul only, the place of a rational soul being supplied by its union with His Divine Nature. Thus he denied the first part of the doctrine now formulated in the Athanasian Creed, that Christ is "perfect Man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting."

Assuming that a human being consists of a human body [Gr., sōma], a human soul [Gr., psyche], and a human mind [Gr., nous], he maintained that the last was not present in our Lord. The opinion originated in a revulsion from the misbeliefs of the Arians, and a desire to express strongly the perfect sinlessness of our Lord. If He possessed the same kind of rational soul that ordinary man possesses, He was possessed of that which made Him capable of sinning; therefore He must have consisted of sōma, a body; psyche, an animating soul; and Logos, Divine nature incapable of sinning.

Apollinarianism was condemned without naming Apollinaris by a Council held at Rome, in A.D. 373, when the bishop was either deposed or gave up his see, and formed a separate congregation to which he consecrated a bishop named Vitalis, from whom the Apollinarians were often called Vitalians. They were at one time very numerous, but the direct condemnation of their principles in the General Council of Constantinople by a synodical epistle, and the suppression of their conventicles by Imperial edicts, in the years 388, 397, and 428, put an end to their existence as a sect. Those who did not return to the Church were associated with the MONOPHYTES.

Apollonia, Sr. [A.D. 250], a saint of much note as the patroness of those who have the toothache. The legend respecting her is that she was the daughter of rich parents, who were heathen in the city of Alexandria. Some pilgrims begging an alms of her mother for the love of Christ and His mother, she entertained them kindly, and received instruction from them which led her to pray to the Virgin that she might have a child. Apollonia was the fruit of the prayer, and when she grew up she received baptism at the hands of St. Leonine, who was a disciple of St. Antony. After her baptism an angel directed her to go into the city of her birth and make the name of Christ known. Many were converted, but some were offended, and when they complained to her father he delivered her up to the governor as a Christian. Here she drove the evil spirit out of an idol which she was commanded to worship. Upon seeing this, the governor ordered her to be bound to a column, and to have her beautiful teeth pulled out one by one. As she remained constant in the Faith, he then ordered a large fire to be kindled in which she was consumed. St. Apollonia's day in the calendars is Feb. 9th, and she is represented in pictures holding a pair of pincers with a tooth grasped in them, or pincers lying near to her.

Apologies for Christianity.—Works written in defence [Greek, Apologia] of Christianity against the heathen at various dates from the second to the sixth centuries. When Christian principles and rites became known among the heathen they were known in a very imperfect degree, and were disguised by strange misrepresentations. Charges were brought against Christianity that it was mere Atheism because it rejected all the heathen deities; it was said to lead to the grossest immoralities, such as incest and infanticide; and to promote disloyalty to the Emperors. These accusations were in common circulation even among those who belonged to the educated classes, and they had much influence on the official mind of judges before whom Christianity, or its renunciation, became a matter of life or death. It was to meet these accusations, therefore, and to disabuse the governing classes of the false impressions which they had received, that the writers called Apologists undertook their work.

The apology of QUADRATUS is the earliest on record. It was written in A.D. 131, and addressed to the Emperor Hadrian at Athens, of which city Quadratus seems to have been bishop. A fragment of this remains in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, in which the writer speaks of persons then living who had been miraculously healed by our Lord.

An Apology written by ARISTIDES was presented to the Emperor on the same occasion of his visit to Athens. It is said to have referred largely to the writings of heathen philosophers, but no part of it remains.

Two Apologies proceeded from the pen of JUSTIN MARTYR, the first being addressed [A.D. 138] to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, to the Senate, and to the whole Roman people; and the second to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius [A.D. 161—166]. Antoninus Pius answered the first apology by an Epistle to the Assembly of Asia, in which he directed that Christians should not be molested, except in cases of disloyalty to the Roman Government; and further, that if any Christian were arraigned solely on account of his religion he should be set free, and his accuser found guilty. Justin's second Apology won for him from Marcus Aurelius the crown of martyrdom.

To the same Emperor, Marcus Aurelius Apologies were addressed by MELLITO, Bishop of Sardis, and APOLLINARIS, Bishop of Hierapolis; Mellito boldly telling the Emperor that the treatment Christians had received from him was such as he ought not to show even to barbarous enemies, while the Christians were loyal subjects. Such outspokenness showed the spirit of a martyr.

But the most outspoken of all the apologies was that of TERTULLIAN, which was written in Latin, all the previous ones having been in Greek, about A.D. 194. From it we are able to see better than from any of the rest what were the accusations brought against Christians. It is also full of retort, showing that the very crimes which he had shown that the Christians were falsely accused of committing were in reality commonly practised among Pagans, and were what they were proud of in their gods, whom he treats with the most withering scorn and contempt.

The arguments of apologists were drawn from the prophecies of the Old Testament, the miracles of our Lord, the rapid spread of His religion, the constancy of Christian martyrs under their piteous sufferings, the strict and self-denying lives of Christians, and their peaceable obedience to the laws. They also exhibited in the strongest possible light the absurdity and worthlessness of Paganism, holding up its superstitions to unsparing ridicule. At a somewhat later date MINICIUS FELIX, in a dialogue called the Octavius [about A.D. 220]; and Origen [A.D. 246], in a work against Celsus; and ARNOBIUS, in a work written to show the sincerity of his conversion, followed the same line, but on a more voluminous and less rhetorical plan.

Apostasy.—This word in its original signified the desertion, or "standing away from" [Gr. apo stasis], of a soldier from the commander and cause to whom and to which he had promised allegiance. It was adopted among Christians as a designation for the forsaking of Christianity, those who gave up their faith being called apostates. Christians were greatly tempted to apostasy in the days of persecution, for the sake of saving their lives. When accused before the magistrates of being Christians, they could escape punishment, torture, and death by throwing a few grains of incense on the fire of a small altar, such as may be seen in many museums, as an offering of adoration to a heathen deity, or to "the genius of the Emperor;" but such an act was considered as a complete and legal renunciation of Christianity by both pagans and Christians.

Another form of apostasy was seen, the result of that extravagant pride of intellect which made the Emperor Julian so entirely renounce his belief in Christ that he endeavoured to restore the ancient Paganism, and was ever after known as "Julian the Apostate." Similar instances of wilful renunciation of Christ were heard of at the period of the French Revolution, when the popular creed was atheistic.

In modern times, the most frequent form of formal apostasy is when Christians become Mahometans.

Apostle.—This word is derived from a Greek verb, apostellein, signifying "to send" on a message, and is used in the New Testament for "one sent forth" [Gr. apostolos] with authority, as an ambassador and representative of Christ. It is an essential part of the meaning of the title that the person sent does not act on his own authority, but on that of the person sending him; and hence it is once used as a title of our Lord Himself, who is called "The Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus, who was faithful to Him that appointed Him" [Heb. iii. 1].

The title was first given by our Lord, thus constituted the Fountain of ministerial authority, to twelve of His disciples, whom He sent forth on a temporary mission, to prepare the way for his own visitation of particular towns or districts in the Holy Land; and they are again called so collectively when permanently appointed to evangelise the world at large, to take their place as the chief rulers of the Church on earth, and to be the twelve original channels through which all ministerial authority was to flow from the Fountain Head into the Church of Christ in all places and all times. Their names are given in four places in the New Testament, and with identities and variations that seem to be designed, as is shown in the following table. That St. Peter should always be named first and Judas Iscariot last is a fact worth noting.

	Matth. x. 2—4.	Mark iii. 16—19.	Luke vi. 14—16.	Acts i. 13—26.
1	Simon Peter
2	Andrew	James	Andrew	James
3	James	John	James	John
4	John	Andrew	John	Andrew
5	Philip
6	Bartholomew			Thomas
7	Thomas	Matthew		Bartholomew
8	Matthew	Thomas		Matthew
9	James the Less
10	Lebbeus, Thaddæus, or Jude		Simon the Canaanite, or Zelotus
11	Simon the Canaanite		Jude, Lebbeus, or Thaddæus
12	Judas Iscariot			Matthias

Others than these twelve are called by the same title in the New Testament, especially St. Paul and St. Barnabas, but it is observable that in the Book of the Revelation, written A.D. 69 or 70, a long time after the name had become familiar to Christians as the designation of some others beside the original twelve, "the twelve Apostles of the Lamb" are still spoken of, as if the number of those who were specially called so had never been exceeded.

Apostle, THE.—The volume containing the Epistles used in the Communion Service, which is also named the "Lectionarium" and "Epistolarium," is so called in the Eastern Church. It is not unlikely that the Epistles as a whole were called "The Apostle" in the early Church, as the four Gospels as a whole were called "The Gospel."

Apostles' Creed, THE. [CREEDS.]

Apostles, FALSE. [FALSE APOSTLES.]

Apostolic See.—An episcopal see founded by an Apostle. The title has been especially given to the bishopric of Antioch, founded by St. Peter; that of Ephesus, founded by St. Paul; and that of Rome, believed to have been founded by St. Peter and St. Paul.

Apostolical Canons. [CANONS.]

Apostolical Constitutions. [CONSTITUTIONS.]

Apostolical Fathers. [FATHERS.]

Apostolical Council.—A title sometimes given to the assembly of the Apostles, of which an account is given in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts. It is also sometimes called "The Council of Jerusalem."

Apostolical Succession.—Ministerial descent from the Apostles, and, through the Apostles, from our Lord, the Fountain of all ministerial authority. This is regarded as historically provable in such a manner that every minister of the Church of England, for example, is able to say: "I received my ministerial authority at the hands of the Bishop of —, who received his [with authority to transmit it to me] at the hands of the three or more bishops by whom he was consecrated, each of those three or more receiving theirs from three or more predecessors, and so on up to the Apostles themselves." Thus the Apostolical succession resolves itself into an official genealogy, which may be traced out in a manner parallel to that of a natural genealogy.

The reasonably sure proof of this ministerial genealogy is not so difficult in practice as it seems to be in theory, as may be seen by taking the Church of England, and its chief pastor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, for an example. It is historically certain that in 1877 Archbishop Benson was consecrated bishop by Archbishop Tait and nine other bishops. It is also historically certain that these ten bishops were consecrated by many earlier bishops; and so the many lines of the official genealogy are carried upward through Archbishop Cranmer and his mediæval predecessors to Archbishop Plegmund, who was (if not consecrated in England) consecrated by Pope Formosus, in A.D. 891, to Archbishop Berthwald, who was consecrated at Lyons by Godwyn, Archbishop of that see, in A.D. 693, and to Archbishop Theodore, who was consecrated by Pope Vitalian in A.D. 668, and to British bishops, French bishops, and Roman bishops, some of whom at least, it is contended, received the Episcopate from Apostles themselves, who had received it from our Lord.

There would be no historical value about such a genealogy if it could be shown that it was grounded principally on traditions or on records of no authority. But it so happens that it has been the general custom to keep records of the succession of bishops from the first ages of the Church, and there is probably no nobleman or gentleman in England whose genealogy can compare, for fulness and historical weight, with the official genealogy of the Archbishop of Canterbury and of many other bishops. Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, writing about A.D. 185, says: "We are able to reckon up the lists of bishops ordained in the churches from the Apostles to our own times . . . but as it would," he adds, "be very tedious, in such a work as this, to reckon up the successions of all the churches," he will give only that belonging to the Church of what was in those days the world's metropolis, the Church of Rome. After naming the twelve bishops who had ruled that Church from the Apostles' time to his own, Irenæus then writes, "In this order, and by this succession, the ecclesiastical tradition from the Apostles, and the preaching of the truth, have come down to us" [Irenæus, Against Heresies, iii. 3]. Materials for such lists exist in great abundance in the pages of Eusebius and of later Church historians. A most extensive collection of lists for the Church of France may be found in a noble national work entitled "Gallia Christiana." Similar lists for the Church of England have been compiled for Le Neve's "Fasti Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ," re-edited in 1854 by Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, then Assistant-keeper of Public Records, and for Stubbs' "Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum," with references to Records from A.D. 597 to A.D. 1857. The descent of the Archbishop of Canterbury is given at length in the Annotated Prayer Book 4to edition, pages 656, 668.

Apostolicals.—(1) There was a movement of this name in the twelfth century which seems to have been confined to the neighbourhood of Cologne. From the inscription which is given of it by St. Bernard it appears to have been one of those sects of the middle ages whose members greatly desired a reformation of the Church, but could not stand against the inevitable temptation of error and fanaticism which awaited them through want of education and of the logical sense. They professed strict asceticism, also condemning marriage, and habitually abstained from the use of flesh for food; they repudiated Baptism and the Holy Eucharist, and gave but a half-belief to the leading doctrines of Christianity. They may have been a sect of the Waldenses.

Apostolicals.—(2) Also called APOTOLICS and APOTOLIC BRETHREN. This last sect was founded in Lombardy and the Tyrol at the end of the thirteenth century by Gerard Sagarelli of Parma, who was burned to death there in A.D. 1300. Among the injunctions which Sagarelli gave them was required that they should dress in white garments similar to those of the Francisian friars. Hence at a later time they were called "Abati," or "White Brethren." They were bareheaded, and depended entirely on alms for which reason, and their professions of self-denial and humility, they called themselves by a name derived from that of our Lord the Apostles. They held extreme principles respecting what has since been called "communism," holding that their own goods (which they had none) and those of the wealthier brethren should be equally shared among all; and although they were allowed to marry, they were permitted to have spiritual sisters attending them. At the death of Sagarelli the Apostolicals had their leader a native of Novara named Dolci who is named by Dante in association with Mahomet, and who seems to have been a native of some military skill. By fanatical zeal and predictions respecting the end of the world he greatly increased the number of the Apostolicals, and organised an army of them so effectively that he was able to carry on a dangerous civil war against Boniface VIII., the reigning pope, for two years. It was in reference to this rebellion that Dante makes Mahomet deliver this message to the poet as he was about to return to earth :—

"Now say to Fra Dolcino, then, to arm him,
Thou, who perhaps will shortly see the sun,
If soon he wish not here to follow me,
So with provisions, that no stress of snow
May give the victory to the Novarese,
Which otherwise to gain would not be easy."
[Dante's Inferno, xxviii. 55.]

Dolcino was nevertheless defeated in several battles, taken prisoner, and executed (with his female companion Margaret) at Vercelli with cruel tortures in A.D. 1307. Remains of the sect were still existing in the south of France and Germany in 1402, and the White Brethren seem to have been a revival of it in Italy.

Apostolical.—A name assumed by the APOSTACTICS.

Apostoolians.—The followers of Samuel Apostool, a Baptist minister of Amsterdam in A.D. 1664. They were a division of the Mennonite WATERLANDERS, who arose in opposition to the GALENISTS, both sects of these Dutch Baptists still existing in Holland. The Apostoolians maintain strict or close communion, and are thus analogous to one section of the PARTICULAR BAPTISTS of England.

Apotactics, or Apostolical.—A sect of the third century, existing in Phrygia, Cilicia, and Pamphylia, who assumed the name of Apotactics, or Renunciators, because their leading principle was that the renunciation of all private property was necessary for salvation. They are said by Epiphanius, in his work on heresies, to have held and put in practice other extravagant opinions respecting asceticism, but very little was evidently known about them.

Apparel.—An ornamental square or oblong piece of embroidered silk, which is sewn on to the wrists and the bottom of the alb, before and behind, and around its neck. The "plain" alb of the rubric in the first English Prayer Book means an alb without apparels.

Apparitor.—An officer attached to the Archbishop's, Bishop's, or Archdeacon's Court, whose name is derived from his office, which is that of citing persons to appear before the court to which he belongs. This officer was anciently called a Summoner, or, as Chaucer spelt it, a "Sampnour;" and the extortions which they practised brought the Courts which they represented into great disfavour at the period of the Reformation.

Appeal.—The removal of a cause from a court of lower jurisdiction to one of higher jurisdiction, as from the Court of the bishop of the diocese to that of the archbishop of the province. For the purposes of this work the term may be regarded as referring to appeals which were made to the pope as the highest ecclesiastical judge in the world.

This appellate jurisdiction of the bishops of Rome originated in the respect which was felt in early ages for their position as the earliest bishops of the Roman Empire and of Christendom itself. But such few appeals as were made to them were in the nature of voluntary applications for advice rather than of applications for judicial decisions. A Papal Court of Appeals was first formally recognised by the Council of Sardica [A.D. 347], at which a motion of Bishops Hosius and Gaudentius was adopted, allowing a bishop who was condemned by a synod to appeal to the Roman Patriarch, who must either confirm the synodal decision or appoint new judges. This determination of the council was by no means generally accepted, and therefore could not be regarded as a law of the Church at large. But in the course of the next half century it was construed in Rome into the institution of an appeal in all important causes from any bishop to the pope, and this not only by bishops themselves, to whom the resolution of the Council had referred, but by any persons who thought themselves aggrieved in any matter by the decision of the Church court of their own bishop, and wished to seek redress at that of the Bishop of Rome. Thus it came to pass that during the mediæval period the pope became, ex officio, the ecclesiastical judge in the highest resort for all the nations whose churches acknowledged obedience to him.

But the system was not fully introduced into England until Continental habits were brought into the English Church by the Conquest, and attempts to introduce it were vigorously opposed until the reign of Stephen. Thus the bishops and barons told St. Anselm that it was a thing unheard of for any one to carry their cause to Rome without the king's leave, and one of the popes, who was contemporary with Henry I., complained that the English sovereign would suffer no appeals to be carried to him. In the reign of Stephen the point was conceded, but the concession was withdrawn in that of Henry II., when one of the Constitutions of Clarendon ordained that no appeals should be carried to Rome without the king's permission. After the murder of Archbishop Becket the point was once more conceded, with the single limitation that such appeals should not concern any injury to the king or the kingdom.

So it substantially remained until the year 1532, when an "Act for the restraint of Appeals" [24 Henry VIII., c. 12] was passed, which finally extinguished the authority of the pope as a judge over the head of English judges. This Act contains some valuable statements upon the subject, which must be interesting to Englishmen :—

"Whereas," it alleges, "by divers sundry old authentic histories and chronicles, it is manifestly declared and expressed that this realm of England is an empire, and so hath been accepted in the world; governed by one supreme head and king, having the dignity and royal estate of the imperial crown of the same; unto whom a body politic compact of all sorts and degrees of people, divided in terms and by names of spirituality and temporality, be bound and ought to bear, next to God, a natural and humble obedience: he being also institute and furnished by the goodness and sufferance of Almighty God with plenary, whole, and entire power, pre-eminence, authority, prerogative and jurisdiction, to render and yield justice and final determination to all manner of folk, residents or subjects, within this his realm, . . . without restraint, or provocation to any foreign princes or potentates of the world: the body spiritual whereof having power when any cause of the law divine happened to come in question, or of spiritual learning, then it was declared, interpreted, and showed by that part of the body politic called the spirituality, now usually called the English Church; which always hath been reported and also found of that sort, that both for knowledge, integrity, and sufficiency of number, it hath been always thought, and is also at this hour sufficient and meet of itself, without the intermeddling of any exterior person or persons, to declare and determine all such doubts, and to administer all such offices and duties as to their rooms spiritual doth appertain. . . And the laws temporal, for trial of property of lands and goods, and for the conservation of the people of this realm in unity and peace, . . . was and yet is administered, adjudged, and executed by sundry judges and ministers of the other part of the said body politic called the temporality: and both their authorities and jurisdictions do conjoin together in the due administration of justice, the one to help the other."

It is stated that appeals had been made to Rome "in causes testamentary, causes of matrimony and divorces, oblations, and obventions," to the great vexation and expense of the king's subjects, and the great hindrance of justice. The appeal was often made for the purpose of delaying justice, and the difficulties of conveying witnesses and documents was so great that persons aggrieved were practically left without remedy by the appeal of the opposite side to the pope. This system was utterly abolished by the Act of Appeals, and it was enacted that in causes which had hitherto admitted of appeal to the Pope the appeal should run from the Archdeacon's Court to that of the Bishop, from the Bishop's

Court to that of the archbishop of the province "there to be definitely and finally ordered, decreed, and adjudged, according to justice without any other appellation or provocation to any other person or persons, court or courts." By a subsequent Act [25 Hen. VIII. c. 19] the latter provision was modified, and it was enacted that appeals might run from the Archbishop's Court to the Court of Chancery, which was to issue a commission under the great seal to certain delegates nominated by the Crown to re-hear the cause. In 1833 a Committee of the Privy Council was substituted for the Court of Delegates, and so the law of Appeal still remains.

Apron, Bishop's.—A rather absurd sort of garment into the use of which English Bishops have drifted under the hands of tailors. It is the front part of a cassock cut away from the back part and the sleeves, and thus shaped like a blacksmith's or farrier's leather apron. Hence its popular name. It is worn under the coat instead of a waistcoat.

Apsæ.—A recessed and vaulted building at the end of the eastern arm of a church, or of the aisles or the transepts, forming a

either situation a recess for an altar and ministrations connected with it. It is generally semicircular, especially in very ancient churches, but not unfrequently in mediæval and modern churches it has five or more sides. It is also occasionally found at the west end of a church as well as the east, where it forms a baptistery. This feature of church architecture was introduced from the Roman Basilica, a hall for the administration of justice which was as common in the towns of Roman Empire as town halls are in our English towns. In these halls the apse contained the raised platform on which the magistrate and his attendants were placed. When a basilica was turned into a church, or when churches were built in the same form, the altar was placed in the chord of the apse, and the clergy sat in seats around the wall, with the bishops in the middle, the person who celebrated the Holy Communion standing on the eastern side of the altar, facing west. In the present day, in England, the altar is usually placed against, or near to, the eastern wall of the apse, the celebrant standing on the western side of it, facing east. Good examples of semicircular apses may be found in St. Paul's Cathedral, and in many churches built by Sir Christopher Wren and his pupils. Among the finest of ancient ones is that of the Church of St. Agnes at Rome. The apse has, however, been glorified by the hands of mediæval architects into such beautiful structures as the polygonal terminations of Cologne, Canterbury, and Norwich Cathedrals.

Aquæ, otherwise called "Hydrothaitæ."—These designations were given by early writers on heresies to those who held the opinion that all things emanated by a process of spontaneous evolution from water, which element they affirmed to be co-eternal with God.

Aquæ Bajulus.—The name given to the bearer of the holy water in processions. [BIDDING OF THE BEDES.] In small parishes he was doubtless the parish clerk, fulfilling the duties of both offices. [PARISH CLERK.]

Aquarii.—These were "water-officers," otherwise called, from two Greek words, "Hydroparastatæ," who used water instead of wine for the Holy Eucharist. This strange and unscriptural practice must have spread widely among ascetic sects in the early ages, for it is mentioned by St. Cyprian, and is distinctly condemned by canons of councils in the years 370, 675, and 692. It is not known ever to have been adopted by ascetics within the Church.

Aquila.—A Jewish proselyte who is famous as a translator of the Hebrew Old Testament into Greek in the middle of the second century. He is said to have been a native of Pontus, as was the Aquila who, with his wife Priscilla, enjoyed the friendship of St. Paul. Epiphanius also speaks of him as a relative of the Emperor Hadrian [A.D. 117-138], who employed him to superintend the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and in modern times he has been identified with the famous Onkelos, the Jewish commentator. Traditions embodied in the Treatise of Epiphanius on weights and measures represent that Aquila was converted by observing the holy lives of the Christians who returned from their refuge at Pella to live in the new Holy City; but that his persistence in the study of astrology led to his excommunication, when he projected a new translation of the Bible into Greek, for the purpose of evading those interpretations of the Septuagint Version which gave scriptural support to Christianity. The translation which he eventually produced was so made as to provide a Greek equivalent for every Hebrew word, and has thus become a valuable help in determining what was the text of the Hebrew in the second century. Only a portion of Aquila's translation has come down to modern times, and nothing more is known of his personal history than what is above stated.

Aquilinus, St. [A.D. 620-695].—This saint was born at Bayeux, and served in the army of Clovis II. About A.D. 653 he was made Bishop of Evreux, and from that time he entirely devoted himself to the good of his people, living in a small cell close to his cathedral and practising great austerities. In A.D. 688 he attended the Council of Rouen, held under St. Ausbertus. Towards the close of his life he suffered from loss of sight, and died in A.D. 695, after ruling his church for forty-two years. His festival is marked on October 19th in the Roman martyrology, but the Church of Evreux commemorates him on February 15th.

Aquinas, St. THOMAS, OF OF AQUINO [A.D. 1224-1274], known to the later Church as "the Angelical Doctor."—This most famous theologian takes his name from his birth-place, Aquino, in the ancient kingdom of Naples, and from his family, he being a younger son of Landulf, Count of Aquino, who was a nephew of the celebrated Barbarossa, the Emperor Frederick I. From the age of five years to that of thirteen Aquinas was educated in the monastery of Monte Casino, near to the family seat, the castle of Rocca Secca. After that he proceeded to the University of Naples, which had just been founded by his relative Frederick II., grandson of Barbarossa, and had already acquired a great reputation. When he was only seventeen years of age he joined the recently-founded Order of Dominican Friars in one of their houses at Naples. This step was taken without the knowledge of his parents, and was naturally distasteful to them, for it seemed as if a promising career was open to him in military life. His mother hastened to Naples to persuade him, if possible, to give up his resolution before his noviciate was over. To prevent them from meeting, he was sent by his superiors to Terracina, Augni, and Rome, and when his mother arrived in the latter city she found that he had already left for Paris. The Countess, assisted by her three elder sons, seized him on the road, and carried him home to the castle of Rocca Secca, where they kept him under restraint for two years. At the end of that time Aquinas escaped through a window, fled to Naples, and thence to Rome, and in A.D. 1244 was taken to Paris under the protection of John, the Master of the Teutonic Order, having now made his profession as a Friar, and been ordained priest. From Paris he shortly after went to Cologne to finish his education under Albert the Great, with whom he went again to Paris. In A.D. 1248 they returned to Cologne, where Aquinas taught philosophy, formal theology, and the Holy Scriptures. In 1258 he was again in Paris, continuing to teach there as in Cologne; as so great had his reputation become that, in 1255, the University of Paris made him Doctor of Theology. A few years afterwards he returned to Italy, and taught in most of the Italian universities, settling down about 1270 in that of Naples, where he received a pension from the king, and spent the remainder of his life in professorial work. Entirely indisposed for honour and labour in the world, he refused many ecclesiastical dignities, and, among others, the Archbishopric of Naples, which was offered him by Pope Clement IV., spending his years in teaching, and the laborious pursuits of literary work in his study. Having composed, by the command of Pope Urban IV., a volume against the separation of the Greek Church from that of Rome, he was summoned, in A.D. 1274, by Pope Gregory X., to attend the Council of Lyons, that he might read it in the presence of the assembly. He never arrived at Lyons, however, but, being taken ill on the road, and turning aside to the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, he died there on March 7th, 1274, at the early age of fifty. Forty years afterwards, in A.D. 1313, he was canonised by Pope John XXII., March 7th, the day of his death, being assigned to his name in the calendar. In A.D. 1369 his body was translated to a magnificent tomb in the convent of the Dominicans, at Toulouse; and in 1567 he was declared to be a Doctor of the Church by Pope Pius V.

The literary life of Aquinas must have been as busy as that of the most active modern author, his works filling seventeen folio volumes. They contain a large body of expositions of Holy Scripture, some sermons, and seventy-three treatises and tracts on many subjects. But the greatest of all his literary labours was his Summa Theologie, an elaborate system of theology, in which all the doctrines maintained in the Church are examined by exact logical methods. Many editions of his works have been published. [THOMISTS.]

Arabici.—An Arabian sect of the third century, which held that the soul dies with the body, and that both soul and body will be raised together at the last day. After forty years' existence, about A.D. 250 a council of bishops was held to consider the doctrine of the Arabici, when the latter were so convinced by the arguments of Origen, who was present, that the whole body of them renounced their error. Yet a belief in the "sleep of the soul" between death and the general resurrection has been a widely-spread error in later ages, though never made the special rallying-point of a sect.

Arcani Disciplina. [DISCIPLINA ARCANI.]

Archangel.—A chief [Gr. archē] or principal angel. Among the "nine orders of angels," the archangels are reckoned the eighth, or lowest but one. The title is used twice in the New Testament; by St. Paul when he writes, "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God" [1 Thess. iv. 16]; and by St. Jude when he mentions "Michael the Archangel" [Jude 9]. It is also found in the Second Book of Esdras, a book written about A.D. 100, where Uriel, or Jeremiel, the Archangel, is represented as showing to Esdras visions of things to come [2 Esdr. iv. 36]. The archangels are supposed to be seven in number, the "seven angels having the seven last plagues" [Rev. xv. 1, 6; xvi. 1; xxi. 9], and the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints [comp. Rev. viii. 3], and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One, of whom Raphael declares himself to be one [Tobit xii. 15], being considered as archangels. Four such principal angels or archangels are named in the canonical and the apocryphal books, namely, Gabriel [Dan. viii. 18; ix. 21; Luke i. 19, 26], Michael [Dan. x. 13, 21; xii. 1; Jude 9; Rev. xii. 7], Uriel [2 Esdr. iv. 1, 36; v. 20; x. 28], and Raphael [Tobit iii. 17; xii. 15]. Jewish tradition gives the names of three others, namely, Chamuel, Jophiel, and Zadkiel. The archangel Gabriel—whose name means "the Strong One of God"—appeared to Daniel, interpret his visions respecting the Messiah to Zacharias, to announce the coming birth of St. John the Baptist, the forerunner of our Lord; and to the Virgin Mary, to announce the coming birth of our Lord Himself; and Gabriel is thus regarded as the Angel of the Incarnation. The archangel Michael is spoken of as one of the "chief princes" and "Michael, your prince," Daniel, and is thus regarded as the special guardian and protector of the Jewish nation. But in the New Testament he is also represented as carrying on the final struggle with Satan: "There was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon" [Rev. xii. 7]. It is a very ancient belief among Jews and Christians that the archangel Michael is God's principal minister for judgment, and hence he is often represented weighing souls.

Archbishop.—The chief or principal bishop among the bishops of a group of dioceses. The office has been recognised under various names—such as Metropolitan, Exarch, or Patriarch—from the earliest ages of the Church, and is perhaps the same as that of the “Angels of the Seven Churches” of the province of Asia to whom the seven epistles in the Book of the Revelation are written. The earliest use of the title is found in the writings of St. Athanasius, who speaks of Alexander, his own predecessor in the see of Alexandria, early in the fourth century, as the Archbishop of Alexandria. By the canon law, the several classes of bishops are settled as four: [1] Patriarcha; [2] Archbishops; [3] Metropolitans; [4] Diocesan Bishops; and although the distinction between metropolitan and archbishop has mostly passed away through the absorption of the lower rank into the higher, it is not always so, the English metropolitans of Canada, New Zealand, and India not being archbishops.

An archbishop's office is twofold. As bishop of a particular see, he has to undertake the ordinary episcopal duties of a diocesan bishop, in which capacity he carries a pastoral crook; as archbishop and metropolitan, he has to undertake, as visitor and on appeal, the supervision of all the dioceses within his province, in which capacity he carries a metropolitan cross. Both crook and cross may be seen on some seals of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

England has for twelve centuries been divided into two Provinces, Canterbury and York, which are presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of All England, and the Archbishop of York, Primate of England. When St. Augustine reorganised the Church of England among the Saxon conquerors of the country, Gregory the Great directed him to divide it into two Archbishopsrics, one at London, even then the chief city of England, with twelve bishops for the south; the other at York, long an important city as the headquarters of the Roman forces in England, with twelve bishops, for the north. Canterbury, the place where St. Augustine placed the headquarters of his mission, was to comprehend both north and south during the lifetime of the great missionary, and thus with St. Augustine [A.D. 597] originated the distinctive title ever so jealously guarded by, and on behalf of, the Archbishop of Canterbury, that of “Primate of ALL England.” The advice of St. Gregory was not practically carried out as regards York for a century and a-half after the establishment of Canterbury as an archiepiscopal see. For a short time [A.D. 625—633], PAULINUS was Bishop of the Northumbrians, and as such held the Pall of an Archbishop which was sent to him by Pope Honorius, but the kingdom of Northumbria was not divided into dioceses until Paulinus had fled from the north to Rochester, where he was Bishop for eleven years; and hence he had no bishops under him, and was never in reality an Archbishop. The first actual Archbishop of York was Egbert [A.D. 732—766], who was the second Bishop of York that had asked for and received a Pall from the Pope, and who had for his Metropolitan Province the dioceses of LINDISFARNE, HEXHAM, and WITHERENE. Although, therefore, the Bishops of Canterbury have been Archbishops of Canterbury for 1,288 years, the Bishops of York have only been Archbishops of York for 1,153 years.

The two Archbishops of England, in addition to their position as Metropolitans, have very high rank and privileges. The Archbishop of Canterbury ranks as a Prince immediately after the Princes of the blood royal, and before all other subjects. The Archbishop of York ranks as a Prince before all other subjects except the Lord Chancellor. It is in token of this high rank that their mitres are heraldically represented as being inserted in prince's coronets, but there is some uncertainty as to whether the mitres which they actually wore were ever in this form. The Archbishop of Canterbury has, by right, the privilege of crowning the Sovereign, the Archbishop of York that of crowning the Queen Consort. Both are ex officio members of the Privy Council, and the Archbishop of Canterbury is practically, if not constitutionally, the medium of communication between the Ministers of the Sovereign and the Church. At the demise of the Sovereign, in the absence of a regent there are also special duties devolving upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, which last until the duties of sovereign are assumed by the succeeding Prince or Princess. The position of Primate of All England is, indeed, a very important and a very grand one. He is practically a patriarch, though actually using only the style and title of Archbishop. So early had this become evident that at Councils held at Rome the Archbishop of Canterbury was placed on the right hand of the Pope, taking precedence of all other Archbishops as, in the complimentary words of Urban II., “alterius orbis Papa,” his brother Pope of another world.

On the Primate's power of granting degrees, see LAMBETH DEGREES.

Both Archbishops have the title of “Grace,” and “Most Reverend Father in God by Divine Providence,” while the other bishops have that of “Lord,” and “Right Reverend Father in God by Divine Permission.” The Bishop of Meath, however, is addressed as “Most Reverend.”

The Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury have been written as far as Juxon by Hook, Dean of Chichester; those of the Archbishops of York, by Raine, Canon of York.

It should be added that Welsh traditions assign the honour of an Archbiscopric to CARR-LEON; and that for fourteen years, somewhere between 768 and 803, Lichfield was constituted an Archbishopric with six suffragan sees by Pope Adrian I.

Archdeacon.—This title originally belonged to an actual "chief" or principal "of the deacons," as it signifies; and the "chief deacon" attended on the bishop as his minister when he celebrated the Holy Communion. He also acted as secretary to the bishop, and as his deputy on special missions. It was in this latter capacity that St. Athanasius, when Archdeacon to Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, attended the Council of Nicea. In process of time the Archdeacon ceased to have any especial connection with the deacons at whose head he was supposed to stand, and became a deputy bishop in almost everything that did not require a bishop's special office. In particular, the Archdeacon was empowered to hold a Court in which to administer discipline and, inflict spiritual censures, which was almost an exact copy in petto, and for that part of the diocese which formed his archdeaconry, of the Bishop's own Court. Hence the Archdeacon came to be called "the eye" and "the hand" of the Bishop; he had to enquire generally of all things spiritual and temporal, appertaining to good order, within his jurisdiction. As immediate Ordinary, he had to visit all Parish Churches and Glebe-houses, and enjoin proper reparations, to look after charitable bequests and endowments, and to take care that all ministerial functions were legally and canonically performed. The history of the division of dioceses into Archdeaconries is somewhat obscure. Probably, as the English dioceses were originally commensurate with the Kingdoms, the Archdeaconries more or less represented the divisions into shires, but we do not get any very definite information on this point prior to the Norman Conquest. There are eighty-five Archdeacons in the Provinces of Canterbury and York. In the Protestant Episcopal Church of America the office does not exist.

Archdeacon, COURT OF.—The Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, deriving its peculiar name from the circumstance that it anciently sat in the Church of St. Mary-le-Bow [Lat. Sancta Maria de Arcubus], in Cheapside, London. Originally he had jurisdiction only over the parish of Bow and twelve others in London, these parishes being under the Archbishop of Canterbury, and not under the Bishop of London. About the year 1567 its sittings were removed to the Hall of Doctors Commons; and by an Act of Parliament of the year 1874, the office was joined with that of the "Judge of the Provincial Courts of Canterbury and York." [ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.]

Archetype.—The principal, or original model or standard. The word has been used in a philosophical sense for the original form of each created thing as it pre-existed in the mind of the Creator.

Arch-heretic.—The chief heretic connected with any heresy, and by implication its author. Such were subjected to more severe punishment than other heretics by the primitive Church, and if they were clergymen were degraded from their orders without hope of restoration. St. Augustine gives Donatus as an example of an arch-heretic; Arius and Nestorius are other examples.

Archimandrite.—The title given to the abbot, or president, of a Greek monastery. It is retained by those who have resigned the office.

Archives.—A word signifying, in Greek, the "registry" where public records were kept; and used in an ecclesiastical sense for the ecclesiastical records themselves. Thus the episcopal archives of a diocese are the documents preserved in the Bishop's Registry; the archives of a cathedral, the documents preserved in its registry, chapter-house, or muniment room.

Archontics.—A sect of local Gnostics which arose in Palestine in the middle of the second century, and derived its name from the "Archons," or sub-deities, who corresponded in their system with the Æons of Simon Magus and the Valentinians [ÆON]. This sect spread to Armenia, but was never very numerous, and seems to have been a branch of the Egyptian Ophites. They had various apocryphal books, and among them the one known as the "Ascension of Isaiah."

Archpriest.—In the primitive Church this was the principal priest of a diocese, usually the senior one according to the date of his ordination as priest. As the organization of dioceses advanced the number of archpriests increased, and one was appointed for each principal town and its neighbourhood under the name of the "rural archpriest." This office is often confused with that of the CHOREPISCOPUS, but was in reality the same as that of the RURAL DEAN, though in medieval times its duties were assumed by the ARCHDEACONS.

Arewardis.—An Armenian sect of "angel children" or sun-worshippers of the eighth century, who mingled together some of the doctrines of Christianity and those of Manichæism.

Ariomanites.—A nickname given to the Arians, signifying that they were mad fanatics who were followers of Arius.

Arius and the Arians.—Early in the fourth century, the heretical opinions which had been promulgated respecting the Christ by our Lord culminated in the wide-spread heresy of Arianism, so named after Arius, its principal leader.

Arius was a native of Ptolemais (now known as Tolmeit), a city in Cyrenaica, or that part of North Africa which lies exactly opposite to the southern part of Greece. The date of his birth is uncertain, but the important part of his life takes in from A.D. 306 to A.D. 336, and this is the period with which we have to deal in treating of his personal history and influence.

In his appearance and manners he was exceedingly attractive, and much of his personal influence seems to have been gained by his gentle and winning ways in society. We read of him as a very tall and thin man, of rigidly ascetic look and serious countenance, of downcast eyes, perhaps from weak sight, and given to violent starts and wild glances, "as if suffering," suggests Dean Stanley, "from some violent and internal complaint, the same, perhaps, that will terminate one day in his sudden and frightful death." He was a man of much ability, tact, and learning, and full of energy.

The first we hear of Arius is as a layman who made himself so prominent as a partisan of Meletius, a Bishop of Lycopolis, (who had apostatised from Christianity to save his life during the Diocletian persecution, and, when safe times had returned, wished to take up his position as if nothing had happened), that he appears to have been excommunicated by his own bishop, Peter, of Alexandria. Arius was, however, reconciled to the Bishop, and ordained deacon about the year 306. His partisanship was not by any means eradicated, nevertheless; for the supporters of Meletius having started a Church of their own, and Meletius having ordained bishops, Arius advocated their claims to be admitted on equal terms of fellowship by the Bishop of Alexandria; and this went on until he was again ejected from the communion of the Church. Whenever he was excommunicated, Arius seems to have repented, and when he was received back again to have relapsed on the earliest opportunity. The repentance now came with the imprisonment of the Bishop by the persecutor Maximin, in 311.

Arius persuaded a number of the Alexandrian clergy, who probably thought the matter between him and the Bishop was more personal than anything else, to go to Peter in prison and intercede for his restoration. This was sternly refused by the old Bishop, who, it is said, supported his refusal by the narrative of a vision he had seen the night before, in which it was revealed to him that Arius would be the cause of terrible divisions in the Church of Christ. Turning to two clergymen, named Achillas and Alexander, he predicted, the story continues, that they, and not Arius, would each in his turn be his successors, and the event proved his words to be prophetic.

After the Bishop's martyrdom, in the year 312, the first-named of these, Achillas, was elected bishop, and Arius, appearing to him to be penitent (and probably being so at the time, for he was a man of strong impulses), he restored him to communion, ordained him priest, appointed him to the charge of the church of Baucalis, in Alexandria, and made him Divinity Lecturer at the college of that city, where he became exceedingly popular with his pupils. Achillas dying, Alexander and Arius were candidates for the see; but it seems that a very small party desired the election of the latter, and Alexander was elected. Arius and the party who had supported him were, however, thrown into a bitter state of hostility towards those who had preferred Alexander; the latter, on the other hand, gave Arius the first place of dignity among his clergy, next to himself.

The particular line which Arius marked out for himself was that of substituting "rational" ideas about the Blessed Trinity for those mysteries which had hitherto been accepted and believed in by the great body of Christians at all times and everywhere. He followed in the track of former heretics, and kept up the succession which is to be traced through Paul of Samosata, Sabellius, Praxeas, the Gnostics, the Docetæ and Cerinthus, back to the Apostolic age itself; but as the last general persecution of the Church was the most severe which it had to undergo, so the last heresy of that period was by far the most dangerous and the most widely spread of all heresies.

Arius began by a controversy with a clergyman named Baucalas, in which the eternal existence of our Lord as God the Son was the subject of dispute; but who was the original assailant of the other does not appear, though it seems probable that Arius was, since he had already accused the bishop of Sabellianism.

The matter became notorious, and the bishop was driven to take some steps respecting it. What he did was exceedingly fair and honourable, and shows that he was not actuated by any private pique against his late rival; for he called together a synod, composed of a hundred of the neighbouring bishops, that they might hear what each of the disputants had to say, and advise them as to the right or the wrong of their arguments. Arius, meanwhile, took a step which seems to show that he was a thorough agitator, for while his matter was thus sub judice he endeavoured to secure influence over his judges by writing to all neighbouring bishops.

All of them, however, with the exception of Eusebius of Nicomædia (not Eusebius the historian, who was Bishop of Cæsarea), refused their countenance, and referred him to his diocesan, Bishop Alexander, and the hundred other bishops decided that the doctrine of Arius was not the doctrine of the Church, and urged him to recant. As he refused to do so, and the case had become so serious that no alternative was

There are always many to side with an oppressed man, or one who is thought to be so, and Arius was a man made for popularity. Among the ladies of Alexandria he found many followers. Some of the younger laity were also won over to his side; a few deacons and several priests were his clerical supporters, as also the Bishop of Ptolemais, his native place, and of Marmarica, the see which lay between it and his present abode. But he seems never to have numbered men of the highest class of intellect among his followers, Eusebius the historian being the only one who could at all be excepted, and he only half inclining towards him at one period of his career, through fear of the clergy running into an opposite extreme.

After the condemnation of his opinions by the bishop and provincial council of Alexandria, Arius left the city and went on a tour among the bishops of Palestine, endeavouring to win them over to his side.

This led to a circular letter being addressed by Bishop Alexander to seventy of them, in which he told them the history of the controversy, and mixed up with it the name of the Bishop of Nicomædia, who had always been an important friend of Arius (Nicomædia being the capital of the Eastern Empire, as Rome was of the Western), and who now espoused his cause more warmly still, receiving him as a visitor. The tact, energy, and talents of Arius are shown by his literary works while at Nicomædia, for under the name of Thalia he composed some songs for sailors and workmen, in which he endeavoured to secure a public opinion for his tenets among the lower classes. These songs no longer exist, except in a few fragments, but they are said by St. Athanasius to contain some immoralities.

The substance of Arian doctrine may be stated in a few words. It is that although the Second Person in the Holy Trinity may be designated as God in some sense, He is not God in the same sense as the First, or in any really true sense, because He is not eternal, and there was therefore a time when He did not exist. It was seldom, however, that Arius put forth his doctrine in this simple form, as his object seems to have been rather to secure as many supporters as he could by broad and indefinite statements, of which only educated theologians could see the bearing. That bearing is illustrated by the change which Arius and his followers adopted in the old Doxology of the Church.

This they used in the form, "Glory be to the Father, by the Son, in the Holy Ghost," which was in the mouth of an Arian a most important change, since the more ancient form ascribes glory to the Son as it does to the Father, and hence acknowledges His equal Godhead. The controversy thus settled on the Greek word homôiousios, which in the English translation of the Nicene Creed rendered "of one substance with;" the one side maintaining that God the Son is an Uncreated Being as entirely God as God the Father, the other that He is a created Being but in some way similar to God the Father in fact a kind of demigod.

The controversy had hitherto been represented by Alexander, Bishop or Patriarch of Alexandria, on one side and Arius himself on the other. It was while the influence of the latter was being exerted to the utmost at Nicomædia, and had penetrated into the family circle of the Emperor Constantine, that a young deacon was brought forward by Alexander as the theological champion of the old doctrine. This young deacon became ultimately that great opponent of Arianism whose name is preserved in memory to this day by the hymn or creed which is called after his name (as representing his statement of the received doctrine), the great Athanasius [ATHANASIUS, St.]

The controversy had now covered so large a surface, and involved so many persons on either side, as to have become a public question of great importance. About fifty years later, the general interest which a revival of it excited, is quaintly but forcibly described by Gregory of Nyssa. "The town is full," wrote—meaning Constantinople—"of those who dogmatise about incomprehensible matters; they are in the streets, in the markets, among the clothiers, money-changers and victuallers. If you ask any one how much you have to pay they dogmatise about 'being begotten' and 'not being begotten.' If you ask the price of bread, the reply is 'The Father is greater than the Son, and the Son is inferior to the Father.' If you ask 'Is the bath ready?' the answer is, 'The bath is made out of nothing.'" Though this was written when Arianism was in high favour with the Emperor, who then held his court at Constantinople, it probably represents something of the tone of society at Nicomædia at Alexandria at the earlier period with which we are now dealing; and the moving cause which led the Emperor Constantine to interfere in the controversy. The Emperor did not attempt to decide it himself, but found a large body of his subjects were at variance on a question which he was not competent to investigate, he appointed a proper ecclesiastical person as a deputy for the purpose, entrusting Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, in the south of Spain, with the office of judging the case, and, if possible, of quieting the controversy.

The report which Hosius made to the Emperor was of such a nature that Constantine decided on assembling an immense Council of bishops, from every part of the world, and trusting to them the final decision of the question, and there seems to be an intima-of the vital and universal importance of it in fact that such an idea was providentially impressed upon the mind of a recent convert like the Emperor, who could have known very little of the real point at issue, or of Christian theology in general. This assembly met in the year 325 at Nicæa, not far from the Imperial residence and the new city which Constantine was then building on the opposite shore of the Bosphorus, and which still retains its name. To this Council of Nicæa, summoned by the secular head of the civilised world, 318 bishops travelled from all parts of the world at the public expense, and some, it is thought, went thither even from our own far distant country. Such an assembly, when we commercially to consider its composition, must have been one to command the respect of the age, and one which may command our respect also. Those who composed it were men of mature years, many of them long past the meridian of life; they had been picked out of the best educated class among their fellow-countrymen at home, as having the knowledge, judgment, and goodness which fitted them for the office of bishop; they were many of them men who had suffered grievously for their religion, showing by their maimed bodies, as they sat in the Council, how real those sufferings had been; they now met together under Imperial command to decide on an important public question, and must have felt the responsibility of their office; and they believed that God's guidance would lead them to a right decision.

The proceeding of the Council was in fact very simple. All its members started with the axiom that the real object for which they had met was not to decide by argument who was right and who was wrong, but to judge of a fact who was and who was not in agreement with the general belief of Christians all over the world, from the Apostles' time downwards. The Bishop of Cordova was President of the Council. Sylvester, the Bishop of Rome, was not there, but sent two priests as his representatives, who acted for him and had the second place of honour at the Council.

Upon hearing the doctrine of Arius from his own lips, indignation and horror were shown by the great majority of the bishops, it was so plainly antagonistic to the truth which they had received, and believed, and taught, and on which their hopes were founded. When each in turn was asked to bear witness to the constant belief of the Church in his part of the world, the testimony proved to be an almost unanimous condemnation of the doctrine of Arius. And when the Nicene Creed (with the exception of the clauses after "I believe in the Holy Ghost," which were added some years later) was submitted to the 318 bishops, everyone subscribed it as the true statement of their faith, except the two Bishops of Ptolemais and Marmarica; who have before been mentioned as being connected, the one with the birthplace of Arius, and the other with the adjacent country, and who were probably therefore his personal friends. Even Eusebius of Nicomædia subscribed, but he did it by a subterfuge, turning the word "homocousion" into "homocousion," and thus by the substitution of a diphthong for a single letter, making the word mean "of a similar substance," instead of meaning "of one substance" with the Father; a perversion the full value and importance of which was afterwards so strongly shown as to remind one by contrast of our Lord's saying that not one jot or one tittle of His words should fall to the ground.

Of the subsequent progress of Arianism after this authoritative decision, much detail cannot be given without entering into particulars that are likely to prove wearisome to the general reader. Arius himself was restored to Imperial favour through the influence of Constantia, the Emperor's sister, who had been entirely gained over to his heresy at Nicomædia. He was exiled after the Council, but recalled in a few years; and gradually gained so much influence at Court, that Constantine issued a command to Alexander, the Bishop of Constantinople, to receive the excommunicated heretic back to the communion of the Church on a certain Sunday in the year 336. Alexander spent the Sabbath, the day before, in prayer, and it is said that he prayed God that either he or Arius might be removed from this life before the hour of trial came. The first minutes of that hour came, however, and both were living. A procession was formed, with Arius in the midst, and began a triumphant march through the city towards the Church of Peace, where Alexander was again prostrate at the altar. While the procession was pompously parading the city, and the triumph of Arius seemed all but complete, he was taken with a sudden pain, and died a few minutes after.

Arianism did not cease with the death of its originator. It was the rallying centre for numbers of men, especially in the Eastern Church, for many a long year: and it was also the starting-point for some other heresies, the tendency of the opinions of Arius always developing towards a denial of the Incarnation. After controversies which shook the Roman Empire to its foundations for forty years, the Arians were formally suppressed as an organised body by decree of the Emperor Theodosius the Great in A.D. 381. But the vast Gothic population lying on the borders of the Empire, and about to descend upon it and overturn it, were Arians, as far as they were Christians at all. Alaric, the first conqueror of Rome, was an Arian; so was Ulfilas, the first translator of the Scriptures into the Teutonic language. It was because the Visigoths who settled in Gaul were Arians, that the orthodox Bishops invited Clovis the Frank to invade the country, and Arianism was a great factor in the downfall of the Gothic Kingdom of Spain, and its conquest by the Mohammedans.

Arles.—An ancient city of Lower Provence, on the banks of the Rhone, the seat of government of the province of the Gauls, and also at times an imperial residence, and was consequently of considerable ecclesiastical importance in the early history of the French Church. It is likewise of interest in connection with the Church of England from several circumstances. [1] In A.D. 314 the Emperor Constantine summoned a council to Arles consisting of bishops from Italy, Sicily, the Gauls (including Britain), and Africa: and the list of the bishops who met on this occasion contains the names of Eborius, bishop of York, Restitutius, Bishop of London, and Adelphius, Bishop of Caerleon-on-Usk. [2] In the year 597 St. Augustine, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, went over from Britain to Arles to be consecrated a bishop by the hands of Vergilius, its Archbishop.

Armasites.—An Egyptian section of the MONOTHELITES (q. v.), who took their name from Harmasius in the seventh century. They are mentioned by St. John Damascene.

Armenia, CHURCH OF.—Christianity was introduced into the high lands south-east of the Caspian Sea at an early date, according to tradition by St. Bartholomew. But it may be doubted if any definitely organised church survived the successive invasions and struggles which these regions had to endure from the Romans and the Parthians in the first three centuries of the Christian era. In the beginning of the fourth century it revived once more under the missionary labours of St. Gregory, the Illuminator or Enlightener. Having converted Tiridates the king, and multitudes of his subjects, a reorganisation of the Armenian Church was commenced by St. Gregory, and he was consecrated first bishop of the Armenians by Leontius the Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, whose successors for several ages consecrated the successors of St Gregory, and regarded them as their vicars or deputies. In the fifth century the Armenian Church, which had very actively opposed itself to the errors of Nestorius [NESTORIANISM], was driven into the opposite error of Eutyches [EUTYCHIANISM], and in A.D. 554 the Armenian bishops practically separated from the great body of the Eastern Churches, renouncing their communion, declaring that Jesus Christ has one nature only, and not the two natures of God and Man, and repudiating the decrees of the great General Council of Chalcedon respecting the doctrine held by the Church about our Lord.

The Greek Emperors often endeavoured to bring about a reunion between the Church of Armenia and the orthodox Greek Churches, but although a gradual return to the received doctrines of the Eastern Churches resulted, a visible reunion has ever been effected. Similar attempts have been often made to bring the Armenians into union with Rome, and a small church of Armenian Roman Catholics exists in Constantinople, where there are also some thousands of Armenian Protestants. There seems to be little doubt that the Church of Armenia is substantially orthodox, and that although it steadily maintains its external isolation from other Churches of the East and West, this is rather an independence like that of the Church of England than a spirit of separation. Their liturgy and their faith are only to be distinguished from those of other Eastern Churches by experts.

Arminians.—A religious party which arose in Holland in the end of the sixteenth century and the beginning of the seventeenth century and strongly opposed the Calvinistic doctrine of Predestination to Eternal Salvation and Eternal Punishment. [PREDESTINATION.] The founder of the party was James Arminius or Herrmann, whose name was Latinised into Arminius [A.D. 1560—1609]. He was born at Oudewater on the Yssel in South Holland, and was the son of a cutler, and died while he was yet a boy. By the assistance of friends he received a learned education at Utrecht, Marburg, Rotterdam, and Leyden, and having heard lectures from Beza at Geneva, he visited Rome for a short time. At Basle he was offered a Doctor of Divinity decree at the premature age of twenty, but declined the honour. Returning to Amsterdam in 1588, he was appointed preacher there and soon became very popular. A man named Kornhert had here made vigorous attacks upon Calvin's doctrine of predestination, and had been proclaimed heretic by the Calvinists. Arminius was requested by the authorities to refute Kornhert and also to defend the SUPRALAPSARIAN doctrine against the SUBLAPSARIAN. In preparation to undertake the work thus assigned to him, Arminius came round to the opinions of his opponent, and was accused of Pelagianism. Being summoned before the magistracy of Amsterdam, he was prevailed on to promise that he would teach nothing at variance with the Heidelberg Confession; but he was accused of teaching that Christ died to save all men instead of to save only an elect, an opinion which he henceforth avowed openly. In 1603 Arminius became Professor of Divinity at Leyden, where he soon became involved in a controversy so fierce that the Government was obliged to interfere for the preservation of the peace. To settle this controversy a general synod was summoned at which the strict Calvinists were to be opposed by Francis Gomar, the colleague of Arminius in the University, while Arminius himself was to lead his followers on the Anti-vinistic side. But the controversy preyed upon the health of Arminius, and he died before the date fixed for the meeting of the synod, on Oct. 18th, 1609.

The Arminian party presented a "Remonstrance" to the States General of Holland in the following year in self-defence, and hence received the name of "Remonstrants." This "Remonstrance" was, in fact, a statement of Arminian principles in five "Articles," so well known afterwards as "The Five Points." The substance of these articles was as follows:

[1] That although God had from eternity decreed to eternal life those who would persevere in their faith, and to eternal death those who should die impenitent, yet that His eternal decrees were determined by His eternal foreknowledge as to the perseverance or impenitence to death of each particular person to be saved or lost. [2] That our Lord Jesus made expiation by His death for the sins of all men, but that only believers can be partakers of this Divine benefit. [3] That no one can of himself, or by the power of his will, originate saving faith within him, but being by nature born unable to think and to do that which is good, he must be born again through the operation of the Holy Ghost. [4] That God's grace is not in such a sense irresistible as to compel a man to be saved against his will, though it may be repelled by his perverse will; and that whatever is good in man comes from the operation of this grace, so that good works done by him are to be ascribed to its operation only. [5] That those who are united to Christ by faith have sufficient spiritual strength to continue in that union until their lives end, but whether they can fall away or not is a question respecting which we have not sufficient evidence in Holy Scripture. From the "Five Articles" thus summarised, the dispute between the Dutch Calvinists and the Dutch Arminians came to be called "The Quinquarticular Controversy," and it became one of the most bitter controversies known to history. Within the five or six years that followed the death of Arminius conferences were held at the Hague [A.D. 1610], and at Delft [A.D. 1613], and a decree was issued by the States General enforcing toleration and forbidding controversy, but all in vain. Strong political feeling aided in making the two parties more exasperated against each other, the Arminians wishing for peace with Spain, and the Calvinists urging the Prince of Orange and the States General to begin war, and the language of the Calvinists towards their opponents was so violent and bloodthirsty that the latter thought it necessary to organise a militia for self-defence.

At last it was determined by the Prince and the States General that another assembly of Protestant divines should be summoned, the decision of which should be final. The Synod of Dort, or Dordrecht, was therefore convened, and sat in the city from which it took its name, from Nov. 13th, 1618, until the end of April, 1619. It consisted entirely of Calvinist divines, the intention being to assume throughout that the Arminian divines were present on their defence as accused persons, and not for the purpose of equal deliberation with the others. [Dorr, Synod or.] The object of the Calvinist party was effectually obtained. The opinions of Arminius were condemned, and the "Remonstrants" or Arminian party were required to subscribe the condemnation. Seven hundred families whose heads refused to subscribe were banished from Holland by a decree of the States General. Grotius and Hoogarbets, two of the chief of their leaders, were sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, from which Grotius escaped two years afterwards concealed in a linen chest. Barneveldt, an aged member of the States General who had protected the Arminian party, was actually put to death.

But notwithstanding the sympathy which the sufferings of the Dutch Arminians aroused, there can be no doubt that the tendency of their opinions after the death of Arminius was decidedly towards a denial of the leading principles of Christianity. Episcopius, their principal theologian, returned from exile, on the promulgation of a decree of toleration in 1634, to open a college in Amsterdam in which he taught theories which practically ended in Unitarianism and Universalism. Ever since that time the descent has been on a downward path in the direction of Rationalism, some of the most distinguished teachers of the Rationalist school having also sprung from among them. Few are now to be found except in Amsterdam and Rotterdam.

Those who have been called Arminians in England were called so as following the earlier teaching of Arminius himself, and not the later teaching of his disciples. Before the Great Rebellion the name was freely given to the Laudian party, a certain likeness being evident between the High Church anti-Calvinism and the anti-Calvinism of the Arminians. After the Restoration the name passed over to the Latitudinarians or Broad Church party, of which Tillotson was the representative. When Whitfield and Wesley established their work on different lines, Whitfield became the father of Calvinistic Methodists and Wesley of Arminian Methodists; and great was the opposition between those who held with Whitfield the doctrine of the Divine decrees to salvation or condemnation, and those who held with Wesley that God ever desires the salvation of all men, gives them a free will to choose the way of salvation, and offers them grace to help them on the road. The revival of the study of theology has, however, done much to extinguish the extreme form of Calvinistic opinion on the subjects of Predestination and Election, and the doctrine of Universal Redemption as taught by Arminius (which is not to be confused with that of Universal Salvation taught by some of his followers) is now generally held by members of the Church of England, and by the majority of Dissenters.

Armorium.—A receptacle for the PRX containing the reserved Sacrament. It was usually in the form of a niche without doors, and was situated about the middle of the altar on the east wall. The armorium was of late introduction in English churches, the usual way of keeping the reserved Sacrament being to place it in a silver box shaped like a dove, which was hung up over the altar, and before which a hanging lamp, or a bowl containing a wax candle, was always burning.

Arnobius (1) [about A.D. 310], sometimes called Arnobius the Elder to distinguish him from Arnobius (2), a Pagan teacher of rhetoric at Sicca in North Africa, having among his pupils LACTANTIUS. In his lectures he had been accustomed to oppose Christianity, but the martyrdoms which he witnessed during the Diocletian persecution brought him round to the side of the Christians, and he offered himself as a convert to the clergy of Sicca to be baptised. At first they declined to receive him, fearing that he contemplated some treachery; and as a proof that he was no longer hostile to the faith he prepared an Apology for Christianity. The first portion consists of a defence of Christianity in two books, and this is followed by five other books setting forth the errors of Paganism. Nothing more is known of his life. Probably he perished in the persecution.

Arnobius (2) [about A.D. 480].—A Bishop of Gaul, who wrote a Commentary on the Psalms, which has been printed in the eighth volume of the great Lyons Library of the Fathers. This Commentary is interesting as containing an interpretation of the Psalms which refers them to Christ and His Church.

Arnold, THOMAS, D.D.—A great educationist and religious leader [1795–1842], born in the Isle of Wight, educated at Winchester and Corpus Christi College, Oxford. After graduating first-class in classics, he was elected to a Fellowship at Oriel, then the highest honour in the University, having among his companions Whately, Keble, Copleston, Hampden. Through the study of Niebuhr's Rome he was powerfully drawn towards German criticism, while his religious impressions deepened day by day. He was ordained in 1818, and took private pupils at Laleham; and here he married, to his lifelong happiness, Mary Penrose. In 1827 he was elected Head Master of Rugby, and by the wonderful influence which he exerted in that post he revolutionised public education in England. Two works describing Arnold's power as a schoolmaster have become classics of our literature—Stanley's Life of Arnold, and Mr. Hughes's story, Tom Brown's School-days. Both alike tell of his manliness and simplicity, of his sternness, yet withal his tenderness of heart and genuine sympathy; of the encouragement which he gave to industry, however plodding and dull; of his piety; of his wondrous power as a preacher. In consequence it was soon seen that Rugby boys came to the front at the University, and their manly tone was a further recommendation of his principles. But, nevertheless, his religious views laid him open to the strong dislike of the clergy, most of whom in that day belonged either to the old dry school or to the Evangelical party. He offended them first, by a pamphlet in favour of Roman Catholic Emancipation; and afterwards, when it was thought that the Whig Government desired to destroy the Establishment, by another on Church Reform [1833], in which he advocated Comprehension of Dissenters. When a vehement outcry was made by some of the Tract writers against Dr. Hampden's appointment to the Divinity Professorship at Oxford in 1836, he exasperated them by a fierce attack in the Edinburgh Review. In consequence of this article Archbishop Howley refused to allow him to preach the sermon at the consecration of Bishop Stanley to the Bishopric of Norwich, and a vote of censure which would have forced his resignation at Rugby was all but carried in a meeting of the trustees. Nevertheless, he lived down the unpopularity; the numbers of the school increased beyond his own desire, and in 1840 he was appointed Regius Professor of History at Oxford. At his inaugural lecture he was rapturously received. He would probably have made at Oxford as great a mark as he had done at Rugby. Archbishop Tait, a very keen judge of movement and of character, used to declare in after years that Arnold would have prevented the secularisation of the Universities, and established a new and learned school of divinity at a moment when the Tract party was for the time shattered by Newman's defection. But he died next year. Though a strong Liberal, he was utterly hostile to indifferentism, and as earnest as man could be in proclaiming the cardinal doctrines of the Christian Creed; man of prayer and faith; and, as he grew older, of greater gentleness towards those from whom he differed. He died suddenly as his father had done, of spasms of the heart, in the full energy of his school work. His widow survived him for thirty-one years.

Arnoldists.—The followers of Arnold Brescia or Brixia [d. A.D. 1155]. Arnold was a monk of the monastery in the north of Italy from which he takes his designation, and was a pupil of ABELARD. While the people of Lombardy were endeavouring to establish republican institutions in the form of free cities, Arnold aggravated their hostility the bishops and clergy by preaching far and wide against endowments and the wealth of the clergy. He was summoned before the Second Lateran Council, and banished from Italy. He took refuge in France with his friend Abelard, but the opposition which his principles met with from St. Bernard drove him to Zurich, where he remained for several years. Meanwhile, the Romans had carried his principles to such a length that they raised an insurrection in A.D. 1143 for the purpose of establishing a republic, and summoned Arnold from Zurich to become their leader. The popular movement soon developed under his directions into a civil war, and the insurgents gained possession of Rome. The reigning Pope, Lucius II., endeavoured to retake it, but was killed in an attempt on the Capitol on Feb. 25th, 1145. The rebellion was carried on by the Arnoldists for the next nine years, and under the rule of the two Popes, Eugenius III. and Anastasius IV. At the end of A.D. 1154 Hadrian IV., once an English ploughboy, was elected to the Papal throne, the only Englishman who ever sat there, and he immediately put an end to the violence and disorder by an interdict, the first of which the Romans had experience. The Arnoldists at once lost all that they had gained, and Arnold himself fled before the energy of the Englishman. Not long afterwards he was captured by the troops of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, who sent him to Rome, where he was hanged as a traitor, and the movement of the Arnoldists came to an end.

Arnulf, St. [A.D. 580—640], [Fr. Arnoul], a French noble who was Bishop of Metz from A.D. 610 to A.D. 620. He was married in 609 to a noble lady named Doda, and by her had two sons, Clodulf or St. Cloud, and Ansigisil, the elder of whom became Bishop of Metz, and the younger the ancestor of the Emperor Charlemagne. St. Arnulf is thus regarded as the founder of the Carolingian race of kings, and it is a remarkable fact in relation to the rule of celibacy enforced upon the clergy of later days, that the greatest princes of Europe, those of France, Germany, and England, were all descended from a married Bishop who was canonised by the Court of Rome. His wife is said to have spent her later years in a convent, having retired thither soon after the birth of her second son.

St. Arnulf resigned his See in 620; he spent the last twenty years of his life in extreme retirement, engaged in the charitable work of ministering to lepers. He died at Horemberg, and was first buried in the monastery of Remiremont. A year later his remains were removed to Metz.

Arrhabonarii.—A controversial designation given by some theologians to those who believe that the Holy Eucharist is the pledge or earnest [Gr. arrhabōn] of a gift to be bestowed in heaven, and not a means by which grace is given on earth. [STANCARISTS.]

Arsenian Schism.—The name given to a breach of communion which occurred between the Churches of Alexandria and Constantinople in A.D. 1265, through the deposition of Arsenius, Patriarch of Constantinople, at the bidding of the Emperor Michael Palæologus, who was excommunicated by Arsenius for cruelly imprisoning and blinding the young John Lascaris, only ten years of age, who was the true heir to the throne. On the deposition of Arsenius and the appointment of Germanus of Adrianople as Patriarch of Constantinople, the Patriarch Nicolas of Alexandria declared that this was an act of schism, and refused to hold communication with Germanus. On the death of the Emperor a reconciliation took place between the two Churches; but new causes of difference arose, chiefly out of the proposals for union between the Roman and the Eastern Churches, and it was only when the general ruin of the latter by the Mahometans in the fourteenth century ensued that the Arsenian schism was permanently brought to an end.

Artemonites.—A sect of Anti-Trinitarians belonging to the early part of the third century, and named from its leader Artemon, who was a disciple of Theodotus of Byzantium. [THEODOTIANS.] Artemon maintained that the doctrine of Trinity in Unity was not the original doctrine of the Church. He asserted that our Lord was simply a naturally born man to whom some portion of the Divine Nature was communicated. Eusebius says that the Artemonites made much use of philosophy in support of this perversion of Christianity. "They presume," he says, "to alter the Holy Scriptures, to abandon the ancient rule of faith, and to form their opinions according to the subtle rules of logic. The science of the Church is neglected for the study of geometry, and they lose sight of heaven while they are measuring the earth. Euclid is perpetually in their hands. Aristotle and Theophrastus are the objects of their admiration, and they express an unusual reverence for the works of Galen." Early in the seventeenth century, John Crell, a German Unitarian divine [A.D. 1590—1633], who revived the opinions of the Artemonites, assumed the name of Artemon to distinguish himself from the Socinians.

Articles.—A term used in religious history to designate the separate parts of any system of doctrine or religion, which, although complete statements in their separate form, are yet articulated together like the joints of a finger or of a limb, or of the whole body. Thus each one of "The Articles of the Christian Faith" is complete in itself, as "I look for the resurrection of the dead," and is yet joined together with the others, as this particular one is with the articles declaring that Jesus "rose again according to the Scriptures," and "suffered and was buried."

Articles of Enquiry.—Formal papers of questions, some of them very important, which are sent to the Churchwardens of every parish by the Bishop of the Diocese, or the Archdeacon of the Archdeaconry in which the parish is situated, preparatory to its visitation, or professed visitation, by either of them [VISITATION].

Articles of Religion.—This name usually refers to the "Articles agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the Convocation holden at London in the year 1562, for the avoiding of diversities of opinions and for the establishing of Consent touching true religion." These Articles are now thirty-nine in number, and are thus colloquially known as "The Thirty-nine Articles." They contain statements on thirty-nine subjects respecting religion in its doctrine and practice in the Church of England, chiefly bearing on the controversies which its theologians had with Roman Catholics and Protestants in the sixteenth century.

[I.] THE TEN ARTICLES. The earliest document of the kind consisted of Ten Articles composed by the Clergy in Convocation, and ratified by the Crown [according to a provision made by the Act of Settlement], in the year 1536. They were entitled, "Articles about Religion set out by the Convocation and published by the king's authority," or "Articles devised by the King's Highness' Majesty, to establish Christian quietness and unity amongst us, and to avoid contentious opinions; which Articles be also approved by the consent and determination of the whole clergy of this realm, Anno MDXXXVI." These relate to the Creeds, Baptism, Confession, Absolution, and Penance, the Holy Communion, Justification, the use of Images, the honour due to Saints, the invocation of Saints, the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, and Purgatory.

The statements of the Ten Articles on these subjects were drawn up by, or under the influence of, Archbishop Cranmer, and represent the mediæval doctrine respecting them in the form in which it was held and taught in England, a less extreme form than that taught in the Roman and other Continental Churches. They were embodied, a year later, in a volume entitled "The Institution of a Christian Man."

[II.] THE FORTY-TWO ARTICLES. These, the original form of those now known as the Thirty-nine Articles, were originally drafted by Archbishop Cranmer, assisted, perhaps, by some of the learned divines who lived with him at Lambeth. The draft was placed in the hands of Convocation in January, 1552, and when it had been fully considered and revised was sent to the King in Council for promulgation as a Canon of the Church of England. The Articles were, however, referred back to Convocation that they might be put in better order, and have titles prefixed to each of them. Having been reconsidered, and having received the informal consent of the King in Council, they were finally passed and subscribed by the bishops and clergy in Convocation on March 2nd, 1553. A few weeks later they received the formal assent of the Crown and were published or promulgated as a Canon of the Church of England by the Crown in May, 1553, under the title of "Articles agreed on by the bishops and other learned men in the Synod at London," a synod formed of the two Convocations of Canterbury and York, "in the year of our Lord God MDLIII, for the avoiding of controversy in opinions and the establishment of a godly concord in certain matters of religion."

[III.] THE ELEVEN ARTICLES. The Forty-two Articles were legally suppressed, like the Prayer Book, during the reign of Queen Mary and King Philip, and it was four years after the death of the Queen before legal measures could be taken for their revival. Convocation not being called together until the first Parliament of Queen Elizabeth in the beginning of 1563. A provisional set of Articles, eleven in number, was therefore put forth by the bishops on their own authority, entitled, "A declaration of certain principal Articles of Religion set out . . . for the uniformity of doctrine, to be taught and holden of all parsons, vicars, and curates, as well in testification of their common consent in the said doctrine, to the stopping of the mouths of them that go about to slander the minister of the Church for diversity of judgment, as necessary for the instruction of their people . . ." These eleven Articles contained a declaration of Belief in the Holy Trinity, the Canonical Scriptures, and the Three Creeds. They also defined the Church and the nature of its authority in respect to change of ceremonies; declared that no man was to take upon him any ministry without being lawfully called to it; acknowledged the supremacy of the Queen and repudiated that of the Bishop of Rome; averred that the Prayer Book is Scriptural, Catholic, and Apostolic; suitable for the advancement of God's glory and for the edification of God's people; that the Office for Baptism is valid, though exorcism and some other ancient ceremonies are disused; that private masses without communion and offered as propitiatory sacrifices for the living and the dead, are "neither agreeable to Christ's ordinance nor grounded upon doctrine Apostolic;" that the Holy Communion ought to be administered in both kinds; and last that superstitions associated with the use of images are lawfully forbidden to be observed.

in the Church of England. The clergy were directed to read these eleven articles at their first entrance on their cures, and on Low Sunday and Michaelmas Day, immediately after the Gospel. It is probable that they were not fully accepted by the clergy, proceeding as they did only from the Bishops, and that they were dropped altogether when the Forty-two Articles were revised and revived.

[IV.] THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. The second, or the first working, Convocation of Queen Elizabeth met, as did her second Parliament, on January 12th, 1563, and at once began to consider the question of framing Articles of Religion which should represent the Theology and ecclesiastical system of the Reformed Church of England. They naturally took the Forty-two Articles of King Edward's reign as the basis of those now to be set forth, and these were laid before the bishops and the clergy assembled in Henry VII.'s Chapel, Westminster Abbey, on January 19th, 1563. The nature of the alterations desirable had doubtless been previously considered by the leading bishops and clergy, yet committees of the two Houses were engaged upon them for ten days before the Articles assumed their present form and were condensed into the familiar and historical thirty-nine. But the Bishops of the Province of Canterbury subscribed them on January 29th, and their clergy on February 6th and subsequent days. They were also subscribed on behalf of the Convocation of York by the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of Durham and Chester. Shortly afterwards their legal authority was completed by their "ratification," and they were promulgated in March or April, 1563. Doubts having been entertained whether the original Latin or the English translation was the version having legal force, both versions were reviewed by Convocation in 1571, and the English one had a new ratification affixed to it by the Queen, giving proper authority to it, as it had been given in 1563 to the Latin.

It was enacted in the same year, by "An Act for the Ministers of the Church to be of sound Religion," that every clergyman should subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles at his ordination and at his admission to any benefice, and also that he should read them publicly in church on the latter occasion. Both the subscription and the public reading are still strictly enforced by law, and many readers may remember to have heard a new rector or vicar read the whole of them from the pulpit on "reading himself in."

Articles, THE LAMBETH.—These were nine propositions which never became, or were intended to become, Articles of the Church of England, but which were framed under the sanction of Archbishop Whitgift at Lambeth Palace, and so acquired a fictitious importance much magnified by the Calvinist party. They arose out of a controversy going on at Cambridge during the greater part of Queen Elizabeth's reign between the ultra-Calvinists and those men of more moderate opinions who represented to some extent the followers of Arminius [ARMINIANS]. The Calvinists had acquired such power in the University that they had obtained authority from the Archbishop to search all private studies for books and papers supporting opinions contrary to their own; and upon this a reaction ensued which led to an appeal being made to Whitgift on both sides. Representative divines of each party were sent up to Lambeth, where they were met by the Archbishop, and Fletcher, Bishop of London, in whose presence a conference was held. After a few days nine formal statements of Calvinistic doctrine were offered by Whitaker, the Margaret Professor of Divinity, and these are what were called "The Lambeth Articles." They are here given in an English form:—

I. God has, from eternity, predestined some persons unto life, and some persons He has reprobated unto death.

II. The moving or efficient cause of predestination to life is not the prevision of faith, or perseverance, or good works, or of anything which exists in the persons predestinated, but the sole will of God's good pleasure.

III. The number of the predestinate is pre-determined and certain, which number it is not possible either to increase or diminish.

IV. They who are not predestined to salvation will, by necessity, be damned on account of their sins.

V. True, living, and justifying faith, and the sanctifying Spirit of God, is not quenched, is not extirpated, does not vanish away in the elect, either finally or completely.

VI. A truly faithful man, that is, one endued with justifying faith, is certain, by the full assurance (plerophoria) of faith, concerning the remission of his sins and his eternal salvation through Christ.

VII. Saving grace, by which they may be saved if they will, is not imparted, nor communicated, nor granted unto all men universally.

VIII. No man is able to come to Christ, unless it be given him, and unless the Father has drawn him. And all men are not drawn by the Father that they may come to the Son.

IX. It is not placed within the will or power of every man to be saved.

These nine propositions were brought before the University of Cambridge, but were not accepted, and fell to the ground except as a party document. In 1604 an endeavour was made by the Puritan party at the Hampton Court Conference to obtain their incorporation with the Thirty-nine Articles, but the attempt completely failed. They were revived in Ireland in the year 1615, and for about twenty years formed part of the Irish Articles of Religion; but in 1635 the Irish Church adopted the English Thirty-nine Articles, and the Lambeth Articles ceased to have any authority. The custom of speaking and writing of them as if they were Articles of the Church of England has been very misleading, because entirely without historical foundation.

Articles, THE SIX.—Six statements of doctrine which formed part of "an Act" [31 Hen. VIII. ch. 14] "for abolishing of diversity of opinions in certain Articles concerning Christian religion," passed in the year 1539, under the personal influence of Henry the Eighth.

The "Six Articles" grew out of an attempt to establish a formal union between the Church of England and the German Lutherans. A conference was held in 1535 at Wittenberg between Fox, Bishop of Hereford, Heath, Archdeacon of Stafford, and Dr. Barnes, on the one side; with Luther, Melancthon, and several other German divines, on the other. The negotiations ended in nothing at the time, but when political circumstances led the thoughts and wishes of Henry VIII. in the same direction again, they were revived in England, the Lutherans being represented by Francis Burckhardt, vice-chancellor to the Elector of Saxony, George à Bayneberg, a nobleman of Hesse, and Frederic Myconius, a Franciscan friar who had become a follower of Luther. The Church of England was represented by Archbishop Cranmer, two other bishops, and four doctors, the king himself occasionally taking part in the discussions. The conference continued from June until September, 1538, and was revived in the following year. The two sides agreed substantially so long as they confined themselves to the consideration of the Creeds; but when the Sacraments came to be discussed the attempts at reconciliation utterly broke down, having produced such a reactionary effect upon the king's mind that the royal theologian sketched out, more or less in their ultimately adopted form, Six Articles on the Holy Eucharist, Vows of Celibacy, and Confession, which differed scarcely at all from the tenets of the Mediæval Church. These Six Articles were ultimately enacted in the following words:—

"First, That in the most blessed Sacrament of the altar, by the strength and efficacy of Christ's mighty word (it being spoken by the priest), is present really, under the form of bread and wine, the natural Body and Blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ conceived of the Virgin Mary; and that after the Consecration there remaineth no substance of bread or wine, nor any other substance, but the substance of Christ, God and Man.

"Secondly, That the communion in both kinds is not necessary: ad salutem, by the law of God, to all persons; and that it is to be believed, and not doubted of, but that in the flesh, under form of bread, is the very Blood, and with the Blood, under form of wine, is the very Flesh, as well apart as though they were both together.

"Thirdly, That priests, after the order of priesthood received, as before, may not marry by the law of God.

"Fourthly, That vows of chastity or widowhood by man or woman made to God advisedly, ought to be observed by the law of God, and that it exempteth them from other liberties of Christian people, which, without that, they might enjoy.

"Fifthly, That this is meet and necessary, that private masses be continued and admitted in the king's English church and congregation, as whereby good Christian people, ordering themselves accordingly, do receive both godly and goodly consolations and benefits; and it is agreeable also to God's law.

"Sixthly, That auricular confession is expedient, and necessary to be retained and continued, used, and frequented in the Church of God."

The "Act of the Six Articles" then enacted, after giving great thanks to his Majesty for his godly pains and travail, that offenders against the First Article should be burned as heretics, and forfeit their goods, as in cases of high treason; while offenders against the other five should suffer and forfeit as in cases of felony. The cruel character of this enactment acquired for the Act the witty and telling name of "the whip with six strings." It was repealed at the accession of Edward VI. in 1547, and was never revived. During the eight years that it was in force twenty-eight persons were executed on account of their religion, but, strangely enough, it appears that very few, if any, suffered under this statute; and as Cranmer, who opposed it vigorously at first in the House of Lords, subsequently withdrew his opposition, it is probable that some communication was made to him from the king which implied that it was only passed in terrorem. It certainly had the effect intended if this was really the case, for as long as it disgraced the statute book it was feared throughout the land.

Articulus mortis.—The "Article of Death," the time and act of dying. The solemn season of the last hour has always been regarded with special charity in Christian theology. Though the popular idea that the act of dying is in itself a kind of expiation for sin is an obvious error, yet it is certain that the Church has been accustomed to use great tenderness towards persons in articulo mortis, especially in the case of sudden accidents or violence, as in battle, where the dying person may be prevented from giving proof of penitence by reformation of life or by restitution. What the ministrations of religion can give under such circumstances is given with less reserve than would be used in times of health and vigour, especially Abolition and the Holy Communion. So also before a battle, in imminent danger by sea, and in other cases where there is no reasonable expectation of escape from death, those who are in peril are regarded in a similar light to those who are actually dying, and the minister of the Gospel is bound to remember His attribute of infinite mercy as tempering His attribute of justice.

Artotyrites.—A fanatical sect of Phrygian Montanists of the third century, who not only used bread [Gr. artos], but also cheese [Gr. tyros], in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. Their justification of this strange custom was that men ought to offer not only the fruit of the ground, such as bread, but also the fruit of the flock, of which they regarded cheese as a typical form.

A. S., i. e., ANNO SALUTIS, "In the year of Salvation." A variation of the form Anno Domini.

Asaph, Sr.—A disciple of St. Kentigern, who accompanied him on his missionary expeditions, and whom he is said to have consecrated as his successor in the see which he founded at Llanelwy when he himself returned to Scotland. The see appears as that of St. Asaph in mediæval times, and it is said that a Bishop of St. Asaph attended a great British council in the year 943, but nothing is known of the person whose name was thus strikingly handed down by tradition. In ancient calendars the name of St. Asaph is commemorated on May 1st.

Asaph, BISHOPRIC OF SR.—This diocese consists of the counties of Flint, Denbigh, and Montgomery, with parts of Merioneth, Carnarvon, and Salop, and adjoins the English dioceses of Chester, Lichfield, and Hereford. Its population by the census of 1881 amounted to 268,901, and the clergy are about 280 in number. The ecclesiastical divisions of the diocese are the archdeaconries of St. Asaph and Montgomery. Its revenue is £4,200.

The bishopric is said to have been founded by St. Kentigern in the beginning of the seventh century. Kentigern was Bishop of Strathclyde, a diocese which extended as far south as the Mersey, and was, like Wales, inhabited by the Cymric Celts. When visiting the southern portion of this great tract of country, St. Kentigern crossed the Mersey into North Wales, and travelled as far south as Menavia, the monastery of which St. David was the head. On his return, Kentigern halted at Llanelwy, in the territory of Cadwallon, who gave him land on which to build a monastery in imitation of St. David's. Eventually he returned to Glasgow, and left one of his disciples behind, called Asaph, from whom the see was afterwards named. Such is the Welsh tradition, but authentic history says nothing of the diocese of St. Asaph until some five centuries later, when Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, consecrated Gilbert to the see in A.D. 1143. From this time there is a regular succession of sixty-four bishops on record. It is not unlikely that there were missionary bishops at an earlier date than this, but there was no regular succession nor any definite diocese until the twelfth century.

The following is a list of the sixty-four Bishops of St. Asaph, from the first of those on record till the present time:—

	Accession.		Accession.
Gilbert	1143	Thomas Goldwell	1555
Geoffrey Arthur	1152	Richard Davies	1560
Richard	1154	Thomas Davis	1561
Geoffrey	1160	William Hughes	1573
Adam	1175	William Morgan	1601
John	1188	Richard Parry	1604
Reiner	1196	John Hamner	1624
Abraham	1225	John Owen	1629
Hugh	1235	George Griffith	1680
Howel ap Ednevet	1240	Henry Glanham	1667
Anian	1249	Isaac Barrow	1670
John	1267	William Lloyd	1680
Anian Schonaw	1268	Edward Jones	1692
Leoline Bromfield	1283	George Hooper	1703
David ap Blethyn	1315	William Beveridge	1704
John Trevor	1352	William Fleetwood	1708
Leoline ap Madoc	1357	John Wynne	1715
Wm. Spridlington	1376	Francis Hare	1757
Lawrence Child	1382	Thomas Tanner	1753
Alexander Bache	1390	Isaac Maddox	1736
John Trevor	1395	Samuel Lisle	1744
Robert Lancaster	1411	R. H. Drummond	1748
John Lowe	1433	Richard Newcome	1761
Reginald Peacock	1444	Jonathan Shipley	1769
Thomas Knight	1451	Samuel Hallifax	1769
Richard Redman	1471	Lewis Bagot	1790
Michael Deacon	1496	Samuel Horsley	1802
David ap Yorwerth	1500	William Cleaver	1806
David ap Owen	1504	John Luxmoore	1815
Edmund Birkhead	1513	William Carey	1830
Henry Standish	1518	T. Fowler Short	1846
Robert Wharton	1536	Joshua Hughes	1870

The existing cathedral of St. Asaph dates from the end of the twelfth century, but it occupies the site of a much earlier church, which was burned down in 1282. It is the smallest cathedral in Great Britain, being only 182 feet in length by sixty-eight feet in width, as the little village of St. Asaph is the smallest city. The present nave and transepts were built by Bishops Anian, Leoline, and David [A.D. 1284—1352]. In 1402 much of it was consumed by fire in the wars of Owen Glendower, and the choir was not rebuilt until the time of Bishop Redman [1471—1495]. In the last century the side windows were walled up, and a plaster ceiling inserted below the timber roof, the roof of the nave itself being lowered beneath the clerestory early in the present. The choir has been properly restored recently.

The cathedral establishment consists of the dean, four residential canons, nine honorary canons, a succentor, and four vicars choral.

Ascension, FESTIVAL OF THE, otherwise called HOLY THURSDAY.—One of the principal days observed in commemoration of our Lord's acts. As He was born on Christmas Day, suffered death on Good Friday, and rose again from the dead on Easter Day, so He ascended up with glory to heaven on the fortieth day afterward, which is called Ascension Day. There is evidence that it was observed in very early times, for St. Chrysostom preached a homily on the day which has come down to us, as also has another by St. Gregory of Nyssa. St. Augustine speaks of it as a day with which Christians had long been familiar, saying, as a modern preacher might, "We celebrate this day the solemnity of the Ascension." St. Augustine also calls it one of the days which were supposed to be instituted by the Apostles; but St. Proclus, Patriarch of Constantinople in the same age, strikes more deeply to the reason of its observance when he says that it is one of the days which the Lord hath made, considering that as the Lord consecrated Easter Day as a day to be remembered for ever by His Resurrection, so He made Ascension Day also to be consecrated for ever by His Ascension and Exaltation. Then He crowned the work of His sufferings and ministrations by opening the doors of heaven and lifting up the gates of everlasting life, as the King of eternal glory. The fact of our Lord's Ascension from the earth is narrated in Mark xvi. 19, Luke xxiv. 51, and Acts i. 9.

Asceticism.—A term [askēsis] borrowed from the Greeks, among whom it signified exercise and self-restraint for the purpose of gaining strength and skill in athletic sports. Among Christians it came to signify abstinence from food, from wine, from marriage, and from many other things that are lawful in themselves, for the sake of living a strict, and in extreme cases a very austere, Christian life. The first large class or order of ascetics [Gr. Askētai] among Christians were the hermits of the desert [ANCHORET], whose ideas of self-discipline embraced the abnegation of nearly all the good gifts of God, the rupture of all natural ties which His Providence had made for them, and the desertion of all social duties which He had imposed upon them. In some cases they practised absurd gymnastic feats, such as those of the PILLAR-SAINTS, under the perverted idea that they promoted personal holiness; and in others tortured themselves with mortifications almost suicidal, as the devotees of India do at the present day. The monastic communities inherited the ascetic principles of the hermits, but dropped most of their fanatical excesses. Under the rule ordained by lawgivers like St. Benedict, the discipline of rigorous abstinence was not carried so far as to interfere with the bodily powers necessary to exercise labour in the field or the workshop, or the writing cloister or the library.

Asceticism in its more extreme forms can hardly be said to enter the practice of Christians who live outside monastic communities; and in modern times such ideas of self-discipline by means of bodily mortification have been superseded to a large extent by the idea of duty done in the world, and in the work of life to which Divine Providence has called us.

Ascites.—A fanatic sect of Montanists, who appeared in Galatia about the year 173. They were so called from the Greek word askos, a wine-skin, and seem to be the same sect as the Ascodrogitæ, Ascodrugitæ, Ascodruti, and Ascodrupitæ. They rejected all forms and ordinances, maintaining that grace could not be communicated by material things. They asserted that they were filled with the Paraclete imagined by Montanus, and hence wore the vessels or skins of new wine [Matt. ix. 17]. Their distinctive worship was that of dancing round an inflated wine-skin richly vested, and placed upon an altar.

Asclepiodotians.—The followers of a disciple of Theodotus the currier [THEODOTIANS], whose name was Asclepiodotus, and who taught that Christ was man alone. They and their leader were excommunicated about A.D. 224.

Ascophites.—A sect of ARCHONTICS, who arose in the last quarter of the second century. They broke the sacred vessels of churches in hatred of the Holy Eucharist. They rejected the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and denied the necessity of good works, believing that the knowledge of God is the only thing necessary to salvation.

Ashes, Benediction of. [ASH WEDNESDAY.]

Ashes, Ceremonial use of.—Ashes, by which the ashes of burnt wood must be understood, have been regarded as a symbol of penitence from the time of Job, who, in the beginning of his afflictions, "sat down among the ashes," and at the end of them said, "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" [Job. ii. 8, xlii. 6]. Many instances of their national and individual use in times of sorrow or penitence are to be found in the Old Testament; and our Lord alluded to the custom when He said, "Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works which were done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes" [Matt. xi. 21]. The early Christians naturally adopted a ceremony which had acquired so much significance, and Tertullian speaks of the "substitution of sackcloth and ashes for a man's usual habit and regimen" as a regular ceremony of public confession and penance in the second century

It was, in fact, the custom for penitents under excommunication to sprinkle ashes on their heads, and stand at the door of the church, to beseech the prayers of those who were entering that they might be readmitted to Communion by absolution. The special ceremony of the First day of Lent which has survived to modern times is described in the next article. [ASH WEDNESDAY.] For the use of ashes in the consecration of a church, see ALPHABET, CEREMONIAL USE OF.

Ash Wednesday.—The First Day of Lent, so called because of the ceremonial use of ashes on that day. The title of the First Day of Lent in the ancient service-books was "Caput Jejunii," the "Head of the Fast;" but it is only since the seventh century that there has been a fixed and uniform rule as to the day from which the forty days of the fast should be reckoned [LENT], and thus Ash Wednesday is not a special holy-day of primitive institution; and the great fast before Easter in the Eastern Church still begins on the Monday of its first week, and not on the Wednesday.

The principal distinction between the First Day of Lent and other days of the fast, and that from which its popular name is derived, is to be found in the ceremonial use of ashes with a solemn penitential service. The ashes are made by burning the palm leaves which had been blessed on the Palm Sunday of the preceding year. They are then placed upon the altar, and a benedictional is said over them. The officiate places a small portion of the ashes upon his head, making the sign of the cross with them, and saying, "Remember, O man, that thou art dust, and unto dust shalt thou return." The same ceremony is then performed upon the assistant clergy, and afterwards upon the laymen and laywomen, kneeling at the altar. Upon this day all the seven Penitential Psalms are used in the Church of England and throughout the Western Church.

Asinarii.—A term of reproach given to the early Christians, under the impression that they worshipped an ass [Lat. asinus], or a crucified man with an ass's head. Inscriptions, or "graffiti," of very early date have been found in Italy, in which such a crucified figure is found with a Christian worshipping in front of it, and such words as "Alexamenos worships his god." These are of very rude workmanship, and appear to have been executed with the point of a dagger or sword by rough soldiers who were watching a Christian awaiting martyrdom.

Aspergillum.—In the Roman Catholic Church, the brush used for sprinkling Holy Water. It was at first of hyssop; in the Sacramentary of Gregory, the bishop at the consecration of a church is directed to sprinkle the altar seven times with hyssop. The French name Goupil (Lat. Vulpicula) may possibly indicate that a fox's brush was sometimes used, but it may also be a mere colloquialism like "Turk's Head Broom."

Aspersarium.—The stone basin for HOLY WATER. It was formerly built up as part of a door-jamb or of a pillar at or near to the principal entrance of every church. Its common English name was "the holy water stoup," but it was also known by its Italian name, "benatura." In the account rolls of All Souls' College, Oxford, in A.D. 1548, there is a charge "for stones for the aspersarium in the entrance of the church."

Aspersio.—This term is used to designate (1) the sprinkling [Lat. aspersio] with which baptism is usually administered; and (2) the sprinkling with which holy water is used. [HOLY WATER.]

Assemani, (1) JOSEPH SIMON [A.D. 1687—1768].—A very learned Syrian Maronite, Titular Archbishop of Tyre, and Librarian of the Vatican Library. He was sent by Pope Clement XI. on a literary mission to Egypt and Syria in 1715, and brought back many valuable MSS. on his return to Rome. He wrote much and learnedly on the history of the Eastern Churches and sects, the chief of his voluminous works being one in four folio volumes containing biographical accounts of the writers of the Syrian Church, the Jacobites, and the Nestorians; another was a collection of the works of St. Ephraem Syrus, the chief of the Syrian Fathers, in six folios; another a Calendar of the Universal Church, in six quarto volumes, which contains the names and symbols of the saints of the East and West, with the dates of their festivals.

Assemani, (2) STEPHEN EVODIUS [A.D. 1707—1782].—A nephew of the preceding, Archbishop of Apamea, who succeeded his uncle as Librarian of the Vatican. He also was a great Oriental scholar. Among his works are two folio volumes of the lives of Eastern and Western martyrs.

Assemani, (3) JOSEPH ALOYSIUS [A.D. 1710—1782].—A brother of the preceding, professor of the Syro-Chaldaic language in the College of Sapienza, at Rome. Like his uncle and brother, he devoted himself to Ecclesiastical literature, publishing Codex Liturgicus Ecclesie Unicee, in which liturgical customs are illustrated by missals, pontificals, and other service books connected with Sacraments and Sacramental rites. He also edited the Alexandrine Liturgy attributed to St. Mark.

Assembly, General. [SCOTLAND, PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF.]

which was summoned by the Long Parliament for the purpose of forming a Presbyterian Establishment in England and Wales, in the place of the Episcopal Establishment which was then being abolished. The Assembly met in Westminster Abbey on July 1, 1643, and sat until the autumn of 1647. It was never formally dissolved, but finally disappeared on the dispersion of the Long Parliament by Cromwell, in the year 1653. It was intended to consist of 121 Episcopal and Presbyterian divines and 30 lay assessors, but most of the Episcopal clergy refused to attend because the Assembly was forbidden by a royal proclamation, and the few who did respond to the summons fell off after the first meeting, so that the permanent portion of it consisted entirely of Presbyterians, though a few subsequently avowed themselves as "Independents." The poet Milton, who was Cromwell's Latin secretary, gives a singularly severe and discrediting account of these divines. He says that for the purpose of reforming religion "a certain number of divines were called, neither chosen by any rule or custom ecclesiastical, nor eminent for their piety or knowledge above others left out, only as each Member of Parliament in his private judgment thought fit so elected one by one. The most part were such as had preached and cried down with great show of zeal the avarice and pluralities of bishops and prelates, that one cure of souls was full employment for one spiritual pastor, how able soever, if not a charge above human strength. Yet these conscientious men—ere any part of the work was done for which they came together, and that on the public salary—wanted not boldness, to the ignominy and scandal of their parson-like profession, and especially of their boasted reformation, to seize into their hands, or not unwillingly to accept (besides one, sometimes two or more of the best livings), collegiate masterships in the Universities, rich lectures in the City, setting sail to all winds that might blow gain into their own covetous bosoms." [MILTON'S Prose Works, i., 130.] Izaak Walton confirms this statement in his Life of Bishop Sanderson, saying that "as the visitors" of the Long Parliament at Oxford "expelled the orthodox," the Presbyterian divines, "these thriving sinners," as he called them, "without scruple or shame possessed themselves of their colleges, so that, with the rest, Dr. Sanderson was, in June, 1648, forced to pack up and be gone."

As soon as the Westminster Assembly of Divines was constituted, it applied for assistance to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, their letter accompanying the request which the Long Parliament made to the Scottish Government for armed assistance against the king. The reply, brought from the General Assembly by four commissioners, Henderson, Rutherford, Baillie, and Gillespie, was a proposal that the English nation should adopt "a solemn League and Covenant," which pledged the nation to the abolition of Episcopacy, and the establishment of Presbyterianism in its place. [COVENANT.] This was adopted by the Assembly and the House of Commons on September 25, 1643, the members of both bodies meeting in St. Margaret's Church, close to Westminster Abbey, in the chapter-house of which the House of Commons held its sittings. The second work accomplished by the Assembly of Divines was the preparation of a "Directory for Public Worship," to supersede the Book of Common Prayer. This was, as its name signified, a book directing ministers as to the mode in which their extempore prayers were to be made, not a book of prayers. It passed both Houses of Parliament in an "Ordinance"—the absence of the king's assent excluding the title "Act of Parliament"—on January 6, 1643, which Ordinance enacted "that the Book of Common Prayer be abolished, and the Directory for the Public Worship of God be established and observed in all the churches within this kingdom." [DIRECTORY.]

The Westminster Assembly also accomplished three other important works for carrying out the establishment of Presbyterianism in England. First, they formulated a scheme for organising—with so much minuteness and rigidity that it became practically unworkable—a system of Presbyterian Discipline for every parish; secondly, they also set forth a Confession of Faith, of a similar character to those in use by non-Episcopal bodies on the Continent [WESTMINSTER CONFSSION]; and thirdly, a longer and shorter Catechism. These survive in the Presbyterian Establishment of Scotland, and, as the "Westminster Standards," are recognised by English-speaking Presbyterians throughout the world.

Assembly's Catechism, THE. [CATECHISM.]

Asser [died about A.D. 910].—A monk of St. David's, who was invited into England by King Alfred, and became a very intimate friend of that learned and pious king. He became Abbot of Amesbury, near Salisbury, and then Bishop of Sherborne. Several works are attributed to him, but that of most interest is a Life of Alfred the Great, which throws much light on the history of the Church of England in the ninth century.

Assistant Bishop, distinguished from a Suffragan by having no title. The Diocesan Calendars for the year 1885 name Assistant Bishops in the Dioceses of Lichfield and Peterborough. In the American Episcopal Church Assistant Bishops are consecrated with right of succession (Canon 6, 1832, of the General Convention), in case of a bishop being disabled by sickness or infirmity. But there is no such right belonging to English Assistant Bishops, who are in fact Colonial Bishops who have retired from their sees.

Associate Synod. [BURGHES.]

Assumption, FESTIVAL OF THE.—The term "Assumption" was a not uncommon one among primitive Christians for the "taking up" [Lat. assumere] of a holy person into a state of bliss, the day of death being thus called the day of such a person's assumption. Thus an apocryphal work of very early Christian times bears the title of the "Assumption of Moses." But its more distinctive application in recent times has been to the supposed taking up of the body of the Virgin Mary into heaven, like the bodies of those saints which arose after our Lord's Resurrection, and appeared to many in Jerusalem [Matt. xxvii. 52].

There is not any good historical foundation for the observance of this festival in its modern form, no trustworthy account of the Virgin's death being known. Its origin seems to rest on a tradition as late as the seventh century, embodied by Nicephorus in his Ecclesiastical History [ii. 21, 22]. This states that all the Apostles except St. Thomas were miraculously brought together from all parts of the world to witness the death of the Virgin. Three days afterwards St. Thomas arrived; but when the grave was opened, that he might look once more on the face of our Lord's mother, nothing was found but her grave-clothes. The absence of St. Thomas and the empty tomb are incidents in the tradition which seem obviously to have been suggested by those connected with the Gospel account of our Lord's Resurrection.

The festival now called the Assumption was originally, and for many ages, designated the "Dormitio," or "Falling Asleep of the Blessed Virgin Mary," a title which is far from including the idea of the resurrection of her body, and may, indeed, be said to exclude it, the resurrection of a person being always associated with the idea of an awaking.

The original day of the festival was January 18th, but it was changed to August 15th in the time of Gregory the Great, about the end of the sixth century. The latter day is still designated the Falling Asleep of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the Eastern Church, but in Roman calendars it has long been called her Assumption.

Assurance.—The tenet that persons who are truly converted have, or may have, a certain conviction that their sins are pardoned.

Assuritans.—One of the many small sects of Donatists which arose about A.D. 358, and were condemned by the Council of Vaga, in Numidia [A.D. 394], at which three hundred and ten Donatist bishops were present.

Astathians.—A very obscure sect, which arose in Phrygia in the early part of the ninth century, under the leadership of a man named Gorgius. The name in Greek, and also in its Latin form, "Instabiles," signifies "the Unstables;" but the principles of the sect are unknown.

Asterisk.—The Eastern term for a cross-shaped support which is placed over the consecrated bread of the Eucharist, to prevent it from being touched by the linen veil with which it is covered.

Astrologers.—Those who believe that the stars influence the destinies of mankind. In the early ages of the Church they were called "Mathematici," whom Philaster, the heresiologist of the fourth century, declares to be the "vain assertors of all error and wickedness."

Asylum. [SANCTUARY.]

Athanasius, St. [A.D. 296—373].—One of the greatest of the Fathers, upon whom it devolved to defend the doctrine of our Lord's Godhead against the Arians. He was Patriarch of Alexandria for nearly half a century [A.D. 326—373], but was four times driven into exile, and went through much suffering at the hands of the Arian party.

In early life Athanasius was brought under the notice of Alexander, the Patriarch of Alexandria, whom he eventually succeeded; and the first introduction of the youth to his venerable predecessor is associated with a story which Dean Stanley agreed with earlier historians in believing to be true. Sitting at the window of a house which overlooked the beach, the patriarch saw some boys "playing at church," and observed that the particular part of Divine Service which they imitated was the administration of baptism. By direction of the bishop, the boys were brought before him, in the presence of the clergy attending upon him, and he found on examining them that one of them, named Athanasius, had assumed the position of bishop among his playfellows, and had christened some of them who had not yet received baptism. After consulting with his clergy, the patriarch determined that the baptism had been administered with water and the proper words, and was thus valid, so that the children would not need to be baptised again. [BAPTISM.] He thought it expedient, however, that Athanasius and the boys who had specially assisted him should be given up by their parents to be brought up as clergymen; and before long Athanasius was taken under the bishop's own care, becoming eventually his secretary, and living with him, St. Cyril says, as an adopted son.

About the year 318 Athanasius was ordained deacon by his master and friend and father in God, and was at once, or soon afterwards, made head of the deacons, the archdeacon of those days having more of a collegiate position than a territorial dignitary, and being also deacon, or personal minister, to the bishop in Divine Service and on other public occasions. [ARCHDEACON.] It was as deacon to the bishop, and scarcely, as is sometimes said, as Archdeacon of Alexandria, that Athanasius attended the most important Council of Nicea, in A.D. 325; and it was at the Council that his growing reputation as a theologian acquired such dimensions as to make him known for ever throughout the world as the great defender of the doctrine that Jesus was and is God Incarnate.

At Easter in the following year, nine months after the conclusion of the Nicene Council, the Bishop and Patriarch of Alexandria died, calling for Athanasius in his last hour to nominate him as his successor, and when he was told that the young deacon could not be found saying, "You think to escape, but it cannot be." Perhaps he foresaw something of the work which his secretary and friend would have to do, and something also of the suffering which he would have to undergo; and perhaps there was a tone of censure in his words, for it is certain that when Athanasius himself was riper in Christian experience, he disapproved of his own conduct in endeavouring to evade the responsibilities which were about to be laid upon him. Subsequent events proved that, notwithstanding Arian misrepresentations, the foresight of the dying bishop as to the best man to become his successor was also the opinion of the majority of the clergy and the whole of the lay people of Alexandria. The struggle of the Arians to obtain an Arian bishop protracted the election for several days and nights, but the laity were all the time loudly calling for a decision in favour of the young deacon, and eventually the obstructive minority was obliged to give way. Athanasius was duly elected to that see—a great position, which practically included that of archbishop and patriarch—on June 8th, 326, two months after the death of Alexander. It was not, however, until December that he was consecrated.

For a few years the new patriarch administered the affairs of his church free from any distracting cares and dissensions; but then began forty years of such trouble and suffering that, in the words of Hooker, "the Arians never suffered Athanasius, till the last hour of his life in this world, to enjoy the comfort of a peaceable day." Twenty years out of the forty were in part spent in exile.

This period of his troubles began with the Emperor Constantine's change of mind in respect to the Arians, from an alteration either in his opinions or in his policy. Immediately after the Nicene Council, Constantine had made it penal to refuse subscription to its decisions, but when, in A.D. 328, his good mother, St. Helena, died, he was brought under the influence of Eusebius, the Arian Bishop of Nicomedia (carefully to be distinguished from Eusebius the historian, Bishop of Caesarea), through his sister Constantia, and from that time he became friendly to the Arians. His first act in their favour was to recall Arius from exile in A.D. 330. He then permitted Eusebius to write from the court to Athanasius, requiring him to admit the man who had been declared heretical by the Council of Nicea to the communion of the Church. Athanasius replied that it could not be right to admit persons to communion who had invented a heresy contrary to the faith of the Church, and condemned by a great general council of the bishops of the Church, who had been gathered from all parts of the world. The Emperor himself then wrote to Athanasius, commanding him to admit to communion all who desired to rejoin the Church. The Bishop, however, refused compliance, and Constantine gave way. His enemies then laid formal charges against him which amounted to treason, but these were refuted easily, and his accusers were censured by the Emperor. Next they charged him with murder, and it was in vain that he established his innocence. Fresh accusations were brought against him, and the old ones brushed up again, and among others, one that he had talked of injuring Constantine's newly-built city of Constantinople by hindering its supply of corn from Alexandria. This last accusation was brought to light suddenly, while Athanasius was defending himself against other charges before the Emperor in Constantinople itself. Constantine was enraged; he had lately beheaded the philosopher Sopater on the mere suspicion of his having done the same thing, and without listening to protestations of innocence, he banished Athanasius to Treves, an Imperial city, in which Constantine, the eldest son of the Emperor, was then residing as the Viceroy of France, Spain, and Britain. Here he remained an exile, though treated with honour, for two years and a half [A.D. 336—338].

Constantine II. and his two brothers, Constantius and Constans, divided the Empire of their father among them, and Alexandria, being in the Empire of the East, fell under the government of Constantius, whose sympathies were on the side of the Arians. Yet all three Emperors agreed that Athanasius should be restored to his see, and he returned to Alexandria amidst the glad acclamations of his flock in November, 338. But the hostility of his opponents never grew weary. A scheme was now set on foot for superseding the Patriarch by the consecration of a successor, and although the first attempt failed, the second was successful; so that in the midst of riot, sacrilege and massacre, an Arian of Cappadocia, named Gregory, was sent from the Court of Constantius to be received as the Bishop of Alexandria. The scenes of violence and cruelty were now such that, with the hope of restoring peace and order, Athanasius first concealed himself outside the city, and then sailed for Rome in the spring of A.D. 340. There Julius, the Bishop of Rome, summoned a Provincial Council, which acquitted the persecuted Patriarch of the charges brought against him; and two years afterwards the Emperors Constans and Constantius called a General Council to meet at Sardica, where 380 bishops, of whom seventy-six were Arians, met together in A.D. 343. The Arian bishops would not sit as a minority, and they arranged themselves as a Second Council at Philippopolis. But the remaining three hundred bishops, among whom were three from Britain, carried on the inquiry, and completely exculpated Athanasius, writing letters to the bishops and laity within his jurisdiction as Patriarch, in which they exhorted all "to contend earnestly for the sound faith, and for the innocence of Athanasius." Once more the exiled Patriarch was allowed to return to Alexandria, which he did about the time that his supplanter Gregory died, A.D. 345, and the reception which he met with showed that his popularity was not at all diminished.

Soon, however, the Arian party regained their ascendancy by the accession of Constantius to the whole Empire, on the murder of his only remaining brother, Constans. The condemnation of Athanasius was obtained by court favour and court threats in the Councils of Arles [A.D. 353] and Milan [A.D. 355]; his orthodox defenders were sent into exile, and he himself was driven into the wilderness of the Thebaid, where he remained among the hermits for eight or nine years [A.D. 354—362], being superseded by the Arian bishop, George of Cappadocia.

When he had escaped from Alexandria, it was the intention of Athanasius to go and appeal personally to Constantius, but the persecution spread throughout the West, a price was set upon his head, and close search was made for him. He therefore changed his mind, and retired to the Thebaid, where he was greatly beloved by the monks who had gathered there under the rule of St. Antony, his own great friend, who had recently died. [ASTONY.]

The accession of the infidel Emperor Julian, a nephew of Constantine the Great, was almost immediately followed by the murder of George, the Cappadocian bishop, who had all this while been sitting in the seat of Athanasius. To show his contempt for Christianity by minimising the controversies which divided Arians and the Orthodox, Julian permitted all exiled bishops to return to their sees, and among them Athanasius, who resumed his throne, to the great joy of Alexandrian Christians, on February 22nd, 362. All the time of his absence he had been actively engaged, by correspondence and by messengers, with the ecclesiastical affairs of his Patriarchate, but important matters had to be undertaken on his return, and the transaction of these brought upon him the resentment of the Pagan part of the population and of the Emperor, who, declaring that he had never intended him to resume "what is called the Episcopal throne," ordered him to leave Alexandria at once. Again he took up his home among the monks of Lower Egypt, where he remained until the death of Julian, which occurred on June 26th, 363. He then returned privately to Alexandria, but immediately after his arrival he received a letter from the new Emperor, Jovian, desiring him to resume his duties as Patriarch.

For a short time after the death of Jovian the troubles of Athanasius returned, Valens, his successor in the East, ordering, in A.D. 365, that all bishops expelled from their sees by his Arian predecessor Constantius, and recalled by Julian, should once more be banished. There was some sort of promise to the people of Alexandria that Athanasius should be excepted from this decree, but he was warned that his life was in danger, and leaving the city, he concealed himself for four months in his father's tomb outside the city walls. At the end of that time an Imperial order was sent for his recall, and his retreat having been discovered he was carried back to the city by a great multitude, not again to be driven from it.

St. Athanasius died at the great age of seventy-seven, after an episcopate of nearly forty-seven years, on May 2nd, 373, the day on which he is commemorated in the Calendars of the Church. Notwithstanding his laborious work as the bishop of an important see and the Archbishop and Patriarch of many other bishops, he left behind him a voluminous collection of letters and treatises, which fill four folio volumes. Much of his literary work was doubtless done during the periods of his exile, especially when living in the cenobite establishments of St. Antony, in the Thebaid. While he lived he was the great breakwater by which the flood of Arianism was withstood, and after his death his works formed one of those strong literary bulwarks by which the faith delivered in the Nicene Creed has been maintained against a long series of assaults.

Athanasian Creed.—A statement of the Catholic belief respecting the several Persons of the Holy Trinity, which acquired the name of "Athanasian," as embodying the doctrine which he taught, and for which he laboured and suffered. [CREEDS.]

Atheists.—Those who profess to believe that there is no God, the words atheism and atheist being taken from a Greek word which is formed from the word Theos, "God," made negative by the prefix a.

Athenagoras.—A Christian Apologist of the second century. Little is known of his life, but he appears to have been an Alexandrian philosopher, and it is said that his first intention was to write against Christianity. But in studying the Scriptures with this hostile purpose he became convinced of their Divine origin, and thus "became a preacher of the faith which once he destroyed." He wrote two works, the Apology, and a Treatise on the Resurrection. They will be found in Clark's "Ante-Nicene Fathers."

Athinganians, or Attingians.—A sect of PAULICIANS (q.v.), which arose in Asia Minor in the latter half of the seventh century. Their distinctive principle, apart from those of the body from which they broke off, was that of using the formula "I am the Water of Life" for the administration of baptism, and "Eat and drink" for that of the Eucharist, instead of the forms in general use in the Church.

Athocians.—Heretics of the thirteenth century, who denied the immortality of the soul.

Atonement.—A making "at one" those who were alienated. The ancient pronunciation of the word "one" is represented by the modern pronunciation of this combination, and it is also found in the words "alone" and "only;" but its actual meaning is best shown by accepting the pronunciation indicated by writers of the Reformation period, namely, at-one-ment, where "one" is pronounced as "won," and not as "own." It only appears once in the Authorised Version of the New Testament [Rom. v. 11], and there it represents the Greek word katallagē, the sense of which is "reconciliation." In the Revised Version this word appears in place of it. The English word was used in the sense of reconciliation until recent times, when it has been commonly used as if it meant "satisfaction for sin." Its true and proper sense is that of the reconciliation of fallen man to God by the work of Christ, whom writers of the Reformation period occasionally called "The At-one-Maker." This sense is well illustrated by the words of Udal in commenting on Eph. ii. 14: "And like as He made the Jews and the Gentiles at one between themselves, even so He made them both at one with God; that there should be nothing to break the atonement, but that the things in heaven and the things in earth should be joined together, as it were, into one body." So also Tyndale wrote: "Paul saith, 1 Tim. ii., One God, One Mediator (that is to say, Advocate, Intercessor, or an At-one-Maker) between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus, which gave Himself a Ransom for all men." [RECONCILIATION, WORK OF CHRIST.]

Atrium.—The entrance-court of a church, the name having been previously used as that of the same division of a Roman mansion. In a large church it would be a portico or colonnade in front, having either an obelisk, or a fountain for ablution in its centre. The

Atterbury, FRANCIS [A.D. 1662—1732].—A Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster during the reign of Queen Anne. He was born at Milton-Keynes, in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church. After gaining some literary distinction at Oxford, he became a distinguished preacher in London, and established so high a reputation that he was made Lord High Almoner to William III. In the year 1713 he became bishop and dean, and was on the point of rising to the Archbishopric of Canterbury when the queen died, and George I. stopped his promotion. Atterbury's sympathies were with the exiled Stuart family, and in 1722 he was imprisoned in the Tower on the charge of being in correspondence with them. On April 9th, 1723, a Bill of Attainder was introduced into the House of Lords; and although he defended himself eloquently and efficiently, the same political weapon which had sent Laud to the block sent Atterbury into exile for the last nine years of his life. During those years he lived at Brussels and Paris. He died in the latter city on February 15th, 1732, and his body was judged worthy of burial in Westminster Abbey.

Attingians. [ATHINGANIANS.]

Attributes of God.—The special characteristic qualities which belong to Him alone, such as Omnipotence and Omniscience, Infinite Wisdom, Goodness, and Truth.

Attrition.—A term used by Roman casuists to express that sorrow for sin which arises through fear of its penalties, or through the shame of exposure. In its better form it becomes REMORSE, and leads on towards CONTRITION, or true repentance.

A. U. C.—The initial letters of the Latin words, "Ab Urbe Condita," that is, of the era which was used by the Romans, who dated their years "from the Foundation of the City." There was some variation in this date, but the year from which the Roman Emperors reckoned was B.C. 753. This era was superseded by the Christian Era in Italy in the 6th century, but not in Europe generally till many years later. It and the Greek Era of the Olympiads are of the greatest importance to Christian chronology.

Audæans.—The followers of Audæus, or Audin, a Syrian of Mesopotamia, who formed a sect in the early part of the fourth century. He seems to have been a man of ascetic mind, who preached with some extravagance against what he considered the luxurious living of the bishops and clergy, and who separated from the Church when his preaching brought down upon him the resentment of those whom he had attacked. The sect became an Episcopal one, for a bishop having joined it, Audæus was himself consecrated, his consecration being valid, though irregular, because contrary to the rule of the Church which requires at least three bishops for consecration. Many bishops eventually joined the sect of Audæus, being induced to do so by the ascetic life which was adopted. Yet it dwindled away under persecution, and did not live beyond the fifth century. The Audæans became ANTHROPOMORPHITES in respect to doctrine, and also adopted the custom of QUARTODECIMANS (q.v.) as regarded the time for the observance of Easter.

Audians. [AUDÆANS.]

Audientes.—A name, "the Hearers," given in the Primitive Church to the several classes of catechumens and penitents who were permitted to hear Divine Service up to the end of the sermon, but not to be present during the actual celebration of the Eucharist. In the orderly arrangement of the congregation adopted in the Primitive Church, the place for the Audientes was the Narthex, or ANTICHOPEL (q.v.). When the sermon was ended, the deacon dismissed them with the words, "Let none of the Hearers nor of the unbelievers be present."

Auditores. [AUDIENTES.]

Andoenus, St.—known in France as St. Ouen [595—683], Bishop of Rouen for forty-four years. He served the Church not only by his labours on behalf of religious houses, but by opposing both Simonism and the Monothelite heresy, which had obtained much hold in his country. He is commemorated on the 24th of August. The beautiful church at Rouen which bears his name was built over his burial-place in the 14th century.

Audry, St.—A popular form of the name of St. ETHELDREDA, chiefly interesting because, from its use in the case of "Saint Audrey's Fair," the word "tawdry" originated. [ETHELDREDA.]

Augmentations, COURT OF.—This was a court which was established at the disolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII., for the purpose of receiving and managing the funds belonging to them.

Augsburg, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

Augustine, St. (1) [A.D. 354—430].—This renowned Father of the Church was born on Nov. 13th, 354, at Tagaste, in Numidia. He was Bishop of Hippo for thirty-five years, and as one of the four great teachers of the Church, became known as "the Doctor of Grace." [DOCTOR.] His father, Patricius, whom he calls "a poor freeman of Tagaste," did not profess Christianity at the time of Augustine's birth, but was afterwards converted and baptised. His mother, Monnica, was certainly a Christian at the period of his birth, and had probably been baptised in her infancy. He appears to have been the only child of his mother, and, as was natural, there was the most tender affection between them all their lives. Unfortunately for Augustine, his mother did not bring him to baptism in his early days, dreading that he would fall into sin after being baptised. "My cleansing was deferred," he says, in his confession, "because the defilements of sin would, after that washing, bring greater and more perilous guilt." Until he was thirty-three years of age, and during his youth, his mother's good influence was too weak to prevent him from falling into a self-willed course of very vicious living, especially while he was receiving his higher education at Carthage, which he called Babylon. For nine years also, from the age of nineteen to that of twenty-eight, he combined with this reckless vice the heresy of MANICHÆISM (q.v.). About thirty, he abandoned both the heresy and the habitual vice, and took up with the philosophy of the NEO-PLATONISTS (q.v.), and although there was little of Christianity in their opinions, he was brought under better influences, and especially was led to the study of Holy Scripture.

Augustine had long been a lecturer in the schools of Carthage, and about this time he returned to Tagaste, his native place, to engage in the teaching of rhetoric there. He soon, however, returned to Carthage, and from thence removed to Rome, still following the same profession, in A.D. 383. Disappointed of success at Rome, he went to Milan, where he was joined by his mother, and where a new life opened itself out before him; for at Milan he came in contact with Ambrose, the great and popular bishop of that city, under the influence of whose preaching and example Augustine was converted to Christianity. He was baptised by St. Ambrose, together with his dearly-beloved natural son, ADERODATUS, on April 25th, 387, Augustine being then thirty-three years of age, and his son fifteen.

The earlier years of his Christian life were spent by St. Augustine in retirement and study. Soon after his baptism he set out, with his mother and his son, to return to Africa. Monnica died on the way, at Ostia, and in his grief Augustine went to Rome, where he remained for more than a year, spending his time in writing and speaking against his former associates, the Manichees. After this, he returned with Adeodatus to Tugaste, where he established a small monastic community, consisting of friends who, like himself, aspired after a stricter life of personal holiness and good works than seemed possible when living in the ordinary freedom of society. Thus three years passed away in study and writing and in prayer, acts of self-discipline, and charitable works among the poor; and during that time another great sorrow came upon St. Augustine in the early death of his pious son, Adeodatus.

In A.D. 390, when he was more than thirty-five years of age, his clerical life began. He went on a visit to a friend, who was an official of the Empire at Hippo Regius, a small seacoast town, the ruins of which still exist in the east of Algeria, and immediately opposite the southern end of Sardinia. There he became acquainted with Valerius, the Bishop of Hippo, who at once ordained him to the priesthood. This epoch of his life we have narrated in his own words in a sermon which he preached at Hippo many years afterwards on "The Life and Conversation of the Clergy," and in which, with his customary outspokenness respecting himself, he thus records the circumstances of his ordination:—"I, whom by the grace of God ye thus see as your bishop, came as a young man to this city, as many of you know. I was looking for a place where to form a monastery to live with my brethren. For all worldly hopes I had abandoned, and what I might have been I would not be; nor yet sought I to be what I am. 'I chose rather to be cast down in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of the ungodly.' I separated me from those who love the world, nor yet did I set myself with those who are placed over the people. Nor in the Feast of my Lord did I 'choose the higher place,' but the lower and abject one, and it pleased Him to say to me, 'Go up higher.' But so exceedingly did I dread the Episcopate, that because my reputation had now begun to be of some account among the servants of God, I would not go to any place where I knew there was no bishop. For I was afraid of this, and did what I could, that in a low place I might be saved, lest in a high one I should be perilled. But, as I said, the servant must not oppose his Master. I came to this city to see a friend whom I thought I might gain to God, that he might live with us in the monastery; I came as being safe, the place having a bishop already. I was laid hold of, made a presbyter, and by this step came to the Episcopacy."

It is probable, especially from the eagerness with which Bishop Valerius enlisted the services of St. Augustine, that even as a priest only he occupied an important position in the Church of Hippo. Perhaps in an office similar to that of dean he became arch-presbyter, or the chief of the priests, at Hippo, as St. Athanasius had been chief of the deacons, or archdeacon, at Alexandria. But after three or four years, the voice "Go up higher" was heard, and he was consecrated coadjutor to the bishop, the death of Valerius a few months later opening the way for him to become his successor as actual Bishop of Hippo. His "Confessions," a kind of spiritual autobiography, are a rich mine of material for his personal history during the time of his life as a layman, and his "Retractions" are a review of his literary work nearly to the time of his death; but there is little recorded of his life and work simply as bishop of his diocese. He lived in a somewhat ascetic manner, surrounded by a number of his clergy, who, like himself, preferred the common life of a monastic society to any other mode of living. He gave up much time to the education of those who were candidates for the ministry. Every day he was accessible in a court which he held for the personal administration of Christian equity. He was also indefatigable in preaching and the ordinary duties of the episcopal office. But beyond this, there is little detailed record of St. Augustine's life as a bishop. There is however, a touching passage in one of his later sermons, in which, after occupying his high office for more than thirty years, he appeals to his people in a manner that he would scarcely have done unless he had been speaking heart to heart, and appealing to those from whom he was sure of a loving response. "I have not presumption enough," he says, "to imagine that I have never given any of you subject of complaint against me during the time I have exercised the function of the Episcopacy. If then, overwhelmed at times with the cares and duties of my office, have not granted audience to you when you asked it, or if I have received you with an air of coldness or abstraction; if I have ever spoken to any one with severity; if, by any thing whatever in my answers, I have wounded the feelings of the afflicted who implored my succour; if, occupied with other thoughts, I have neglected or deferred assisting the poor, or shown, by any displeasure in my countenance, that I deemed them to importunate in their solicitations; lastly, if I have betrayed too much acuteness of feeling with respect to the false suspicions that soon have entertained against me; and if, through the weakness of human nature, I have conceived unjust opinions of others: in return pardon me, O my people, to whom I confide all my faults—pardon me for them, I conjure you, and so also shall you obtain the pardon of your sins."

But St. Augustine was much more than Bishop of Hippo. In his time the great schism of the Donatists was rending into factions the Christianity of North Africa, setting up altar against altar, church against church [DONATISTS]. In his efforts to defend the unity of the Church he was so successful that whereas at the beginning of his Episcopate the schismatics were split up into innumerable parties, united in nothing but opposition to the Church, and having as many as four hundred bishops in Africa; at its close a large number of Donatist bishops had passed over to the Church at the head of their flocks, and the schism had almost disappeared. With equal vigour and equal success St. Augustine combated the errors of PELAGIANISM (q.v.), which, however, did not at any time form the basis of an organised sect. The chief of these errors was the denial of original sin, and the assertion that man can of his own will work out his salvation without the assistance of God's grace. Against Pelagianism St. Augustine preached and wrote for twenty years of his life; and while he contributed largely to its extinction at that time, his works remained for all subsequent ages as an efficient antidote to its subtle revivals.

It was in the midst of St. Augustine's Episcopate that the Roman Empire began to fall finally to pieces. Rome was taken and sacked by the Goths under Alaric, in A.D. 410, when Christians grew sad and desponding, as if the end of the world were near, while pagans attacked their faith as if Christianity were the cause of all the disasters that had occurred since the world had come under its influence. It was at this crisis that St. Augustine brought forward his learned and beautiful work on "The City of God," in which he undertook to defend the workings of God's providence, to show the solidity of the "city which hath foundations," and the instability of paganism. But as the great Father's life drew towards its close it was overclouded by the ruin which drew near to his own diocese. Genserich, the King of the Vandals, advanced from Spain into North Africa, by the treachery of Count Boniface, and by alliance with the Moors succeeded in devastating the Roman province. Boniface repented of his treachery, and endeavoured to rid the province of the wild foe whom he had brought into it, but he was defeated time after time, and was at last shut up in the city of Hippo, which was closely besieged. The aged bishop foresaw what the result would be, and though he supported his people with encouragement and consolation, he yet prayed that he might be spared the sight of their destruction. His prayer was heard, and he passed away on August 28th, 430, in the third month of the siege. In the following year the city was taken, but the Vandals respected the body of the saint, and also his library. The body was taken to St. Stephen's, in Sardinia, when Augustine's successor fled thither from persecution in A.D. 506. It was afterwards removed thence to Pavia, about A.D. 713. There it was discovered in A.D. 1695, and was at last returned to the city of his rule on October 23rd, 1842. He is commemorated in the calendars of the Church on August 28th, the day of his death, and no ecclesiastical writer ever won greater veneration by his works.

These works fill twelve folio volumes, and form a most rich treasure of scriptural exposition as well as of theological argument. Many of them have been translated into English, and among those so translated which are not controversial may be mentioned his Commentaries on the Psalms, and Homilies on St. John, "The City of God," a large number of his letters, many of his sermons, a series of "Practical Treatises," and his "Confessions."

Augustine, Sr. (2) [d. A.D. 605]. The first Archbishop of Canterbury. Nothing is known of this great missionary before the year 596, when he must have been a man somewhat advanced in years, since he then comes before us as the Prior of the Benedictine Monastery of St. Andrew, at Rome, where he appears to have succeeded Gregory the Great when that great man became Pope in A.D. 590.

While the latter was a deacon in the church and a brother in the Monastery of St. Andrew, which he had built on the site of his own house on the Coelian Mount, news reached him that a fresh cargo of slaves had been imported and was on view in the marketplace. He had already exerted himself mightily to check this great evil, which at that time disgraced all civilised Europe. It was mainly carried on by Jews. On arriving in the market he was attracted by the beauty of three flaxen-haired youths among the captives. Turning to the person in charge of them, he asked where they came from, and was told from Britain; and inquiring further if they were Christians, was told by the merchant that they were pagans. After an exclamation of regret Gregory asked what was the name of the nation to which these youths belonged, and was told they were called Angles. He caught at the word, and exclaimed, "Angles? Angels, rather, for angel-like they are. But to what province do they belong?" "Deira," was the reply, that being the southern portion of what we now call the "North country"—Durham, Cumberland, Westmoreland, with part of Lancashire and Yorkshire. "Ay, and from God's ire (de ira Dei) they shall be rescued and brought over to the grace of Christ. And what is their king's name?" "It is Ælla." "Fittingly so called, for Alleluia" (written in the abbreviated form of "Alla" in the old service books) "must be chanted in his dominions."

He went at once to the Pope and besought to be allowed to lead a missionary company to England. He received permission, and had already set out on his journey when the great popularity which he had gained at Rome caused the people to demand and enforce his return; and some years later he became Bishop of Rome.

He showed then that he had not forgotten the English children, for in the year 596, Augustine was sent by him to Britain, with forty companions, much as Archdeacon Mackenzie was, not many years since, sent forth on a martyr-like mission from Canterbury to Central Africa; the leader of the mission being, in each case, intended for the future bishop.

After some troubles by the way, which necessitated a return to Rome for further advice and authority, St. Augustine and his company set foot on English ground some time in the spring of the year 597. It was on the Isle of Thanet that they first landed; and before proceeding further, they sent messengers to Ethelbert, King of Kent (afterwards king of nearly all England), to acquaint him with their arrival. King Ethelbert's queen, Bertha, daughter of Charibert, King of Paris, was a Christian, though Ethelbert was not; and on her marriage she had made it a condition that she should be allowed to have a private chapel, and to bring over from France her chaplain, who was a bishop named Luidhard, and to whom Ethelbert granted the old Romano-British Church of St. Martin, outside the walls of Canterbury. The king had probably some knowledge, therefore, of Christianity, though he was yet unbaptised, and he was ready to receive the missionaries with courteous hospitality. He first met them under an oak in a field near their landing-place. About fifty years ago the old stem of a solitary oak, alleged to be St. Augustine's tree, was removed. In 1884 a handsome cross was erected by Lord Granville to mark the spot. Here Augustine preached his message, and the King, still refusing to commit himself, gave the missionaries leave to reside at Canterbury, which was his capital city. Here they settled down, and it was not long before Ethelbert embraced the faith, and was baptised by St. Augustine on Whitsunday, June 2nd, 597, in St. Martin's Church.

A few weeks later, Augustine returned to France to receive consecration to the see of Canterbury at the hands of Vergilius, the Archbishop of Arles, and other French prelates; and returned within six or seven months of his first arrival in the country, as the first Archbishop of Canterbury.

Before his death he consecrated Mellitus (one of a new company of missionaries from Rome) as Bishop of London and Justus as Bishop of Rochester.

Before long Augustine came to know that there was a Church in the western part of the island, under a Bishop, or perhaps Archbishop, of Caerleon, and six or seven other bishops. With these he sought an interview, in which he claimed to exercise supremacy over them all. They refused to acknowledge it, and asserted at once that while they looked with respect on the Bishop of Rome as an elder brother, they could never admit that he had any right to assume such powers over them as Augustine is represented to have been assumed. Angry differences arose on this and other points, in which Augustine endeavoured to make them yield to the authority of Rome; and a bitterness sprang up between the native bishops and those who came from a foreign land, which was not eradicated for centuries. Augustine probably had strong feelings as to the purity of the doctrine and liturgical usages of the Church from which he had sprung, and at the same time exaggerated ideas as to the errors of the native Church; and thus he was led into a stiff line of conduct which alienated from him those with whom he ought to have been united. He had established a Church in Kent, in as strict accordance as circumstances would admit of with that Roman pattern which he loved and respected, and was now anxious that the native Church, which was 500 years older, should be altered in many particulars in which the lawful authorities of the ancient Church saw no need of change. It seems very strange that St. Augustine should have made so little attempt at conciliation under these circumstances; and no wonder that his conduct has often been thought to foreshadow, even that early period, the arrogance and extravagant pretensions which afterwards characterised the Popes in dealing with England.

Quaint Bishop Godwin writes rather severely of this conduct: "We deny not that he was sent to preach Christ and His religion; but it is manifest he preached also himself like a curst cow throwing down with his head much of the good milke that before she had given."

When the Archbishop of Canterbury found that the bishops of the ancient Church of the country refused to co-operate with him on any other terms than those of a brotherly equality, he returned to Canterbury, where he spent the short remaining portion of his life. He was not able to carry out the great missionary scheme of St. Gregory by establishing twelve bishoprics in the north of England under an Archbishop of York, and twelve in the south of England under an Archbishop of Canterbury, but he laid some sort of foundation for that great undertaking by separating off the western portion of the kingdom of Kent and making a separate diocese at Rochester, as well as by consecrating ting Mellitus as Bishop of London. Nowhere else in the north or south did St. Augustine succeed in organising the Church which he had come to establish.

As he saw his end approaching St. Augustine consecrated a successor—a singularly high-handed proceeding—in the person of his friend and companion Laurence. He died in the year 605, and his body rested temporarily in a cemetery which he had consecrated outside the walls of Canterbury. Eight years afterwards it was removed to the Abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul, which he had founded, which was afterwards known by his name, and on the site of which now stands the important Missionary College of St. Augustine. His memory has always been venerated in the Church of England, and in the mediæval calendars he was called “the Apostle of the English.” He is commemorated on May 26th, the day being probably chosen as being the day of his death. No special symbol was ever associated with his name, but he is sometimes represented in the act of baptising King Ethelbert, and sometimes simply as an archbishop.

Augustinian Canons, commonly called “Austin Canons.”—These were an order of clerical monks who observed the “Rule” attributed to St. Augustine of Hippo. They were not known under this name until the eleventh century, but an order of clergy called Canons had existed previously, and these appear to have been re-formed and named Augustinian Canons by Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, at the period indicated. In their earlier history they were probably “secular Canons,” that is, Canons like those of existing cathedrals and collegiate churches, who lived “in the world,” and were at liberty to marry; but in their later history they became “Regular Canons,” living together under one roof like monks, having a common dormitory and refectory, and bound by the Rule of their order. They were introduced into England at Colchester about A.D. 1105, in the reign of Henry I., and they quickly increased in number, having large houses at Oseney, on the east side of Oxford, at Bristol, Cirencester, Carlisle, Hexham, Walsingham, Newstead, and Bolton. There were, in fact, nearly two hundred houses of Canons Regular in England and Wales. Their dress was a long black cassock, with a white rochet over it, and over that a black cloak and hood. But the hood was not used, black caps or birettas being worn. They were not shorn like the monks.

Augustinian Friars, commonly called “Austin Friars.” [FRIARS.]

Augustinians.—A name assumed by the Janesists [JANSENISM] to emphasise their profession of holding and teaching the doctrine of St. Augustine of Hippo on the subject of Divine grace.

Aumbry.—A small apartment near the altar, and mostly made in the north wall of the chancel, in which the vessels connected with the altar are kept.

Auricular Confession.—That form of confession which is made, not silently and in privacy, nor publicly in the face of the congregation, but into the “ear” of a minister. [CONFESSION.]

Authentic.—The etymology of this word hardly bears out its popular theological use. It is derived from the Greek authentikos, “warranted,” used in opposition to adespotos, “without a master” or “owner,” i.e., anonymous. Yet Bishop Watson, in his Apology for the Bible, draws this distinction between “Genuine” and “Authentic”:—“A genuine book is that which was written by the person whose name it bears as the author of it. An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact as they really happened.” According to this definition Gulliver’s Travels, though not authentic, because not true, is genuine as being the work of Dean Swift. But the distinction is not satisfactory. For, to begin with, the etymology rather leads one to define authentic as meaning that the work is really written by the person to whom it is attributed. And, moreover, there is little scope for such a distinction with regard to the books of the Bible. No one who recognises the inspiration of the Epistle to the Hebrews would call in question its genuineness as part of Scripture, though many doubt it being the work of St. Paul. As Jerome writes, the doubt has never been de auctoritate, sed de auctore. “Its authority is not questioned, but its authorship.” Some of the Psalms are not David’s, but we do not say they are not genuine (which would be equivalent to calling them spurious), because they do not profess to be David’s. The cxxxviii Psalm is as genuine a part of Scripture as any other part, though it was written ages after the days of David. On the other hand the genuineness of the 2nd Epistle of St. Peter has been questioned by some critics. If that genuineness could be disproved, its authority, or what Bishop Watson defines as its authenticity would go with it, because by calling itself Peter’s, it would be lending itself to a fraud. It would be better, therefore, if the writers on Christian evidence would revise Bishop Watson’s definition, and would apply this word authentic to express that the work is really written by the author from whom it professes to come.

Authorised Version. [BIBLE.]

Antissiodorensæ Concilium.—A reference often found in Church histories, the city being that of Auxerre, in which councils were held in A.D. 578 and A.D. 841.

Autocephali.—[1] Metropolitans who were "their own heads," that is, who had no ecclesiastical superiors. Such Archbishops or Bishops who have metropolitan authority over other Bishops thus claim to be free from Patriarchal jurisdiction, and subject only to the authority of a General Council. This claim was made by Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, during his trial before the Pope's delegates, and has been maintained by all his successors. [2] Bishops who claim to be exempt from the authority of their Metropolitans, and only subject to that of their Patriarch.

Auto da Fé.—A so-called "Act of Faith," formerly observed annually in Spain, and consisting of a public ceremonial invested with much ecclesiastical pomp, at which the Inquisition handed over its condemned heretics to the civil power to be executed according to law, generally by fire. The spectacle was as popular among the Spaniards as bull-fighting. The first of these singularly un-Christian "acts of faith" took place at Seville, in the year 1481, and they were only abolished in the year 1813. According to Llorente, the historian of the Inquisition, as many as 341,000 victims suffered in the three centuries during which they were allowed.

Avoidance. [BENEFICE.]

Avrillon, JOHN BAPTIST ELIAS [A.D. 1652—1729].—A great Franciscan preacher and devotional writer, some of whose pious reflections and meditations are in use among English people.

Ayliffe, JOHN.—A Fellow of New College, Oxford, who was expelled and degraded in the beginning of the last century for the publication of a work on "The Ancient and Present State of the University of Oxford." He also wrote, in 1726, a digest of Church laws, under the title "Parergon Juris Canonici Anglicani."

Aylmer, JOHN [A.D. 1521—1594].—Bishop of London for eighteen years during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. During the reign of Edward VI. he was tutor to Lady Jane Grey, but was obliged to leave England on the accession of Queen Mary, and spent the years of her reign at Zurich. In 1562 he became Archdeacon of Lincoln, and in 1576 succeeded Sandys as Bishop of London.

Azyme.—A designation of the unleavened bread [Gr. Azymos] used for the Holy Eucharist. In the eleventh century the members of the Western Church were reproachfully called "Azymites" by some writers of the Eastern Church, none but fermented bread being used in the latter.

B.A.—Bachelor of Arts (Artium Baccalaureus), the first academical degree granted by universities, and of late years by other educational institutions called simply colleges. The Scotch Universities, however, have always granted the degree of Master of Arts at once. The derivation of Baccalaureus is quite uncertain; it has been said, though without much authority, to be from the laurel wreath and its berries, of old time granted as an outward and visible form and sign of merit. Others derive it from the French bas chevalier, a lower class of knight than those holding an independent position. The "Artes" are the liberal arts of a general education, distinguished, on the one hand, from trade knowledge, in which no degrees were granted (they are now granted by Dublin, Durham, and several Colonial, Indian, and American Universities in civil engineering, which may be placed under this head), and on the other from professional knowledge, which had, and has, its special degrees in the three faculties of divinity, law, and medicine. The principal change in the estimation of this degree is that now for all except university purposes it is considered as a practically complete degree, instead of preparatory to that of Master, to be taken, as it formerly was, after continued study and residence in the university.

Baanites.—One of the many sects of PAULICIANS (q.v.) which sprang up in Armenia about A.D. 710, under the leadership of Baanes, from whom they took their name.

Babylas, Str.—A Bishop of Antioch [A.D. 237—250], who was martyred in the Decian persecution, and in the story of whose life it is difficult to distinguish between historical truth and well-meant fiction. St. Babylas was famous in his lifetime for compelling the Emperor Philip, on a visit to Antioch, to take his place among the penitents, and undergo penance for the murder of Gordian, this being made a condition of his readmission to Communion. After his death, he was still more famous on account of the revived oracle of Apollo being, it was said, silenced by his relic during the reign of Julian the Apostate [A.D. 362]. The same night that the saint's relics were removed by order of Julian, the temple and statue of Apollo were destroyed by lightning. In the Eastern Church the festival is September 4th, in the West January 24th.

Baccanarists.—When the Jesuits were temporarily suppressed in 1773 [Jesuits], Baccanari of Trentino attempted to revive them under the title of the Clerks of the Faith of Jesus. When the Jesuits were reinstated, the Baccanarists were absorbed into them.

Bacchus and Gergius, SAINTS.—Two Roman officers who were martyred in the persecution begun by the Emperor Maximin. A church was dedicated in their names at Constantinople by the Emperor Justinian, and they are also commemorated by their names being taken as the title of one of the Roman cardinals. Their festival is marked as October 7th.

Bacon, ROGER [A.D. 1214—1292].—One of the most learned men of the Dark Ages: a most advanced theologian, mathematician, linguist, and natural philosopher, born at or near Ilchester. Studying at Oxford and Paris, he took from the latter university his degree of D.D., and returned to Oxford, where he joined the lately founded order of Franciscan friars, and began to give public lectures on, as it appears, natural philosophy. But, as with Galileo afterwards, his great learning, so far in advance of his time, got him many enemies; first, the authorities of the university forbade his lectures, and then the other friars of his house brought charges against him of practising unlawful arts, and caused him to be imprisoned. Such, at least, were the ostensible charges; but there is much reason to think that the real cause of the hatred felt against him was the freedom with which he had treated the lives of the clergy in his writings. This, as well as the wish to have the Bible translated into English, which he expressed in his correspondence with Pope Clement IV., gives him some claim to rank among the earliest reformers of religion. While he was in prison, Pope Clement IV. wrote to him asking for his works—so far had his renown spread; on receiving and reading them, the Pope interfered in his favour, and Bacon was released. As long as Clement was Pope, he was protected; but Clement died in 1271, and shortly the same charges were again brought against Bacon, with the same result of imprisonment. This time, however, the Pope could not be got to interfere, and Bacon lay in prison for ten years, till he was released at the request, as it is stated, of "some noblemen"—English peers, it is presumed. Being now in old age, he was allowed to finish his days in peace, and he died at Oxford in 1292, aged seventy-eight.

As has been stated, Bacon's learning was very great, and many things were known to him which, whether or not they can be said to have been afterwards lost and rediscovered, certainly did not take their rank till later. Gunpowder, for instance, there is no doubt, was familiar to him—he gives a recipe,

"Ad faciendum la crak," in plain English to make a cracker—though Berthold Schwartz, the Russian monk, till lately considered the discoverer, did not live till the next century. The principle of the telescope also was perceived by him; even of balloons and steam-travelling traces are to be found in his works. But advanced as he was, he was by no means free from some of the follies of his age; some of our learned men believe in the folly of spiritualism, and Bacon was an alchemist and searcher after the philosopher's stone, the elixir of life, and the imaginary aims which such men followed. And this has probably conduced to the way in which the charges originally got up by the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford and the General of the Franciscans have lasted to the present day: for every child who has read the Historie of Friar Bacon, from 1652 (the year of its first publication) downwards, if he does not actually believe in the story of the talking head of brass, certainly believes that Bacon was no better than he should have been. In old English plays he used to figure as magic personified, like Dr. Faustus in German ones; there is a play in Dodsley's collection bearing the name of "Friar Bacon."

His works are not yet all published: the chief one, the Opus Majus, edited by Dr. Jebb, 1733, is a philosophical work on the causes of ignorance, the nature of research, and the sources of knowledge, and in it are propounded many of the discoveries afterwards so well known; besides some of those already mentioned, the error in the calendar, rectified 300 years afterwards by Pope Gregory XIII., is shown and explained.

Besides the principal sources of reference in the Biographia Britannica and other dictionaries, it will not be at all beneath one who wishes to understand Bacon to refer to Sir Francis Palgrave's Merchant and Friar—a curious book, which does not deserve its present oblivion.

Bacularii.—A party of ANABAPTISTS, who were shocked at the wars and cruel excesses of that sect, and went into the opposite extreme of abjuring war altogether. They derived their name of "Staff-bearers" from the staves which they carried as the only weapon which they considered lawful.

Bagnolenses.—A mediæval sect of CATHARI (q.v.) of the thirteenth century, which derived its name from Bagnolo, or Baiolo, a town of Provence. They correspond in most respects with the ALBANENSES, and are thought by some historians to have been the original ALBIGENSES. They were known by various other names, such as Baiolenses, Concordenses, Concorrenses, Concoretii, and Concorenenses.

Bailey, LE.—The dedication names of churches sometimes have the words "le Bailey" added to them, as in the cases of St. Peter le Bailey, Oxford, St. Mary le Bailey, Durham, and St. Paul in the Bailey, Lincoln. It indicates that the church so named was situated within the bailey of a castle, that is, in the space or court between the keep and the outer wall.

Baius, or Bajus [A.D. 1513—1589].—The Latinised name of Michael de Bay, a theologian of Louvain, whose theories of predestination and grace became afterwards the foundation of JANSENISM (q.v.). He was a man of very great learning, and so enthusiastic a student of St. Augustine that he is said to have read through the whole of that great teacher's works nine times. At an early age, in 1549, he became head of the papal college at Louvain, and being sent by the King of Spain, in 1563, as one of the divines to sit at the Council of Trent, he greatly distinguished himself there. His Augustinian opinions brought upon Baius the opposition of the Jesuits and also of the Franciscans, and after their condemnation by the University of Paris, they were also condemned by the Pope, though without mentioning the name of Baius. The latter submitted, and was eventually appointed Dean of St. Peter's, in Louvain, Chancellor of the University, and Inquisitor-General in the Netherlands. His works had abiding influence, and his Augustinian views, as well as those on Papal infallibility, spread widely through the Netherlands and northern France.

Baker, Sir RICHARD [A.D. 1568—1645].—Chiefly now known as a writer of English history, but his writings as a minor theologian may entitle him to a place in this work. He was of a young branch of the Bakers of Sissinghurst, near Cranbrook, in Kent: grandson, by his second son John, of Sir John Baker; born at Sissinghurst about 1568; M.A., Hart Hall, Oxford [OXFORD, HERTFORD COLLEGE], and a barrister-at-law; knighted 1603; High Sheriff of Oxfordshire, 1620. He married Margaret, daughter of Sir George Mainwaring, of Ightfield, Shropshire, who bore him two sons and three daughters; but by guaranteeing this family's debts he lost his property, and was forced to literary work. His industry could not, however, keep this unfortunate sufferer for other men's follies from imprisonment, and he died in the Fleet, where some of his works had been written, Feb. 18, 1645. His chief work, the Chronicle of the Kings of England, first published in 1641, was continued and reprinted at intervals till 1733; the style rendered it a very popular book at that time—thus Addison describes it (Spectator, No. 269, January 8, 1712) as one of the books which lay in Sir Roger de Coverley's hall-window, and Scott makes it part of Baillie Jarvie's winter studies (Rob Roy, chap. xxvi.); but it has very many inaccuracies, though some were corrected in later editions, and in 1672 Thomas Blount published Animadversions on it; and though at the end of the last century Daines Barrington thought well of it, it is now considered of very little value. Baker's theological works are on the Lord's Prayer, and certain of the Psalms, single and in sets; they are called Meditations and Disquisitions, and were published from 1637 to 1640. But they have not been reprinted, and are now forgotten, though Fuller's opinion of the work on the Lord's Prayer was that it was "co-rival with the best comments which professed divines have written on that subject."

Baldacchino.—The Italian name for a canopy, or what used in England to be called a "Cloth of Estate"—such as was set over the sovereign's throne or the seats of dignitaries, such as bishops and judges and nobles, and their ladies, when keeping their state in their halls or at the head of their tables. It was also carried in procession over the person to be honoured, as also over the coffin at a state funeral; and in a similar manner it was reproduced in the form of a solid structure of marble over the tomb.

But the name baldacchino has been specially given to the canopy, generally supported by pillars, but sometimes suspended from above, placed over the altar in a Roman Catholic Church, not so much to protect it as to impart to it additional grace and dignity. It is generally square in form, covered with silk or other rich material, fringed at the margin. It is supposed to be copied from a structure erected by the early Christians over tombs and altars, and, from its resemblance to the bowl of a cup, called in Latin, Ciborium, and in Greek, Xibōrion. Baldacchinos were first introduced into the Western Church about 1130, and into England about 1279. They were not much used in the Pre-Reformation Church of England, in which it was the custom to use hangings behind the altar and curtains, or BANKERS, at the two ends. But it was an almost universal feature in the churches which were built or redecorated after Italian taste became the rule in English church architecture. Most frequently, the baldacchino of the Jacobean, Stuart, and Hanoverian periods took the form of a pediment, often arched, resting on coupled pillars which stood at each end of the altar, and the Sacred Name was very commonly written on the pediment in Hebrew characters of gold, within a triangle, and surrounded by golden rays. A canopy on twisted pillars stands over the altar at St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard Street, in the City of London. Efforts made in recent years to introduce the baldacchino into the Established Church were successfully resisted. A proposal to erect one in the Church of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, was opposed in the Consistory Court, and on the 15th December, 1873, Dr. Tristram gave a judgment condemning it. The largest and finest baldacchino known is that at St. Peter's at Rome, reaching an elevation, including the cross, of 126½ feet.

Baldric, a bell-rope, or, the link which joins the clapper to the bell. In old churchwardens' accounts the item is constantly found, "to a new baldric" or "bawdryk."

Bale, JOHN.—A reforming Irish bishop, a most ardent Protestant, under Henry VIII. and his successors. He was born, 1495, at Cove, now called South Cove, near Dunwich; his early education, from his twelfth year, was at the Carmelite monastery at Norwich, his later at Jesus College, Cambridge. He became a Doctor of Divinity and a Carmelite monk, but afterwards took the rectory of Thorndon, near Eye, and was induced by Thomas, Lord Wentworth, of Nettlestead, in Suffolk, to adopt Protestant opinions, probably about 1530. These his new opinions he earnestly preached, and charges of heresy were, of course, brought against him, on which he was imprisoned at Greenwich. From prison he wrote to Thomas Cromwell, Lord Privy Seal, asking for protection. The letter is in Ellis, 3 vol. 8 iii. 151, and though undated, is assigned to 1536 by its address, which is to "the most honorable Thomas Cromwell (not Lord Cromwell), Lord of the Preuye Seale." Cromwell received this appointment in 1536, and his peerage in the same year, immediately afterwards. John Leland also, the antiquary, wrote to Cromwell in his favour; this letter, too, Ellis gives. The protection which Bale asked for he received, and this brought him into some notice at court; but on the attainer and execution of Cromwell, 1540, he was obliged to flee into Holland, where he remained till the accession of Edward VI. About 1548 he was recalled by Edward VI., and shortly presented to the rectory of Bishopstoke. In 1562 he was made Bishop of Ossory; his letters patent were passed February 1st, 1563, and he was consecrated at Dublin by the Archbishop with the Bishops of Kildare and Down, March 25th. Bale was consecrated according to the reformed ordinal, positively refusing the old. On July 6th in the same year King Edward died, and Bale was at once obliged to flee before the persecution caused by his strenuous efforts at reform. After a good deal of trouble, he succeeded in making good his escape to Basle, where he lived during Queen Mary's reign. On the succession of Elizabeth, he came to England, and was included, December 6th, 1559, in the commission to consecrate Archbishop Parker. He did not, however, act, neither did he resume his diocese, although he is described in this commission as Bishop of Ossory, probably because he may have executed no formal resignation. He received instead (1560) a prebend of Canterbury, where he died, 1563, and was buried in the cathedral.

Bale was a learned man, and, as has been said, an ardent Protestant; but he allowed his fury for controversy to carry him to most unjustifiable lengths of coarseness and ribaldry. Cotton, in the Irish Fasti, apologises for what he very mildly terms Bale's "acrimony" on the score of his persecutions, but the excuse is quite insufficient. Ample proofs may be found in Maitland's Reformation Essays, p. 41, et seq., where extracts are given from Bale's criticism (1554) of Bishop Bonner's articles to his diocese of London. Almost all Bale's works after he professed Protestantism were written with a direct controversial view. Even the largest and most important, Scriptorum Illustrum Majoris Britannie Catalogus, 1557, distinctly informs us on its title that it is written with this particular view, "that the actions of the reprobate, as well as of the elect ministers of the Church, may historically and aptly correspond with the mysteries described in the Revelation." The other remarkable works of Bale are his plays, of which eleven are a series on the life of Christ, and others miscellaneous, but all aimed against Rome. Some were publicly acted during his short episcopate at Kilkenny, the cathedral town of the diocese of Ossory.

Balguy, JOHN [A.D. 1686—1748]. — A divine of some distinction in that BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY which stirred so many minds in the earlier half of the last century, and in which he took the side of Bishop Hoadly. It was more to his credit that he also attacked the principles of Lord Shaftesbury the Deist. Bishop Hoadly preferred him to a canonry in Salisbury Cathedral.

Balguy, THOMAS [A.D. 1716—1795], was the son of John Balguy. Although patronised by his father's friend, Bishop Hoadly, who made him successively Prebend of Winchester and Archdeacon of Salisbury and Winchester, he entirely dissented from that bishop's unorthodox opinions. It is told of him that on the death of Bishop Warburton he was intended for the see of Gloucester. The king's messenger clattered into the Close of Winchester in the middle of the night, to the great disturbance of the peaceful slumbers of other expectant or non-expectant prebendaries. But when the message was announced to Dr. Balguy, he simply aroused himself sufficiently to write a note to Lord North, the Prime Minister, declining the appointment, and then went to bed again to finish his night's rest.

Balliol College. [OXFORD UNIVERSITY.]

Balsamon, THEODORE [d. A.D. 1204].—A writer of the Greek Church, who was born at Constantinople, and became librarian in the Cathedral of St. Sophia. His works consisted of Commentaries on the Canon Law, and they are conspicuous for the opposition which they maintain to the claims of the Papacy.

Baluze, STEPHEN [A.D. 1630—1718].—A voluminous French writer on Ecclesiastical History and the Canon Law. He mixed himself up with political questions by publishing Lives of the Popes of Avignon and the History of the House of Auvergne, and thus brought upon himself the displeasure of Louis XIV., who banished him from France. But his disgrace at court led him to employ himself the more on his theological and historical studies; and he did excellent service to the Christian world by diligent and persevering search after MSS. of ancient writers, by collating them with printed editions, and by printing new editions with improved text and learned notes.

Bambino.—An Italian word, which means literally "a little boy." It is the special designation of a small figure of the Holy Child Jesus, which is publicly exhibited in Roman Catholic churches at Christmas-time. A similar figure, enclosed in a glazed box and gaudily dressed, is carried about by children in Yorkshire and Durham for the purpose of obtaining money, and goes by the popular name of the "Doll in a box," so little of reverence is associated in the popular mind with the exhibition.

Bampton Lectures.—The Rev. John Bampton, M.A., Trin. Coll., Oxon., Prebendary of Minor Pars Altaris, in Salisbury, from 1718 to his death [born 1689, died 1761], by his will bequeathed his "lands and estates" to the University of Oxford for ever, "to the endowment of eight Divinity lecture sermons." A lecturer, at least M.A. of Oxford or Cambridge, was to be chosen at Easter every year by the heads of houses, and was to preach the eight sermons the next year at St. Mary's, between the beginning of Lent and the end of the third week after Trinity. The sermons were to be "upon either of the following subjects:—

1. To confirm and establish the Christian faith, and to confute all heretics and schismatics.
2. Upon the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures.

3. Upon the authority of the writings of the Primitive Fathers as to the faith and practice of the Primitive Church.

4. Upon the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

5. Upon the Divinity of the Holy Ghost.

6. Upon the Articles of the Christian Faith as comprehended in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

The bequest, however, did not take effect till 1779, when the first lecturer was chosen, the first lecture being preached in 1780. A list of the names of the lecturers may be found in Allibone. Among the most valuable of the lectures are Landluce's (afterwards Archbishop of Cashel) on the so-called Calvinistic Articles of Religion, 1804; Burton's (afterwards Regius Professor of Divinity) on the heresies of the Apostolic Age, 1829; and later, Liddon's on our Lord's Divinity, 1866. A complete series, however, is both hard to get and not worth having when it is got. Allibone strangely says it is worth from £40 to £45, but if it was so when he wrote in America, it certainly is not so in England now.

Bancroft, RICHARD.—This prelate, Archbishop of Canterbury under James I., was the younger son of John Bancroft* and his wife Mary Curwen, niece of Hugh Curwen, Archbishop of Dublin. He was born at Farnham, Lancashire, 1544; B.A. Christ Church, Cambridge, 1566; M.A. Jesus College, 1570; B.D., 1580; D.D., 1585. He was chaplain to Richard Cox, Bishop of Ely, who in 1575, collated him to the Rectory of Teversham, Cambridgeshire. In 1584 he became Rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn; 1586, of Cottingham, Northamptonshire, which he was presented by Sir Christopher Hatton, Lord Chancellor, whose chaplain then was. In 1589 his promotion advanced to dignities; he was then made a Prebendary of St. Paul's; in 1592 of Westminster; 1594, Canon of Canterbury. He was also chaplain to Archbishop Whitgift, and on 8th May 1597, was consecrated Bishop of London, resigning his three stalls, all of which he held up to that time.

Bancroft was a staunch Anglican Churchman, and much opposed to the Puritan party to this he, no doubt, owed his promotion, since the famous sermon against them which thus brought him first into notice was preached at St. Paul's Cross, Feb. 9th, 1570, immediately before he received his prebend of St. Paul's. The text of the sermon was, "Beloved, believe not every spirit, try the spirits whether they are of God." The sermon itself has often been called the first published development of High Church principles (Kemble's Introduction to Hooker's E.P., i., lxxv.); and Kemble points out a curious parallel between Bancroft and Hooker (page 193) in their estimation of Puritanism.

* John Bancroft's eldest son, Christopher, father to John Bancroft, Bishop of Oxford from 1682 to his death, in 1641. It was he who first brought down Cuddesdon Palace; this building was destroyed in 1644 by the Royalists, that the Roundheads might not seize it, and rebuilt in 1679.

Bancroft.

"A very strange matter if it were true that Christ should erect a form of government for the ruling of His Church to continue from His departure out of the world until His coming again, and that the same should never be once thought of or put in practice for the space of 1,500 years."

Hooker.

"A very strange thing, sure it were, that such a discipline as ye speak of should be taught by Christ and His Apostles in the Word of God, and no Church ever have found it out or received it till this present time."

While Bishop of London, Bancroft took a principal part in the Hampton Court Conference, and disputed specially with Dr. Reynolds (himself afterwards Bishop of Norwich) on predestination. In 1604 Archbishop Whitgift died, and Bancroft, on Dec. 10th, was confirmed his successor; shortly after which (1605) he exhibited to the King and Privy Council "certain articles of abuses which are desired to be reformed in granting of prohibitions." These were written by the superior courts to the inferior, ecclesiastical ones among them, to stay their trying of causes supposed to be incompetent to them (Kerr's "Blackstone," p. 303); and the Archbishop's contention was that these were unduly granted: 488 prohibitions, he said, had been sent into the Court of Arches in the time of Elizabeth, and eighty-eight since James's accession; he therefore prayed that the Ecclesiastical Courts might have more liberty to try causes and to pass the sentence of excommunication. The judges, being called on to answer, gave their answers (as might have been expected) altogether in favour of their own jurisdiction, and Bancroft's "Articles" were declared contrary to law. In 1608 he was made Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and on Nov. 2nd, 1610, he died, having in the early part of that year "offered to Parliament," as is stated (though he never actually brought in the Bill), a scheme for the better regulation of tithes, and improving in other ways the maintenance of the clergy.

Bancroft's characteristic was steadiness to Anglicanism as opposed to Puritanism; and as a bishop he was always well spoken of. Sir John Harrington, for instance, says ("Brief View of the State of the Church of England"), "No bishop since I can remember hath been counted more vigilant in looking to his charge, ne quid ecclesie detrimenti capiat." Camden ("Britannia," i. 242) calls him "a person of singular courage and prudence in all matters relating to the discipline and establishment of the Church;" but Clarendon's praise is the highest of all (book i., anno 1633, death of Archbishop Abbott): "Dr. Bancroft, that metropolitan who understood the Church excellently, and had almost rescued it out of the hands of the Calvinian party, and very much subdued the unruly spirit of the Non-conformists by and after the Conference at Hampton Court; countenanced men of the greatest parts in learning, and disposed the clergy to a more solid course of study than they had been accustomed to; and if he had lived, would quickly have extinguished all that fire in England which had been kindled at Geneva; or if he had been succeeded by Bishop Andrews, Bishop Overal, or any man who understood and loved the Church, that infection would easily have been kept out which could not afterwards be so easily expelled."

Bancroft's chief work is "Dangerous Positions and Proceedings, published and practised within this Island of Britaine under pretence of Reformation, and for the Presbyterian Discipline" (1593). The title pretty well explains its purpose, which is an exposure of the doctrine of the Scottish and Genevan party and its results. In the translation of the Bible (our Authorised Version) he took no actual part; he is, indeed, stated to have said, when the translation was proposed, "that if there should be translation according to every man's fancy, there would be no end of translating;" still, when the work was undertaken, he gave his countenance to it, and acknowledgment is made to him in the preface—that preface which is so seldom printed and so little known: "The chief overseer and epitaph under his Majesty, to whom not only we, but also our whole Church, was much bound."

Bands.—This article of academical and professional dress, like many others, seems to have been originally common to all dress, and was probably nothing more than a large shirt-collar turned down, such as may be seen in the old Cavalier portraits; an old crayon, for instance, represents Sir Edmund Verney, royal standard-bearer at Edgehill, in full armour, with this very incongruous collar at the top of it. On becoming a separate piece of dress, the size of bands began to diminish, though during the last century, when they were almost universal among the clergy, they were still often large; Wesley and Whitfield, as the reader will have observed from their portraits, wore them of considerable size. At present they are worn chiefly as part of the full academical dress, and by barristers; hardly (except at court) by any clergy except those of the Evangelical party.

Bangor. BISHOPRIC OF.—In the usual style of Welsh tradition the foundation of the see of Bangor is attributed to a St. Deiniol, or Daniel, who is said to have died in A.D. 584, but of whom nothing is known except his name. There are traces of Bishops of Bangor also during the dark ages of Welsh history, but the first authentic record of them is to be found after the Norman Conquest, when William Rufus nominated one of his chaplains, a Breton named Hervé, to the see in A.D. 1092. In A.D. 1109 Hervé was translated to Ely, and Bangor remained vacant until A.D. 1120, from which time there has been a nearly continuous succession of bishops until the present day, the number recorded from 1092 being sixty-four.

The diocese comprehends the Isle of Anglesey, the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, and part of the county of Montgomery. The bishop's income is £4,200, and the population of the diocese numbered 226,040 in the year 1881. The following is a list of the Bishops of Bangor:—

The CATHEDRAL OF BANGOR has been in recent years carefully and tastefully restored. The earliest reference to any ecclesiastical building upon the site is in a Welsh Chronicle, which gives an account of King Edgar's expedition into Wales, and states that he built a church at Bangor, "on the north side of the cathedral." The cathedral thus referred to is said to have been burned down by the Normans in A.D. 1071, and to have been rebuilt by them in A.D. 1211. This latter structure was destroyed during the Welsh wars of Edward I. Once more it began to be rebuilt by the munificence of Bishop Anian, at the end of the thirteenth century, this bishop being also the same as the Anian who provided a "Use" for Bangor, as St. Osmund had done for Salisbury. [Uses.] Anian's church was burned down by Owen Glendower and his savage followers.

The present cathedral is, as to the walls, a fabric erected in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII. [A.D. 1490-1533]. Carved timber roofs were added to this church in the seventeenth century, but these were destroyed or greatly altered, at the beginning of the present century. About the same time as the roofs, the stall-work was destroyed, and replaced by what Sir Gilbert Scott called "the most execrable gimcrack that ever disgraced a church." During the recent restoration many fragments of the thirteenth century cathedral which was burned down by Owen Glendower were recovered, and these were used both for design and for actual material. As it now exists, a structure partly old and partly new, the western tower is Bishop Skevington's work, built early in the sixteenth century. The central tower is new, but replaces what stood there in ancient days. The choir is Perpendicular work, of the latter part of the fifteenth or the beginning of the sixteenth century.

The cathedral establishment consists of dean, four residentiary canons, six honorary canons, a chancellor, and two minor canons.

Bangorian Controversy.—A controversy respecting the spiritual authority and general system of the Church, and especially the Church of England, which arose in the beginning of the last century. Ever since the Revolution of 1688, the Church had suffered, not merely through the loss of some of the most pious of her sons, the Non-jurors, but also in consequence of the appointment of Whigs to bishoprics while the rank and file of the clergy were Tories, i.e., partisans of the Stuarts and upholders of absolute obedience. Consequently, there were many bitter scenes in Convocation between the Upper and Lower House. During the reign of Anne, however, there seemed a hope of reconciliation, but this hope was destroyed largely through the intemperate utterances of Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, who in 1716 became Bishop of Bangor [HOADLY]. Dr. Hickey, a learned Non-juror, having published some papers in which he accused the Church of schism, Hoadly replied by publishing a treatise, "Preservative Against the Principles and Practices of the Non-jurors, both in Church and State," wherein he affirms that it is essential to the Christian profession that there should be any communion with a visible Church. On March 31st, 1717, he preached before the King a sermon on "The Nature of the Kingdom or Church of Christ," which was published by royal command. Dr. Snell, head-master of Eton, appealed to the voice of the Church, and Convocation met to consider the matter. The Lower House drew a report, but before it could be presented to the Upper House, the King, advised by Whig ministers, prorogued Convocation at the end of the year, and it met no more on our own day. There can be no question that this high-handed proceeding was a heblow to the Church of England. It silenced her clergy, and gave the opportunity for opposers to gird at her.

From this time the controversy between the Bishop of Bangor and his opponents was carried on by pamphlets, of which several hundreds were published. Hoadly's main opposers were Sherlock, afterwards Bishop of London, and William Law, a Non-juror. The latter's three letters to Hoadly will be found in the first volume of an admirable collection of Tracts, entitled The Scholar Armed. To Law, probably more than to any other man, the Church owed at that time the preservation of her spiritual life [Law], as will be gathered from what we have said. Law and his followers maintained the system of the Church as one of Divine institution and authority, while the other side looked upon it as a mere human institution.

Bankers.—The curtains which formerly hung across the north and south ends of altars in English churches.

Banner.—The form of a banner, now so well known in its religious and processional use, is the same which it has had from the earliest times, an upright pole and cross-bar (sometimes fixed, sometimes attached only to the top by cords from its ends), on which is a square or nearly square piece of silk, bearing a device.* Banners are military in their origin. No one needs to be reminded of the familiar Roman eagle; and their Christian and religious use dates almost from the beginning of Christianity itself, from the celebrated vision of Constantine, when he saw the cross upon the banner, inscribed "In this Conquer;" the LABARUM, which he made according to the pattern showed to him, and used as his military standard, being adopted in the Church also, and used by her in processions. Smith's "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" (under the word exillum) gives instances from Gregory of Tours in the sixth century, and Honorius of Autun in the twelfth.

Bede tells us ("Ecccl. Hist.," i. 25) that Augustine and his priests, when they first visited King Ethelbert of Kent, A.D. 597, came in procession, bearing a cross and "the image of our Lord and Saviour painted on a board," which may be called their banner, or, at any rate, occupied its place and served its purpose. All through the mediæval canons of the English Church their use may be traced, and especially in the Rogation Day processions, of which, "beating the bounds" is the modern English representative; and for their use, as mentioned in the "Sarum Processional," see Maskell's Monumenta Rituala, i. cxi. They do not appear to have been used since the Reformation till their recent revival with so many other ornaments and ceremonies.

* In strict heraldic language, however, this is a gonfalon, a banner being simply a square flag.

Banns of Marriage.—The public notice of marriage to be contracted is traced back in France and England to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In England it is known as early as A.D. 1200 to have been given three times, as now. A canon to that effect was passed in the Synod of Westminster, under Hubert Fitzwalter, Archbishop of Canterbury (Johnson's Canons, ii. 91). In 1322, a constitution of Archbishop Walter Reynolds ordered the banns to be on three Sundays, or holy-days, distant from one another (a se distantibus); on which, William Lyndwood (Bishop of St. David's, 1444) notes, in his "Provinciale," that it seems one day at least must be between them; then adds that he thinks three feast-days running, as in Easter or Whitsun Week, will do; because to be distant is the same as to differ, or to be removed, and if three feast-days come running, they so differ that one of them is not another. But all room for this little bit of casuistry is removed by the "Sarum Manual," which provides, in so many words, that there must be one common day between the feast-days. Following the Sarum use, holy-days as well as Sundays were mentioned in all our reformed prayer-books, including the one of 1662, that now in use; and it is without the least authority that the rubric was altered by the printers, about 1809, as it now commonly stands.

The time for banns, in the Sarum use, was during the Mass, and in agreement with this, all our books directed and direct that it is to be during the Communion Service, before the Offertory sentences; but the above-mentioned printer's alteration has swept this too away, and substituted "after the second lesson." The history of this is that the Act of 26 George II. (commonly known as Lord Hardwicke's) provided this as the place for banns in the Evening Service, for which no previous provision had ever been made, and that it was construed to extend to the Morning Service also. But it has been held by Lord Mansfield and by Baron Alderson (1856) that this is a wrong construction, and that the time for banns in the Morning Service is still regulated by the rubric, and is therefore before the Offertory sentences. With regard to the former point, whether holy-days as well as Sundays are still available for banns, the case is different; for though it has never been raised or decided, and though it may seem at first sight to stand on the same footing, the Act 4 Geo. IV. distinctly provides that banns shall be published on three Sundays, and that other rules of the rubric not hereby altered shall be duly observed. An Act of Parliament is generally held to supersede the rubric, and the decision of Lord Mansfield and Baron Alderson was not opposed to this principle, but simply declared that the Act, being capable of a construction in agreement with the rubric, was to receive such construction. The later Act

6 and 7 Will. IV., which confirms "all the rules prescribed by the rubric," refers, not to the publication of banns, but to the actual solemnization of marriage.

The object of this publication of Banns, it cannot be denied, is publicity: as the Sarum book has it, "when the greater multitude of people shall be present." In England the greater multitude are now present at Morning Prayer, and when Lord Mansfield and Baron Alderson gave their decisions, this was almost invariably followed by the Communion Service, so that the greatest publicity was still attained; but it is not now attained by publishing banns at an early celebration, when (at least in the country) a dozen at most may be present.

Baptism.—One of the two Sacraments ordained by Christ, and that rite whereby admission is given to Christianity.

1. ORIGIN.—It is, though not demonstrably certain, very highly probable that the admission to Judaism by baptism of Proselytes of Righteousness (the highest class of proselytes), which certainly existed after our Lord's time, existed during and before His time and that of John the Baptist. Dr. John Lightfoot (on Matt. iii.) and Prideaux assume it at once; and it is urged that if it is not free from doubt, a very strong argument may be founded on the way in which the subject is handled in the earlier chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke, as if the idea of baptism was perfectly familiar to the Jews, and it agrees with analogy that the rite should be founded on and developed out of one already known. References to authorities may be found in Smith's "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," under "Baptism," i. 170. This proselyte baptism was by immersion of the whole body in water, and its derivative, that of John, would probably be so also: "They were baptised of him in Jordan" (Matt. iii. 6). Our Lord also came up "out of the water."

Thus, then, John's baptism prepared the way for that of the Greater than he who was to come after him, and even this Greater, "to fulfil all righteousness," deigned to receive it at his hands. The disciples of our Lord also baptised, but it was not with full Christian baptism, for that in the name of the Holy Trinity was not instituted by Him till just before His ascension (Matt. xxviii. 19). Probably their baptism, like John's, was a baptism merely of repentance.

2. PROGRESS.—The full form of baptism instituted by the glorified Saviour became instantly the only authorised form, and all seeming exceptions in the New Testament can be shown to be not really such: chiefly by these considerations, that the phrase "in the Name of Jesus Christ" (Acts ii. 38, viii. 16, xix. 4) follows instantly on a mention of the preaching of that Name, so that it is most natural that the speaker or narrator (not speaking, as no early writer in such cases speaks, with strict theological accuracy) should continue the use of the same form of language; also that the preposition answering to the English "in" is not always the same; also that in no case is the expression strictly "in the Name of the Son." Some very few real exceptions there afterwards were, but formal decisions were always in favour of the orthodox way.

Adult baptism, in the first days of Christianity, was, of course, the rule, and infant baptism only known when whole households were converted at once. Of this instance can be given where children can hardly have failed to make part; and that infant baptism was our Lord's intention, the two texts, Mark x. 14 and John iii. 5, when taken together, are in the opinion of the great majority of Christians, enough to show. As Christianity grew, and children were born of Christians, these were in many cases baptised in their infancy (Iren. agt. Heresies, ii. 1; Tert. de Bapt. 18; Iren., Hom. on St. Luke 14), but not in all, for an exaggerated opinion of sin after baptism, and probably in some cases even the mere fact that the parents themselves had been baptised as adults, often to the deferring of baptism, as in the cases of St. Augustine and the Emperor Constantine. About the fifth and sixth centuries infant baptism became the rule, and has remained ever since; but there have always been bodies of Christians, larger or smaller, who have denied the necessity of infant baptism; and, as is well known, such exist to the present time. [BAPTISTS.]

3. MATTER, MODE, AND MANNER.—The essentials of baptism are, first, water; and secondly, the recitation of the formula, "in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" and it is, of course, further necessary that the water should actually touch the person of him who is to be baptised, but the quantity of water which obtains this contact is not essential; and therefore, three ways of administering baptism, all equally valid, have existed, corresponding to the three ways in which necessary contact may be procured. They are: dipping in the water [IMMERSION], pouring the water on [AFFUSION], sprinkling the water [ASPERSION]. Immersion is there is no doubt, the first rule of the Church. All early descriptions of baptism, as Tertullian, de Baptismo, use such words as genuit, down, and plunging in the water; but at the same time it is also clear that Affusion was known and used where necessary, where the Philippian gaoler was baptised "he and all his straightway," in the middle of the night, St. Paul being still a prisoner, and certainly not able to take the long out to the river Gangites. In the Western Church, however, Affusion gradually the place of Immersion, and as early as the thirteenth century had become the custom which it now is, taking the form of Aspersión. The only mention of Aspersión in any formulary of the Church appears to have been in the catechism between 1604 and 1662, when the answer to the question, "What is the outward visible sign or form in baptism?" stood thus: "Water wherein the person baptised is dipped, or sprinkled with it, in the Name, &c." But in the East Immersion has remained the practice as well as the primary rule; this latter it indeed still is in the Church of England, as her rubrics for Public Baptism show. Scattered instances of absolute compliance with them may be found in modern times, as in the family of Shirley, temp. Charles I. One in 1823 may be found in the Annual Register for that year, p. 214. Of late years it has become somewhat more common. [See BAPTISTERY]. The triple application of water, in agreement with the form of words, was also the ancient rule, but it was very early that the single application was used, and declared equally allowable, in recognition of the Unity of the Trinity. Still, the earlier form, though no longer required by the Church of England, is not unfrequently used, and in the Eastern and Roman Churches is the universal practice. Of other ancient ceremonies of minor importance space forbids to speak at length; the chief of them, exorcism and anointing, were, with the Trine Immersion, retained in our first reformed Prayer Book of 1549, but laid aside with it in 1552.

4. MINISTER.—As our Lord handed on the function of baptism to His disciples the Apostles, so they handed it on to their successors, the first bishops, whose special province it remained for some time before they, in their turn, handed it on to the lower orders of the ministry: but all along it was held that the power lay with the whole ministry, as when St. Philip the deacon and evangelist baptised at Samaria (Acts viii.); it has been also held, though less universally, and is still held, that baptism can be given by any person whosoever. This is shown in the rubrics of the old English offices.

5. THE SIGN OF THE CROSS.—This is not essential to baptism, and accordingly in private it is not ordered. In public it is used, not as a part of baptism, but "in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under His banner against sin, the world, and the devil, and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end." Then these familiar words of the Church of England, no better short explanation can be found. A longer and more elaborate one, justifying the ceremony from the charge of superstition, is found in the 30th canon of the Church of England.

Baptism of Bells.—An improper designation, sometimes given to the ceremony of dedicating bells, in which they were sprinkled with holy water, there being, however, no association between this rite and that of holy baptism. [BELLS, BAPTISM OF.]

Baptism of Blood.—Persons who suffered martyrdom for Christ without having had time or opportunity to be baptised, were accounted by the ancient Church to have been baptised in their own blood by the act of martyrdom.

Baptismerium, or Baptismale.—The baptism book, out of which the clergy and singers said the services for baptism. In the modern Church of England these services are usually bound up with those for churchings, burials, and marriages, under the name of the Book of Occasional Offices, or "The Manual."

Baptistery.—The building [Greek Baptistérion; Lat. Baptisterium] set apart in or near a church for the administration of baptism. While the Church was in a missionary condition converts were baptised in such places as were most suitable to the circumstances of the case, some being christened in fountains, pools, or running streams, as was the Ethiopian convert of St. Philip [Acts viii. 36-39], others in houses, by the pouring of water upon the person from some vessel, as appears to have been the case with the Philippian gaoler and his family [Acts xvi. 33]. But as the settled organisation of Christianity progressed, although this primitive method was still continued, as it has been continued to the present day, the administration of baptism became associated with the buildings which were erected, or adapted, for the special purposes of Divine Service. It then became the custom, apart from missionary operations, and in the ordinary course of Church work, for baptism to be administered in the presence of the bishop of the diocese three times a year, namely, at Epiphany, Easter, and Whitsuntide, the bishop confirming all at once as soon as they had been christened. Thus the buildings would need to be larger, on account of the great number of persons to be christened, and they would have to be near the residence of the bishop, on account of the necessity for his presence to confirm the baptism and the baptised. Hence it came to pass that baptisteries were originally annexed to cathedral churches, the city of Rome being the only place where they appear to have been associated with smaller churches in the earlier times of organised Christianity.

The most ancient baptisteries known are those of Aquileia, which is in ruins, of the Lateran of Rome, of Ravenna, and of Florence, these dating from the fourth to the sixth century. From these and others, and from the references made to the rite of baptism by early Christian writers, it appears that a baptistery was generally circular, or six or eight-sided, having in the centre a large reservoir, or font, into which the person to be christened descended by three steps, the water being sufficiently deep for immersion above the knees, or for more complete immersion by kneeling or stooping. This reservoir, or "piscina," was surmounted by a dome, which was supported on pillars of marble, and this dome was decorated, as well as the walls, with paintings illustrating the rite of baptism and other Gospel subjects; and the whole building was often a hundred feet in diameter. Baptistries are usually dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There is a curious baptistery in the parish church of Cranbrook, Kent, made by the Vicar, John Johnson [JOHNSON], in the early part of the eighteenth century, for the immersion of those who had grown to be adults without being baptised. There are, however, only two notices of its having been used.

Baptists.—A denomination which maintains that the only true baptism is that which is administered to persons who can give an account of their faith, and by immersion of the whole body in water. But although this ordinary definition is correct as far as it goes, it does not go further than externals, nor does it distinguish this denomination from the Churches of ancient origin, since the latter make strict provision that all grown-up persons who come to baptism shall give an account of their faith, and also that baptism shall be administered by immersion when desired. The true difference in essential principle between the Baptists and the Church of England is that the former baptise persons in the belief that they have been converted, the rite of baptism being used as an outward sign that they have already, before baptism, and independently of it, become children of God; while the latter distinctly expresses in the words of the baptismal service that the persons baptised, whether infants or adults, are by the administration of baptism "regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church," "being now born again, and made heirs of everlasting salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ;" and in the words of the Catechism, that each one of us "in" our "baptism" "was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven." There should also be added this further practical difference: that whereas the Church of England accepts the baptisms of Baptists as true and valid baptisms, making the persons christened children of God, who need no further baptism, no baptisms of the Church of England or of any other communion are accepted as true and valid by the Baptists unless they were performed when the persons had arrived at years of discretion. All persons, therefore, who have been christened in infancy are not baptised if they become Baptists.

The rejection of infant baptism was a principle of many mediæval sects, and of the ANABAPTISTS; but it was almost invariably mixed up with theological and political principles, which make a broad line of demarcation between them and the Protestant Baptists of England, Germany, and America [ANABAPTISTS], who have not been distinguished by revolutionary tendencies. There can be no doubt that the special opinions which they hold respecting infant baptism were held by many of the Puritans in the Reformation age, but the severe proceedings of reformers like Hooper and Latimer were of such a nature as to make some degree of secrecy necessary for safety. It does not appear, however, that any of those whose views on baptism were similar to those of the modern Baptists aggregated into separate communities until the reign of Charles I., when the formation of their first congregation took place, according to the historian, Crosby, under the following circumstances; the original narrator being William Kiffin, one of the founders of the sect:—"There was a congregation of Protestant Dissenters of the Independent persuasion in London gathered in the year 1606, whereof Mr. Henry Jacob was the first pastor, and after him Mr. John Lathorp, who was their minister at this time. In this society several persons, finding that the congregation kept not their first principles of separatism and being also convinced that baptism should not be administered to infants, but such as professed faith in Christ, desired that they might be dismissed from that communion and allowed to form a distinct congregation in such order as was most agreeable to their own sentiments. The Church, considering that they were now grown very numerous, more than could in these times of persecution conveniently meet together, and believing also that these persons acted from a principle of conscience, and not obstinacy, agreed to allow them the liberty they desired, and they should be constituted a distinct Church, which was performed the 12th of September 1633. And as they believed that baptism was not rightly administered to infants, so they looked upon the baptism they had received in that age as invalid: whereupon, most of them received a new baptism. Their minister was Mr. John Spilsbury. What number they were is uncertain, because in the mentioning of the names of about twenty and women, it is added, 'with divers others.' In the year 1638, Mr. William Kiffin (the writer of this narrative), Mr. Thomas Wither, and others being of the same judgment, upon their request, dismissed to the said Spilsbury's congregation. In the year 1640 another congregation of Baptists was formed, whose place of meeting was in Cruikshank's Alley."

Frars, the chief promoters of which were Mr. Green, Mr. Paul Hobson, and Captain Spencer." [Crosby's Hist. of Eng. Baptists, i. 148.] The same writer also records that the "new baptism" of these early Baptists was effected by communication with the Dutch MENNONITES. One of their number, Mr. Richard Blant, being acquainted with the Dutch language, was sent over to Holland, where he was baptised by John Batte; and on his return, he baptised Mr. Samuel Blacklock, the two of them baptising others to the number of fifty-three.

The numbers of the Baptist congregations rapidly increased about the time of the Great Rebellion. In the year 1646 there were said to be forty-six of them in and about London alone.

A Declaration of Parliament was issued in their favour in March, 1647, but a year later, on May 2nd, 1648, an Ordinance of the Lords and Commons was passed, which was of exactly an opposite character. This latter Ordinance declared, "Whoever shall say that the baptism of infants is unlawful, or that such baptism is void, and that such persons ought to be baptised again, and in pursuance thereof shall baptise any person formerly baptised, or shall say the Church government of Presbytery is anti-Christian or unlawful, shall, upon conviction by the oath of two witnesses, or by his own confession, be ordered to renounce his said error in the public congregation of the parish where the offence was committed; and, in case of refusal, he shall be committed to prison till he find sureties that he shall not publish or maintain the said error any more." The Baptists, however, shared in the moderation with which religions of all kinds were treated by Cromwell, and many of his supporters belonging to their sect, it attained considerable political importance during the time of his rule.

It was at this period that the increasing body broke up into two distinct sections: those of the General and the Particular Baptists.

The General Baptists, who are also called "Arminian Baptists," derive their name from holding the doctrine of general redemption, since they maintain with the ARMINIANS that Christ died to redeem all men. They split off from the main body in 1660, when a "Confession of Faith" was promulgated by them, in the third and fourth articles of which they set forth the doctrine of general redemption, in the eighth and ninth that of election. At the Restoration, in 1661, they claimed to be 20,000 in number, but shortly afterwards began that downward course of the sect into Unitarianism, which eventually split it up. Those who then seceded took the name of "New Connection General Baptists."

The Particular Baptists call themselves so because they maintain the Calvinistic doctrine of "particular redemption," namely, that Christ did not die to redeem all men, but only the elect. These, again, are divided into two classes: [1] the "free Communionists," who admit to the Lord's Supper those persons who have been baptised in infancy only, as well as those who have been baptised as adults; and [2] the "strict," or "close Communionists," who admit no persons to Communion but those who have been baptised as adults.

As there are ten or twelve minor sects of Baptists as well as these principal divisions, it is convenient to remember that it is the Particular Baptists who are generally meant when "Baptists" without any other designation are named. In many of the churches, however, which formally belong to this class, the distinctive tenet of particular redemption is no longer insisted upon.

The system of Church government among Baptists is that of Independents or Congregationalists, each congregation being complete in itself, and independent of all interference from without. In 1832, an association of Baptist churches was constituted under the name of the Baptist Union, and to this most of the churches have affiliated themselves; but it possesses no right of interference with the several communities of which it is composed. In 1885 the statistical records of the Baptists enumerated in the United Kingdom 3,909 chapels, in charge of 1,908 pastors and 3,505 evangelists, with 312,465 baptised members, and 467,930 Sunday scholars. There are also considerable numbers in the United States, and in the English Colonies and foreign dominions of the Crown; and missionaries are employed among the natives of India, Ceylon, China, Japan, the West Indies, and Africa. The annual expenditure of the Baptist community on their missions, and on other pious objects, amounts to upwards of £200,000.

Barbara, St. [A.D. 235].—All which is historically known respecting this saint is that she was the daughter of a rich nobleman of Nicomedia, named Dioscorus, that she learned Christianity from Origen, and that she suffered martyrdom in Nicomedia in the year 235, during the persecution of Maximinus. The ordinary legend about her is that having lost her mother, she was shut up in a tower by her father, who gave her much indulgence and luxury, but wished to prevent her beauty from attracting suitors. When he had ordered two windows only to be constructed, Barbara directed a third to be made, and explained to him that she had done this in honour of the Blessed Trinity. Dioscorus was so enraged that, when he found it impossible to make his daughter abjure Christianity, he carried her before the persecutors, and eventually beheaded her with his own hands. At the moment of her death there occurred a great storm of thunder and lightning, and thus St. Barbara is regarded as the saint who protects against thunder, lightning, and fire-arms. There is a pretty German legend that when she was being scourged before execution the angels changed the rods into feathers. Usually she is represented in art with a tower in her hand or near to her, and often with artillery at her feet, and her effigy is frequently engraved on arms and armour. The day dedicated to the memory of St. Barbara is Dec. 4th.

Barbeliotes.—A sect of Gnostics mentioned by Irenæus, who sprang up in the second century, and called themselves after the name they had given to a fanciful being named Barbelos, or Barbelo, whom they seem to have substituted for the Saviour of the Christian system, calling him the Son [Heb. Bar] of the Father and of a mother named Jaldabaoth, or Sabaoth, whom they designated the Lady [Heb. Belah]. Such traces of Christianity as there were in their system were mixed up with so much licentiousness, that they received the nickname of Barborians, from the Greek word borboros, which means filth or mud.

Barclay, ROBERT [A.D. 1648—1690].—One of the earliest and most distinguished of the Quakers. He belonged to a Presbyterian family of Morayshire, but was educated at the Scotch Seminary College at Paris. When about sixteen years of age, his father, David Barclay, became a convert to the new sect of the QUAKERS (q.v.), and Robert, being then brought back to Scotland, soon adopted his father's opinions. From that time he became a most zealous advocate of Quakerism, and was imprisoned for his opinions at Aberdeen in 1677. In 1682 he was appointed Governor of New Jersey, but as he was allowed to have a deputy-governor, he never visited his government, but remained on his estate of Ury, which he succeeded in getting made into a free barony, with civil and criminal jurisdiction. There he died, in the year 1690.

Barclay's celebrity among the Quakers rests on an "Apology for their Tenets," which he published in Latin in 1676, and which has been translated into English and circulated in many editions. He was intimate with Fox and Penn, and was also attached to the friendship of Elizabeth, Princess Palatine of the Rhine, a sister of Prince Rupert, and niece of Charles I.

Barcochba.—A Jew, who, whilst Jerusalem was lying waste after its destruction by Titus, assumed the name of Barcochba (Son of the Star), and claimed to be the Messiah. [A.D. 132.] Great numbers flocked to him and he succeeded in recovering Jerusalem, and, by his heroic but sanguinary exploits, achieved the freedom of the Palestine Jews for a short time. But after a savage three years' war the Roman general, Julius Severus, stormed his fortress, Bethar, Barcochba was killed. Every Jew was bidden, on pain of death, to set foot in Holy City. The Christians suffered most during this struggle, both from the Romans who frequently treated them as though they were Jews, and from the followers of the impostor because they refused to join him.

Bardesanians.—The followers of Bardesanes, a Syrian of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, a man of great learning and piety. He and his followers adopted the dual system of Gnostics, but not their worse principles; perhaps they only adopted dualism as a philosophical explanation of the origin of evil, which they desired to make independent of God, without imagining any other Supreme Creator. But Bardesanes held opinions respecting the body of our Lord which were not consistent with the doctrine of His Incarnation, looking upon it as an appearance of a body rather than real flesh and blood, and descending direct from heaven, and not of the Virgin Mary. He and his son, Diodorus, wrote a great many hymns, which were very popular, and were used even among Catholic Christians. In the fourth century the public use of these hymns in churches was forbidden, and after that time this is heard of the Bardesanians.

Bardsey, THE SAINT OF.—The name of the "island of bards" on the coast of Carnarvonshire, was also known as the "island of saints." It acquired the name from being the place to which Dubricius, the Archbishop or Bishop, of Caerleon, retired in A.D. 547, and where he founded a monastic house which lasted down to the time of the Reformation. Thence proceeded many holy men for the service of the Church in Wales during troublous times, when that service led to death at the hands of those who were contending for the possession of the country.

Barlaamites.—So named from Barlaam, Abbot of St. Saviour's, in Constantinople, in the middle of the fourteenth century. He and his followers were the opponents of the fanatical Hesychasts (q.v.), or Quietists of that age.

Barlow, WILLIAM.—A reforming bishop from the time of Henry VIII. to Elizabeth I. now principally known as the leading secretary of Archbishop Parker, and as a subject of the controversies which arose, both concerning his own conversion and his performance of that rite. Parker. Barlow was of Welsh descent and born in Essex about 1499; had a liberal education partly at St. Osyth, in Essex county, in a convent of Augustine canons (of the building of which a good part remains), and afterwards at Oxford, where took his degree of D.D. His early opinions, like his later ones, were Protestant, for he wrote and published, in 1519, a book called The Burying of the Mass, which met with a good deal of opposition; he also went abroad to hear the German Reformers. But their doctrine, strange to say, pleased him not; neither Carlstadt, nor Hanssheim (better known as Ecolampadius), nor even Luther himself could steady this wavering convert, and he went on to Rome. Thence, returning to England, he published, in 1531, a violent attack upon what he called the "Lutheran Jaccyons," and in 1533 wrote to Henry VIII., and formally recanted his "grievous errors in disallowing the Mass and denying Purgatory." In spite of this, he must have halted between the two opinions, for in the same year he was collated by Archbishop Cranmer, at Queen Anne Boleyn's request, to the Rectory of Sundridge, in Kent, and in 1534, by the same influence, made Prior of Augustine Canons, first at Haverfordwest, and then at Bisham, in Berkshire. This last he held till July 5, 1536. In November, 1534, he was sent by Henry VIII. to James V. of Scotland, to endeavour to induce him to join Henry in throwing off the Pope's supremacy, and in Scotland he remained till February 10, 1535. A year afterwards, March to May, 1536, he was again in Scotland on the same errand, with a short interval in April.

We now come to his promotion to a bishopric; and here reference may be made to Mr. Hadden's exhaustive notes on Archbishop Bramhall's Treatise, The Consecration of Protestant Bishops Vindicated, from which these dates and those above are taken; Bramhall's Works in the Anglo-Catholic Library, iii., Preface (which is unpagged), and pp. 138-143, 227. Barlow was elected Bishop of St. Asaph by the Dean and Chapter, January 16, 1536; his temporalities were restored February 2, and his election confirmed by the Archbishop, February 23, when the register makes no mention of his consecration. As he was in Scotland immediately afterwards, and, indeed, being confirmed by proxy, probably on his journey at the time, it is clear that he was not consecrated to St. Asaph. He was elected by the Dean and Chapter of St. David's, April 10, confirmed in person April 21, and received his temporalities April 26, when it is certain that he was still unconsecrated, since the Act of Parliament then in force made it compulsory to recite the consecration if it had taken place. On April 27 he received his writ of summons to the House of Lords; Parliament met on June 8, and he took his seat in the Lords June 30, being then, of course, consecrated. All this is proved by the different registers which still exist, but the actual register of the consecration does not exist, and it must therefore be proved by collateral evidence. We have seen that he was still unconsecrated on April 26, but consecrated by June 30; the time, however, is still further narrowed by the precedence which he took in Parliament and Convocation. This is regulated by the date of consecration, and Barlow's place was after a bishop who was undoubtedly consecrated June 11. As, therefore, there is no evidence of the performance of any other consecration between June 11 and 30, it is all but certain that he was consecrated with this bishop on the 11th; the omission of the entry in Archbishop Cranmer's register being of no importance when it is remembered how carelessly this is kept, no fewer than seven other consecrations being omitted. To the fact of the consecration witness is also given by Barlow's civil acts as bishop: e.g., his granting of leases, which, if he were unconsecrated, would have been null and void; and by his spiritual acts, as ordaining priests and deacons and consecrating bishops, which latter he did in 1539 and 1542; but, most of all, by his own words in a sermon preached shortly after his consecration, and which was reported to the Privy Council January 11, 1537, to the effect that he had said that any layman appointed by the king should be as good a bishop as himself, or the best in England. This, if he were unconsecrated, would be simply meaningless. It is known from other sources that he, as well as Archbishop Cranmer, held low opinions on consecration; but, considering the results, legal and other, of such a course, it is inconceivable that they could have dispensed with it. To resume his history: he was employed during the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. in almost the whole of the work of Reformation; notably he aided in compiling "The Institution of a Christian Man," 1537, commonly known as the "Bishops' Book." He was made Bishop of Bath and Wells by letters patent, dated February 3, 1548, the canonical formalities of election and confirmation being then suspended by Act of Parliament. Edward VI. died July 6, 1553, and before the end of the year (the exact date is not known) Barlow resigned this see, and was committed to the Tower by Queen Mary as a married heretic. He, however, recanted, at least to the extent of republishing his book against the "Lutheran Jaccyons," and afterwards contrived to escape to Germany, where he remained till the accession of Elizabeth. Mary died November 17, 1558. Then returning to England, he consecrated Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canterbury on December 17, 1559, with the assistance of Bishops Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkin. He was at the time Bishop-elect of Chichester, and confirmed thereto December 20. On June 21, 1560, he was made a Prebendary of Westminster, which office he resigned in 1565, and died December 10, 1569.

Enough has been said to show the vacillating nature of his character; nor was he remarkable for devoutness or discretion. Archbishop Cranmer, after the discussion of any serious subject, would sometimes say, "This is all very true, but my brother Barlow in half an hour will teach the world to believe it is but a jest."

His works, too, have been mentioned, or nearly all; except the Bishops' Book, they are now little read. He also translated great part of the Apocrypha for Cranmer's Bible. By his wife, Agatha Wellesbourne, he had six sons and five daughters; the latter all married bishops (the last survivor of these episcopal sons-in-law died in 1628). The only one of the former of any note was William Barlow, Archdeacon of Salisbury, a mathematician of some repute, who died in 1625.

Barnabas, EPISTLE OF.—An early Christian document, ascribed to St. Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul in his first apostolic journey. The question of authorship has been much debated. The external evidence that it was really the work of St. Barnabas must be admitted to be very strong. St. Clement of Alexandria and Origen, who are weighty authorities, both speak of it as a genuine work; so do the historians Eusebius and St. Jerome. In the recently discovered Sinaitic Manuscript of the New Testament [MANUSCRIPTS] this Epistle is attached to it. But though the work was evidently regarded as written by him whose name it bears, it was never included by the early Church amongst the inspired Scriptures, and we need not be surprised at this. It is true that we have Scriptures not written by Apostles, the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke for instance, but the connexion of the writers with Apostles was admitted. Now we know of St. Barnabas that he and St. Paul differed in opinion and went separate ways. We doubt not that the providence of God found work for both, but the parting may have been one reason why the Epistle of Barnabas was not found worthy of the same honour as St. Luke's Gospel. The contents of the Epistle itself show a marked difference between it and the writings which the Church, guided by the Spirit of God, declared to be inspired. It will be found in the edition of the Apostolical Fathers, published by Archbishop Wake (who, following the early writers, believed it to be the genuine work of Barnabas), and in Clark's edition of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, as well as in Hone's Apocryphal New Testament. It contains twenty-one chapters, and is addressed to believers in danger of relapsing into Judaism. But the line taken is not that of the Epistle to the Hebrews. He quotes such passages as Isaiah i. 11—14, Jer. vii. 22, 23, Zech. viii. 17, to prove that sacrifices and ritual were under no circumstances pleasing to God; that they were the substitution of the carnal in place of the spiritual which God intended. He goes minutely into the prohibitions concerning unclean beasts to show that these symbolised spiritual doctrines. The cow represents those "who while they live in pleasure forget their God, but when a want pinches them then they know the Lord as the cow when she is full knows not her master, but when she is hungry she makes noise, and being again fed is silent." The eagle signifies those who live by rapine and robbery, and so on (Ch. x.). Some of the ancient writer's fancies are of the strangest character: he even goes to the length of symbolising the three hundred and eighty servants of Abraham. Dr. Milligan, in a very thoughtful article on the book (Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities), truly says that the substance of Christian truth may be held in connexion with absurd and foolish views which to others would be impossible. It has ever been so. We have heard good pious men talking wild nonsense in proof of the Beast of the Revelation meant, now Pius IX., and now the Emperor Nicholas. Making allowance for weakness, therefore, we recognise in this epistle much piety, much zeal for the spiritual welfare of those to whom the writer is addressing himself. The epistle is very beautiful in its deep pathetic earnestness.

Barnabites.—An order of clergy, founded for charitable purposes at Milan at the beginning of the sixteenth century, under the name of the Clerks Regulars of St. Paul, vulgarly called Barnabites, because they were at first accustomed to assemble in the Church of St. Barnabas, at Milan.

This society or "congregation" of clerics was instituted by Antony Maria Zaccaria, Bartholomew Ferrari, and James Antonio Morigia, as a voluntary association for the purpose of instructing, catechising, preaching, receiving confessions, directing schools, promoting missions, and engaging themselves in any other clerical work upon which they might please the bishops to employ them. During the lifetime of their founders they had no establishment out of Milan, but eventually they extended their order into Germany, and France, and many bishops have belonged to it. The Barnabites, also, like the Jesuits, had many distinguished men in their ranks. They have about twenty houses (called Colleges) on the Continent, and none in England.

Baronius, CARDINAL [A.D. 1538—1633].—The learned and industrious historian, Cardinal Baronius, was born at Sora, in Naples, October 30th, 1538. He pursued his studies first at Veroli, and afterwards at Naples. In 1557 he went with his father to Rome, where he became a member of the newly founded Congregation of the Oratory, under the government of its founder, St. Philip Neri [ORATORIANS], of whom Baronius came the successor. The Pope, Clement VIII., made him his confessor and a cardinal in 1596, and not long afterwards Librarian of the Vatican. On the death of Clement VIII., Baronius was nearly chosen Pope, but the influence of Spain and his own strong opposition prevented his election. He died June 30th, 1607.

The great work of Baronius, his Ecclesiastical Annals, was undertaken by the direction of his superior, St. Philip Neri. It was intended to be a complete Church history for every year from the beginning of Christianity. It occupied him for thirty years, and in its original form [A.D. 1588—1609] filled twelve folio volumes. But many editions of it have been published, and continuations, notes, corrections, and indexes so rapidly increased its size that the twenty-first edition [A.D. 1738—1767] is in forty-three volumes folio.

Barrow, ISAAC, D.D. (1630—1677), one of the greatest scholars and preachers of the Church of England. His father was a wealthy London citizen, and is said to have regarded the rough and negligent habits of Isaac, who was his eldest son, with such disgust, that he used to pray God that if any of his sons should die early it might be this one. Isaac was sent first to Charterhouse, where his main renown lay in his vigorous pugilistic habits, then to Felstead School in Essex, where he gained a better character. At fifteen he was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, but his father having been heavily mulcted for his adherence to the fortunes of Charles I., the son could not have been kept at Cambridge but for the help of Dr. Henry Hammond. In 1648 he took his degree, and became fellow next year. At first he gave himself to mathematical and physical studies, but on his succession to the fellowship he felt it to be his duty to give his chief attention to theology, with a view to taking Holy Orders. He closely studied the learned languages, and was certainly one of the best Greek scholars of his day. But when he became a candidate for the Greek professorship in 1654 he was unsuccessful, through its being known that he was a staunch Royalist. The consequence was that he left Cambridge for a while, and spent a year or two in Continental travel, going as far as Constantinople and Smyrna. On his return he was ordained, and immediately afterwards, times having changed, he was appointed to the Greek professorship. In 1663 the founder of the Lucasian professorship of Mathematics appointed Barrow the first professor; he held it for six years, and then resigned it in favour of one of his pupils, a young man of twenty-seven, of whose abilities he had formed a very high estimate. This young man was Isaac Newton. Barrow's whole life was marked by acts of self-renunciation. In 1671 he preached the Spital

Sermon [SPITAL SERMON], the first he ever printed. It is said to have taken three hours in delivery, but not to have wearied the hearers. If this tradition is true, it must have been cut short before printing, for it only occupies 94 printed pages, which would hardly occupy more than two hours. Next year Charles II. made him Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, declaring while he did so that he was appointing the best scholar in England. He held the post for only five years, for he died in the 47th year of his age, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He is described as a short, lean man, very slovenly in dress, a great smoker, and passionately fond of fruit. He was never married, believing that it was not in accordance with the College statutes. His greatest literary work, which still holds an unapproachable position in theological controversy, is his Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy. In this he maintains that this supremacy involves at least seven assumptions: (1) That St. Peter held a primacy over the others; (2) that this primacy was not personal, but could be transmitted to his successors; (3) that he was ever Bishop of Rome; (4) that he continued so to his death; (5) that the Bishops of Rome have a universal supremacy over Christendom; (6) that they have enjoyed it ever since St. Peter's time; (7) that it is indefectible and unchangeable. His treatment of each point is characteristic; he runs it into every ramification of which it is capable, and does it with vehemence and eagerness as well as with exhaustive learning. One of the most powerful and acute of his critics (Dr. H. Wace) sees an analogy between his early pugnacity and his controversial and even homiletical method. He seems to clear the whole field of all hostile forces, and to remain the sole figure, triumphant over every form of sin or error with which he has been in combat. Dr. Wace calls him, in fact, the "exhaustive" preacher. He leaves nothing unsaid on the subject on which he has been preaching, takes each division and discusses it step by step, places each in its position, and leaves at last the impression that the building is complete. This is, in fact, Barrow's invariable method. He does not start with an a priori laying down of great principles, but builds up without revealing his plan at starting. And for the same reason he does not apparently care for watchwords, such as "justification by faith," nor display any signs of anxiety over the great problems of sin and free will. He is a great moralist of the highest kind, the preacher of practical Christianity, second to none. It has even been said that in Mathematics he has but one superior, namely, his pupil Newton. His theological works fill three folio volumes.

Bartholomew Massacre.—The name given to a shocking act of cruelty perpetrated in 1572, on St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24), by which thousands of Huguenots, or French Protestants, lost their lives.

The person who had the honourable place of pioneer in the French Reformation was Jacques Lefevre [d. 1537], a scholar and theologian of Etaples, in Picardy (on the coast between Boulogne and Dieppe). This man's independent study of the Scriptures, early in the sixteenth century, led him to conclude that received religious opinions often derived no authority from the true form of Christianity; and, at the same time, Luther's teaching, spreading, as we know, into England, obtained no small currency also in northern France. Lefevre's opinions were likewise held by the Bishop of Meaux, a few miles from Paris, and thus reformed opinions spread gradually southwards to the metropolis. The party was joined by Margaret, Duchess of Alençon, afterwards Queen of Navarre, sister to King Francis I. But in 1521 the doctrine of Luther was formally condemned by the Theological Faculty of Paris; persecution shortly afterwards began, and many executions for heresy took place. Political considerations after a time led to its relaxation; Henry II., King of Navarre, was induced by his wife to become a Protestant, and his small court became a camp of refuge for that party. But another marriage brought disaster upon it: that of the king's son, the Duke of Orleans, with Catherine de Medici, a near relative of Popes Clement VII. and Leo X.

Under the protection of the Court of Navarre, and also because Francis I. was on bad terms with the Emperor Charles V., and desired to oppose his policy, the Protestants had rest for a time. But through the interposition of Pope Paul III. a ten years' truce was signed in 1538, one result of which was that whatever countenance Francis I. had given the Protestants was withdrawn from them; and in the later years of his reign they were again much persecuted in Provence, where some 4,000 Vaudois were massacred in 1545. In spite of this, however, the party grew and flourished. Francis I. died in 1547, and was succeeded by his son, Henry II., the husband of Catherine de Medici, under whom they rose to considerable importance, and even Catherine seems for a time to have favoured them. Anthony, who became King of Navarre in 1555, and his brother Louis, Prince of Condé, joined the Protestants as his predecessor had done, as also did several of the chief nobility (among whom Gaspard de Coligny, High Admiral, and his brothers were conspicuous), and the Huguenots became of such importance that the French Court conceived much alarm. But the hands of the Court were strengthened by the Guises, a branch of the old Dukes of Lorraine, who now took a foremost place in the state. Claude, Duke of Guise, died in 1550, leaving a large family, of whom those important to the present history were his successor, Francis, Charles, Cardinal of Lorraine, and Mary, who, after a short marriage with the Duke of Longueville, became wife of James V. of Scotland, and mother to the famous Queen Mary, whose first husband was Henry II.'s eldest son and successor, Francis II. The Guises were a proud and haughty family, and their hatred of Protestant opinion, together with their pride and self-interest, embarked them in a course which plunged France into religious wars lasting for more than a century, and in which the Massacre of St. Bartholomew was one of the most prominent events.

Henry II. died in 1559, and during the short eighteen months' reign of his son, Francis II., the Huguenots for the first time attempted some organised resistance to their oppressors. It failed, however; they lost an engagement near Amboise, and again more than a thousand of them were massacred. Francis II. died in 1560, and his brother, Charles IX., a boy of ten, succeeded under the regency of his mother, Catherine. This promotion the Guises would fain have had, but having, of course, no legal claim to it, not being of the royal blood, they retired from Court. Some of their oppressors being thus for a time removed, the Huguenots became so important a body that the experiment of treating with them was tried, and all persecution prohibited; but embittered by what had already passed, they availed themselves of this to commit some outrages against the Established Church, and great disturbances were the result. However, still further concessions were made by the Court, and liberty of worship proclaimed; but too late. King Anthony of Navarre was prevailed on to return to the Church of Rome, and this, with the increased opposition among the Catholic party caused by the last edict, induced the Duke of Guise to return to Court. On his way, he attacked and broke up with considerable slaughter a religious meeting at Vassy, in Champagne (March, 1562), excited by which bad faith, the Protestants now took up arms in earnest, and thus began the civil war. Rouen, however, where they entrenched themselves, was taken on Oct. 26th by the Duke of Guise and his new ally, the King of Navarre (the latter was killed, and it is stated that in dying he renounced Rome a second time); they also lost the battle of Dreux, Dec. 19th, and after a fanatical member of their party had assassinated the Duke of Guise, in February, 1563, another peace was made, which lasted for some few years.

In 1564 Catherine the Regent, with her son, the young king, made a progress through the kingdom, and while at Bayonne received a visit from her eldest daughter, Elizabeth, wife of Philip II. of Spain. This queen was attended by her husband's minister, the Duke of Alba, who, like his master, was a stern ligated Roman Catholic; and between the Duke and Queen Catherine there were held a number of secret conferences, which have never been, in modern phrase, reported. It is certain that their general subject was the heresy of Protestantism, and the best means to put it down, and also that Alva tried to persuade Catherine to abandon her present conciliatory policy, and follow his master and himself in the strong measures which they were about to adopt, and did within two or three years adopt, in Holland; but what is not certain is whether Alva was backed by the Court of Rome, where Pius IV. was then Pope. The contemporary historian, Adriani, states that it was so; and though Roman Catholics have denied the complicity of Rome, at any rate, in the great massacre itself, recent discoveries have implicated that Court more than had hitherto been known.

The Dutch persecution, already mentioned, was the next cause of hostilities; on receiving news of it the Huguenots again took up arms, though at first with little better success than before. The battle of St. Denis, indeed (Nov. 10th, 1567), was a success for neither party, and a short and hollow truce followed; but Jarnac (Mar. 13th, 1569), where the Protestant Prince of Condé was killed—his successor as general being Henry of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France—and Moncontour (Oct. 3rd, 1569) went decidedly against the Protestants. In 1570, however, they met with so much success that Catherine made terms with them which were more advantageous to them than ever before, and Pope Pius V. and Philip of Spain strongly remonstrated. Charles IX. also took matters more than hitherto into his own hands, invited the Queen-regnant of Navarre, Admiral Coligny, and other influential Protestants, to Court, and favoured the party in many ways, marrying his sister Margaret to the King of Navarre, as Henry became by his mother's sudden death on July 9th, 1572. Coligny obtained great power with the king; and Catherine, seeing that her influence would fail, resolved, with her younger son, the Duke of Anjou, and her confidant, Guise, on his destruction. It was therefore attempted (Aug. 22nd, 1572) to assassinate him, but he was not dangerously hurt, and Catherine, excited and alarmed, began to talk of a possible or probable conspiracy of the Huguenots, and thus endeavoured to frighten the king (August 23rd) into giving his consent to the conclusion of the murder. For some time he held out; but at last, by reproaching him with cowardice, she drove him so far beside himself that late at night he exclaimed, "Kill him then! but kill them all, for none shall reproach me!" There is no doubt that he hardly knew what he was saying; but Catherine seized on his words, and almost instantly the massacre began. At two o'clock the next morning (August 24th) the great bell of St. Germain rang out its murderous signal; at three the Admiral was put to death, and all over Paris the Huguenots fell by thousands. The King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé saved themselves by joining, or pretending to join, the Roman Catholic Church, and a few other individual escapes are recorded; but the great body of the Protestants in Paris lost their lives, and very many in the other royal garrisons, to all of which similar orders had been sent, which orders, however, were in some cases imperfectly executed. The total number slain it is not possible to give; it has been most variously estimated from five to ten or twenty, or even thirty, thousand; probably, as usual, the middle estimate is nearest the truth. Charles IX. was bold enough to avow and justify his conduct before his Parliament, who congratulated him on his zeal, and instituted an annual procession in honour of the glorious day.

At Rome the rejoicings were very great. A rare little pamphlet has lately been acquired by the Bodleian Library, which gives an account of them. To copy at length the account of the solemn procession, the Mass, the Te Deum, the prayers, &c., is needless. The important part is the "inscription, most elegantly embroidered in letters of gold upon a purple cloth," and of which the following is a translation:—"To the Most High God; to the Most Holy Father Gregory XIII., Sovereign Pontiff; to the Holy and Most Illustrious College of Cardinals; to the Senate and People of Rome." The pamphlet proceeds:—

"Charles IX., Most Christian King of France, moved with zeal for the Lord God of Hosts, inasmuch as well-nigh all the heretics of his kingdom have been, as it were, by the sudden Divine sending of an angelic destroyer, with one slaughter removed; therefore he, never to be unmindful of so great a blessing, of the counsel given to that end, of the help sent, of the prayers of twenty years,* of his own supplications, vows, tears, and sighs to the Most High God, and those of all Christians, and himself now very rich in the most solid joys, rejoices at their altogether marvellous effect, at their entirely incredible result, at the fulness now in all ways abounding by the Divine gift.

"That such good fortune should happen at the beginning of the pontificate of the Most Holy Father Gregory XIII., not long after his admirable and Divine election, together with the most ready and earnest continuation of the expedition to the East, he considers to portend the re-establishment of ecclesiastical matters, and the certain strength and flourishing of the dying religion.

"For this so great a blessing, though absent in body, yet present in spirit, with your most ardent and united vows this day, here in the church of his ancestor St. Louis, he gives to the Most High God his hearty thanks; and that his hope herein may not fail, he humbly implores His Goodness.

"Charles of Lorraine, Cardinal Priest of the Holy Roman Church, by the title of St. Apollonius, willed this to be here signed and witnessed unto all, A.D. MDLXXII. VI., 1st Sept."

This, there can be no doubt, implicates Rome more than had hitherto been supposed. If such expressions as "the counsel given to that end and the help sent" have any meaning, they must mean that the Roman Court was at least privy to the massacre, if not that it directly advised it. De Thou, Anquetil, Bouanni, testify to the joy of Rome at its accomplishment; and the denials of so many Roman writers, old and new, must go for very little, and seem to be of a piece with their denial of a plain fact: the existence of medals struck to commemorate the day. Of these medals, the one best known was struck at Rome, in silver and copper. The following description is kindly given by W. S. W. Vaux, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., late Keeper of Coins and Medals in the British Museum:—"Obverse. GREGORIVS. XIII. PONT. MAX. ANN. I. Head and shoulders of the Pope facing the left. Under the head of Pope, the letters F.P.

The remnant of the Protestants, recovering themselves, again took arms, and so bravely defended themselves in La Rochelle (March, 1573), that a treaty was entered into, and their worship licensed in that and three other towns. Charles IX. died in 1574—it has usually been said of remorse—and his brother and successor, Henry III., so fully conceded all the Protestant demands that a "Holy League" of Catholics was formed to oppose his action. This League the king tried to pacify by declaring himself its head; and for a short time there was again war between the Catholic and Protestant parties, after which a fresh treaty, slightly less favourable to the latter, was formed. The death, in 1584, of Henry III.'s last brother, the Duke of Anjou, was an event of importance, since the King of Navarre, who had again become a Protestant in 1576, now became heir to the throne. The League opposed him strongly, and the Duke of Guise, though ostensibly doing the same, really fought for his own hand, almost openly announcing his intention to dethrone Henry and assume the crown himself. Henry, however, could not break with Guise, and was forced to sign the Treaty of Nemours, revoking all edicts favourable to the Protestants. This yet again provoked hostilities, and a battle was fought at Contras (Oct. 20, 1587) between the army of the king and duke and that of the King of Navarre, with German allies. The royalists were successful; but Henry found that Guise carried off all the credit at Paris; and the League so intrigued in his favour, that Henry at last resolved to assassinate him. This was done Dec. 23rd, 1588; his brother, the Cardinal of Lorraine, was also murdered; and the result was an instant rebellion of the League, during which Catherine de Medici, almost unnoticed, died. The only resource left to Henry was to take the singular measure of concluding an alliance with the King of Navarre. These strange allies opened their campaign against the League; but before any engagement took place Henry was himself assassinated by the monk Jacques Clement, at the instigation of Guise's sister. He died August 2nd, 1589, and thus ended the dynasty of Valois. Henry of Navarre, now King of France, made good his title on the fields of Arques and Ivry (March 14th, 1590) against the League, under the Duke of Mayenne, next brother of the murdered Guise, and entered Paris, where he once more joined the Church of Rome, and in that communion remained. His policy, however, towards the Protestants was not that of persecution. Some reason to complain of injustice they had at first; but the Edict of Nantes, signed in 1598, placed them for the present on a permanent footing. Such is in part the brief history of the first seventy years of the French Reformation. To pursue it further is beyond the present purpose, and reference must be made to French Histories.

The chief authorities, of which some have been already mentioned, are the "Historia sui Temporis" of De Thou, Davila's "History of the Civil Wars," Agrippa d'Aubigné's "History of his own Times." In English, short and clear accounts of the ecclesiastical side of the question may be seen in Hardwick's "Church History of the Middle Ages, Reformation Period," and of the civil side in Mr. Jervis's "Students' History of France." Sir Nathaniel Wrexall's "History of the House of Valois," though he is not in himself by any means a high authority, is useful as far as others led him by the hand. Miss Yonge's "Cameos" are very trustworthy, and give a life-like view of the various situations; and for a somewhat idealised narrative, reference may even be made to the beautiful story, "The Chaplet of Pearls." Lastly, readers should be reminded of the fine use made of the event of the "massacre" by the late Dr. Pusey, in his famous sermon on "Quietness and Confidence," preached before the University of Oxford, Nov. 5th, 1837.

Baruli.—A sect of the ALBANENSES of the twelfth century. They held that the Son of God did not assume a body of flesh and blood, but a kind of celestial body of immaterial substance. They held also the curious opinion that all souls were created before the creation of the world, and all fell into sin together soon afterwards.

Basil and Emmelina, Srs.—The father and mother of St. Basil the Great. The date of the elder St. Basil's death is not known, but St. Emmelina died in A.D. 370. Their names are commemorated together on May 30th.

Basil, Sr. [A.D. 328—379], distinguished from his father and several others of the name by being designated "THE GREAT," a learned and pious Bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, who laboured earnestly for the extinction of misbelief and disunion in the Eastern Church. He was the grandson of four sufferers of noble ancestry in the Maximianian persecution, his maternal grandfather being a martyr, and his paternal grandfather, with his wife Macrina, having to leave his estate in Pontus for a banishment and concealment of seven years. St. Basil's father, an advocate and rhetorician, was also named Basil, and his mother Emmelina. They had five sons and five daughters. St. Basil was the oldest of the sons, St. Gregory of Nyssa another, and St. Peter of Sebasta third, all these three sons becoming bishops.

St. Basil the Great was born at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, where also he first received his education. From his native city he was sent to Constantinople, where he soon became known for his eloquence and goodness. On leaving Constantinople, he prosecuted a university life for five or six years longer at Athens, where he had St. Gregory Nazianzen for his friend and fellow-student. In his early life St. Basil settled as a teacher of rhetoric and a schoolmaster in Cæsarea, and was charged by his sister Macrina with some freedom of conduct and worldliness, induced by the admiration with which he was courted by all around. But a revulsion soon came, and then he adopted an ascetic life, his brother Naucratus having already become a hermit. Having visited the hermits of Egypt, Palestine, Cæle Syria, and Mesopotamia, he resolved fully to settle down in a monastic life at Neocæsarea, in Pontus, where his father's estates were situated: a place which he describes in glowing terms as full of natural beauty, and where the whole family appear to have lived together on their property with a kind of religious discipline. Here, and in the first instance among his own connexions, St. Basil established the system of cænobite, or common, life, in the place of the solitary, or hermit, life: the system thus established by St. Basil being an intermediate stage between the communities of "solitaries" established by St. Antony and the fully-developed Benedictine system of social communities which represents the monastic system of the Middle Ages. Under his rule, in the first instance, arose that life of combined industry and devotion which became the glory of Benedictine monasteries.

It was not until he was about thirty-six years of age, in A.D. 364, that St. Basil became a priest, though he had been a deacon for several years. He was ordained by Eusebius, the historian, Bishop of Cæsarea. He assisted Eusebius with his theological learning during a period of great difficulty, and on the Bishop's death, in 370, he was elected to the vacant see, thus becoming Bishop of his native place.

As Bishop of Cæsarea, St. Basil encountered much trouble and mortification through his abundant charity towards the Semi-Arians, and his too-confiding trust in their promises. His own orthodoxy came to be suspected by his Episcopal brethren, and his efforts at reconciliation were regarded as evidence that his sympathies were on the Arian side. When he showed great friendship for Eustathius, Bishop of Sebaste, who was more than suspected of Semi-Arianism, he himself was refused communion by Theodotus, Bishop of Nicopolis, and his own brother sided with Theodotus, severely blaming St. Basil for blindly and credulously accepting the professions of Eustathius, and for thus causing trouble to the Church, instead of really promoting charity. Eustathius soon afterwards declared himself openly to be of the Semi-Arian party, condemned the Nicene Creed, and attacked the doctrine of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. St. Basil was thus convinced of the error into which his charitable hopefulness had led him, and before his death he was reconciled to the more keen-sighted Theodotus. His single-hearted endeavours to bring about union were thus defeated, but his charitable intent was not unrewarded, for when the Emperor Valens, in his progress through Asia Minor, enforced Arianism wherever he went, he left the Church in Cappadocia unmolested. Another great effort of his life was directed to the reconciliation of the Eastern and Western Churches, which were already showing marked symptoms of those divergencies which were to end in a total breach. There were several points of difference, but that to which St. Basil directed himself was that of the Procession of the Holy Ghost. He died, however, without seeing the dispute settled, and it broke out fiercely afterwards.

St. Basil died on January 1st, 379, with the words of the Psalmist on his lips—"O Lord, into Thy hands I commit my spirit." His funeral was attended with such a concourse of people, Jews, Gentiles, and Christians, that many were suffocated in the crowd. He left behind him commentaries on the Scriptures, which have not come down to our time, and many homilies on the Psalms, a few of which survive. But the work by which he is best known is one in nine homilies on the opening chapters of Genesis, of which he entitled the Hexæmeron, or Six Days' Work of Creation. His whole writings, as known to us, occupy three folio volumes.

Basil, BISHOP OF ANCYRA, was a native of the city over which he eventually presided as bishop, and was originally a physician. He belonged to the Semi-Arian party, and was in the confidence of the Arian Emperor Constantius, but was deposed from his see by the Council of Sardica in A.D. 347, though he still held possession of it through his favour with the Emperor. He was, however, finally deposed by the Arians in 360, and he died in exile. St. Athanasius considered that his diversion from the Catholic faith was more in name than reality.

Basil, LITURGY OF ST. [LITURGIES.]

Basil, MONKS OF ST.—This is the most ancient order of monks, and is so called because the rule observed is that which St. Basil composed when he and his friends adopted the recluse life. Nearly all the monks of the East are still under this rule, and those who are in holy orders are called "Caloyers." There have also been many communities of them on Mount Athos, near the entrance of the Gulf of Corinth, from very ancient times; and in these monasteries, or "Cauras," the rule of St. Basil is observed in a very austere form.

Basil of Ancyra, St. [d. A.D. 362.]—A priest of the city of Ancyra, who vigorously opposed Arianism during the reign of Constantius, the son of the Emperor Constantine. For about thirty years he was extremely zealous in contending against Arian innovations of every kind, and in however high a quarter they might be supported. At length his opposition to the attempts which Julian the Apostate made to restore Paganism brought on him the personal fury of that Emperor when he was visiting Ancyra. By his order Basil was cruelly tortured, and at length burned to death with hot irons on June 29th, 362. He is commemorated in both Greek and Latin Martyrologies on March 22nd.

Basil of Bulgaria. [BOGOMILES.]

Basilians. [BASIL, MONKS OF ST.]

Basilica.—This word is a Latin form of the Greek word basilikē, which literally signifies a royal residence or palace; but in very early Christian times it came to be a common designation for a church, from the fact that when the Roman Empire became a Christian government, many buildings which had formerly been known as basilicas were turned into churches. These Roman basilicas were, however, not royal residences, but great halls of justice, being used for the administration of the law, and also as convenient places of shelter and promenade. They varied in size, but were sometimes very large, one which remains in ruins at Pompeii having been two hundred and twenty feet long by eighty feet wide, and about sixty feet high. This is an oblong building, with a nave, two aisles, a vestibule at one end, and an enclosure called the tribunal at the other: the Roman justice-hall thus containing the characteristic structural features of the churches of later date. [APSE.]

The experience furnished by these buildings as places of public assembly doubtless led to their appropriation as churches; and when churches began to be regarded as public buildings, and to be built on a grand scale by the Emperor Constantine and by wealthy private persons, the pattern of the basilica was still followed. Hence, among the old churches of Rome there are twelve which bear the name of basilicas, that of the Lateran, dedicated to St. John, being said to be of Constantine's foundation. The great Church of St. Peter was of a similar form until replaced by the present one in the sixteenth century, and so also was that of St. Paul, without the walls, both of these also having been commenced by Constantine. All these churches have been rebuilt, but the ancient basilican character is still preserved in that of St. Agnes. How that character was incorporated into the architecture of English churches will be seen in another article [CHURCH ARCHITECTURE]; but it may be mentioned, in conclusion, that Sir Christopher Wren introduced it into most of his churches, and that it has been revived in recent times. Examples of modern basilican churches may be seen in that of Wilton, near Salisbury, and that of St. Barnabas, in Oxford.

Basilides [A.D. 273].—A military martyr, mentioned by the ecclesiastical historian, Eusebius. He was an officer of the guards of Aquila, Governor of Egypt, and was ordered to superintend the execution of a Christian lady named Potamiana. He protected her from insult on the way, and she gratefully promised that when she came into the presence of her Saviour she would, in return, pray for his conversion. Not long afterwards Basilides declared himself to be a Christian, and was beheaded at Alexandria. He is commemorated on June 12th.

Basilidians.—The followers of the Gnostic leader, Basilides, who established a strange corruption of Christianity similar to that of Simon Magus, some time between the death of St. John and the middle of the second century.

Basilides was an Alexandrian, and learned in early life in the same school of philosophy as that in which Simon Magus was brought up, but he had also sat at the feet of Menander, and was thus brought into the direct current of thought which was headed by Simon. His system was an amalgamation of Pythagoreanism, the Oriental superstitions of India, and imperfect ideas of Christianity. At the head of the system was an imaginary Supreme Being, whom Basilides named "Abraxas," a name apparently suggested by some fanciful adaptation of the Greek numeral letters which spell the name Meithras: that given to the Persian iron-god. Thus, as the sum of the numbers represented by the letters of the name Meithras, $m + e + i + t + h + r + a + s = 4 + 5 + 10 + 9 + 100 + 1 + 200$ is 365, a number is arrived at which may be again distributed into seven numbers, when it is made into the word used by Basilides

$a + b + r + a + x + a + s = 1 + 1 + 100 + 1 + 60 + 1 + 200$. From Abraxas were descended personified attributes of God, Abraxas developing Understanding, Understanding the Word, and so on. From these again descended 365 orders of angels, and by the lowest of these angelic orders, among whom was the God of the Jews, the world was created. Other angels were the guardian angels of other nations, and when their dimensions brought in corruption, the Supreme sent down His Son Understanding, who joined Himself to the Man Jesus for the purpose of reforming corrupt man, and who was put to death by the God of the Jews. Many fanciful superstitions besides these entered into the system of Basilides, and what there was of Christianity in it was obscured or contradicted by them.

The Basilidians were little known beyond Egypt, but evidence that they spread to some extent seems to be involved in the fact that the name of Basilides and some of his doctrines were known in Spain two or three centuries later.

Basire, ISAAC [A.D. 1607—1676].—This venerable man, who was a native of Jersey, became in his later life chaplain to Charles I. and Archdeacon of Northumberland. Being driven from his benefices during the early part of the Great Rebellion, he took shelter with the king at Oxford; and when that city surrendered, he determined to go abroad for the purpose of making the principles of the Church of England known in the East. Setting out in the year 1646, he travelled through Greece, Palestine, and Mesopotamia, and was received with friendliness, and even distinction, by the Greek bishops and clergy, and by the Patriarchs of Jerusalem and Aleppo. On his way homeward, he was offered the Professorship of Theology in the University of Weissembourg, in Transylvania, and there he settled for several years. At the Restoration, Basire returned to England, and resumed his position as Archdeacon of Northumberland, dying in October, 1676. His efforts to restore open communion between the Eastern and the English churches fell to the ground.

Basile, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

Basile, COUNCIL OF. [PAPAL SCHISM.]

Basnage, BENJAMIN [A.D. 1680—1652], a native of Normandy, and a Huguenot minister there. He took refuge in England, and preached for some time at Norwich. He wrote a treatise on the Church, which was printed at La Rochelle in 1612.

Basnage, ANTONY [A.D. 1610—1691], the eldest son of the preceding, was a minister at Bayeux, but had to fly to Holland, spending his later days at Zutphen.

Basnage, SAMUEL [A.D. 1638—1721], the son of the preceding, was also a minister at Zutphen, and wrote some works on Church history.

Basnage, JAMES [A.D. 1653—1723], grandson of Benjamin, and son of Henry, a lawyer of some note, was a Protestant minister at Rouen. He wrote a large number of works bearing more or less on ecclesiastical history, including a "History of the Jews from the Time of our Lord," in many volumes; a "Church History," in two folio volumes; a "Treasury of Ecclesiastical and Historical Monuments," and a "History of the Old and New Testaments."

Bassus.—Saints of this name, and belonging to early periods of Church history, are commemorated on March 19th, October 20th, and November 23rd in Roman Martyrologies.

Bath.—This name was often given to the font, or piscina, or BAPTISTERY. It was also a symbolical name of baptism.

Bath and Wells, BISHOPRIC OF.—This is the ancient bishopric of Somersetshire, which was formed by cutting off the province or county of Somerset from the diocese of Sherborne, in the year 909. After several variations in the title of the see, and after its removal from the Collegiate Church of Wells to the Monastic Church of Bath, and back again, it was finally settled, in A.D. 1136, that the bishopric should be called that of Bath and Wells, the bishops being elected by the monks of Bath and the canons of Wells, and the two churches having equal honour as cathedrals. [WELLS, BISHOPRIC OF.] At the dissolution of the Monastery of Bath, however, no new foundation was made there, and it has never received a cathedral establishment; hence, Wells is the actual see, although Bath still keeps its place in the title of the bishops. The bishopric takes in the whole of the county of Somerset, its population in 1881 being 423,705, and the income of the bishop being fixed at £5,000.

The following is a list of the sixty-eight bishops of this see from its foundation to the present time.

The original Cathedral of Wells was the church of a college of secular canons, which had been established by King Ine in A.D. 704, near a spring dedicated to St. Andrew, and hence called "The Wells." This early cathedral, falling into ruins about the time of the Conquest, was restored and partly rebuilt by Bishop Robert [A.D. 1136—1166]. A few years afterwards an entirely new church was begun, and its erection having occupied the whole of the long episcopate of Bishop Jocelin [A.D. 1206—1242], the existing nave, transepts, the west front, and the lower part of the central tower were completed about 1250. The Lady Chapel and the upper part of the central tower were built between 1318 and 1326, the Presbytery between 1329 and 1363, and the two western towers between 1366 and 1424. The western portion, excepting the towers, is thus in the Early English style, and the eastern in the Decorated; and the cathedral, thus completed during the best period of English church architecture, is one of the most beautiful of English churches. One of its most striking features is the double arch, which was inserted in 1338 to support the central tower when it had shown signs of giving way.

The cathedral establishment of Wells consists of a dean, four canons, a precentor, chancellor, and treasurer, forty-two prebendaries, and three priest-vicars, or minor canons. The endowments yield an income of about £4,000 a year.

Bath, BISHOPRIC OF. [BATH AND WELLS, BISHOPRIC OF.]

Bathilda, St., or Baldochilde [d. A.D. 680].—The wife of Clovis III., King of the Franks, and the mother of Clothaire II., Childeric II., and Theodoric III. She was an English lady, but was captured, and carried to France as a slave. There she was married to the king about A.D. 640, but on his death became Regent of the kingdom, and remained so for many years. She used all her authority in endeavouring to discover and reform abuses in Church and State, and is highly commended by St. Gregory of Tours. Many churches and religious houses owed their foundation to her, and among them the celebrated Abbey of Corbie, in Picardy. When compelled to resign her post as Regent, Bathilda retired to one of the nunneries which she had founded near Paris, that of Chelles, where she died on Jan. 30th, 680, the day on which she is commemorated being that of her death.

Bâton.—The silver or ivory staff of a precentor, with which he beats time when leading the singing of services, anthems, or hymns on solemn festival occasions.

Bavon, St. [A.D. 589—653].—The patron saint of Ghent, in Flanders, and of Haarlem, in Holland, whose proper name was Allewin. He was of noble family, and having lived a profligate life, was converted by the death of his wife and the preaching of St. Amandus, and retired into the monastery of St. Peter at Ghent, where, and in secluded places near, he practised great austerities.

In his early days St. Bavon had been engaged, like John Newton, in the slave-trade, and it is related that when he began to lead a life of repentance, he saw one day coming towards him a man whom he had formerly sold. The pangs of remorse which seized him at the sight may be imagined. He threw himself at his feet, and cried aloud, "It is I who sold you, bound with thongs; remember not, I beseech you, the wrong that I did you, but grant me one prayer: beat me with rods and shave my head, as is done to thieves, and cast me bound hand and foot into prison."

This is the punishment I deserve; and perhaps, if you will do this, the mercy of God will grant my pardon." Nothing would content Bawon till the sufferer by his old injustice did as he was desired.

Bawdkyn.—A name given to the cloth of gold, which was so extensively used for church vestments, hangings, &c. The name was corrupted from Bagdad, Babylon, or Baldacca, whence the fabric was imported. [BALDACCHINO.]

Baxter, RICHARD.—One of the most famous Nonconformist divines of the Rebellion and Restoration. He was the only child of Richard Baxter, of Eaton Constantine, near Shrewsbury, and his wife, Beatrice, daughter of Richard Adenly, of Rowton, near High Ercall, and was born Nov. 12th, 1615, at Rowton, where he lived for nearly ten years with his grandfather before going home. His early teaching was from the readers at Rowton and Eaton Constantine (these were not the incumbents of parishes, but their substitutes, sometimes priests, sometimes only deacons, but not licensed to preach), of whom he gives no good account. "They read Common Prayer," he says, "on Sundays and Holy-days, and taught School and tipled on the Week-days, and whipt the boys when they were drunk, so that we changed them very oft." After that he went to school at High Ercall, and then to Wroxeter, but was never at a University, having instead a private tutor at Ludlow. This tutor, in 1634, persuaded him to try a courtier's life, and got him an invitation from Sir Henry Herbert, Master of the Revels. A month of it, however, was enough for Baxter; he returned to Shropshire, in 1638 was ordained deacon and priest by John Thornborough, Bishop of Worcester, became Master of Dudley School, and, after about nine months, curate of Bridgenorth. Though he had, on taking holy orders, already studied in some degree the question between the Church and Dissent, and had then inclined towards the former side, what was called the Et cetera Oath put him again upon the subject. This was an oath which Archbishop Laud's canons of 1640 required to be taken by all clerics and academics that they approved the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and would never consent to the alteration of its government by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, et cetera. The general Puritan dislike of Episcopacy was much aggravated by mysteries supposed to lurk in the shadow of the et cetera, and many clergy, Baxter among them, refused the oath, and were indeed confirmed in their dislike by it. But it was not widely enforced, by reason not only of the storm raised by it, but of the outbreaks against the Church, and generally of the approach of the Rebellion; and Baxter was, in 1640, made Lecturer of Kidderminster, the old vicar being sequestered. Though taking the side of the Parliament, he did not follow his party to extremes; and, indeed, in preaching before and conversing with Oliver Cromwell, he did not express himself at all strongly in his favour. Still, he could not be at peace at Kidderminster, but was more than once driven thence by the Royalists. Part of his time he spent at Gloucester, part at Coventry, and after the battle of Naseby, 1645, he entered the Parliamentary army as a chaplain, serving for two years. Leaving the army then on account of his health ("bleeding," he says, "a Gallon of Blood by the Nose"), he returned to Kidderminster, where he remained till the Restoration, when the old vicar was restored. During this time (1654) he was on the committee appointed by Oliver Cromwell's Parliament to settle what were the "fundamentals of religion." His Kidderminster life can be studied at large in his own Life and Times, edited by Matthew Sylvester, or in Calamy's "Life" of him, which is an abridgement of the above; and the reports of public disputations in which he was engaged may throw light on the difficult question as to what were his opinions.

At the Restoration of Charles II. he was known as a favourer of the monarchy, preached a thanksgiving service at St. Paul's, and was made a Chaplain-in-Ordinary (June 25, 1660). He now comes more into public notice; was a Royal Commissioner at the Savoy Conference for the revision of the Prayer Book (April 15—July 24, 1661), one of the sub-committee, three on each side, appointed during the proceedings as "disputants," and was requested by his party to draw up a substitute for the Prayer Book. This work, which he did alone in a fortnight, has always been excessively lauded by Evangelicals: "All who are competent judges allow it to be an excellent performance," says the Biographia Britannica; "One of the finest compositions of the ritual kind," says Dr. Johnson, "he had ever seen;" "Few better liturgies exist," said William Orme, Congregational minister, in his "Life of Baxter," 1830; but the Prayer Book is certainly one of the better liturgies which Mr. Orme allows to exist.

But before this, in October, 1660, the bishopric of Hereford had been offered to Baxter, and his letter to Lord Clarendon refusing it (dated 1st November) is in "Sylvester," p. 282. Before the Royal Declaration, he says, he should have thought it unlawful to accept it; this declaration, issued 29th October, announced the king's intention of associating the presbyters in many ways with the bishops, and so far changed Baxter's opinion; nevertheless, he refuses ("as because I am conscious that it will overmatch my sufficiency, and affright me with the remembrance of my Account for so great an Undertaking, &c., so specially because will it very much disable me from an effectual promoting of the Church's Peace"); and he concludes by asking that the old vicar of Kidderminster may be promoted, and he himself made vicar. But this was not done, and Baxter remained in London, officiating occasionally till the passing of the Act of Uniformity, May 19, 1662, when he refused his subscription, and thus formally left the Church of England. He lived quietly at Acton till the first Conventicle Act, passed in 1664, expired in 1670, and then began public preaching to his own party; but under the "Five Mile" Act, by which ministers were not allowed to come within five miles of a town, he was arrested and imprisoned for six months. He was released by habeas corpus, but in 1670 the second Conventicle Act was passed; still, in 1672 under the Royal Indulgence, Baxter resumed his preaching, and continued it at intervals of much opposition; at one time he was again indicted under the "Five Mile" Act, and a medical certificate saved him from imprisonment. At last, in 1685, he was committed on a charge of sedition, based on passages in his Paraphrase of the New Testament, in which he was supposed to have reflected on the prelates of the Establishment; and on the 30th of May he was tried in the King's Bench before Lord Jeffreys, Chief Justice, who treated him with the most scandalous insolence, and would not allow his counsel to speak. (See Macaulay's History, i. 240, People's Ed.) He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, but the next year received a pardon from James II., and from that time lived quietly till his death, on the 8th December, 1691. Though married in 1662, to Margaret Charlton, he had no children.

Baxter was a sort of religious free-lance, opposing many of those who for want of a better word have been called "his party" nearly as much as he did the Church herself. His religious system, as far as it differs from ordinary Protestantism, there is no one word to describe except Baxterianism, which has sometimes been used; it is roughly described as a mean between Calvinism (the well-known doctrine of predestination in its extreme form) and Arminianism (which is nearer to modern Church of England doctrine), and consists in drawing a distinction between those predestined at all events to salvation and those who may be saved by improving the grace conferred on them.

Baxter's works, the voluminous writings of a learned man, have not yet been collected, except the practical ones by William Orme, 1830. Some of the best known of them, as The Saints' Everlasting Rest, and The Call to the Unconverted, are perhaps now less read than formerly, but 150 years ago they were considered essential to devotional reading with the Bible and Prayer Book, the "Imitation of Christ," and the "Pilgrim's Progress." His few poems, published by Pickering, 1821, though there is much that is fine in them, are very uncertain; part of one, called the Valuediction, which has some very grand lines, given by Archbishop Trench in Household Poetry, p. 160; and the beautiful, too little known, hymn—

Christ leads us through no darker rooms
Than He went through before, is from a poem of his called The Covenant of Confidence of Faith. A list of his works is Calamy's "Life," i. 410.

Bayle, PIERRE DE, a French critic and writer of the second half of the seventeenth century, second son of Jean de Bayle, Protestant minister of Carla, in the south of France, was born November 18, 1647. When at the University of Toulouse for education he joined the Roman Catholic Church (March 19, 1669), but was afterwards reclaimed (August 21, 1670). On the 4th November 1675, he was made Professor of Philosophy at the Protestant University of Sedan, and held the post till the university was suppressed July 9, 1681, on which he left France and settled in Rotterdam. In the same year he was made Professor of Philosophy at the History there in the newly-erected "Illustrious School," but was deprived of his office in 1690, on the publication of a pamphlet called "Advice to Refugees," supposed, but without much reason, to be his, and considered politically to favour the French as against the Dutch.

Bayle was a leading man among French Protestants, and wrote a good deal on their side. In 1680 he published a dissertation on the Eucharist, in the form of an answer to a work by a Jesuit father, named de Valois, against the opinions of Des Cartes on the nature of bodies. In 1682 he wrote two works in reply to the History of Calvinism by Louis Maimbourg, a General Criticism, and an Apology for the Reformers, of which the former went to three editions in his lifetime and was continued and enlarged in 1685.

But it is not by his theological writings that Bayle is now known, or even by Mercure Galant and Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, some of the earliest of periodicals, "reviews," but by his "Critical and Philosophical Dictionary," published in 1695, and a second edition in 1702. It is a very learned and useful book, but ill arranged, sceptical in its tendency, and much disfigured by coarseness of more kinds than one; still it became very widely circulated, and translated into English as early as 1710, published in 1734, 5 vols. folio, and Biographia Britannica of 1747 was professedly written on its plan. Under the frontispiece (Bayle's portrait) in the English edition Latin distich, which thus translated show what opinion was once entertained of him:

This is that Bayle, whose writings, while they
We doubt if more delight or knowledge give.

Bayle died of diseased lungs, December 28, 1706. "The year," said a French literary journal, "could not conclude with a more auspicious loss to the Republic of Letters."

Beadle, BEDRELL : ONE WHO PROCLAIMS.—There are ecclesiastical beadles and secular beadles, parochial beadles and companies' beadles; there are also university bedells.

Generally speaking, the beadle is a summoning officer, the word having the same root as the verb to bid [BEDS]; and around this have grown other ministerial duties very various. Thus, a parish beadle may assist the churchwarden in seating the people in church or in keeping order, and a company's beadle may carry about all sorts of messages for his company.

At Oxford there were formerly three esquire bedells, called of Arts, Divinity, Law and Medicine; but now there is only one, with three ordinary bedells. In future there are to be two bedells and two sub-bedells. Their duties are to carry the vice-chancellor's maces before him, and to summon the congregations. At Cambridge there used to be three esquire bedells; now there are but two, elected by the Senate from qualified persons who are nominated by the Council of the Senate.

Beads. [ROSARY.]

Beadsman.—One who offers prayers on behalf of another.

"An holy hospital,
In which seven beadsman, that had vowed all
Their life to service of high heaven's King."
Spenser.

"In thy danger
Command thy grievance to my holy prayer;
For I will be thy beadsman."
Shakespeare.

[BEDSMAN.]

Beam, or ROOD-BEAM.—The ornamented beam which crosses the chancel where there is no chancel-screen, to hold the rood, or cross, or crucifix.

Beam-Light.—The lamp or candle hanging from the rood-beam in honour of the reserved Sacrament in Roman Catholic churches.

Beatific Vision.—The sight of God in His glory. It is a vision reserved as the crown of all privileges to those who have, or shall have, entered Heaven. Some theologians consider that the words, "No man hath seen God at any time" [John i. 18] are still true, and that the vision of His Person which was vouchsafed to Isaiah, Ezekiel, St. Paul, and St. John, was that of God the Son Incarnate, revealing Himself before and after His Incarnation in the form of His Glorified Manhood, "the King in His beauty" [Isaiah xxxiii. 17], "the First and the Last" [Rev. i. 17, 18]. After the consummation of Christ's work, those who enter into His Kingdom for ever will have a further privilege: "His servants shall serve Him, and they shall see His face; and His Name shall be in their foreheads" [Rev. xxii. 3, 4].

Beatification.—A preliminary and limited form of canonization, by which, not less than fifty years after his death, a person may receive the title of "blessed," though not that of "saint" until the long enquiries preceding canonization have been completed. [CANONIZATION.] Beatification establishes the person beatified as an object of saintly veneration to a particular order, community, or diocese, but not to the whole Roman Catholic world.

Beatitude.—A state of blessedness. [Lat. beatitudo, happiness.] It is the name given to the "Eight Beatitudes" proclaimed by our Lord in Matthew v. 1 et seqq.

Beatrice, St. [A.D. 303].—The sister of Saints Simplicius and Faustinus, who were beheaded in the Diocletian persecution, and their bodies thrown into the Tiber. St. Beatrice lovingly exerted herself to recover their bodies, and have them interred with Christian burial. For this she was condemned to death, and after escaping the fury of the persecutors for seven months, was eventually strangled in prison. The three martyrs are commemorated on the same day, July 29th.

Beatrice, St. [A.D. 1226].—An Italian nun of the thirteenth century, daughter of the Marquess Azo, and a collateral ancestress of the Royal Family of England. She is commemorated on May 10th.

Beausobre [A.D. 1659-1738].—Isaac de Beausobre was an eminent writer among the French Calvinists, or Huguenots, in the seventeenth century. He had been destined for the law by his family, but disliking that profession, he became minister at Chatillon-sur-Indre, in Touraine, in 1685. Having resisted too strongly for his safety the action of the laws against the Huguenots, he was compelled to fly, first to Rotterdam, and then to Deesau, where he became chaplain to the Princess of Anhalt. Afterwards he was invited to Berlin, where he became a royal chaplain. At seventy years of age he brought himself into much odium by marrying a young girl, and was suspended from his ministry for five years. During his suspension Beausobre wrote the most learned of his works, a "History of Manichæism," in two quarto volumes. Like nearly all the rest of his works, it is unfinished. He was much in controversy with the Lutherans and the Roman Catholics, and was considered the most learned Calvinist of his age.

B.C.—The recently instituted degree (at Cambridge) of Bachelor of Surgery (Baccalaureus Chirurgiæ). (See B.A. for the supposed derivation of Baccalaureus.)

B.C.L.—Bachelor of Civil Law. The first degree in the faculty of Law, described at Oxford by these initials; at Cambridge it is, or was, more commonly described as LL.B. (not L.L.B.), Legum Baccalaureus, thus including the other branches of law, as statute law and canon law; it is now, however, often simply written B.L.

B.D.—Bachelor of Divinity; in Latin, S.T.B., or Sanctæ Theologiæ Baccalaureus, the first degree granted in that faculty; granted only, of course, to those who are supposed to have made some progress in the study, and as a result, almost or quite always to those in holy orders, and those who have already graduated in Arts. There was formerly an exception to this latter rule at Cambridge, where clergy who had been members of the University for ten years were allowed by an Act of Queen Elizabeth to take the degree of B.D. without having taken any other; they might then go on like any other B.D. to the degree of Doctor. This was done away with by the statutes of 1858, reserving, of course, the rights of the existing "Ten-year Men." A B.D. degree of this kind was taken as lately as 1882, but it will probably be the last.

Becket, THOMAS.—Archbishop of Canterbury under Henry II. The story that his father was a Crusader and his mother a Moorish or Saracen princess, who followed the Crusader to England for his love, has long been given up: it is clearly what is now called a "folk-story," a legend which has attached itself to many people and been versified by poets from the mediæval ballad-writers down to Wordsworth. Thomas Becket's parents were Gilbert and Rose Becket, natives of Normandy; Gilbert settled in London early in the twelfth century, and about 1118 his son Thomas was born in the City, on the site, according to tradition, of the Mercers' Chapel in Cheap-side. He was educated at Merton Abbey, in Surrey, and afterwards at Oxford and Paris. He was then, as we should now say, engaged in business with his father and other London merchants, till, through some of the clergy, he was introduced to Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, and taken into his household. Receiving (doubtless from him) holy orders, he was presented to much preferment, of which the chief was the Archdeaconry of Canterbury; this he received in the year 1154. In October of that year Henry II. came to the throne, and Archbishop Theobald, doubtful of his devotion to the Church, resolved to place near him the Archdeacon, a most devoted Churchman. By his means, therefore, Becket was made Lord Chancellor in 1155, and at once went up to court; but though an earnest Churchman, he was not as yet widely known to be such, and the king believed that he would give him help in the task which he proposed himself, namely, the reform of the morals of the clergy. Becket also, though in grave matters an excellent politician and statesman, made himself very familiar with the king by throwing off his dignity as ecclesiastic (he was only in deacon's orders) and appearing as a soldier and courtier; and in the object which the king had specially in heart, he consented, when the whole realm was taxed, to levy it on ecclesiastical as well as secular property.

Archbishop Theobald died April 18th, 1161, and the king, then in Normandy, expected Becket to second him when Archbishop as he had done when Chancellor, resolved to give him the Primacy. Becket's reluctance was considerable; the course of conduct which the Chancellor, even though Archdeacon too, had thought himself at liberty to pursue, he knew that he could not follow as Archbishop, and he is said to have warned the king that he must oppose his policy. But whether because this warning was not given formally, seriously, or for what other reason, the king paid no heed to it; and though the prior monks of Canterbury were loth to do so, a mandate from Henry compelled them to elect Becket, on May 24th, 1162. The election was confirmed by the other bishops, with but one dissentient; Becket was consecrated Archbishop in Canterbury Cathedral on Trinity Sunday, June 3rd, and on August 10th received his pall.

And now that Becket is Archbishop, it will be right to give a few words to the condition of the Church over which he is to preside. King Henry's point was, as has been generally said, to repress the liberty of the clergy, speaking particularly, it was in the first instance to abolish the immunity which they claimed from secular courts. Their immunity was very great—whether as great as sometimes said may be doubted, but still, there was, no doubt, much of it, and a clerk who committed a sin or a crime invariably claimed exemption from a secular trial. We must remember that this exemption extended only to those whom we now understand to be clergy, bishops, priests, and deacons, even to those only in the minor orders of the Roman Church, nor yet only to all who taken the tonsure, but to the servants and dependents of all these also. In fact, to the words of Mr. Green, "the clerical order included in Henry's day the whole of the professional and educated classes." (Hist. of Eng. People, i., 164.) All these, therefore, stood their trials from ecclesiastical courts which could never inflict a capital penalty, and grievous crimes were thus often committed, and very inadequately punished. When the king determined to reform, Becket stood up to oppose him, upheld what he conceived the honour of the Church. He set himself against the king from the very first by resigning the Chancellorship immediately on his consecration; to which Henry replied by forcing him to resign the Archdeaconry, which he would have continued to hold in commendam : and though he had formerly consented to the taxation of Church property, Becket now opposed a compulsory tax on the lands of his see.

He was present, May 19th, 1163, at the Council of Tours, under Pope Alexander III., when the rights of the clergy were very distinctly put forth, and was thus strengthened for the strife. In October of that year the matter was broached by Henry at a Parliament at Westminster, where he demanded that criminous clerks should be degraded, and handed over to the secular power to be tried. The Archbishop agreed that a degraded clerk was amenable to this power, but held that his degradation was his punishment, and therefore he could only be tried again for a fresh offence : the other bishops were inclined to yield to the king, but Becket, by his indignant arguments, kept them from altogether doing so. At last the king asked in anger and plain words whether they would observe or not "the customs of the realm." Becket replied, "Saving my order;" and all the bishops said the same but one, who gave way without reserve. As they would give no other answer, Henry, in anger, dismissed the assembly. In private the bishops again wavered, and implored Becket to withdraw his condition; he spoke at first like St. Paul, "If an angel preach this doctrine, let him be accursed," but finding after a time that even the Pope was not with him (the Pope had his own quarrels with Victor IV., anti-pope, and could not break with Henry), he at last gave way, went to the king at Woodstock, and withdrew the words.

It was, of course, Henry's object to have the consent thus wrung from Becket publicly and formally given, and he therefore summoned the Council of Clarendon, 25th January, 1164, at which the same demand was made that the "customs" should be observed. Then came the question, what were the customs? and at length the sixteen Constitutions of Clarendon were drawn up, which may be found at length in various places: Johnson's English Canons, ii. 50; Landon's Manual of Councils, p. 133; and Canon Stubbs' translation in Select Charters, &c., is reprinted in Canon Perry's English Church History, p. 255. They were, of course, strongly on Henry's side; but as the one bearing on the actual point in dispute, the trial of clerks, was not very clearly expressed—did not explain whether a clerk could be tried twice, by the Church and by the State, or whether, if acquitted by the former, he could be re-tried by the latter—Becket's assent might have been continued if this had stood alone. But the whole body of the Constitutions were very different; giving a verbal assent to vague and uncertain customs, and a formal one to a written document, were also very different things: and thus Becket retracted his former assent. The other bishops gave theirs, and were most importunate with the Archbishop to do likewise; the king's anger was also very great, and there was, indeed, apparent danger of an appeal to arms; under these circumstances Becket again made his promise, and now swore his oath to observe the Constitutions. But he had no sooner done so than he repented bitterly: suspended himself as a penance from saying mass, and applied to Pope Alexander III. for absolution and dispensation from his oath, which was granted him. Henry's next plan was to apply to the Pope for a commission as legate to the Archbishop of York, a strong opponent of Becket; the Pope, wishing to keep well with both parties, endeavoured to trim; granted the legation (27th February, 1164), but privately assured Becket of his favour.

Thus far Becket had perhaps been not unfairly treated by the king; but now Henry, resolved upon ruining him, became quite unscrupulous; and though Becket on becoming Archbishop had received a formal acquaintance for all his expenditure as Chancellor, he was called on at the Council of Northampton, 6th October, 1164, to produce his accounts. He, of course, pleaded that this order had been given without his authority; and on the 13th October, Becket, in his pontificals, and with his crozier, went down to the council, formally appealed to Rome, and inhibited those bishops who were in the council, and therefore sitting in judgment on their metropolitan. The appeal was pronounced perjury, as contrary to Becket's oath to observe the Constitutions, and the inhibition treason, and sentence was about to be pronounced, when Becket repeated his appeal, and left the council. He then requested the king's license to leave the country, and on the king's declining to answer him, he departed the same night, October 13th. By slow degrees, and with very small attendance, he got down to the coast at Estry, between Sandwich and Deal, and thence across the Channel to Gravelines, on November 3rd: ambassadors whom Henry sent on the subject to the King of France, Louis VII., and the Pope, crossed from Dover to Calais on the very same day. But both King and Pope at once declared on the side of Becket; the Pope (Alexander III.), formally condemned the Constitutions of Clarendon, and Becket, to make his position stronger, formally resigned to and received back from him the Archbishopric of Canterbury.

When all this became known to Henry, his wrath was great; he sequestered all the revenues of Becket's see into the charge of one Randulf de Broc, and with a high hand banished from England all his relations and dependents; he also, in concert with the Emperor Frederick I. (Barbarossa), proclaimed the anti-pope Pascal III., who had succeeded Victor. Becket meanwhile took to studying Canon Law at Pontigny, and when Henry came to France, in 1165, he thrice cited him to submission in terms of gradually increasing severity. The summons was, of course, disregarded by the king, and Becket would have at once excommunicated him, but for a temporary inhibition from the Pope. When this expired, he, in the Cathedral of Vezelay on Ascension Day, 2nd June, 1166, solemnly excommunicated by name, not indeed the king—Henry was dangerously ill at the time—but all his other most powerful enemies, and generally all who upheld the Constitutions of Clarendon, thus including the king, and indeed almost the whole nation, and caused the sentence to be published in England. Henry, in answer, threatened with confiscation and expulsion the Cistercian Order which was now sheltering Becket, and thus forced him to leave Pontigny; but he was received at Sens itself, and so became more conspicuous than ever.

At this time Alexander III. had his own bad fortune, by the Emperor's invasion of Rome and enthronement of the anti-pope Pascal; and Henry, who cared neither for Pope nor anti-pope, except so far as his allegiance to either helped him against Becket, returned again to Alexander's party, and thus forced him to disown Becket. But in the next year, 1167, the Emperor was forced by pestilence to evacuate Rome, and Alexander was freer to act; he had already issued a commission to two cardinals to settle the dispute, and the year 1168 was taken up with repeated attempts, through these and other commissioners, to do so. Henry also sent repeated embassies to the Pope, and although Becket bitterly complained of the concessions which were granted them, a meeting was at last arranged between the king and the primate at Montmirail, 6th Jan., 1169. Becket had proposed to substitute for his old reservation, "saving my order," the words "saving God's honour;" the mediators had opposed even this, and Becket had seemed to yield; still, however, when he met the king and pronounced his submission, he added, after a pause, "saving God's honour." This again broke off the whole thing, and Becket a second time turned to excommunication; he passed the sentence on the Bishop of London and others; and Alexander tried issuing a fresh legatine commission. This did little better than those which went before, and all through 1169 and 1170 the dispute dragged on.

At last, in the latter year, Henry resolved to have his eldest son crowned as co-king; this was done on Sunday, 14th June, by the Archbishop of York, who produced an authorising brief from the Pope, of the genuineness of which there is some doubt; and Becket was more furious than ever at this invasion of his privileges. A reconciliation would have seemed utterly impossible; but, as usual with unexpected things, it suddenly came about. The only way, however, of accounting for it is that which is stated by one of the biographers, that Henry at last perceived the Archbishop might be better managed in England than out of it; probably also he greatly dreaded the threatened interdict. Thus on the 22nd July they met at Fretteval; Becket, finding the alteration in the king's tone, altered his also, and a general reconciliation was made, all disputed matters being passed over lightly handled. Some months were occupied in preparations for Becket's return to England; and on the 1st Dec. he crossed from Wisissant to Sandwich. But he had obtained letters from Alexander excommunicating suspending the Archbishop of York and other bishops, and had sent them before him. This was the primary cause of his death; he was met with a demand that he should absolve them; he refused, and the bishops appealed to the king, who was still in Normandy. King Henry should be careful of their words; just 400 years after, Charles IX.'s hasty words caused the St. Bartholomew Massacre; so now Henry II.'s hasty words caused the Archbishop of Canterbury's murder. "Will none of you," he called out in a rage, "deliver me from this turbulent priest?" It is certain that he did not intend a murder, and it is probable that the four gentlemen of his bedchamber, who resolved to attempt the "deliverance," did not intend it either; but however true it may be, Reginald Fitzurse, Hugh Morville, William de Tracy, and Richard le Breton, constantly left Bayeux, and hastened to England, most likely without any fixed purpose, except to be guided by circumstances.

This closing scene may be best studied either in Dean Hook's "Life," or in Dr. Stanley's "Memorials of Canterbury." Four knights crossed in two parties, landed at Dover, two at Winchelsea, and met at St. Wood Castle, the house of Randulf de Becket's chief enemy and sequestrator of the see, on the 28th Dec. The next day, taking some military precautions, they went to Canterbury, and entered the Archbishop's presence unarmed, that is, without swords. They challenged him to absolve the bishops; he refusing, referring them to the Pope, and standing, as ever, on the Church's rights, passion gradually got the better of them, and they at last rushed out for swords. The Archbishop was implored by the monks and others with him to take sanctuary in the cathedral church; this he refused till vespers began, when he, as usual, went to attend the service. He would, as was afterwards thought, and as is most likely, have taken his place at the High Altar, but the knights bursting in, overtook him in Benedict's Chapel, and there, after he again refused absolution to the bishops, threatened his life. For fear of sacrilege they would have dragged him out of the church; but Becket exerted his strength to resist, and his own passion unhappily rivalling he called Fitzurse a coarse name. From irritated by this and the resistance, the knights now fell upon him and slew him; he died, commending his soul to God; and they then returned to Saltwood, and at last to Knareborough, where Hugh Morville lived. Becket was solemnly and mournfully buried in the midst of enthusiasm and regret; in 1173 he was regularly canonised, and till the Reformation St. Thomas of Canterbury was greatly venerated in England. In 1538, however, Henry VIII., who naturally did not at all like such a vigorous defender of the Church and of Rome, actually went through the absurd farce of trying the murdered saint for treason before the Privy Council. As he was, of course, condemned, his tomb was rifled, his relics burnt, his office so completely expunged from all office-books that it is hardly to be found undefaced in one of those that remain, his day (December 29th) also being deleted from the calendar. This, of course, remains in the Church of Rome, but it was never restored, even as a "black-letter day," to the English Common Prayer Book; it is, however, found in the calendar of Queen Elizabeth's Præces Privatae, 1564, and was often inserted in ordinary almanacks, and in calendars published by the Stationers' Company under the authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury down to 1832.

The first great conflict in England between Church and State ended in favour of the former, for Becket's murder undid most of what Henry had done or attempted to do, so violent was the ecclesiastical reaction which it caused. The king himself was obliged to do abject penance, and, as has been said, the Archbishop's memory was worshipped in a way which came something near to madness. For the next century the power of the Church—that is, of Rome—grew apace; and then began the struggle for the national independence of the English Church from the State of England on the one hand, and the Church of Rome on the other.

Becket's character has, perhaps, been sufficiently seen already: it is that of a proud, haughty man, conscious of his failing, and sometimes struggling with it, but unable to distinguish between his own individual pride and the pride of his order. By the latter he was indeed actuated all through his contest with the king, but by the former his judgment was blinded, and he was incapable of seeing how the latter should have been best asserted. Still, though the name of martyr is not rightly given him, he stands out a grand figure in history; and the Church owed to Becket her preservation from becoming a creature of the King's tyranny. Besides the two works already referred to, there is a learned and careful biography of Becket by the late Canon Robertson.

and the father of English Church History, now commonly called the Venerable.* Very little, if anything, is known of his life beyond his own few words affixed to his Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, and of his death a most beautiful account remains by his secretary, Cuthbert. Bede was born in 672 in that north country where his whole life was spent; at seven years old he entered the Monastery of St. Peter's, Wearmouth, then newly founded (674) by BENEDICT BISCOF, its first abbot; and when St. Paul's, Jarrow, was built by the same founder, in 682, he was transferred to it under Abbot Ceolfrid. Here he remained all his life, with, as far as is known, very few and short absences. He was made deacon in 691 by ST. JOHN OF BEVERLEY, Bishop of HEXHAM, by a faculty, as we should say, being only nineteen, and in 702 was ordained priest by the same bishop, and occupied himself with the work of a priest and a monk, reading, writing, and teaching. He died "in harness" on Ascension Day, May 28, 735. Suffering greatly from asthma, he worked to the very last at dictating to Cuthbert his translation of St. John; and that which followed cannot be given in other than the pathetic words of the Rev. G. F. Browne, in his Fathers for English Readers: The Venerable Bede:—"In the evening his boy-scribe said to him, 'One sentence, dear master, is left unfinished.' He bade him write quickly. Soon the boy announced that it was finished. 'True,' the dying man said, 'it is finished. Take mine head between thy hands and raise me. Full fain would I sit with my face to my holy oratory, where I was ever wont to pray, that sitting so I may call on my Father.' And so he sat on the floor of his cell, and chanted, 'Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost.' And as he breathed the words 'the Holy Ghost,' he died."

Bede's chief work is, of course, the Ecclesiastical History, which is our only authority for the time: it has been reprinted many times, and translated often; the translation now easiest of access is that of Dr. Giles, in Bohn's "Antiquarian Library." At the end may be seen Bede's own list of his works, chiefly comments and biography: they are almost all extant; but the translation of St. John is gone.

Bede was buried at Jarrow, but in the eleventh century his relics were removed to Durham, where they reposed for a time, with those of St. Cuthbert, in the feretory behind the altar. In the twelfth century they were removed to a shrine erected for them in the Galilee, at the west end of the nave. They are believed still to remain under a massive

* This title was not peculiar to Bede, though it is only in his case that it is now usually applied. It was a frequent description of holy but uncanonised men, and it is needless to repeat the stories (for the famous one of the epitaph filled up by the angel is not the only one) which have been invented to account for it.

Bede, Beda, or Beda [A.D. 672—735].
—The well-known monastic priest and student of the seventh and eighth centuries, table tomb, on the slab of which the ancient inscription has been reproduced in large modern characters—

"HAC SUNT IN FOSSA, BEDÆ VENERABILIS OSSA."

The marble slabs which formed the base of the shrine are part of the pavement between two columns in the south arcade of the nave. Bede's festival is observed on May 27th.

Bede-house.—An alms-house; so-called because it was a condition that those who got the benefit of the founder's charity, in the form of maintenance, clothes, and lodging, should in return give him the benefit of their charity in the form of prayers for his soul, whether before or after his death.

Bedell, BISHOP [A.D. 1570–1642].—An English divine of some distinction in respect to efforts which were made by James I. to bring about friendly relations between the Churches of England and Rome. He accompanied Sir Henry Wotton as chaplain on his embassy to Venice, where he became intimate with Father Paul, and also with Antony de Dominis, the learned, but unstable, Archbishop of Spalato, who afterwards became Canon of Windsor and, having recanted his conversion to Anglicanism, died in the prison of the Inquisition at Rome. Little notice was taken of Bedell at home until he was comparatively an old man, when, in the year 1627, he was appointed Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1629 was, through the efforts of Laud, consecrated Bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh, in Ireland. During his occupation of this see he made earnest endeavours to reconcile the Irish to the principles of the Reformation, causing the "Book of Common Prayer" to be used in the Irish language, and also circulating an Irish version of the Scriptures. Had his conduct been generally followed, there would probably have been much less heard of Popery in Ireland. He also endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation of the Calvinists and the Lutherans, showing his strong desire to promote unity in religion. When the rebellion broke out in 1641, Bishop Bedell was at first allowed to live in comparative peace, but upon his refusing to dismiss those who took shelter with him, and who were obnoxious to the Parliamentarians, he was treated with great severity. At the end of 1641 he was imprisoned for three weeks, celebrating the Holy Communion in prison on Christmas Day. A few days afterwards he was exchanged, but his health had broken down with the hardships which he had been made to endure, and he died on February 7th, 1642. Respect was shown to him at the last even by those who had caused his death, and a Roman Catholic priest who attended his funeral in Kilmore Churchyard was heard to exclaim, Sit anima mea cum animâ Bedelli.

Bedes.—An old English word "prayers," derived from the verb "to bidden" or "pray." [Anglo-Saxon, biddan.] There is accidentally a similarity of sound between "bedes" in this sense and "beads," formed into a rosary and used for counting prayers, there is no etymological association between the two words.

Bedes, BIDDING THE.—Literally, means "praying the prayers." It was the name of the popular Sunday and Festival Service of the mediæval Church of England. The "prayers" were said or sung about nine o'clock in the morning, after mass had been celebrated, and consisted of three parts, most, if not all, being said in English. The first part consisted of a procession, in which the officiating clergyman, attended by the clerk, or acolyte, bearing a vessel of blessed water, and by the singers, walked in procession down the nave of the church, the priest sprinkling the congregation with the water, while the choir sang anthems or hymns. The second part consisted of a form in which the congregation were bidden to pray for all sorts of conditions of men, living and departed, several collects, and the versicles that are used at Morning and Evening Prayer. The third part consisted of a sermon; after which the congregation were dismissed.

Attendance at this service held the place with the agricultural and trading population that the once-a-day morning or evening service does at the present time. The more devout attended mass early in the morning as well.

Bedes-men.—The inmates of such establishments as that mentioned under Bede-houses. Some of them, in black or purple gowns, may be seen in cathedrals during Divine Service, or acting as deputy vergers.

Bedford, BISHOP OF.—There is no diocese of Bedford, but the title is used as that of a suffragan or assistant bishop to the Bishop of London. In the year 1537 John Hodgkins was consecrated with this title; in later years he assisted at the consecration of Thomas of Westminster [1540], Knight of Bath [1541], Bush of Bristol [1542], Man of Sodor [1546], Ridley of Rochester [1547], Coverdale of Exeter, Scory of Rochester [1551], Parker of Canterbury, and eight other bishops [1559], and he was thus an important link between the Episcopate before and after the Reformation. In the year 1879, William Walsham How was created Suffragan to the then Bishop of London (Dr. Jackson), with the same title, Bedford, being one of the suffragan sees authorised by the Act of Henry VIII., under which such assistant bishops are appointed. [SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS.]

Bees, or Bega, St. [about A.D. 650].—Irish saint who was foundress of St. Bees Abbey, near Whitehaven. Her legend nar-

of her that she "was a pious and religious lady abbees, who, with some of her sisters, was driven in by stormy weather at Whitehaven, and, the ship being cast away in the harbour, was left destitute. And so she went to the lady of Egremont Castle for relief. That lady, a godly woman, pitied her distress, and desired her lord to give her some place to dwell in, which he did at the now St. Bees. And she and her sisters sewed, and spinned, and wrought carpets and other work, and lived very godly lives, as got them much love. She desired Lady Egremont to desire her lord to build them a house, and they would lead a religious life together, and many would join with them if they had but a house and land to live upon. Wherewith the Lady Egremont was very well pleased, and spoke to her lord; he had land enough, and should give them some to lye up treasure in heaven. And the lord laughed at the lady, and said he would give them as much land as snow fell upon the next morning and on Midsummer Day. And on the morrow he looked out at the castle window to the sea side, two miles from Egremont; all was white with snow for three miles together. And thereupon builded this St. Bees' Abbey, and gave all those lands was snowen unto it, and the town and haven of Whitehaven." A St. Bega, or St. Bees, is commemorated on September 6th, and another on November 22nd, and there is no real historical information as to the person intended.

Bees', St., COLLEGE OF.—A theological college, founded in the year 1816 by Law, Bishop of Chester, for the purpose of providing the north of England with a better-educated class of clergy. The poverty of the endowments of the Church of England in the Lake Country was such that few clergymen could be found who were able to live on them and to bring up families in that wild country. So difficult was it to provide for the religious instruction of out-of-the-way parishes in Cumberland, that it was customary for village tradesmen or parish clerks to read the service and a sermon, and to take the small stipend intended for a parish clergyman. The Bishop of Chester, to put an end to this custom, ordered men to serve such parishes on a very low educational qualification, and at length accepted education at the grammar-school of St. Bees as a step upward in the standard. Bishop Law at last took steps for the foundation of a theological college, and by the co-operation of the Earl of Lonsdale parts of the old church and monastery were appropriated to the purpose. The course of instruction extends over two years, and those who have passed their examinations at St. Bees are now entitled to offer themselves as candidates for the degree of B.A., after one year's residence in the University of Durham.

Beghards and Beguines.—These were voluntary societies of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, which were formed respectively by men and women for the furtherance of personal piety without living a distinctly monastic life. They were, however, affiliated to the Friars as brethren and sisters of a lay, or "third," Order of the Dominicans and Franciscans, hence called "Tertiaries." They appear to have sprung up about the same period both in France and in the Netherlands, but no trustworthy historical account of their origin is extant. The Beguines, or women societies, appear to have been the earliest; and it has been not unreasonably supposed that the great mortality caused by the plague may have suggested a certain amount of asceticism, and that the loss of men in the Crusades may have left many widows and other women who sought after a religious life as their only consolation, but yet did not care to take the vows in monastic communities. There is no doubt that the Beguines and Beghards were respectable in their origin, and it is equally certain that there was a very large body of persons calling themselves Beghards who became thoroughly disreputable, and were mere vagrant beggars. Some, indeed, have supposed that the name by which they were known was given to them at first because of their hard or earnest begging in prayer, but that, on the degeneracy of the order, it clung to them in a different sense, as mere hard beggars of alms; but neither this nor any other explanation of the name is satisfactory, and perhaps it had a personal origin, which is not now known, and which was lost through the many forms of nickname into which it was perverted.

The original Beghards were certainly allied, at a very early period of their existence, with the fanatical, communistic, and licentious communities known as the FRATICELLI and the BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT. They professed to keep the strict Franciscan vow of poverty; but what this vow came to in their case was that agricultural labourers and workmen left their industries by which they earned wages, and wandered about idly in crowds, crying, "Bread for the love of God!" and thus living on the wages or the wealth of others. Public opinion respecting their immorality is shown by one of the nicknames given to them: that of "Sisterers," or "Schwestriones." They appear to have had their headquarters at Cologne, to have spread along the banks of the Rhine, and to have thence overrun France and the Netherlands. They were condemned by Councils held at Cologne in A.D. 1306, at Trèves in A.D. 1310, and at Strasburg in A.D. 1317. In a Bull issued by Pope John XXII. in A.D. 1330, they are described as persons who had wandered away from the Catholic faith, despised the sacraments, and sown abundant errors. Hence they have been claimed as Protestants, and this opinion has been strengthened by the fact that many were burned by the Inquisition in the fourteenth century. But well-informed writers, like Ullmann, in his work on "Reformers before the Reformation," have shown that the Beghards were profligates of the worst description even in their professedly religious services, advocating and practising community of the sexes in a most offensive form, and being far too discreditable in their principles and practices to be claimed with satisfaction by any professing Christians.

Beguines.—An order of sisters of mercy, best known in Belgium, where they serve the hospitals and engage in other works of charity. They are said to have been founded by St. Begga, Countess of Brabant, in the seventh century, but this assertion seems to have no historical foundation. They take the vows of chastity and obedience for a year, at the end of which they can either renew them or return to "the world" as ordinary members of society.

Begutte.—The old Dutch form—equivalent to the English word "bigots"—of the name BEGHARD.

Behmen, or Boehme, JACOB [A.D. 1575—1624].—A German mystic, who began life without any education, first in the fields, next as a shoemaker's apprentice, a working cobbler, and then, at twenty-nine years of age, as a master-shoemaker, but who attained to a strange influence over religious thought in Germany and in England, and left behind him Theosophic writings which fill ten volumes.

Jacob Behmen was born of humble parents at Allseidenberg, a village near Görlitz, in 1575, was set to work in the fields, without any education whatever, until he was ten years of age, and at twelve was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Görlitz. Even at this early age he had visions, and was told by a mysterious stranger to whom he sold a pair of shoes that little as he was he should become great, and such a one as the world should wonder at. At nineteen years of age he married; four sons were born to him, and at twenty-nine he set up a shop for himself, and appears to have maintained himself and family by his trade as a shoemaker all his life. He began to write soon after he was thirty years of age, his first work being "Aurora, or the Morning Redness," which was first circulated in manuscript, and attracted so much attention as to be denounced from the pulpit by the leading divine of Görlitz. This was not published for seven years, and during that period he obeyed the order given to him to write no more. Afterwards he printed his "Description of the Three Principles of the Divine Being." It was probably this work which caused him to be summoned before the Elector of Saxony, who appointed six Doctors of Divinity to examine him. But in this examination he won the good opinion of all, and was dismissed as a gentle enthusiast, would harm no one, even by his strange teaching. Shortly after this, he died in town where he had spent most of his life.

Jacob Behmen's writings utter in their way the deepest philosophical conceptions, and are the work of a thoroughly spiritual mind. Their phraseology is drawn from Scriptures, with a large admixture of mystical chymistry then in use. They consist of speculations on the Deity and the origin of things, and are delivered in the form of revelations. There is much in them respecting the duality of all created things, the union of the Divine nature with soul. No doubt Behmen had read and was influenced by the writings of medieval Mystics, and of Paracelsus, a writer new to his own date; but he must also have access to the speculations of the Primitive Gnostics, which constantly show themselves in his works, especially as regards Dualism and the origin of things. In recent times his writings have influenced Hegel, who placed Behmen at the head of modern philosophy. In England, his chief disciples were William Law, who so greatly influenced the mind of John Wesley, and Jane Lead, the founder of the society of the PHILADELPHIANS. In the middle of the present century his works were enthusiastically studied and circulated. Walton, a goldsmith on Cornhill, and now may be learned respecting the principles of both Behmen and Law from Walton's "Introduction to Theosophy." [THEOSOPHISTS.]

Belfry.—The tower or other place where bells are hung. The primæ facie derivation of the word from bell, though the question cannot be considered settled, is perhaps the whole, the correct one. Notes and Queries throughout 1882 gives an exhaustive discussion of the point; but though good modern authorities are of a different opinion, it is quite possible that the "beffrois," the battering-towers or watch-towers, are derived from "belfries," and not vice versa. But not the truth be that there is an ancient fusion between two different words? The varying forms of mediæval Latin, bertes and belfredum, induce such a suspicion.

It is clear that as soon as the bells attached to any ecclesiastical building increased in number, a special place would be necessary for them, and that this would assume the form of a tower it is also easy to see; many reasons, especially the facilitating of the spreading of sound, would lead to it. It gives us the earliest examples of bells as parts of churches: some at Ravenna, Rome are attributed to the sixth and seventh centuries; and even in England some much later may be found, as the Jarrow and Wearmouth, the homes of the monks. There are also to be found instances of detached towers, more properly, perhaps, campaniles: one very fine and large one Bede's, Suffolk; old St. Paul's and Salisbury are other cases.

The "baptism," or blessing, of bells is to be found under "Bells, Baptism of;" but there was also a separate benediction of the tower; see Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesiis Ritibus, ii. 298, where an office for the purpose is given from a Rheims pontifical.

There is no doubt that the belfry and bells are as much under the incumbent's control as any other part of the church, but he is bound to allow access for all purposes connected with the church; how far for other purposes does not seem to be decided. At the same time, he is bound to take all precautions to preserve order and decorum.

Belgic Confession. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

Bellarmino, ROBERT [A.D. 1542-1621].—This distinguished Roman Catholic controversialist was born at Monte Pulciano, in Tuscany, on October 4th, 1542, being a nephew on the maternal side of Pope Marcellus II. He became a Jesuit in A.D. 1560, and was soon known as a famous preacher while yet only a deacon; he was ordained priest at Ghent in 1569. He was the first Jesuit who took academical status as a theologian, and this he did at the University of Louvain, in 1570. Upon his return to Rome in 1576, Pope Gregory XIII. appointed him Lecturer in Controversial Theology in the new college which he had just founded, and Sixtus V. sent him, with Cardinal Cajetan, into France, to act as Theologian to the Embassy if any controversy should arise with the Protestants. At the end of ten months Bellarmine returned to Rome; in 1598 he was made a cardinal; and in 1601 was appointed Archbishop of Capua. After four years he resigned the see for the Librarianship of the Vatican, and would have been elected Pope, but for the fear that his position as a Jesuit would give him a too-overwhelming power. He died at the age of 69, on September 17th, 1621, leaving a great reputation, especially through his "Body of Controversy," in three folio volumes. In three other folios his miscellaneous works are printed, containing some commentaries on the Psalms and sermons, and some works (amongst others) against James I., under the pseudonym of "Matthew Tortus," which was answered by Bishop Andrews, in a work entitled "Tortura Torti." Bellarmine uniformly took the Ultramontane form of Romanism in controversy, and called ecclesiastical authority to such a height as made him very unacceptable to civil rulers. But combative as he was, he left the good saying behind him that "an ounce of peace is better than a pound of victory." There was a strong popular feeling for his canonisation, but this was never granted by the Court of Rome, notwithstanding the great literary services which he rendered at a very critical period, when Rome still entertained some hopes of recovering the Church of England.

Bell, Book, and Candle, CURSING BY.

—The popular way of expressing the ceremonies with which excommunication was pronounced. The "book" was that from which the sentence or form of excommunication was read; the "candle" was kept lighted during the time that it was being read, and then cast upon the ground and extinguished, to symbolise the expulsion of the sinner's light, or "candlestick," from the Church of God until he should repent; and the "bell" was rung, or sometimes the whole peal of bells, with a discordant clangour, as an advertisement to those outside the church of what was going on within.

Similar ceremonies were also used at exorcism, and thus the same phrase came to be used for it. [EXORCISM].

Bells.—The ecclesiastical use of bells appears to date from that time when liberty of worship was first given to Christians, and so comes chiefly into notice after Constantine the Great; it is clear that so long as their assemblies were to be as private as possible no such notice could have been courted as a bell must draw on them. This use of bells, to summon to religious services, was their first and principal use; thus Gregory of Tours mentions a bell calling French monks to matins in the fifth century. In England also they are known about the same time, Bede (Ecc. Hist., iv. 23) relating that on the death of St. Hilda, Abbess of Whitby, the passing bell was heard by her nuns at a distance. The earlier bells, of which many remain, were made of iron, and four-sided: such is the "bell of St. Patrick," still existing at Armagh, and one of the oldest known, dating from the sixth century. These were, of course, small, though not mere handbells; larger bells and "bell metal" (copper and tin) were of later introduction. The largest bell in England is the quite modern "Great Paul," hung in the south-western tower of St. Paul's Cathedral; but the enormous Russian bells are far larger than this or any other, the great bell of the Kremlin, which was broken, never hung, and probably never sounded, being more than twenty feet across.

Some of the ceremonial uses of bells are summed up in the well-known lines—

"Funera plango, fulgura frango, sabbata pango, Excito lentos, dissipio ventos, paco cruentos," which the Church historian, Fuller, thus translates:—

"Men's deaths I tell
By doleful knell;
Lightning and thunder
I break asunder;
On Sabbath all
To church I call;
The sleepy head
I raise from bed;

The winds so fierce
I do disperse :
Men's cruel rage
I do assuage."

For bells as connected with the dead, see the article BURIAL; for their well-known use in excommunications, see BELL, BOOK, AND CANDLE. The small bell which was rung at the elevation of the host during mass remains in several places: sometimes, as at Great St. Mary's, Cambridge, placed in the tower among other bells; sometimes, as at Over, in that county, in its original place between the nave and chancel; but this custom was not of very early date. In processions also, especially where the host was borne, as to a sick man, bells were carried and rung. Lastly, the belief that the ringing of bells tends to disperse tempest was very ancient.

Bells, Baptism of.—There can be little doubt that bells have, like all other Church property and ornaments, if not invariably, yet very frequently, received some kind of consecration by a rite of benediction. Before the Reformation such an office was accompanied with many more ceremonies than at present; and from the holy water which was used, also from the giving a name to the bell, and the appointing "sponsors" (probably at first the donors of the bell), it often acquired the name of the "baptism" of the bell. These additions to the rite, travestying as they do the rites belonging to Baptism, were, and are, some of the most unsatisfactory ceremonies of Roman ritual, and are very tamely explained by Roman writers. Thus Martene (De Antiquis Ecclesie Ritibus, ii. 297) says that bells are said to be baptised, not because they are really baptised with a baptism for the remission of sins, but because the same ceremonies are used: which means nothing, being a mere statement of fact, without accounting for or justifying the fact. The rite itself dates from the eighth or ninth century, but the ceremonies associated with it are somewhat obscure in their origin. Possibly some light may be thrown on the connexion of ideas by a benediction in the Leofric A.S. Missal (ed. Warren, p. 6), where prayer is made that the bell may be "sprinkled with the dew of the Holy Spirit." The Sarum Form is given in Maskell, i. 155, and an early French one in the Martene cited above; for other references, see Smith's "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," under "Bell."

Bema.—This is a Greek word, meaning "a raised place," or "tribune," and is the ancient name by which in the Eastern Church the platform used for the clergy and singers, and answering to an English chancel, is designated.

carved basin at or near a church door which holds the blessed water for the use of the worshippers as they enter. It was introduced into England in the fifteenth century, but the usual and ancient English name was "holy-water stoup." [WATER.]

Benedicite.—The Canticle at Morning Prayer alternative to the Te Deum: so called, like all other canticles, and the whole Psalter, from its first word in Latin. In its origin it is a part, not the whole, of the song which, in the Greek and Latin translations of the Bible, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego sang in the furnace of fire [Dan. iii.]. In the original Hebrew this song does not exist, and therefore in modern English Bibles it is placed, with other like books and parts of books, in that section of the Bible known as the APOCRYPHA; the reference for the Benedicite to our English Apocrypha is Song of the Three Holy Children, vv. 35—66.

The Canticle has been used in the Morning Prayer of the Church from very early times as a song of general praise; following this early practice, it was placed in the Sarum Breviary among the Psalms to be said on all Sundays; and in the first English Prayer Book of 1549 it assumed its present position. The rubric there provided that it should be said in Lent instead of the Te Deum, and although this provision was removed in 1552, many Ritualists still carry it into effect. Some also use it in Advent, when, as well as in Lent, the Te Deum was to be omitted by the Sarum Breviary, though this second exception was not mentioned in 1549; and a yet further difference in practice is, that some on these occasions use it on Sundays as well as week-days, while others on Sundays resume the Te Deum. An old rule was to use it whenever any lesson from Daniel was read: a more recent practice, still very common, to use it on Septuagesima Sunday, sometimes also on Trinity Sunday, the first lesson being the account of the Creation (Gen. i.), and on the nineteenth (now the twenty-first) Sunday after Trinity, when it was Dan. iii.; in the same way, it would now be said on September 15th when a week-day. Daniel iii., under the Old Lectionary, was an Evening week-day lesson in the Calendar; but though, according to the strict letter of the rubric, it may be used on any day, it is practically seldom heard except as here explained.

It will be of interest to give one or two variations in text: Wycliffe, 1380, ver. literally translating the Latin, has the archaic but grand formula, "Bless ye, all the work of the Lord, to the Lord; praise ye and above raise ye Him into worlds;" * Bishop Coverdale, 1535, has "Speak good of the Lord praise Him and set Him up for ever," which was taken into the Prayer Book of 1549, and in 1552 altered as at present; while our modern Apocrypha reads, "Praise and exalt Him above all for ever."

Benedict, St. [A.D. 480—542]. — The founder of the Benedictine Order of monks was born in a position of some wealth and rank at Nursia, a few miles north-east of Rome, his parents being known by the names of Euprepus and Abundantia, and his sister by that of Scholastica. [SCHOLASTICA, St.] When quite young, he was sent to Rome for education, but having been brought up piously, he was shocked by the vices which he saw among his fellow-students, and when only fourteen years of age took the resolution (formed, perhaps, on reminiscences of intercourse with the abbot and monks of Nursia) of retiring from the world. Boy as he was, he carried out this resolution with stern perseverance for three years, living as a hermit in a small cave near Subiaco, and holding no communication with any one except an old monk, named Romanus, who supplied him with bread and water by letting them down to him in an old bell tied to the end of a rope. When he was seventeen years of age, Benedict's retreat was discovered by some shepherds, and he speedily became an object of veneration to the country people around. He was never in holy orders, but his teaching and guidance was eagerly sought after, and he seems to have become the head of a community of CÆNOBITES. In A.D. 510, when he was thirty years of age, Benedict was elected as their abbot by the monks of Vicovaro, but his government of that monastery was so disliked that his life was attempted by poison, and he returned to his desert home. Here a large number of persons who venerated him, and aspired to a higher life under his guidance, gathered around him, and he again established a Cænobitic community, or, rather, he formed his disciples into twelve communities of ten, each ten having an abbot or dean over them, and himself being at the head of all. Under these circumstances St. Benedict matured his ideal of monastic life, and at forty-eight years of age [A.D. 528] he left Subiaco. Going south-east into Campania, he took possession of an ancient Temple of Apollo, on the top of Mount Casinus (known to more modern times as Monte Casino), and having destroyed it, erected first a Chapel of St. Martin and afterwards his cloistered buildings on its site. It was from this Abbey of Monte Casino, and from its Abbot Benedict, that all the many thousand Benedictine monasteries took their origin.

It was at his monastery at Monte Casino that St. Benedict elaborated the ideal of a monastic life which he had formed at Subiaco—gaining much, doubtless, by experience—into that code of monastic laws known to future ages as the "Rule of St. Benedict." It was his only literary work, so far as is known, but its influence has been incalculably great. It was, doubtless, the fruit of much observation, much thought, much experience, and, more than all, of much prayer; and if the lapse of thirteen centuries, with enormous changes in habits and in modes of thought, has made much of it obsolete, yet even now its principles are such as might well be used for the foundation of a religious community—assuming such communities to be needed or desirable for modern times—with great advantage, whether as to spirituality or as to external organisation. [BENEDICTINE MONKS.]

St. Benedict's life was not a long one. After many visions, or supposed visions, in which his soul was saddened by the foresight of impending troubles for his country and his monastery, he beheld the soul of his sister, Scholastica, fly heavenward, and predicted his own coming death. Six days before the event occurred he fell violently ill, and ordered his grave to be dug. At last, on March 21st, 543, the holy man caused himself to be carried into his oratory, received there the Holy Communion, and while he was held upright by some of the monks, stretched forth his hands in a longing prayer for rest and for the most blessed of all visions, and then died. On that day, March 21st, St. Benedict's festival is observed.

Benedict, Biscor, St. [A.D. 628—690]. — A young Anglo-Saxon nobleman, whose name is given as Baducing in an early metrical life of St. Wilfrid, and who probably assumed the name of Benedict when, at twenty-five or twenty-six years of age, he forsook the life of a soldier and courtier at the court of Osway, King of Northumbria, and joined the Monastery of Lerins, in France.

On a second visit which he paid to Rome, he found that much difficulty had arisen respecting an appointment to the archbishopric of Canterbury. The kings of Kent and Northumbria had concurred in nominating Wighard, and he had arrived at Rome for consecration at the hands of Pope Vitalian. Before the day of his consecration arrived, Wighard died, and as communication between England and Rome was slow, the Pope nominated Theodore, an aged monk of Tarsus, to the great Western archbishopric, instead of waiting for a new nomination by the kings. Vitalian then prevailed on the courtly young monk Benedict to accompany the unsophisticated Theodore as interpreter, that he might introduce him to the king and nobles of England. Arriving in Kent, Benedict was made Abbot of St. Augustine's, and held the office for two years.

Eventually, Benedict returned to Northumbria, where he received from King Egfrid a tract of land between the Tyne and the Wear, whereon he built and with which he endowed the famous monasteries of Bishop Wearmouth on the one river, and that of Jarrow on the other, and where he brought up the Venerable Bede, the Church historian of early England. [Bede.] For the building and adornment of these churches and monasteries Benedict brought many skilled workmen from abroad, whence also he brought pictures of glass for the windows, the first stained-glass used in England. Books also he gathered together, both the costly illuminated Service Books and Bibles, and MSS. for the library. Parts of the fabrics of both churches remain, and there are books in the library of Durham Cathedral which are supposed to be as old as the time of Bede, and thus very near at least to the time of Benedict Biscop. It is, perhaps, a survival of his enterprise that glass manufactures are still carried on extensively—beautiful plate-glass and stained-glass—on the banks of the Tyne and the Wear.

The close of Benedict's life was a suffering one. He was prostrated by paralysis for two years, and died in his monastery of Wearmouth, on January 12th, 690. There also he was at first buried; but in the tenth century his remains were removed to Thorney, in Cambridgeshire. The day of his commemoration is that of his death, January 12th.

Benedict, St., of ANIANE [A.D. 750—821].

—A young French nobleman, of the time of the Emperor Charlemagne, who adopted a monastic life, won great veneration in those rude days by his severe asceticism, assumed the name of Benedict, and gained so much influence among French monks that he was able to effect considerable, though but temporary, reforms among the degenerated monasteries of his native country. His day is marked in the Calendar as February 12th, the day on which he died.

Benedictine Monks, or Black Monks, the first name being derived from their founder, the second from the colour of their dress.

After the death of St. Benedict, in A.D. 543, [Benedict, Sr.], the number of monasteries founded on his system, and governed by his Rule, increased rapidly. But while the Order was yet in its infancy, an enthusiastic member of it, Gregory the Great, born twelve or fifteen years before the death of St. Benedict, succeeded to the Papal throne [A.D. 590]. About fifteen years before this, St. Gregory had sold his large property for the purpose of endowing six monasteries in Sicily, and of founding one dedicated to St. Andrew on the site of his own mansion and gardens in Rome. It was from this monastery that he started to evangelise Britain, and when defeated in his object by the unwillingness of the Romans to lose him from among them, it was here that he resided as Abbot, until he became Pope, when St. Augustine was appointed in his place. As Abbot of this Benedictine Monastery of St. Andrew it was that St. Augustine set forth on the same mission in A.D. 596, accompanied by forty of his brethren; and Benedictine monks it was that the Archbishop of Canterbury and his secular companions carried on their work.

There is no doubt that there were many monasteries in Britain before the coming of Augustine and his forty Benedictines [Benedictus Iacobi], but there is good reason to think the latter were the first of their Order to appear here, and that as Benedictine monks general all sprang from Monte Casino, those of England in particular sprang from Canterbury in the beginning of the seventh century. About the middle of the ninth century, however, Archbishop Dunstan greatly extended their numbers and their power, for several generations all the monasteries in England were brought under the Benedictine Rule. In after-times, notwithstanding the strong hold which the Augustinian Canons, the Cistercians, and the Friars gained on the people, the Benedictines always retained supremacy, and out of 1,200 monastic establishments, great and small, which existed just before the Reformation storm broke over them, as many as 257 belonged to the Benedictine monks and nuns, including the largest and most wealthy abbeys, such as Westminster, Canterbury, Durham, Winchester, Ely. For nearly five centuries they lived in the midst of the English people, exercising an immense influence upon national life, following with much exactness the same Rule as their founder had left for their guidance, and maintaining the light of Christianity in the country during those times of darkness and godlessness, which in many regions are justly called "The Dark Ages."

Inglulf, Abbot of Croyland, tells us what his own practice was. The old monks, who bore the burden and heat of the day, they were past the ability for active labour, were to have a good chamber furnished in that part of the monastery called infirmary, and have a clerk or servant appointed to wait upon them. The young monk to be his companion, a breakfast and dine with him. As for senior himself, he was to sit at home or out, to go or come, according to his own pleasure. He might visit the cloister, the refectory, or dining-hall, the school-room, and every other part of the monastery in his monk's dress or without it, just as he pleased. Nothing unpleasant about the presence of the monastery was to be mentioned. Every one was charged to be giving him offence; and everything was to be done for his comfort of mind and body. He might in the utmost peace and quiet wait for his latter end. It would not be to find a more pleasing picture of the

with which Christian love would "rock the cradle of declining age."

The statutes of Lanfranc and Ingulf prescribed the order of Divine Service to be observed in the abbey-churches throughout the year; and we learn from them what principal officers there were in every large abbey. Next to the abbot came the prior, who, in the abbot's absence, had the chief care of the house; and under him were often one or more sub-priors. These were all removable at the will of the abbot, as all the other officers were.

Another was the almoner, who had the oversight of the alms of the house, which were every day distributed at the gate to the poor; and on the anniversary of the founder, or other benefactors to the monastery, took charge of the larger gifts or doles which were then commonly given away in food and clothing. He was also to make inquiry for and visit the poor who needed relief at home.

Another was the sacrist, or churchwarden, who took care of the holy vessels for the Communion, which was usually celebrated every day; prepared the host, or communion bread, with his own hands, as it was kept distinct from ordinary bread; provided the wine, and the water to mix with it; kept the altar-cloths neat and clean; and furnished wax candles for the evening or early service. It was his business to ring the bell at service-time, and to see to the order of burial for the dead; for all which duties he was allowed the help of others to assist him.

The chamberlain had the care of the dormitory, provided beds and bedding for the monks, and the chief part of their clothing and shoes. Their beds were commonly stuffed with hay or straw. He was also to provide iron tools for shoeing the horses of the abbot and prior, and of all strangers who visited the abbey.

The cellarer, or house steward, had to provide all the meat and drink used in the monastery, whether for the monks or strangers, as flesh, fish, fowl, wine, bread-corn, malt for their ale and beer, as well as wood for firing, and all kitchen utensils.

There was also the hospitaler, or hosteler, who had the special charge of the entertainment of guests—the exercise of hospitality to all comers, and particularly travellers, being a chief part of the duties of a monastery.

There was, again, the master of the infirmary, who, with his servants, had the care of the sick and aged; and for their especial comfort he had often a separate cook and kitchen, where the food was prepared most suitably to their infirm condition.

The head-chamber, or precentor, had the chief care of the service in the choir, presided over the singing men and organist and choristers, provided books for them, and paid them their salaries. He had also the charge of the abbey seal, kept the chapter-book, or record of the proceedings of the public business, and furnished parchment, pens, and ink for the writers, and colours for the painters or draughtsmen who adorned the old missals or prayer-books.

All the proceedings were to be subject to the most rigid order. The rules of St. Benedict directed that six hours every day were to be given to manual labour; and for this purpose there were little offices or shops in different parts of the monastery, where the men employed themselves in their different occupations. Some were the tailors and shoemakers of the monastery; some worked at jewellery, bookbinding, carving, or sculpture, or cabinet-making; some wrote or painted. To see that all at such times were at their duty, some were chosen out of the number, persons of tried character and prudence, who were called curators, or round-goers, whose business it was to go round from time to time separately to the workshops, and, without speaking, to notice if any were absent, or standing idle, or sitting to talk with their neighbours. In the church or choir at the night service, they were to go about in the middle of the psalms and prayers, carrying a dark lantern, and if they found any one asleep, to make some little sound to awake him, or if he slept too fast to be so awakened, to open the dark lantern, and turn the light full in his face.

There was commonly a school kept near the great abbey, and at the expense of the monasteries. In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, A.D. 1562, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Williams, complained that more than a hundred flourishing schools had been destroyed which had been maintained by the monasteries, and that ignorance had greatly increased. These schools however, do not seem to have done much to advance the state of learning among the people. The masters were not paid at such a rate as to invite the best teachers. John Somerset, who was afterwards tutor and physician to King Henry VI., began life as master of the grammar school at Bury St. Edmunds, A.D. 1418. The abbot of that rich monastery gave him a salary of forty shillings a year, which, even according to the value of money at that time, would not be more than about the salary of a village schoolmaster now; and this was to a man who taught arts and languages, and was one of the most learned of his time. In earlier times the schools were within the abbey, and the children who were admitted to them were taught by the monks, under the inspection of the prior; but these were chiefly the "little monks," or children whom their parents, according to the permission of this rule, which cannot be commended, dedicated in infancy to monkhood, without any choice of their own. The neighbours were, however, permitted in most monasteries to send their children to these schools, where they might, without expense, be taught grammar and church music.

The churches of the Old Benedictine monasteries were remarkable in many places for their very great beauty and magnificence. Whatever skill in building the Saxons possessed—and they had skill enough to erect arched roofs, and ornamental windows, and pillars supporting towers—was far outdone by the Norman churchmen, who began, very soon after they were possessed of the English bishoprics and abbeys, everywhere to pull down the old churches, and raise up new ones on a scale of much greater magnificence. And, indeed, the early Norman architects, whether churchmen and monks, or professional builders, soon attained to an excellence and skill which now, at the distance of five or six hundred years, we admire, but cannot imitate. The best attempts at church architecture which are made now are but imperfect copies from the models which they have left. Much ignorance has prevailed upon this subject; and for a long time these buildings were treated with a base contempt by persons who had no other notion of architecture than to raise up ugly high brick walls, with holes through them for windows. But now this excellent art has been revived, and the old abbey-churches which are yet left have been restored from the mutilation and shameful disfigurements which they had suffered. Among the Benedictine churches still remaining to this day are to be reckoned St. Albans, which, except the Saxon portions yet left, was begun in the time of Lanfranc and William the Conqueror; Westminster Abbey, which, though handsomely built by Edward the Confessor, was rebuilt in Henry III.'s time, chiefly at that king's expense; Selby Abbey, founded by William the Conqueror; Tewkesbury, in Gloucestershire; Romsey, in the New Forest, Hampshire, the beautiful church of an old Benedictine nunnery, founded by Bishop Ethelwold, in King Edgar's reign; Peterborough, turned into a cathedral church at the Reformation; Bath, Gloucester, and Chester, preserved by the same means; Shrewsbury, Great Malvern, and Brecon. Among those of equal magnificence shamefully destroyed, in many cases to the great injury of religion (for whatever became of the monks, the churches ought to have been spared), were Ramsey and Thorney, Hunts; Tavistock, Devon; Colchester; Hyde Abbey, near Winchester; St. Augustine's, Canterbury; Croyland and Spalding, Lincolnshire; Reading Abbey, the foundation and burial-place of Henry I.; Bury St. Edmunds, Glastonbury, Malmesbury, Evesham, Whitby, St. Mary's, York; King Alfred's nunnery, founded for his daughter at Shaftesbury; King Edward the Elder's, at Wilton, and many more: of all which scarcely any trace is now to be found.

The building next in beauty to the church was the chapter-house, or council-chamber, where all rose at the coming of the abbot, received him with every mark of reverence. The style of homage and respect paid by members of these religious houses to their superiors was in accordance with the homage paid by vassals to their lord; but when the power of the abbot seemed to exceed the rules, it might be checked by the decision of the chapter. The style of these beautiful chapter-houses may be judged of from those which still remain in the precincts of cathedrals, particularly at Salisbury and Westminster.

Adjoining the church and chapter-house were the cloisters, where the monks read, walked and conversed, and where the children sometimes were brought to say their lessons to the prior. The refectory, or dining-room, was often a part of the building of great beauty; but of this few specimens remain. The dormitory, where the monks slept in a common chamber, was a large room, sometimes built over the cloisters; in large monasteries there were sometimes more than one. Old and young were together in the same apartment, and not the young alone, that the presence of the aged might serve as a check to indiscreet mirth. There were to be not fewer than from ten to twelve in one chamber, and they had a lamp burning.

In every great abbey there was a library, called the Scriptorium, or writing-room, where several writers were employed in copying books for the use of the library. The abbots of St. Albans did good service in this way. The Abbot Paul built the scriptorium in Lanfranc's time which had afterward the estate settled separately upon it; and John Whethamsted, an abbot, who built a library in Henry VI.'s reign, is said to have had copies of eighty different works made while he was abbot. The same was done at Durham, at Glastonbury, at St. Augustine's, Canterbury, at Bury St. Edmunds, and other places; for the larger monasteries were very careful of their libraries.

The Rules of St. Benedict advise his monks to have their abbeys situated near a running stream, that they may have a mill on the premises. This was generally observed. They were also to have a garden, a bakehouse, a brewhouse, that there might be as little as possible for sending abroad for their supplies. And for the same reason they were recommended to have all necessary arts practised among themselves, that they might supply themselves with clothing and whatever else they wanted. As the abbeys became richer, these arts, however, were exercised so much by the monks as by the servants of the monastery.

It was common for the early Norman monks to come and keep Christmas, or other chief feasts of the Church, in some of the principal monasteries, as Hyde Abbey, near Winchester, or St. Alban's, or Tewkesbury, or Gloucester. This was the time when the abbot's hospitality was most especially exerted, as the number of retainers the kings brought with them was no trifle. At St. Alban's, in Henry's III.'s time, there was stabling provided for three hundred horses.

The Benedictines, as they were the most ancient and numerous, were also the richest, order of monks in England. The Saxon kings and nobles, particularly in Dunstan's time, gave them large manors and estates, and the attachment of the native English, as well as of the Normans, seems to have been given chiefly to them. A great number of bishops were taken, before and after the Conquest, from their monasteries; and the three archbishops who presided next after the Conquest, and others in the following reigns, were Benedictines. It was to this order also that the mitred abbots belonged, of whom twenty-nine sat in Parliament as spiritual peers and barons. [ABBOTS.]

The dress of the Benedictine monks consisted of woollen stockings and boots, a white lincey-wolsey shirt and breeches, a black tunic, or cassoock, and a black cowl to put over the head. When at work, they wore a scapular, which consisted of a sleeveless garment made of two strips of cloth hanging down behind and before.

Benediction.—A "benison," or solemn invocation of the Divine blessing [Lat. benedictio] upon persons or things. Simple forms of benediction occur frequently in the domestic life of Christians everywhere, as in the familiar form of leave-taking, "Good-bye," which is really "God be with you," or in the blessing of food and those who partake of it, which is popularly known as "grace" before meat or after meat. More formal are those which occur in Divine Service, as in the mutual salutation, "The Lord be with you," "And with thy spirit." In a still more solemn form benedictions become the purpose of short services, when they are usually acts of dedication to sacred use.

BENEDICTION OF CHURCH ORNAMENTS AND UTENSILS.—All the vestments and vessels used in Divine Service were anciently set apart for their sacred use by words of prayer specially adapted to each of them. Thus there are separate benedictions in the old Service-books for the amice, the alb, the girdle, the manipule, the stole, and the chasuble. Such prayers were also used for the benediction of the altar linen, the paten, the chalice, the Service-books, the thurible, and for all other "ornaments" or vessels used in Divine Service. Those used in the dedication of the altar linen may serve as specimens of the rest (+ indicates the sign of the Cross): "Hear our prayers O Lord; and be pleased to bless and sanctify these linen cloths which are prepared for the use of the holy altar; through Jesus Christ our Lord." "O Lord God Almighty, Who didst instruct Thy servant Moses for forty days in the making of ornaments and textures, . . . be pleased to bless, sanctify, and consecrate these cloths of linen, that they may touch and be used about the altar of Thy most glorious Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, Who ever liveth and reigneth," &c.

The custom of blessing Church utensils can be traced as far back as the consecration of the great church at Jerusalem, in A.D. 335, when it is mentioned by the ecclesiastical historian Sozomen. Forms which were used near to that time are extant in the Sacramentary of Gelasius [A.D. 492], and forms are also extant which were used in the English Church in the eighth century. It was continued by English bishops long subsequent to the Reformation, and is still occasionally used by them.

BENEDICTION OF CROPS.—In almost every Christian country there are special services invoking the blessing of God on the special produce of the country. [ROGATIONS.]

BENEDICTION OF FLAGS AND BANNERS.—The use of sacred standards in war may be reasonably traced back to the Jews, who, in the first days of their independence, were divinely directed to pitch every man "by his own standard with the ensign of his father's house," the four standards indicated being described in the Targum as of beautiful embroidery work. The LABARUM of Constantine was obviously considered very sacred, and so also was the banner of St. Cuthbert, which was kept in the feretory behind the altar in Durham Cathedral. The form used for the benediction of banners in the mediæval Church is given in Maskell's Monumenta Rituaia, ii. 326, and in the same place is reprinted the form used at the present day in the English army when new colours are presented to a regiment.

BENEDICTION OF FONTS.—The water with which or in which persons were to be baptised was set apart for the purpose with words and acts of blessing at the very earliest period to which ceremonies not ordered in Scripture can be traced, St. Cyprian [A.D. 255] expressly saying that the water was first cleansed and sanctified by the priest or bishop. In what manner this was done in the sixth century is shown by the "Service Book," or "Sacramentary of St. Gelasius and Gregory," where both the prayers and the rites for this service are given. Similar ceremonies and prayers were used in the Church of England down to the time when the Service-books were translated from Latin into English. Up to this period the benediction of the font was a service in itself, and so it continued to be in the first English Prayer Book, where the rubric ordered that "the water in the font shall be changed every month once at the least, and afore any child be baptised in the water so changed, the priest shall say at the font these prayers following :" the prayers being almost exactly the same as those in the modern service, beginning, "O merciful God, grant that the old Adam," and ending, "Thy faithful and elect children; through Jesus Christ our Lord." The use of the sign of the cross in this benediction of the font is mentioned as early as the fourth century, when St. Augustine speaks of it in two of his sermons.

BENEDICTION OF FOUNDATION STONES.—This custom can be traced up to the seventh century, and a short service was provided for the purpose in the old Latin Service-books of the Church of England [Maskell's Monum. Rit., cccxv. 193]. A similar service is still used, but its form is usually privately arranged, sanctioned by the bishop in whose diocese the church is about to be built. It is customary to commemorate the benediction of a "corner stone," or foundation stone, by carving a cross upon it, and this cross may be observed on churches built in the streets of London.

BENEDICTION OF HOUSES.—It was once the custom to have new houses blessed and dedicated with a religious service, of which there is a reminiscence in the "house warming," the religious service having naturally been accompanied by hospitality.

BENEDICTION OF THE PEOPLE.—This is a ministerial act, performed in the name of God, a custom which the Christian Church inherited from the Jews, and which the Jews inherited from the patriarchal ages, when Melchizedek, "King of Salem, that is, King of Peace," "the priest of the Most High God," pronounced the blessing of peace on the people of Israel "while yet in the loins" of their forefather, saying, "Blessed be Abram of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth, and blessed be the Most High God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand" [Gen. xiv. 19; comp. Heb. vii. 7, 10]. When Aaron and his sons were set apart for the priestly office, the office to which the family was dedicated was (1) to "bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord;" (2) "to stand before the Lord to minister unto Him;" and (3) "to bless in His name" [Deut. x. 8, xxi. 5]. The exact form in which this benediction was to be given by the Jewish ministry was enjoined also by God Himself in the words, "On this wise shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless thee and keep thee: the Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace" [Numb. vi. 22—26], a form which is found three times in the Prayer Book of the Church of England.

In the foundation of the Christian Church our Lord gave direction to the apostles to use acts of benediction as part of their ministrations. "Into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house. And if son of peace be there, your peace shall upon it: if not, it shall turn to you again" [Luke x. 5]. "Peace I leave with you, peace I give unto you" [John xiv. 27]. His last words and act as He departed from His earthly ministry are thus recorded: "He lifted up His hands and blessed them" [Lk. xxiv. 50], perhaps in the words of the Easter salutation, "Peace be unto you" [John xx. 19].

The apostolic use of ministerial benediction is illustrated by many instances in the Epistles. St. Paul concluding each of his with such benediction; St. Peter closing his first Epistle with one; and St. John using one at the end of the Revelations which makes a fitting termination to the whole Bible. The forms thus used are substantially the two which are familiar to Christians of modern times. The first of these is called "The Peace," or in Latin the "Pax," and is in its simpler form "The peace of the Lord be with you always" in its longer one, "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord: and the blessing of God Almighty, the Father of the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be among you, and remain with you always." The second form of benediction is an apostolic one which St. Paul uses, with slight variations, at the end of all his Epistles: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." The latter part of "The Peace" that is, the blessing in the name of the Holy Trinity, is not found in Scripture, but has been used from Anglo-Saxon times in the Communion Service of the Church of England. It stands by itself at the end of the Confirmation Service, and is the ordinary form in which ministerial benedictions are given. The former portion is substantially found in the Epistles to the Philippians iv. 7 and 1 Peter v. 14.

It seems always to have been customary for the ministerial benediction to be pronounced with a particular gesture, "lifting up of the hands and blessing," which is mentioned in both the Old and New Testaments. Perhaps the most ancient gesture is that of "lifting up of the hands" with both arms outstretched towards the people. But in paintings and sculptures which have come down to us from the primitive Church, our Lord, His Apostles, bishops and priests are represented as stretching out the right hand, with the fingers arranged in one of two forms: (1) The index finger, the fourth, is bent inwards, so that the tip meets that of the thumb, the middle finger, the middle and the little finger being held upright: this being the custom of the Eastern Church. (2) The ring finger the little finger are bent inward, while the thumb and the other two fingers are held upright, which is the custom of the Western Church. The symbolism assigned to these different gestures does not offer any satisfactory explanation of them, but the gestures themselves are both of the most venerable antiquity in the Christian Church.

BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.—A modern very popular Roman Catholic rite. The priest takes the reserved Sacrament from the Tabernacle, and places it in a monstrance for the veneration of the congregation. It is then incensed and a Hymn is sung, "Tantum ergo sacramentum," after which, and some versicles and a collect, the officiating priest takes again the monstrance holding the reserved Sacrament, and holds it up in his hand to the view of the people, while all remain perfectly silent. This rite is known in France as Le Salut.

BENEDICTION OF SHIPS.—A religious service used at the launching of new ships. Where it has fallen wholly into disuse, there is still a survival of it in the custom of breaking a bottle of wine on the bows of a ship as she is formally named at the moment of launching.

BENEDICTION OF SWORDS.—On "Letare" Sunday, the 4th Sunday in Lent, and on Christmas Eve, the Pope used to bless with special ceremonies swords of honour to be sent as presents of state to favoured sovereigns. Such a sword was blessed by Julius II. for Henry VIII. That Pope dying, it was sent to the king, with a velvet cap of maintenance, by Leo, and presented to him with great state and ceremony in St. Paul's Cathedral, on May 19th, 1513. This sword is still preserved in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. It has various engraved designs upon it, and under a crystal at the top of the hilt is the word "Vigilate," with a winged hour-glass.

There was also a formula for the blessing of an ordinary knight's sword among similar prayers at the end of the Salisbury Missal.

Benedictus.—The thanksgiving hymn of Zacharias on the birth of his son, John the Baptist (Luke i. 68-79), used at Morning Prayer from the ninth century at least, if not earlier; and thence through the Sarum Breviary, where it was used at Lauds (the second of the ancient seven offices), descending to us as a thanksgiving for the Incarnation and the Church. Our first Prayer Book (1549) had it in its present place, but without the Jubilate as an alternative, which was inserted in 1552; from then till the last revision in 1662, either might be used at discretion; but in 1662 the use of the Benedictus was made compulsory, except when it occurred in a Lesson or Gospel, that is to say, except on the 26th March and the 24th June. The Jubilate is thus (strictly speaking) to be less often used than under the Old Lectionary, unless, which is doubtful, the rubric is to apply to an Evening Lesson also, in which case it will be used on the 24th September as well. In practice, however, the old discretion is universally retained, and formerly, but not often now, went frequently almost to the entire disuse of the Benedictus, probably from the mere desire to "save time." That it was commonly so in 1848, when Dr. Newman wrote his story, "Loss and Gain," a passage at p. 215 (4th edition) will show; and Archdeacon Freeman in 1855 speaks of the "very general use" of the Jubilate, and attempts to render a reason ("Principles of Divine Service," i. 357).

The text in our present Prayer Book is not that of any version of the New Testament, though it is nearer to Tyndall, 1535, than to any other; it is almost exactly the same as that of the book of 1552 (the single difference is hand for hands in the seventh verse), in which year a few variations were made from 1549, the only important one being a mighty salvation for an horn of salvation. This, it will be remembered, is read in our present New Testament, both of 1611 and 1881. The latter has an important change to what is considered, though very doubtfully, the better Greek reading in the last verse but one, shall visit us, for hath visited.

Benefice.—The temporary right of property in an ecclesiastical estate. This right of property is usually a life-interest, and is practically limited to the reception of the income which is yielded by the estate. With a few exceptions [SINECURES], the holders of such estates have certain duties imposed upon them, for the performance of which the usufruct of the estate is intended to be the equivalent.

The name is derived from the Latin beneficium, which signified land conferred on soldiers for faithful service, and so called because held by the free gift and beneficence of the sovereign. Originally all church moneys were under the control of the bishops, who distributed them at their own judgment. When the Church acquired lands these also were in part assigned to the clergy, but over the allotment of these, too, the bishops had much control. It was not until the twelfth century that they became fixed. It would appear, however, that from the beginning of all Church endowments, or at least of the endowments of parochial churches, those who had contributed to the building and endowments of such churches were recognised as having some right to the nomination of the clerks who should serve them. This became the right of advowson, which has been defined as "a kind of reversionary right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice in a man and his heirs for ever" (Godolphin in Phillimore's Eccl. Law). The word, according to the same writer "is a kind of bastard French word, either because the patron thereof, claiming his jus patronatus therein, advocat se in his own right to the same, eamque esse sui quasi clientis loco, or rather because the patron in his own right advocat alium to the church being vacant, and presents him to it." An advowson which is attached to a manor is said to be an advowson appendant; when it is held by an owner as his personal right, having been by any process separated from a manor, it is an advowson in gross. A patron who appoints a clerk to any benefice presents him to the bishop for that purpose, who thereupon, if there be no impediment, institutes him. This then is a living held by Presentation. If the advowson belongs to the bishop he presents the clerk as well as institutes him; this is called collation. After Institution (q.v.) must follow Induction (q.v.). A few benefices are called Donatives (q.v.); in these the patron puts the clerk in possession without any presentation to the Ordinary. Where cathedral or other corporations, such as city companies, hold an advowson, it is called elective. But the Crown being patron paramount of all benefices in England, it follows that all advowsons which are not duly filled up by the patrons belong to the Crown. Sometimes this happens through lapse, in cases where six months have elapsed without any appointment being made. It may happen also by reason of the patron being outlawed, or convicted of simony. During the vacation of a See the Crown has right of presentation to all benefices to which the bishop could have collated. Even if a bishop has instituted, the clerk cannot claim the benefice if the bishop should die before induction. Upon promotion of any beneficed clergyman to a bishopric, the benefice vacated by him falls for that occasion to the presentation of the Crown. But if a clerk be appointed to a colonial bishopric the presentation to the benefice which he leaves does not go to the Crown. This was decided in 1857, in the case The Queen against the Provost of Eton. A Roman Catholic cannot present. A benefice which becomes vacant is said to be avoided. Of the benefices belonging to the Crown, according to the Clergy List of 1885, 366 belong to the Prime Minister, and 677 to the Lord Chancellor. Those in the hands of the latter are under a certain yearly value in the King's books. The origin of this custom is said to have been that in ancient times the Chancellor had many clergymen acting as his officials, for whom he was bound to make provision. (See Phillimore's Eccl. Law, vol. i., p. 385). In 1863 the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Westbury, carried a measure enabling him to sell some of the small benefices in his gift to private patrons, with the object in some cases of adding the purchase money to the endowment of the benefice, and so increasing its value, in others, where the benefice was more valuable, of adding to endowment of others still remaining to the Chancellor. To the Royal livings appertaining to the Crown and the Chancellor, shall be added 21 belonging to the Prince of Wales and 41 to the Duchy of Lancaster.

It is necessary that any man holding a benefice shall have been ordained to priesthood. According to the present law of Pluralities, if a holder of one benefice is sent to another, he gives up the first on the day of institution to the second; it is avoided as though he had died.

In certain cases two or more benefices may be united. This can only be done, however, (1) by the Archbishop of the province, in his own diocese, or at the request of one of his suffragans, where the united population does not exceed 1,500, and the aggregate value does not exceed £500; or (2) by the Queen in council, or (3) by special Act of Parliament. Unions of benefices within the metropolis. Under this Act as many as five parishes within the City of London, where the resident population has become small, are united into one, and all the churches but one have been pulled down. This is why it is not so frequent that a benefice is in the presentation of two patrons alternately (e.g. the City of London, or a city company, or the Crown as private patron). When there were many churches each patron possessed one, and this provision the old rights of the parishes are preserved. In most cases portions of the revenue of the united benefices are transferred to some other poor metropolitan parish, or a new church is built and endowed in some crowded district. When a church is pulled down, great care is used to prevent desecration of burial grounds, and destruction of monuments. Similarly, when a parish becomes too populous to be properly served by one church, and new churches are required, they are sometimes made chapels-of-ease under the mother church; but more commonly fresh districts are formed round a new church, and these become separate benefices. The incumbents used to be perpetual curates, but are now styled vicars. [PERPETUAL CURATE.]

A benefice becomes a freehold for the holder's life, but he may be deprived, suspended for heresy or immorality, or under the Public Worship Regulation Act (q.v.); or the benefice may be sequestered for debt. In this case the bishop appoints a curate and assigns him a stipend, the debts are paid. During the time the incumbent of the sequestered benefice is not to accept any other preferment, but by doing so the first benefice would be avoided.

Beneficiary.—The person who holds a benefice, now usually called the Incumbent.

(q. v.) of whatever rank he may be, whether an archbishop or a vicar.

Benefit of Clergy.—A mediæval custom by which accused persons who could prove themselves to be "clergy" or "clerks" could claim the benefit of being tried by a Church court, which was considered to be less severe than a secular court. The proof required was the ability to read Latin; and this proof was so evaded that the privilege became greatly abused, any one claiming it who could scramble through a single verse of the Latin Bible, a process popularly called "reading his neck verse." At the Reformation the clergy were prohibited from claiming the Benefit of Clergy by Statutes of 1531, 1536, and 1541, and from that time they have been subject to the ordinary criminal jurisdiction of the judges of assize. But it was retained in a modified form until the year 1827, when it was entirely abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 28.

Benet.—A shortened form of the name of St. Benedict which is found in the dedications of churches in London and Cambridge, and also in that of St. Benet's College, Cambridge.

Benet and Collet.—Popular names given to the minor orders of Exorcists and Acolytes. Thus the Latin words "nempe hoc non excludit omnes inferiores sed eos tantum qui solius prime tonsuræ sunt clerici" are translated by Foxe the Martyrologist, "For this does not exclude all the inferiors, but only such as have taken Benet and Collett." So also John Lambert is represented as saying, "I say the order or state of priests and deacons was ordained by God, but subdeacons and conjurers, otherwise called exorcistæ and acolytes, which we call Benet and Collett, were instituted by the invention of men" [Foxe's Acts and Monuments, iii. 534, 634, v. 191, ed. 1837]. These popular names had some association, perhaps, with the "benet book" and "collett book" which are named in some ancient inventories of church goods [Maskell's Mon. Hist. i. cxlvii., cvii., cci.]. But the name "collet" is no doubt a corrupt form of "acolyte," and "benet" may have been suggested by the association between the ideas of exorcism and blessing, or between the exorcist's official name and his duties in connection with blessed or "holy" water, which also was always exorcised before it was blessed for use.

Bengel [A.D. 1687—1752].—A distinguished Lutheran Divine who did great service to the Christian Church by his critical study of the New Testament. John Albert Bengel was the son of a Lutheran minister at Winnenden in Württemberg. He studied at Stuttgart and Tübingen, and having acquired a reputation for his accurate knowledge of that language he was appointed Professor of Greek at Denkendorf. His most important work was his Gnomon Novi Testamenti, a book which is still highly appreciated by Protestant theologians.

Benitier. [BENATURA.]

Bennet's Hulme, St. [NORWICH, BISHOPRIC OF.]

Benno, St. [1010-1106].—A native of Goslar, in Hanover, where, after taking orders, he became a teacher. He was the author of two works still extant, on Teaching and on the Sunday Gospels. He was twice imprisoned by Henry IV., on suspicion of disloyalty. His canonisation in 1523 was much ridiculed by Luther, who brought forward some instances of his defective character. He is buried at Munich, and is accepted as the patron saint of Bavaria.

Bentley, RICHARD [A.D. 1662-1742].—The great Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, the founder of modern criticism, was born 27th January, 1662, at Oulton, near Wakefield; he was the son by a second marriage of Thomas Bentley, of Woodlesford, and grandson of James Bentley, a royalist Captain in the war of the Rebellion, in which he lost most of his estate. Richard Bentley was educated at Wakefield, and in 1676 went to St. John's College, Cambridge, from which he graduated B.A. 1680, M.A. 1683, B.D. 1691, D.D. 1696. Failing, for technical reasons, to obtain a Fellowship, he was, in 1682, made by the College Head Master of Spalding Grammar School, and in the next year recommended, also by the College, as private tutor to James, son of Bishop Stillingfleet, then Dean of St. Paul's, and an old Fellow of the College. While at the Deanery his critical and philological studies began, and were continued at the Bodleian Library, Oxford, where he took his pupil in 1689, and was incorporated M.A., as a member of Wadham College. In 1690 he was ordained Deacon, and became Chaplain to Dr. Stillingfleet, just made Bishop of Worcester; and in 1692, though not yet a priest, he preached the first of the Boyle Lectures, newly founded, "to prove the Truth of the Christian Religion among Infidels," under the will of the celebrated Robert Boyle, who died the year before; these lectures were remarkable for their application of the Newtonian philosophy to the defence of Christianity, and went through several editions. In the same year he was ordained priest, and made Prebendary of Worcester; and the next year was appointed Keeper of the King's Library. In 1694 happened one of the matters which still make his name famous, the celebrated dispute with Charles Boyle (great-nephew to the founder of the Lecture, afterwards Earl of Orrery, and ancestor of the present Earl of Cork and Orrery), on the authenticity of the Epistles of Phalaris. These, which are letters supposed to be written by the Sicilian tyrant, popularly remembered as the roaster of his enemies in a brazen bull, had never been questioned up to that time, but on Boyle's publishing a new edition, Bentley so thoroughly demolished them that it is now strange how their authenticity can ever have been believed in. Boyle, however, attempted to reply, and Bentley's rejoinder, as well as the whole controversy, was written with such wit and humour that the work ranks among the English classics; it gave rise, indeed among other works, to Swift's Battle of the Books. (A telling account of this controversy will be found in Macaulay's Life of Atterbury.)

The second great division of Bentley's life began with his mastership of Trinity College. This was conferred on him by the Crown in 1700, and in the same year he was Vice-Chancellor of the University: this office he never held again. In 1701, he was also made Archdeacon of Ely, to which office was then annexed the vicarage of Haddenham. As Master of Trinity, though he did much for the college in many ways, he conducted himself in such a dictatorial manner as to be constantly at variance with the Fellows, and notably in two serious disputes, in which he was charged with misapplication of college funds. A difficulty arose in trying the matter, there being a doubt whether the power of visitor in such cases lay with the Bishop of Ely or the Crown. Bishop Patrick, before whom the charge first came, declined to interfere; he died 1707, but his successor, Bishop Moore, was of a different opinion, and called on the Master to plead, who answered by denying the jurisdiction, and petitioned the Crown against it. In reply came an injunction to the Bishop to stay proceedings, but the Master gave way for the time, and requested to take his trial, either before the Bishop or any other royal commissioner. The Bishop, however, did not proceed till in 1714 he received a mandamus from the King's Bench: on this he tried the case, but died 31st July, 1714, before giving judgment, and the matter dropped for the next fourteen years. In 1728, the same charges against Bentley were laid before Bishop Greene; this time, however, the College petitioned against the Bishop's jurisdiction, and the Bishop presented a counter-petition to be heard on his right. The question was carried through the Privy Council to the King's Bench, and it was there decided [May, 1728] that the Bishop might visit the Master, but it being urged that the Bishop might exceed this licence by visiting the College also, a second petition for a further hearing was presented, and was tried in the King's Bench. This time the decision went against the Bishop, who thereupon appealed to the House of Lords, and was at last commissioned by them to try the Master. This being done, Bentley was sentenced to deprivation, but he was not deprived; for the vice-master, who must have executed the sentence, was afraid to do it, and resigned; and his successor, appointed of course by Bentley, pleaded that the Bishop's order was directed to him. After some further litigation, the matter again dropped; but Greene died 18th May, 1738, and Bentley remained Master. In the course of this dispute Bentley was also engaged in a suit of one. Being made Regius Professor of Divinity in 1717, he was the next year accused of demanding illegal fees from the candidates for degrees whom he presented: for this he was suspended from his own degrees, first by the Vice-Chancellor (Thomas Gooch, Master of Caius, afterwards Bishop of Ely), and then by grace of the senate; he was afterwards not till 1728, restored by mandamus from the King's Bench.

All this time his classical work was going on; he edited Horace, Terence, and Aristophanes, and had the temerity to publish an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, a vast number of conjectural emendations, that which demands most notice in a Reliquiæ Encyclopædia is his proposal for a new edition of the Greek Testament. Dr. John Canon of Canterbury, was in the very beginning of the century (his edition was published in 1707, the year of his death) the first to enter on the historical criticism of the text of Erasmus, then called, as it is still, the Receptus, or Received Text; he was also the first to perceive the value of what is called the Greek and Latin consent; and Bentley's theory, following this notion out, was based upon two statements of St. Jerome concerning his Vulgate—(1) that he had made it according to the best Greek copy, i.e., Origen's; (2) that the very order of the words is mysterious; on this Bentley concluded that by comparing Origen's Latin with the oldest attainable Greek, he could restore Origen's text with great exactness. In 1716, Bentley laid his proposals before Archbishop Wake, who was himself much interested in the matter; in 1720 he published them with a special chapter, the last in the Bible; but no more was done, owing probably not so much to the opposition which Dr. Conyers Middleton and others set up, as to what Scrivener [Introduction to N.T., p. 40, 1874] considers to be the true reason, the impossibility of maintaining his principles against evidence which his increasing attainments bore in their face.

Bentley, "one of the most diligent, the most highly-gifted men our dear University of Cambridge ever nourished" [Scrivener, p. 40] but also one of the most headstrong and obstinate, died 14th July, 1742; he was married in 1701, Joanna, daughter of John Bernard, Bart., of Brampton, by whom he had, besides two daughters, a son Richard, a literary man, though far below his father [Fellow of Trinity, Senior Proctor, who died 1782].

Bentley's Life has been written by Bishop Monk, of Gloucester and Bristol, 1830; his works have been edited by Alexander Dyce, 1836, and his Letters collected by Dr. Wordsworth, one of his successors as Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, 1842.

Bereans.—A sect founded in the last century by John Barclay, professing to be like the Bereans of old [Acts xvii. 11], and denying any rule of conduct but that of the Scriptures. A few congregations are said to exist still.

Berengarians, followers of Berengarius, who was born at Tours, 998, and up to A.D. 1040 was Canon of the Cathedral and Master of the Cathedral School founded there by St. Martin, where he himself also had received his earlier education. In 1040 he became Archdeacon of Angers, and for nearly half a century after that he was prominently mixed up with the controversy which had begun to agitate the Christian world on the subject of Christ's Presence in the Eucharist. Of that controversy it is only necessary to say here that it turned upon the questions—(1) Whether the words "This is My Body," and "This is My Blood," mean that the consecrated bread and wine actually become changed into the Body and Blood of Christ, in such a sense that the bread and wine no longer exist; or, (2) Whether the words are used in a symbolical sense only, and so do not mean that the Body and Blood of Christ are really present at all in the consecrated bread and wine; or (3) Whether the words mean that the Body and Blood of Christ are truly present in association with the consecrated elements, but present in a mysterious manner which cannot be explained. The last of these statements was that which was actually maintained by Berengarius; the second was that which he was accused of maintaining; and the first was that which was maintained by his opponents.

Berengarius was first drawn into a public expression of his opinions in reply to letters of remonstrance written to him in 1046 and 1048, by an old friend and schoolfellow, Adelman, who was at the earlier date Archdeacon of Liège, and at the later Bishop of Breecia; and also in a controversy with Hugo, Bishop of Langres. He then corresponded on the subject with the great Lanfranc, at that time Abbot of Bec, but afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. His letter to Lanfranc, who was then at Rome, having been brought before a council then sitting there, Berengarius was condemned as a heretic [A.D. 1050]. This sentence was withdrawn by Hildebrand, afterwards Pope Gregory VII., at a Synod held at Tours [A.D. 1054], in which Berengarius declared his opinion in the simple form that "The Bread and Wine of the Altar, after consecration, are the Body and Blood of Christ." Subsequently a popular agitation was raised against him as a heretic, and in 1059 he was summoned to Rome, where he was persuaded to sign a form of recantation, in which he accepted the full and popular doctrine of Transubstantiation. Returning to France he disregarded his recantation, which was made in a moment of weakness, and entered on a long controversy with Lanfranc, which even brought his life into danger from the hands of the populace, who were violently opposed to his opinions. He was again summoned to Rome in 1079, and, on signing a second recantation, received a certificate from Pope Gregory VII., declaring that his opinions were orthodox, and anathematizing any one who should call him a heretic. The remaining nine years of his life were all spent in close retirement, in the island of St. Cosme, near Tours, in much humiliation, on account of his professed recantation, and in some fear, on account of the hatred which he had incurred among the bigots of Tours, who heard of those opinions in an exaggerated and distorted form, both from those who professed to be his followers and from his opponents. He never formed a sect, nor did his friends form themselves into one; his name being applied for controversial convenience to those who denied the Real Presence, just as the name of another distinguished divine was adopted in England for those who held certain opinions in the middle of the nineteenth century.

Bergier, NICOLAS SILVÈSTRE [1718—1790].—A Canon of Nôtre Dame, and royal confessor, a man of much learning, who achieved great success by his writings against infidelity, chiefly against Voltaire and the Encyclopædists.

Berkeley, BISHOP [A.D. 1684—1753].—George Berkeley was born in Ireland, on the 12th of March, 1684. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where, in 1707, he gained a Fellowship. In 1713 he went to London, where he was introduced to the best literary society by Steele and Swift. He spent several years in travelling through Europe; first as chaplain and secretary to the famous Earl of Peterborough, and then as companion to Mr. Ashe, a son of the Bishop of Clogher. In 1724 Berkeley was preferred to the Deanery of Derry; but for a long time he had been forming a scheme for the conversion of the North Americans, which he hoped to effect by establishing a missionary college in Bermuda; this he intended to be a centre of operations, both on the Continent and in the West Indies. He put forth this scheme in 1725, a time when what is now the United States was yet an English colony, and its Church more or less under the control of the English Government. Encouraged by promises of substantial help from the Government, and accompanied by his family, and by several of the Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, he set sail for Rhode Island the same year. Here for seven years he worked untiringly to promote his object, but, utterly disappointed in the promised assistance of Government, he was at length compelled to give up the work and return to England. He had resigned the Deanery of Derry, worth £1,100 a year, and had spent much of his private means in the establishment of the college; and now, on giving up his favourite scheme, he determined to bear the whole loss himself, and returned all the subscriptions he had received. In 1734 he was made Bishop of Cloyne, and held that See till his death, in January, 1753, although he had the offer of the much richer See of Clogher.

Berkeley was celebrated for his philosophical writings. The chief principles of his philosophy are set forth in the Theory of Vision, published in 1709, and The Principles of Human Knowledge, published a year later. In the first of these he enforced the distinction between the immediate operation of the senses, and the deductions which we habitually draw from our sensations. In the second work he propounded the novel doctrine that what we call "matter" has no actual existence, and that the impressions which we believe ourselves to receive from it are not, in fact, derived from anything external to ourselves, but are produced within us by a certain disposition of the mind, the immediate operation of God.

In Paris he visited Malebranche, and discussed with him his ideal theory so hotly that it is said to have hastened the death of the French sage. In 1713 he published his Dialogue between Hylas and Philonous; in 1732 his Minute Philosopher, a series of dialogues on the model of Plato between two Atheists and two Christian Theists; and in 1734 the Analyst, a work addressed to infidel mathematicians. In 1744 he wrote Siris, a work on the benefits of tar-water in cases of colic.

The Minute Philosopher is the most characteristic of Berkeley's writings. In it he set himself to assail infidelity. He began by thinking that they erred by applying material standards and tests to the Being and Government of God. He soon saw what was the sophism which underlay their arguments. They assumed matter as a primary fact, the existence of which could not be gainsaid. He replied: "I admit the evidence of my senses, I see the sun, and hear music, and taste food. But I cannot generalise on these facts so far as to say what matter is. I know equally well that I have a spirit, thinking and reasoning power, and I know not what that is either. That is the greater of the two powers which I feel within me. And therefore I believe that the Being who made the outer world is a spirit, greater than all material things." "The idealism of Berkeley," writes Professor Maurice, "is a name applied to his doctrine, if it is supposed to represent an unpractical habit of mind, an inclination to overlook facts, a preference for a world which we create to the world which we find. Berkeley was remarkable among his contemporaries for his devotedness to practical objects. If his zeal carried him into other worlds, and made him anticipate blessings for our colonies which could not be attained in his day, it shrank from no conflict with realities; it did not waste itself in any dreams. To watch the complaints of his people, to give them water, and carefully to examine and register its effects, was part of his work as a priest, and became a link in the chain of philosophical thoughts. In his treatment of his diocese, and in his conception of the duties of the English Government to English settlers, towards the Irish and the faith, he displayed the soundest sense and benevolence. He anticipated maxims which after-years have been compelled to swallow, accept, and act upon. Surrounded by most accomplished and the most critical of his times, who shared little in his beliefs, some of whom were directly opposed to it, he was never regarded with any feelings but those of admiration and affection. He looked with contempt on the coxcombs who answered Berkeley with a grin. Of Berkeley himself he could only say that he had never seen virtue under heaven."

Bern, THE DISPUTATION OF, was famous among the many gatherings held during the Reformation, to decide whether Protestantism or Romanism should be the acknowledged religion of the country. Bern had for a time been halting between two opinions, at last the lords and chief citizens determined to hold a conference, to choose once for all between the Pope and Luther. They invited the Bishops, and desired all cantons and free towns of the Helvetic confederacy to send deputies; indeed, so anxious were they to thoroughly sift the matter, they invited the ablest champions on both sides, promising them freedom of debate. The assemblage amounted to about 100 persons. The place chosen for the conference was the Church of the Cordeliers; the Protestant deputies sat at one table, and the Catholics at the other, and between them sat the notaries, who were bound by an oath to make a true and unbiassed report of the proceedings. The meeting lasted for twenty days, from January 6th, 1528, to January 27th. It was held on Sundays as well as week-days, except on January 22nd, the fête of St. Vincent, the patron saint of Bern. Then it was seen that the Protestants had gained the day; Bernese had been accustomed to observe the day with much solemnity, but now they called in vain to service: neither priest worshipper appeared. Then the canons and ecclesiastics were assembled, and asked if they wished to subscribe to the Reformed theses, to which they replied with hearty consent, and forthwith signed the articles. Eck and other champions of Rome had declined to be present, thus leaving the field open to the Protestants, who were represented by Zwingli, Kolb, Haller, Capito and Écolampadius. On February 7th, 1528, the Reformation Edict was published consisting of thirteen articles. Mass was abolished, and the altars were pulled down, images were removed, and the Reformation may be said to have won a complete and easy victory.

Bernard, St. [A.D. 1091—1153], Abbot of Clairvaux, one of the most influential and distinguished personages of the Middle Ages. He was great as a divine, as the second founder of the Cistercian Order of Monks, and as the instigator of the Second Crusade.

St. Bernard was born at Fontaines in Burgundy, his parents, Tecelinus and Aletha, being both of noble families. He was educated in the University of Paris, then the most learned place in Europe, and after leaving the University returned to his father's house, which was on an estate not far from the Abbey of Cîteaux, near Dijon, where the Order of Cistercians had lately branched off from that of the Benedictines, under the leadership of an Englishman named Stephen Harding [CISTERCIANS]. It may have been the influence of this neighbouring monastery which induced St. Bernard to form a monastic community in his father's house, five brothers and a sister, with some neighbouring youths, joining him. At the age of twenty-two [A.D. 1113] the six brothers and some of these enthusiastic young ascetics, the whole number amounting to thirty, asked for and obtained incorporation among the Cistercians of the Abbey, where they remained for two or three years. This period of probation over, Bernard and his friends were drafted off, in 1115, to establish themselves as a new community at Clairvaux, in Champagne. The country was very bleak and barren, and great difficulties had to be surmounted in building the house. Bernard was appointed Abbot by the Bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, in whose diocese the new monastery was situated, and here he remained for nearly forty years, so influencing the order of monks which he had joined, and so extending the number of their monasteries, that they were eventually called after his name, "the Bernardines," being a second name for "the Cistercians."

St. Bernard began his career at Clairvaux with the practice of great austerities, making the severe rule of the Cistercian Order still more severe; but circumstances brought him into public life, and this mellowing influence, together with the better knowledge of the world and of human nature which came with maturer age, led him to relax his discipline, both as regarded himself and those whom he ruled. In public life, indeed, he became very conspicuous before he was forty years of age. In A.D. 1128 he was present at the Synod of Troyes, where his influence led to the establishment on a firm foundation of the Order of Knights Templars, whose greatness is still kept visibly in memory by the Temple and its Church in London. He also drew up the Statutes of that Order. He then became the adviser of Louis VI. respecting the claims of Innocent II. and Anacletus to the Papacy, deciding that the first, as having been first elected, ought to be regarded as the true Pope, a decision which was adopted, not only by the King of France, but also by Henry I., King of England, and even by the Anti-Pope Victor, who was chosen by the opposite party to succeed Anacletus, but who submitted himself to Innocent II.

In the year 1146 St. Bernard began to urge the continental princes and people to engage in another crusade, his sermons and letters inducing vast numbers to enlist themselves in the army organised for the recovery of the Holy Land out of the hands of its Mahometan conquerors, and producing such an effect that he was entreated to take the supreme command as generalissimo. This command he prudently declined, but he sent the crusaders forth with his full sanction, by giving the cross with his own hands to the Emperor, the King of France, the Count of Flanders, and other commanders who had unsheathed their swords at his bidding.

In the controversies of the period St. Bernard is chiefly known as the opponent of ABELARD, both by his writings, and also by word of mouth at the Council of Sens, held in A.D. 1140. Seven years later he combated the errors of Gilbert de la Porée, Bishop of Poitiers, on the subject of the Holy Trinity, and caused them to be officially condemned at Autun, Paris, and Rheims. In the same year, at the request of Alberic, Cardinal of Ostia, he undertook to confute and convert the PETROBRUSIANS, a sect opposed to most of the received doctrines of the Church, and followers of a priest named Peter de Brueys. St. Bernard went to Toulouse, the stronghold of the sect, and won over many by his earnest preaching and strong arguments.

But the most abiding influence of St. Bernard was exerted through the monasteries which he founded, and through his writings. He is said to have founded one hundred and sixty Cistercian monasteries during his lifetime, and great numbers were erected in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, including in England those of Fountains, Tintern, Beaulieu, Netley, Furness, Hayles, Jervaulx, Woburn, and St. John's College, Oxford. His writings were extensively read during the middle ages, and were among the earliest of printed books, appearing in two folio volumes at Ments, A.D. 1475. His theology was chiefly founded on that of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, and one characteristic of it is his frequent references to and quotations from the Bible. St. Bernard's writings acquired for him the title of the "Last of the Fathers," so great was their authority. It may be added that while in theology and in practical work and life St. Bernard belonged in all things to the Middle Ages, he was an unsparing censor of the abuses which had sprung up in the Court of Rome, and under its influence in the Church at large.

We are indebted to St. Bernard for several well-known hymns—"Jesu, the very thought of Thee," "Jesu, the very thought is sweet," "Jesu, Thou joy of loving hearts," &c., being translations of portions of a Latin metrical poem of 200 lines, known as "Jesu, dulcis memoria." "O sacred Head, surrounded," is a translation by Sir Henry Baker of another of his poems.

St. Bernard was canonised in 1174; his festival is observed on August 20th. During his life his personal influence was almost incalculably great; the Kings of France and England, the Emperor of Germany, and even the Pope, were really guided and inspired by him.

Bernard, of CLUNY, is sometimes known as Bernard of Morlaix, in Brittany, where he was born of English parents. Little more is known of his life than that he was a monk of the magnificent Abbey of Cluny, in Auvergne. He must not be confounded with St. Bernard of Clairvaux, with whom he was contemporary. He was the author of a famous poem of about 3,000 lines, On Contempt of the World, which he dedicated to his Abbot, Peter the Venerable. The poem commences with a description of the glory of heaven, and Dr. J. M. Neale has made a free translation of it, entitled, The Rhythm of Bernard of Morlaix. Some of our most familiar hymns about heaven are extracts from this translation: "Brief life is here our portion," "For thee, O dear, dear country," "Jerusalem the Golden." From a later portion of the poem comes also "The world is very evil." Archbishop Trench has published ninety-six lines of it in his Sacred Latin Poetry and there have been several American translations.

Bernard, St. [A.D. 923—1008], of Menthon. The founder of the hospitals for travellers across the Alpine passes, known as "The Great St. Bernard" and "The Little St. Bernard," where some of the regular Canons of St. Augustine (Augustinian Canons) have for nine centuries ministered charity, in word and deed, to distressed travellers, rescuing many from death, showing hospitality to all who stood in need of it, and guiding others to safety. St. Bernard of Menthon was Archdeacon of Aosta, and for forty years was engaged on missions among the mountaineers, and his observations of the hardships which Alpine travellers had to undergo suggested to him the idea of erecting the great Hospice as a place of refuge for them. His name is commemorated in the Calendar for June 16th, the day of his burial. He died at Novarra, on May 28th, 1008.

Bernardin, of SIENNA, St. [1380—1444]. At the age of twenty-two he became a Franciscan. He was the most celebrated preacher of his day, and by his eloquence persuaded many of both sexes to give up their gambles and frivolity. He refused several Italian bishoprics which were offered to him, and was canonized by Nicholas V., in 1450.

Bernardines.—A second name for the Cistercian Order of Monks. [BERNARD, OF CLAIRVAUX. CISTERCIANS].

Berquin, LOUIS DE, born at Passy, about 1490. He was brought up in the strict form of Roman Catholicism, but having investigated the doctrines of Luther, became a convert to them. He was twice imprisoned on a charge of heresy, and a second time only released at the express desire of the king. Having, however, once attacked the Sorbonne, he was a third time thrown into prison, and this time condemned to be burned alive. This sentence was carried out in Paris, on the 22nd of April, 1529. Berquin is remarkable as being the first victim of the Protestant persecution in France.

Berstead, COUNCIL OF.—A Witenagemot summoned by Wilfred, King of Kent. Berstead, near Maidstone, to pass his ecclesiastical laws, probably about A.D. 1002. The laws passed by this council are given in the Textus Roffensis.

Berthwald, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY [A.D. 693—731].—Being Abbot of Revesham, he was elected Archbishop after a year's vacancy, to succeed Theodor of Tarsus, 1st July, 692, and was consecrated at Lyons, under the Pope's authority, June, 693, by Godwin, Bishop of that city. Though a learned man, his knowledge was not equal to that of his predecessor; but he seems, though of a less haughty temper than Theodor, to have been equally tenacious of the rights of his own Church against Rome. He is chiefly known for his attempts to settle the case of the famous Wilfred, Archbishop of York. This, which must be described in detail under WILFRED, turned on the point, whether the Archbishops of Canterbury had in the province of York, and especially whether they had the power to consecrate fresh sees and consecrate fresh bishops. This Archbishop Theodore had done, Wilfred, though appealing to Rome, had been forced by Theodore's influence to leave his see of York for that of Leicester. Archbishop Berthwald now called [702] a Synod, at Easterfield, in Yorkshire, to consider the case; but Wilfred still refusing to submit, the matter, in spite of another appeal to Rome, could not be settled until a second council was held, in 706, near the Nidd (the exact place is not known), a little river falling into the northern Ouse. At this council Berthwald induced Wilfred so far to give way as to be content with the see of Hexham, instead of York, to which he had insisted on returning.

Little more is known of Berthwald; he watched over the interests of his province by obtaining a veto on the appointment of bishops; and over those of the Kentish monasteries by gaining protection for them against lay oppression. He died 13th Jan., 731, and was buried beside his predecessor in St. Peter's Church at Canterbury.

Bertram, usually called "Bertram the Priest," or "Bertram the Monk;" but the name is thought to be a corruption of that of Ratramnus, with "Blessed" (Lat. Beatus) prefixed in an abbreviated form, and thus reading B. Ratramnus. He was a monk of Convey, in Aquitaine, and wrote a tract on The Body and Blood of the Lord, which was brought into notice at the time of the Reformation, under the title of The Book of Bertram [RATRAMNUS].

Beryllus [about A.D. 227], a Bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, who denied the pre-existence of Christ as God before the Incarnation, and maintained the view that He had no other Divine Nature than that of God the Father, Who, as a spirit, was united to Him at the time of His birth. A council was held at Bostra in A.D. 227, when the great Origen so successfully argued with Beryllus that he was brought back to the faith of the Church.

Bethlehemites.—A Roman Catholic Order, founded in America by a Spaniard in the seventeenth century, under the patronage of "Our Lady of Bethlehem." Their special duties were to minister to the sick in hospitals, and to teach in schools, and the Order rapidly spread through Spanish America. But with the decline of Spanish power there the Order dwindled also, though there are several houses belonging to it in Central America. There are no others anywhere. In the thirteenth century there was a similar order established in Cambridge, but nothing further is known of it.

Betrothal [MARRIAGE].

Beveridge, WILLIAM. — This learned Bishop was born in 1638, at Barrow-on-Soar

(near Loughborough), where his grandfather, father and brother were successively incumbents. Admitted in 1653 of St. John's College, Cambridge, he was B.A. 1656, M.A. 1660, D.D. 1679. His studies took an Eastern turn, and he was a learned Orientalist. He was made Deacon the 3rd, and ordained Priest the 31st, of January, 1661, by Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, and collated Vicar of Ealing, by Bishop Sheldon of London, holding the living till 1672, when the Lord Mayor, Sir Robert Hanson, made him Rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill. Proceeding further, he was Prebendary of St. Paul's, 1674 (this he held till his death), Archdeacon of Colchester, 1681, and Canon of Canterbury, 1684. In 1691 he was nominated by William III., whose Chaplain he was, for election to Bath and Wells, the see of the deprived Bishop Ken; but although he had, of course, taken the oath of allegiance to the king, and indeed went so far as to vacate his canonry of Canterbury, he would not in the end accept the bishopric. In 1704 St. Asaph was offered him, vacant by the translation of Bishop Hooper to the same see of Bath and Wells. Possibly the same scruples as to Ken's deprivation might have made Beveridge refuse this also, had not Ken formally resigned in Hooper's favour; St. Asaph, therefore, Beveridge accepted, vacated his archdeaconry, and was consecrated 16th July, 1704, by Archbishop Tenison, Bishop Spratt of Rochester (Dean of Westminster), and Bishop Hooper.

Beveridge died on the 5th March, 1708, at Westminster, and was buried at St. Paul's, leaving most of his estate (for he had no children) to the recently-founded Societies for the Propagation of the Gospel and of Christian Knowledge, an endowment for daily service in his native parish, and his library to St. Paul's. His doctrine was that of a High Churchman,* though perhaps not the highest of his day. He was a most upright and pious man, and for the zeal which he displayed in his first parish obtained the appellation of "the great reviver and restorer of primitive piety." He was most assiduous in his duties, and met with such success that his parishes were considered models; as archdeacon he conducted his visitations in person, which seems to have been then uncommon; as bishop he paid considerable attention to the duty of catechising, and supplied his clergy with his own Exposition upon the Church Catechism, which has been several times reprinted.

Besides this work, other and more important ones were the Synodicon [1672], a collection of the Apostolical Canons and Conciliar

*Extracts from his writings are given in all four of the "Catene Patrum," drawn up by Fusey and Newman (Tracts for the Times, Nos. 74, 76, 78, 81), on the Sacraments, Tradition, and the Apostolical Succession.

Decrees; this, however, was the only one which he himself published; but after his death appeared his Sermons [1709—14]; Private Thoughts on Religion [1709]; Thesaurus Theologicus [1710], being skeleton sermons arranged in order and called a "System of Divinity;" and an Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles [1710]. This was imperfect, the MS. of the last nine not being at that time found; it was discovered in 1830, and published in 1840, by Dr. Routh, of Oxford. Thorpe, the bookseller who sold it to him, had obtained it from the Rev. — Stanley, Rector of Much Hadham, a descendant of William Stanley, Dean of St. Asaph [1706—31], into whose family Bishop Beveridge had married.

Beveridge's whole works were first collected by Hartwell Horne, 9 vols. 8vo., 1824, and again published in 12 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1844—48.

Beza, St. [BEE's, St.]

Beza, THEODORE [A.D. 1519—1605].—Beza is the Latin form of the name of Theodore de Beze, one of the earliest French reformers. He was son of Pierre de Beze, baillif of Vezelai, in Burgundy, by his wife Marie Bourdelot, and was born in 1519. His early education at Paris and Orleans led him towards Protestant doctrines, but not so far that he refused the priory of Longjumeau, near Paris, to which he was presented on returning thither in 1539, after taking his degree in law at Orleans. This he retained for nine years, till after a serious illness in 1548 he read his recantation at Genoa, and the next year became Professor of Greek at Lausanne. Here, besides the lectures properly belonging to his chair, he lectured on the Epistles of St. Paul and St. Peter, and made his Latin translation of the New Testament [see BIBLE]; he also finished the French metrical version of the Psalms, of which Clement Marot had done the first fifty. In 1559 he resigned his professorship and joined Calvin at Genoa, where he became a Protestant minister, and took so prominent a part that he was fixed upon to convert King Anthony of Navarre. This, aided by King Anthony's wife, he succeeded in doing;* and afterwards remaining for a time in France was present during some of the religious campaigns of the period, acting as chaplain at the battle of Dreux, 19th Dec., 1562. In 1563 he returned to Genoa, and Calvin dying in the following year, he became the recognised head of the reforming party, and as such was president of the Synod of Rochelle, in 1570. He lived to a great age, managing the affairs of the Geneva Protestants, and negotiating and speaking at conferences and synods. His public lectures were continued till 1600, and even after that he lived five years, dying 13th October, 1605.

His moral character has, of course, been much attacked; some accusations were made against him while Prior of Longjumeau, but they were never either proved or brought to trial; although some of his early poems, called Jeunesses, are somewhat licentious, he repented, and apologised for them. Another matter of the share he took in the wars of religion, which he was accused of inciting the murder of Francis, Duke of Guise, [1563]; but he was accused of inciting the murder of an assassin himself, Poltrot de Méré, who made the accusation, afterwards withdrew it; as to his zeal in exciting the Protestant resistance, he was by no means one of the most prominent, nor were the Protestants unprovoked, or perhaps even unjustified in their resistance. His fiery zeal was much lessened in his last days, and in 1599, when he had an interview with Henry IV., he asked what he could do for him, all that he asked was that peace might be restored to France.

Much of Beza's Biblical work will be found mentioned under BIBLE; and his chief publication, besides what have been already spoken of, was a History of the French Reformation Church, from 1521 to 1563, Antwerp, 1563, 3 vols.; another remarkable work was his Treatise De Hæreticis Puniendis, 1544, in favour of the capital punishment of heretics.

Bespopostschina.—That division of the Russian Dissenters which does not retain the office of priest. It comprehends many sects.

Bezalovestni.—A curious sect of Russian Dissenters, formed in the last century, whose members, after their conversion, renounced the use of speech, and so acquired their distinctive name, which means "The Deaf." Cruel forms of torture were used by the Governor-general of Siberia during the reign of Catherine II., with the object of obtaining information as to their tenets, but without success.

Bianchi. [WHITE BRETHREN.]

Bibiana, St. [A.D. 363], otherwise known as St. Viviana, a martyr of Rome, daughter of Flavianus, a prefect of Rome, banished for his profession of Christianity, and whose mother, Dafrosa, also became a martyr. After infamous attempts to corrupt her virtue, Bibiana was beaten to death with loaded scourges. She is commemorated December 2nd.

Bible.—That the volume which we call the Bible is the inspired revelation of God appears from a chain of evidence beginning with very early times. The history of the LXX. (the Greek translation of the Old Testament.—see below) proves the existence of the Old Testament long before

*For a short account of French Protestantism, see the article BARTHOLOMEW MASSACRE.

Christian era; in the second prologue to Ecclesiasticus, about B.C. 230, "the Law and the Prophets and the rest of the Books" are spoken of, which virtually represents our Lord's own division (Luke xxiv. 44). And that these books, then, afterwards, and now existing, came from most primitive ages as the productions of those whose names they bear, may rest upon the testimony of Philo, the Jewish philosopher, in the first half, and Josephus, the Jewish historian, in the second half, of the first century, to the extreme and jealous care with which the Jews preserved their sacred writings—writings described by Josephus in agreement with all later catalogues of the Old Testament.

Of these later catalogues, the first extant is that in the works of Melito, Bishop of Sardis, [A.D. 180], another is by Origen, a few years later, and there are eight others in the works of the Fathers, down to St. Augustine in the fifth century. Then came the catalogues set forth by the councils, adding the New Testament; that of Laodicea [363], gives all our books except the Revelation of St. John; while that of Carthage [397], adds the Revelation, and inserts also some of the Apocryphal books.

The word Bible, in Greek and Latin "Biblia," is a plural noun turned into a singular, being the Greek "books." St. Chrysostom, in the fourth century, first uses it in his Homilies (the earlier titles of the "Bible" being such as answer to our expressions, "the Holy Scriptures," or "Sacred Writings"); and through the Latin translation into ancient, middle, and modern English, it passed as the familiar name by which we know the volume of sacred books of our Christian religion. With most of the reformed churches it is divided into the three great sections of the Old Testament, the Apocrypha, and the New Testament.

1.—THE ORIGINAL HEBREW OLD TESTAMENT.—The thirty-nine books, whose names stand at the beginning of our Bibles, in "The Names and Order of all the Books," formed, of course, and form now, the HEBREW BIBLE; but they were differently arranged into the three sections of which our Lord speaks (Luke xxiv. 44), as "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms;" (1) the Law being the five Books of Moses; (2) the Prophets, not only those books which we call by that name, but the historical ones also, which were placed in this category in consequence of the belief that the prophets were the historians; (3) the Psalms, the book of that name and the other poetical ones. This is but a rough classification, and not at all times strictly accurate, but such was the principle.

The books are of most various dates, from Job, or rather part of Job, down to Malachi the prophet. With regard to the former, the exact date is uncertain, but it is thought by some that Moses edited what already existed, and added the historical beginning and end; the date usually given to Moses is about B.C. 1490. From about this time, then, the five Books of Moses and that of Job are dated; and the Book of Malachi from about B.C. 420. Over more than a thousand years, therefore, the Books of the Old Testament range; and as during this time the work of collection was gradually going on, more than one assemblage of books is, as might be expected, known. Thus about B.C. 1420, "the Book of the Law of God" (Joshua xxiv. 26), was, as tradition has uniformly maintained, what is now known as the Pentateuch. About B.C. 710 Isaiah (xxxiv. 16) mentions "the Book of the Lord;" and about B.C. 520 Zechariah's mention (vii. 7) of "the former prophets" is probably an allusion, though not quite so clear a one, to an earlier compilation of prophets and historians. And at the end of the fifth century before Christ, that is, rather more than a hundred years after the last date, the latest collection and redaction was made by Ezra and Nehemiah, the two Jewish restorers, and the standard copy thus produced laid up in the Temple. This was lost at the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans [A.D. 70], just as the sacred autographs had been lost when Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon took the city [B.C. 588].

Far later even than A.D. 70 are the earliest Hebrew copies which now exist. The MS. Bible in the Cambridge University Library is said to date from A.D. 856 (Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, under Old Testament), and other copies of different books on the Continent from 843, 897, 916; the MSS. of the Samaritan Pentateuch, a recension in Samaritan characters, made about B.C. 400, date from the tenth century. The printed editions began in 1477, with the Psalter, at Bologna; other separate portions followed, and before the end of the century the whole Bible was printed, at Soncino, near Cremona; a copy of this edition is at Exeter College. The great Complutensian Polyglot (the Bible in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin), succeeded in 1522, at Complutense, now Alcalá; and many other editions more or less important, among which the other Polyglots may be mentioned: the Antwerp Polyglot, 1569—1572, containing (besides the above languages) the Syriac version; the Paris, 1628—1645, containing also Samaritan and Arabic; the London, 1657 (edited by Bishop Watson, of Chester); the Leipzig, 1750, containing the German version; and the Second London 1816, published by the Bagsters. All modern Hebrew Bibles, however, are based on Van der Hooght's edition, Amsterdam, 1705.

THE GREEK OLD TESTAMENT.—Some portions of the Old Testament (the history of the Exodus, the settlement in Canaan, the Law of Moses, strictly so called), may have been translated into Greek very shortly after the final redaction by Ezra; and there is a quotation of Aristobulus, a Jewish priest of about B.C. 160, by Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, or Miscellanies, i. 22), to the effect that Plato the philosopher (B.C. 428—347) had studied them. But the whole of the Old Testament was first translated in the reign of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, King of Egypt [B.C. 288—247]. This king was the founder of the famous museum and library of Alexandria, and under the care of Demetrius Phalereus the orator, who was his librarian, the Old Testament was translated by learned Jews of Alexandria. This is all that is really known of the history of the translation; the legends that seventy translators were sent from Jerusalem by the High Priest, that they were shut up in seventy cells on the island of Pharos, and each by the help of the Holy Ghost finished a version in seventy days, which seventy, by the same Divine power, minutely agreed—these are discredited by the simple evidence of the version itself, that the translators were not quite perfectly acquainted with Hebrew; one portion, however, of these traditions is embodied in the name of the version, “the Septuagint,” or, in short, LXX.

One of the oldest MSS. of the Septuagint known, the Codex Cottonianus, of the fourth century, was almost destroyed by fire in 1731; what remains is in the British Museum. There is also the Codex Alexandrinus, which is almost complete in both Testaments, and dates from the fifth century; but at the Vatican is a Greek Bible somewhat less complete, of the same age as the Cottonian, another at Paris, and another at Milan, more fragmentary still, and about two centuries younger. The Psalter was printed at Milan in 1481, and at Venice 1486 and 1496, but the first complete LXX. was in the Complutensian Polyglot already mentioned, 1517. The text of this was an eclectic one; but reprints of both the Alexandrian and Vatican MSS., which differ slightly from each other (the latter being generally nearest the Hebrew), have often been made; thus the latter is taken by Bishop Walton in his Polyglot, 1697; by Holmes and Parsons,* Oxford, 1798; by Dean Gaisford's small edition, Oxford, 1848; also by Messrs. Bagster's reprints; while the former is represented by Grabe, Oxford, 1707; Breitinger, Zürich, 1730; and Mr. Field in 1859, who also arranged the version according to the Hebrew, by separating the Apocryphal Books, and altering where necessary the arrangement of chapters.

Three other versions, by Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, date from the second century; they are not extant except in fragments; their characteristics are—of Aquila's, great and unintelligible literalness; of Theodotion's, very considerable ignorance of Hebrew, far more than the slight and partial ignorance of the LXX.; of Symmachus', the reverse of the first, too great a phrase. Theodotion's requires further notice from the curious fact that his Daniel was unknown reasons, very early substituted that of the LXX. It so remained universal till 1772, when the latter was first published at Rome, from the Codex Chigianus of the sixteenth century, and very commonly so afterwards. Gaisford [1848] gives both. Yet three versions, though only partial ones, exist but are now extant only in very scattered fragments; being anonymous they are only known as the Fifth, Sixth and Seventh versions. The seven, together with the original Hebrew and the same in Greek letters, formed the great Hexapla of Origen [A.D. 185—254], arranged in parallel columns, and having title from the number of columns which throughout. This work was kept at Caesarea but was destroyed when the Saracens took the town in 653. The central column being the LXX. itself, with Origen's annotations, was preserved in a copy made by Eusebius; but numerous fragments were afterwards bedded as quotations in different works of the Fathers and others, and all these have been brought together successively by Montfaucon [1757], Drusius [1622], Montfaucon [1757], and Mr. Field [1875], whose preface is the best, as well as the latest, authority on the whole subject.

THE LATIN OLD TESTAMENT.—The earliest Latin versions, not only of the Old Testament but of the whole Bible, did not come but of the whole Bible, did not come, as might have been expected, from the Roman Church, which in the first days of Christianity was Greek-speaking, but from that of Africa, which from the beginning seems to have used Latin. One version which is not otherwise known, is quoted by very early writers of our own church, as Fastidius, a devotional writer of the fourth century, said to have been Bishop of Lorraine and even before this, as early as Tertullian [A.D. 150—220], there seem to have been more than one version, or, more properly, several recensions of the same text, such as the African, British, Gallican, and one, the oldest known, called the Old Italic. Of this last is the chief part (of the Old Testament) which remains is the Psalter, which was long used in divine service, and with us till the Norman conquest. These early versions were called the LXX.; as the preface to our English Bible says, “They were not out of the Hebrew fountain, but out of the Greek stream; therefore the Greek not altogether clear, the Latin derived from it needs be muddy. This moved St. Jerome to undertake the translating of the Old Testament out of the very fountains themselves. He began with the Psalter, of which there were three distinct versions, all extant; the Roman, being the Old Italic slightly corrected; (2) the Gallican, a fresh version from

LXX; (3) the Hebrew, direct from the original; he then proceeded with the rest of the Bible, and finished it during the last twenty years of the fourth century. His version by degrees superseded the Old Italic, and, revised by order of Charlemagne [A.D. 802], and again by Pope Clement VIII. in 1593, is the present authorised Bible of the Roman Catholic Church. The name, Vulgate, by which this Bible is known, was originally applied by Jerome himself to the Old Italic, and afterwards gradually transferred to his own work. The existing MSS. are very many; some of the earliest date from the sixth century; one of this age, the Codex Amiatinus, is at Florence; one in the British Museum, known as Charlemagne's Bible, is beautifully illuminated, and another of the same kind at Durham Cathedral is known by the name of Bishop Pudesey, or de Brissac [1153—1197]. The Vulgate, on the invention of printing, was the very first book to come from the press, about 1460; after the edition was supposed to be lost, a copy of it was found in the seventeenth century in the library of Cardinal Guilio Mazarin, at Paris, and it is therefore called the Mazarin Bible. About twenty copies are now known, mostly in England.

In the sixteenth century other translations were made; in 1527 by Sanctes Paquinius [d. 1536]; in 1535 by Sebastian Munster [d. 1552]; in 1572, by Benedict Arias Montanus [d. 1598]; in 1579, by Emanuel Tremellius [d. 1580], to which his son-in-law Francis Junius [d. 1602], added a translation of the Apocrypha; this name has led a writer in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible into a strange blunder (ii. 466); "the margin of the A.V. (Tob. xi. 18), gives Junius as the equivalent of Nasbas."

II.—THE ORIGINAL GREEK NEW TESTAMENT.—The New Testament was at originally written in Greek (for the theories that St. Matthew's Gospel was a translation from Hebrew, and St. Mark's from Latin, are now given up, the latter by all scholars, the former by nearly all) within the last half of the first century; the original autographs are long since lost, it is impossible to say when or how, and the earliest MSS. which exist date from the fourth and fifth centuries. The principal ones (of which some have already been mentioned) are: (1) The Sinaitic MS., discovered by Tischendorf in 1859, and now at St. Petersburg, of the latter part of the fourth century; (2) the Alexandrine, brought to England in 1625, and placed in the British Museum, 1753, of the early portion of the fifth century; (3) the Vatican, in that Library since 1450, of the early part of the fourth century, and so the oldest known; (4) Ephraem, at Paris, of the fifth century; and (5) Bezae, at Cambridge since 1581, of the sixth century. Of these the only one where the New Testament is quite complete is the first; the second is very nearly so; the third somewhat more deficient; the fourth is only large fragments; and the fifth the Gospels and Acts. Little more than a brief list can be given of some of the more important printed editions, of which the first (though some of the early chapters of St. John had been printed sooner), was, as of the Old Testament, that of the Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Francis Ximenes de Cisneros, which was published in 1514, before the rest; to Ximenes succeeded Erasmus, who published in his lifetime five editions, 1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, 1535. Theodore Beza, and the printers Stephens and Elzevir, were the editors of the next hundred years, and Dr. Scrivener thinks that Beza's last edition, 1598, is the text which our Authorised Version most nearly represents. But not all of the five great MSS. were yet known, those which were known do not appear to have been used, and Ximenes and Erasmus formed their text from very few, and those late and unimportant ones. Stephens was the first to collate any number, though even he used them carelessly; and the Polyglot of Bishop Walton of Chester, 1657, was the first real preparation for the formation of a correct text by criticism. Bishop Fell of Oxford, 1675, in some measure, though slightly, carried on the work; but Dr. John Mill, Canon of Canterbury, 1707, "found the edifice of wood and left it marble" (Scrivener): such was his industry, zeal, and sagacity, that he is universally allowed to be the parent of all the work that has been done. Bentley's great plans came to nothing (BENTLEY), and for the next century almost all original research was made in Germany. Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann, successively did their work upon the New Testament, which was crowned in 1872 by Tischendorf's final and eighth edition of his revised text. Meanwhile, of later years in England the three texts of Dr. Tregelles, Dean Alford, and Bishop Wordsworth have been published, and in 1881 the great edition of Professors Westcott and Hort* came forth, which is the last attempt to settle the words actually written by the inspired writers.

These, the words actually written, cannot, it is almost universally allowed, be those of the common or received text; and the problem before critics, unless Westcott and Hort, as some think, have solved it,† is to ascertain these as nearly as possible from the three chief sources, namely MSS., Versions, and Quotations. Of these three only one has yet been mentioned, and but a small portion of that; but there exist, roughly speaking, about 2,000 MSS., more or less complete, of which rather less than a tenth are "uncial," the others being "cursive" (the modern words answering to these would be "point-hand" and "running-hand"), the uncials being as a rule the earliest. The Versions of chief critical value are the Latin, Syriac, Gothic, Egyptian, Æthiopic, and Armenian; and the Quotations referred to are those made by the early Fathers of the Church. These three sources of evidence come in the order of their value; for in the second it cannot, of course, be always certain what Greek reading is represented by any translation, nor in the third whether a quotation is meant to be a verbatim one. Again, in applying the evidences there will be differences; for some critics, as Dean Alford and others, attach paramount importance to the early uncials, those already mentioned by name and some few others, and to their descent from and relation to each other; while some, of whom Dean Burgon in his celebrated Quarterly Review papers, and in a less degree Mr. Maclellan, in his English New Testament, are examples, give great weight in all cases to the later cursives, whose influence formed our received text, and to the possibility, which no doubt always exists, that some may be copies from an earlier uncial than any we now possess. To strike the balance is the great difficulty of criticism; and it must not be forgotten that Tischendorf, one of the greatest of critics, in many cases returned in his later editions to the received readings.

* Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, Canon of Westminster; Fenton John Anthony Hort, D.D., Hulsean Professor of Divinity at Cambridge.

† Dr. Scrivener, whose authority, even if it is not equal to that of the Cambridge Professors, falls very little short of it, throws, however, very considerable doubt on the soundness of their conclusions. Textual Criticism, 3rd and last edition.

There are also "Græco-Latin" MSS., i.e., of the two languages side by side. The best known is Codex Bezae, whose Latin is simply its translation of its own Greek; others have, some the Old Italic, some the Vulgate. Lastly, Theodore Beza, in 1556, made a very elegant version of the New Testament, which went through many editions, and has been reprinted by the Bagsters; and Emanuel Tremellius, in 1569, made a version from the Syriac.

III.—OTHER EARLY VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE.

—To these very little space can be given; those whose names have been already mentioned are (1) the Syriac, in which language and its dialects there are known six more or less different and perfect versions; the best known, the Peshito (meaning Simple), is of the third century, and was published as early as 1555, by Albert Wiedmanstadt, Chancellor to the Emperor Ferdinand I.; (2) the Egyptian, dividing into three in different dialects, of the fourth or fifth centuries; (3) the Gothic, made by Bishop Ulfilas, about A.D. 360; (4) the Æthiopic, whose date is unknown (Christianity came to Æthiopia in the fourth century); this version only exists in late MSS.; (5) the Armenian, made in the fifth century. Others are (6) the Arabic, of the tenth century; (7) the Chaldee of the Old Testament only, called the Targum, word of unknown meaning; this is intermixed with Jewish comment, paraphrase and explanation, and is of very various uncertain dates; (8) the Samaritan, a debased Hebrew dialect, of perhaps seventh century—not to be confused with "Samaritan Pentateuch;" (9) the Slavonic, of doubtful age, perhaps partly even diærial.

IV.—THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

(1).—PRIMITIVE VERSIONS.—Of these there is a trace, but a very slight one, in a sermon of St. Chrysostom, about the end of the fourth century; the Scriptures are read, he says, even in the British Isles, and the same is learnt as at Constantinople, though in another tongue.

(2).—ANCIENT ENGLISH, OR SAXON NORMAN VERSIONS. No complete Anglo-Saxon version of the Bible now exists, though probably ever existed; the Venerable Bede [672—735], Eadfrith, Bishop of Lindisfarne [d. 721], and King Alfred the Great, translated great part of it, but these versions are now lost. Ælfric, Archbishop of Canterbury [d. 1005], translated the Heptateuch (Moses, with Joshua and Judges), the Psalms of Kings, Esther, Job, Judith, two Books of Maccabees, with the apocryphal gospels of Nicodemus; of these, the Heptateuch, Judith, and Nicodemus, were published in 1709 by Edward Thwaites [d. 1711], Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, Regius Professor of Greek, also Professor of Moral Philosophy. The Anglo-Saxon translation of the Gospels appears to be ascribed to Ælfric with sufficient authority. There remain six MSS. at Cambridge, Oxford, and the Bodleian Museum, of which the oldest is at Christ's College, Cambridge; but they differ from one another, and their relations, either common or mutual, are not as yet clearly ascertained. A text representing them was published by Archbishop Parker, and John Foxe, in 1564, by Thomas Marshall, Rector of Lincoln College [d. 1685], 1665; by Mr. Benjamin Thorpe, the eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar, 1842, and by Professor Bosworth, 1846. Besides these are two glosses, or Latin interlinear Anglo-Saxon, known as the Lindisfarne and Rushworth Gospels; the former, in the British Museum, is of the eighth century, the latter, in the Bodleian Library, of the ninth; both have been published by the Surtees Society. There were also many other versions, more or less paraphrastic, which have no strict right to be on the present list, such as the narrative poems by Caedmon, and Cynewulf of Whitby, in the seventh century, published by Mr. Thorpe in 1832; a version of the Psalms by Aldhelm, Bishop of Sherborne [d. 709], published by Sir Spelman 1640, by Mr. Thorpe 1835, and by Rev. Joseph Stevenson, 1843. Later, the language began to change, there see have been a version of the Bible in Norman-English, of which fragments remain; and as in Saxon-English, there were also metrical paraphrases. The chief of these are the "Ormulum" and the "Southeur," both in the Bodleian Library. The former, of the eleventh century, contains the New Testament narrative only; the latter, of about the twelfth century, that of both Testaments.

(3).—MEDIEVAL ENGLISH VERSIONS.—These begin with the Psalters of William Shoreham, Vicar of Chart Sutton, near Staplehurst, and of Richard Rolle, chantry priest of Hampole (now Hamphall), near Doncaster, which were produced about the same time, the first half of the fourteenth century. The former exists only in one MS. in the British Museum; the latter is more common, and was printed as late as 1536. Of entire translations of the Bible, it has been asserted more than once that Wycliffe's was not the first. Foxe, quoting from a tract of the early fifteenth century, speaks of "a Bible in English of Northern speech, which seemed to be 200 years old;" Sir Thomas More, 1532, says that there was a translation in English "by virtuous and well-learned men long before Wycliffe's days." This testimony is very vague, and it is at any rate certain that Wycliffe knew nothing of any predecessor. Foxe's Bible may have been one of the Saxon or (perhaps more probably) Norman versions; More's, either this or an early copy of Wycliffe, for since he speaks of "long before," he cannot, prima facie, refer to the version of John Trevisa, for the former existence of which there is really evidence of a certain kind, summed up by Mr. J. H. Cooke, F.S.A., in Notes and Queries, 4th S., x. 261. John Trevisa, whom Allibone styles "a Cornish divine," Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and Canon of Westbury-on-Trym (where, curiously enough, Wycliffe was also Canon) was vicar of Berkeley, and chaplain to the Lords Berkeley from 1350 to 1412. Among his other works he translated Higden's "Polychronicon;" and Caxton, in the version based on this, which he printed 1482, is the first to mention his translation of the Bible; the mention was repeated by Bale, Holinshed, and others, and in the preface to our Authorized Version. There remains at Berkeley Castle a draft letter from the first Earl of Berkeley to James, Duke of York, afterwards James II., asking his acceptance of "a booke, wh. is an ancient collection in manuscript of some part of the Bible,"* which "has been carefully preserved near 400 years," and the Berkeley librarian of the beginning of this century records that the "booke" is now in the Vatican. Mr. Cooke, however, says that such search as has been made there has not disclosed it; and all that is really known of Trevisa's labours in this kind are some fragments of the text of the Apocalypse painted by him in Latin and Norman-French on the roof of Berkeley Chapel.

In default, therefore, of this, the earliest version must be considered to be the Wycliffe Bible, which work was begun by John Wycliffe (Rector of Lutterworth), about 1360, in his commentaries, first on the Revelation, then on the Gospels, translations being added to both works. Shortly afterwards he translated the rest of the New Testament, and put the whole together in a volume (1380). The Old Testament was begun by Nicholas Hereford (D.D., Queen's College, Oxford, Chancellor and Treasurer of Hereford), but not finished, as the translator, being tried, 1382, for heresy, was excommunicated, and left England to appeal at Rome; it was completed by Wycliffe himself, and thus a complete English Bible was for the first time produced. Like all other translations hitherto made, however, it was from the Vulgate, and from not very good MSS. of that; and a few years after Wycliffe's death in 1384, a revision was made by John Purvey, afterwards vicar of West Hythe. Of both these versions there are many MSS. still extant; but they were not printed in mediæval times, and there were indeed much uncertainty and confusion in the whole history, till the admirable edition of the Rev. Josiah Forshall and Sir Frederick Madden appeared (4 vols. 4to, 1850), giving a list of 170 existing MSS. The edition contains the two versions in parallel columns, and was the first printing of the Old Testament in this version, except that Wycliffe's "Song of Solomon" had been printed in Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary, 1810—25. Wycliffe's New Testament was published by Mr. Lea Wilson in 1848, and Purvey's (which was then supposed to be Wycliffe's), by the Rev. John Lewis in 1731, by the Rev. Henry Baker in 1810, and in Bagster's English Hexapla, 1841.

Of the long opposition, partly political, partly ecclesiastical, to those Protestant doctrines of which Wycliffe was one of the earliest preachers, and consequently to the Bible in the vulgar tongue, this is not the place to speak. The translation was formally condemned in Convocation by Archbishop Thomas Arundel, 1408; but the version survived, and the number of still extant MSS. is enough to show the wide circulation which it had.

(4).—MODERN ENGLISH VERSIONS.—John Foxe's witness to the circulation of the Wycliffite versions at the beginning of the 16th century is well known: some, he says, "gave a load of hay for a few chapters of St. Paul." This earnest desire for a vernacular Bible, translated from the Greek Testament of Erasmus, was much increased by Luther's German version, and William Tyndale at last undertook the work. He began with the New Testament; but finding the work impossible in England, since Bishop Cuthbert Tunstall of London (afterwards of Durham) obstinately refused his sanction, he settled at Hamburg in 1524, where he seems to have published St. Matthew and St. Mark separately. Next, in 1525, the whole New Testament came out at Cologne and Worms, in two editions, 4to. and 8vo., and early in 1526 was brought to England, where great but useless efforts were made to stamp it out. Burning the copies was of no use; it only put money into the translator's pocket: even an Act of Parliament afterwards passed (35 Henry VIII.) was no use. Six more editions came out abroad, one after the other, some unknown to Tyndale, revised by his secretary, George Joye (Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, d. 1533). Tyndale then proceeded to the Old Testament, publishing the Pentateuch in 1530, and the Book of Jonah in 1534; other fragmentary translations were attached to the New Testament of 1534, being such of the Epistles in the Sarum Missal as were taken from the Old Testament. Tyndale, however, was executed on a charge of heresy, 1536, leaving more of his Old Testament in MS. as far as the end of 2nd Chronicles. This was afterwards used, as will be seen, by Rogers and Matthews.

* It is to be noticed that our preface to the Bible speaks only of Trevisa's translating the Gospels.

Tyndale's actual work was so effectually destroyed that very few copies remain; of the 4to. New Testament in the first edition one fragment, St. Matthew to xxii. 12, was discovered in 1836, and is now in the British Museum; of the 8vo. first edition a perfect copy, except the title, is in the Baptist College at Bristol (from this the Bagsters reprinted in their Hexapla), and an imperfect one is at St. Paul's; of some of the other editions there are copies at Cambridge University Library and the British Museum. In the latter also there are copies of the Pentateuch, and one of the Book of Jonah was discovered in 1861, bound in a volume of tracts, by the present Bishop of Bath and Wells.

But Tyndale's end was attained: even before his death one complete translation, the first ever printed, came forth, and another was preparing, for which the royal licence had been granted. In 1535, came

(5).—COVERDALE'S BIBLE, translated by Miles Coverdale, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, probably under the auspices of Thomas Cromwell. How far this was from the original is not clear; the title of the first issue had the words "out of Douche [German] and Latyn," i.e. (roughly speaking), Luther and the Vulgate; and though these words were afterwards struck out, there is little, if any, positive evidence to show that they do not represent the fact, though there is on the other hand no doubt that Coverdale knew some Hebrew. Other editions were published in 1537, 1550, 1553, and in 1538 three editions of the New Testament, with the Vulgate—to which it was more closely adapted by a revision—in parallel columns. This Bible was reprinted in 1838 by Bagster, and in the preface is a list of twenty-one existing copies.

(6).—MATTHEWS' AND TAVERNER'S BIBLES. —What of Tyndale's Old Testament had remained unpublished, had come into the hands of his friend, John Rogers, Canon of St. Paul's, afterwards the first Protestant martyr under Queen Mary; and he, in 1537, published a Bible made up of Tyndale to the end of the 2nd Book of Chronicles,* the rest of the Old Testament and Apocrypha (except the Prayer of Manasses, by himself), by Coverdale, and Tyndale's New Testament of 1535. John Rogers's initials occur throughout the book, and Foxe's testimony (inaccurate as Foxe sometimes is) may prove their meaning; but the question concerning Thomas Matthews, under whose name the book appeared, is not so easy. It has usually been said that he was no one but Rogers, and Rogers at his trial is described with such an alias: Professor Westcott, however (History of the Bible, p. 88), is of a different opinion. Other editions of Matthews' Bible were published in 1549 and 1551; copies remain in the chief public libraries. It was revised in 1539 by Richard Taverner (Barrister-at-Law and High Sheriff of Oxfordshire), but his revision had but very little circulation and was but once reprinted.

(7).—CROMWELL'S AND CRANMER'S BIBLES. —Next came the first "Authorised Version." As has been said, steps towards this were taken even before the death of Tyndale, by a petition from Convocation to Henry VIII. to license a translation. The licence is not found, but there is no doubt that it was granted, and Archbishop Cranmer, with the help of others, among whom was Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, began the translation. This work, however, was never perfected; and in 1538 Thomas Cromwell commissioned Coverdale to prepare another Bible. This was to have been published at Paris, with the leave of the King of France; the Inquisition, however, interfered, and it became necessary to remove the work to England, where the Great Bible, as it was called, came forth in 1539. There is no proof (Westcott, p. 100) that Cranmer was engaged in it, or even knew of it: but to the second edition, 1540, he wrote a preface, and it is very probable that his translations of 1536 were used in the revisions which took place in the successive editions of 1541 and after. Copies remain in considerable numbers, and one part at any rate is perfectly familiar, for the Prayer-book Psalms are from this version; immediately, as is said by Dr. Archibald Stephens (Book of Common

* That this part, i.e., from Joshua onwards, is the work of Tyndale, is clear from comparison of style; as is well shown by Dr. Moulton in the Bible Educator, iv. 85.

Prayer with Notes, iii., 1799), from the fourth edition of 1541.

About 1550, Sir John Cheke (M.A., St. John's College, Cambridge, Regius Professor of Greek), translated St. Matthew and a few verses of St. Mark; his MS. remains at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and was first published in 1843 by the Rev. James Goodwin, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of that college.

(8).—GENEVA BIBLE.—During the check given to the work of reformation by the reign of Queen Mary, the Protestant exiles at Geneva entered on another version. Of this, the New Testament was first published in 1557, being Tyndale's translation revised on Beza's Latin by William Whittingham (brother-in-law of Calvin) afterwards, though a layman, Dean of Durham: this is the text given in Bagster's Hexapla. The whole Bible was published in 1560, when the New Testament was again revised; yet a further revision of it, professedly based on Beza's Latin, was made in 1576 by Lawrence Tomson, secretary to Sir Francis Walsingham, which was sometimes substituted in editions of this Bible. This Bible was for many reasons the most "popular" one that had appeared; it was the first of less than folio size, the first in ordinary Roman type, the first divided into verses (see below), and thus it was printed in as many as eighty editions, and as late as 1617, and copies are constantly met with. That item so common in second-hand booksellers' catalogues, "the celebrated Breeches Bible," is nothing but a copy of one of several editions where Gen. iii. 7, reads, "And they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves breeches." Wycliffe, however, had used the word before; Coverdale had "apurns," as he spells it.

(9).—THE BISHOPS' BIBLE.—The last mentioned being the production of the Puritan party, Archbishop Parker resolved on a new translation; this was begun in 1563, and published in 1568. The name was given by the Puritans; but it so happened that out of the fifteen translators all but three were then or afterwards Bishops. This version was rather an unhappy one: the Geneva, Puritan though it was, had made many improvements which were not sufficiently regarded; and being very large and costly, the Bishops' Bible never became popular.

(10).—RHEIMS AND DOUAY BIBLE.—Next in order of time came the Roman Catholic translation, into which the Romanists were at last fairly driven. The New Testament was published at Rheims, 1582, the Old at Douay, 1610, both of course from the Vulgate, this being the authorised original of the Roman Catholic Church; but there is clear evidence that in the New Testament the Greek text was not neglected, and the version is of considerable value to scholars. It has been much revised, chiefly in 1750 and 1791, and is now much nearer our own version than it used to be.

(11).—PRESENT AUTHORISED AND REVISED VERSIONS.—The first motion for that authorised version which we now have came from Dr. Reynolds, the spokesman of the Puritan party at the Hampton Court Conference, 1604. King James I. took the matter up with the greatest interest, and named (no doubt on the presentation of the Universities and others) fifty-four learned men to undertake the work. Only forty-seven of them, however, are now known.*

The "hard, heavy, and holy task," as Fuller calls it, was carried on simultaneously at Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge, for three or four years, and the result of it published in 1611; but it did not at once supersede former translations: the Bishops' Bible, indeed, was not printed as a whole after 1606, but the New Testament appeared as late as 1618, and the Geneva Bible in the year 1617.

Thus, then, we obtained our present Bible; but it must not be supposed that the copies in common use are verbatim et literatim reprints: for in these respects a silent and not publicly authorised emendation has been gradually going on—some aspects of which will be hereafter mentioned—principally through the editions of 1616, 1638, 1701, edited by Bp. Lloyd, of Worcester; 1762, by Dr. Paris; 1769, by Dr. Blayney; and lastly the classical edition of 1873, by Dr. Scrivener. So that for an exact representation of the "authorised" standard, the Oxford facsimile of 1833 must be turned to.

The causes which led to the revision of the Authorised Version may be easily gathered from our section on the original Greek, and the Revisers' preface to the New Testament will explain them in full. The revision was begun in 1870, by a committee of fifty-three scholars and divines, nominated by the Southern Convocation, the Northern declining to co-operate; of these, twenty-seven were engaged on the Old Testament, and twenty-six on the New. The assistance of American scholars was also invited and received, and the work began on the 22nd June, 1870, and ended on the 11th November, 1880, as far as the New Testament was concerned; it was published in 1881. The Old was presented to Convocation on the last day of April, 1885, and published on the 19th of May following. Both works were followed by an appendix, containing renderings preferred by the American committee; in editions published in America these are inserted in the text.

Two editions of the original Greek have since been published, intended to show the

* There were also to be nominated three or four of each University as "overseers," and it is probable that the 47 are to be made up to 54 by three from Oxford, and four from Cambridge, or vice versa. 47 + 3 + 4 = 54.

Greek form of the alterations introduced by the Revisers: one at Oxford, by Archdeacon Palmer, in which the readings which they adopted have been placed in the text, those of the received editions at the bottom of the page; the other at Cambridge, by Dr. Scrivener, where the reverse plan has been followed, the body of the text being Besa's, of 1598, with the readings of such other old printed editions as the translators of 1611 used, while at the bottom of the page are given those preferred by the Revisers. The latter is certainly the more scholarly plan, since the Revisers did not undertake to construct a Greek text, and Archdeacon Palmer's, therefore, is an altogether new one which cannot represent their work, except so far as the alterations actually made are concerned; they must almost certainly have made many minor changes, not indeed affecting the English rendering, but by no means unimportant in the study of the Greek.

(12) PRIVATE TRANSLATIONS were made of the whole Bible by Anthony Purver, a Quaker, 1764; David Macrae, 1799; Dr. John Bellamy, 1818; none of these are of any value, though Macrae's went to three editions; and more lately by Mr. Samuel Sharpe. Of the New Testament alone there have been private versions by many writers, as Dean Alford, Mr. Highton, and lastly by Mr. Maclellan, with analysis, notes, and so forth. Of this last, though it is believed to be finished, only the Gospels are yet published.

(13) VERSIONS IN OTHER MODERN LANGUAGES.

—(a) German, of course, claims precedence, in which tongue Luther's was the first complete version, though many detached books had before been translated. Luther's New Testament was published in 1522, the Old Testament at intervals within the next ten years, and the whole Bible in 1534; another, called the Zürich Bible, is by Luther and other scholars, of whom Ulric Zwingli was one: this came out in 1529; a third, the Worms Bible, of much the same composition, appeared also in that year.

(b) The earliest French Bibles, of the 13th and 14th centuries, appear, like our own Anglo-Saxon ones, to have been paraphrastic in their nature. A New Testament was published in 1478, and a complete Bible in 1487; and in 1530 and 1535, two others by Jacques Lefevre, the first French reformer (for whom see BARTHOLOMEW MASSACRE) and Robert Olivetan, which were revised in 1707 and 1744; there are also more modern versions by Louis Segond and others. (c) Malermi's Italian Bible was printed at Venice in 1471, and Brucioli's at the same place in 1532; Diodati's, 1607, Scio's, and others followed. (d) In Valencian Spanish the Bible was published 1478, but in classical Spanish the New Testament was the first to appear in 1543, succeeded by Pinel's Bible, 1553; De Reyna's, 1569; De Valera's, 1602; while (e) no Portuguese translations appeared till the New Testament in 1712, and the whole Bible in 1748.

VI.—We return now to the Authorised Version and its predecessors, to consider their prefaces, notes, and other helps; also their sectional divisions of different kinds. All the different translations have their own PREFACES, and it is a great pity that that of our present Bible is so little known; printers have thought proper to leave it out, instead of the fulsome dedication, which we could far better have spared, to James I., "the Sun in his strength," and to Queen Elizabeth's memory, "the bright Occidental Star." The general drift of these prefaces is usually much the same, pointing out the right use of Scripture, justifying the translation and translators, describing their work and what like work went before, and explaining either there or in special prologues the contents of each book. Wycliffe, besides his own prologue (though this is properly Purvey's), added a translation of St. Jerome's; he gives also marginal or textual notes. Tyndale has his prologues to separate books, and somewhat polemical notes; Coverdale, chapter-headings placed together; Matthews a marginal commentary, which Taverner somewhat abridged; the Geneva Bible has "arguments" to each book, as well as chapter-headings and marginal notes; these last are in many cases dogmatic, as also, though less often, are those in the Bishops' Bible. But all this apparatus was swept away at the last revision by King James's special desire, and what remains is the noble preface by Miles Smith, Bishop of Gloucester [d. 1624], the headings of chapters and column, and the marginal references with dates and a few explanatory notes.

The CHAPTER-HEADINGS have remained unaltered since 1611, except in twelve cases, of which the only important one is that of the 149th Psalm. Here the original reading was "that power which He hath given to the Church to rule the consciences of men;" where De Paris, 1762, struck out the last six words, Dr. Blayney, 1769, put "His saints" for "the Church;" before them indeed, a 12mo. of the Stationers' Company, 1647, had left out the whole clause, but here as in many other cases the headings are shortened. Blayney's reading, however, took no root, though it is found in a King's Printers' copy for the Bible Society, 1825, and a Cambridge one for the S.P.C.K., 1838; the common reading is Paris'. Blayney, in fact, made an entirely new set of headings, though they were never accepted. Scott in his commentary did the same. There are not of any great importance (though in some cases it may be well to quote them as words actually before the hearer) and some printers, as the Bagsters, omit them altogether.

The COLUMN-HEADINGS, which are short portions of those of the chapters, vary in different editions, of necessity in different-sized ones, and even in those of the same size they differ.

THE MARGINAL REFERENCES are of very varying value, some giving real illustrations of the text, some mere verbal coincidences, while some are altogether mistaken; they came at first from the Vulgate, and have been very freely added to by different commentators and editors, especially by Paris and Blayney. The DATES in the Margin are from the Annales Veteris et Novi Testamentorum of Archbishop Usher of Armagh [1650—64], and were first inserted by Bishop Lloyd, 1701; he also added, from the Essay on Jewish Weights and Measures of Bishop Cumberland of Peterborough, 1685, the tables on those subjects and the others which were found in old Bibles, but are not now usually printed; they are in D'Oyly and Mant's edition, but probably in few later. The MARGINAL NOTES which remain in our present Bibles are those giving (1) a more literal translation, as Gen. i. 5, Matt. xvi. 22; or (2) another translation altogether, as Gen. iv. 13, Matt. iii. 8; or (3) a variation of a proper name, as Gen. xxii. 23 (these are often very trifling, being mere differences of spelling in the Hebrew and Greek and Latin forms); or (4) an explanation of one, as Gen. v. 29, Matt. i. 21; or lastly (5), an explanation, historical or otherwise, as Judges xi. 29, Matt. xviii. 24. Those referring to differences of reading are very few; instances are Gen. x. 4, Acts xxv. 6; but in the Revised New Testament, 1881, they are greatly increased in number.

The division into our modern chapters was introduced into the Vulgate about the middle of the thirteenth century by Cardinal Hugh de St. Cher [d. 1263], for the purposes of his Concordance—the first ever put together; these chapters he subdivided into smaller sections by the letters A, B, C, &c., in the margin. The chapter-division at once took root everywhere; the other, though used by Coverdale in his Bible, 1535 (in Bagster's reprint the letters come at intervals of from twenty to thirty lines), was after a time superseded by the modern verse division. This was introduced first into the Hebrew Bible about 1445, and extended to the New Testament in 1528, by Sanctes Paquinnus, in his Latin version. These verses were, however, of somewhat greater length than those now known, and Robert Stephens the printer brought them into the modern shape in 1548 and 1551; the Geneva Bible, 1560, was the first English one completely arranged with chapter and verse as they are at present seen. The paragraph-divisions of the Authorised Version, that is the sections marked ¶, are of no value whatever, proceeding as they do on no principle of any kind; but a division of the kind now known as the "paragraph division" was first used by John Reeves, King's Printer, about 1800: in England it attracted little attention at first, though the University of Oxford reprinted Reeves' edition about 1830; but in America two similar editions were published, in 1834 by the Rev. Dr. Coit, and in 1836 by James Nourse; and in 1838 the Religious Tract Society reprinted Dr. Coit's Bible somewhat further revised. The "Church Service" system of publication, too, which appears to have begun about this time, and is now so well known, doubtless had a good deal to do with making the division familiar; lastly, Dr. Scrivener's edition is arranged on this plan, in 1881 it was adopted in the Revised New Testament, and now it appears in the Revised Old Testament; thus our children, or at any rate our grandchildren, will perhaps know nothing else in their new Bibles, the chapters and verses being only printed in the margin.

The words found in ITALICS in our present Bibles, and partly retained by our modern Revisers, are those not directly represented in the original languages, but yet necessary to the English sense. The plan is believed to have been first employed by Sebastian Munster in his Latin version, 1534, and was borrowed from him in the Authorised Bible of 1539. Thence through the Geneva and the Bishops' Bible it descended to the Revisers of 1611. By them, however, it was very uncertainly and inconsistently used; and though some revision of it was attempted in the same century, and in the next by Paris and Blayney, it was first thoroughly and critically settled by Dr. Scrivener in 1873.

Specimens of successive translations will be found in "Casell's Bible Educator," iv. 378, 379.

Bible Societies.—Several societies have been formed for the purpose of selling at a low price, and giving away gratuitously, copies of the Old and New Testament in the authorised English version, and in all the languages into which they have been translated.

(1)—The oldest of such associations was The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, which was incorporated in the reign of William III. [A.D. 1698], for the education of the poor, missionary work among the heathen, the circulation of the Bible and Prayer-book, the publication of tracts. It published the Bible in Welsh in A.D. 1718, 1743 and 1748, issuing 60,000 Welsh Bibles before the end of the eighteenth century. It also issued an edition in Irish; and in the first twenty-two years of its existence [A.D. 1698—1720] it had issued 10,000 copies of the New Testament in Arabic, the vernacular language of the East. [See SOCIETIES.]

in A.D. 1701, and furnished supplies of Bibles and Prayer-books, and other necessary books to its missionaries in North America, India, the West Indies, and other Colonies. [PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, SOCIETY FOR.]

(3)—The Scottish Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge supplied the Highlands and Western Isles, and part of North America, with Gaelic Bibles.

(4)—The Society for Promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor was founded in A.D. 1750.

(5)—The Bible Society, whose title was afterwards changed to that of The Naval and Military Bible Society, was founded in A.D. 1780.

(6)—The Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools was founded in A.D. 1785, and distributed Bibles gratuitously among the Sunday-scholars of England and Wales.

(7)—The Association for Discountenancing Vice and Promoting the Knowledge and Practice of the Christian Religion [A.D. 1792], was an Irish Society having its quarters in Dublin, and making a principal part of its work the distribution of Bibles among the poor.

(8)—A French Bible Society was formed among the Protestants of France, in the very heat of the French Revolution [A.D. 1792], for the publication of a French edition of the Scriptures. The time being unfavourable for the establishment of such a society in France, the money collected was entrusted in 1803 to Dr. Coke, the coadjutor of John Wesley, and Mr. Hall of Dublin, for the purchase of 2,000 Bibles for distribution among "poor Catholics and others in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

But although the efforts of these Societies must have resulted in the circulation of large numbers of Bibles, those efforts were chiefly local; and it is probable that Wales and the Highlands were better supplied with Welsh and Gaelic Bibles by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, than London and the country districts of England were by all other charitable means put together. A trustworthy investigation among 17,000 families of the labouring class in the metropolis led to the conclusion that not half of that class had any portion of the Holy Scriptures in their houses; and among 868 families, consisting of 3,000 individuals in Bloomsbury, only 38 Bibles were found. In fact, we have to face this phenomenon in history, that while it was an accepted maxim of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, that "the Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants," scarcely any effort was being made by English and Scottish Protestants to spread that religion by the circulation of printed Bibles which is now so familiar to the world. Such being the case, there was, from the Protestant point of view, a crying necessity for the establishment of some new organisation. This was found in the greatest of all the Bible Societies, namely,

(9)—The British and Foreign Bible Society.—It was a widely-spread feeling of the necessity we have named, rather than any particular suggestion or incident, which gave rise to the Society. But for the popular history of that origin, the incident and the suggestion are ready to hand. Mary Jones, a young Welsh girl, having a great desire to obtain a Bible in her native language, was prompted to apply to the Reverend Thomas Charles, of Bala, a clergyman who had given up his parish and devoted himself to missionary work among the people of North Wales. The scarcity of Welsh Bibles was then revealed to him, and on his next visit to London, in 1802, Mr. Charles started the subject of a Bible Society for Wales among his friends, and brought it before the Committee of the Religious Tract Society. While he was reading a paper on the subject, the Rev. Joseph Hughes, the Secretary, a Baptist Minister at Battersea, exclaimed, "If for Wales, why not for the World?" The suggestion took with those present, and the following entry on the Committee minutes of the Religious Tract Society for December 7th, 1802, shows the immediate result: "Mr. Charles, of Bala, having introduced the subject, which had been previously mentioned by Mr. Tarn, of dispersing Bibles in Wales, the Committee resolved that it would be highly desirable to stir up the public mind to the dispersion of Bibles generally, and that a paper in a Magazine to this effect might be singularly useful. The object was deemed sufficiently connected with the object of the Society thus generally to appear on the minutes; and the Secretary, who suggested it, was accordingly desired to enter it." On December 21st, 1802, the Tract Society Committee again met, when a second minute appears bearing on the subject: "Mr. Secretary read a paper on the importance of forming a Society for the distribution of Bibles in various languages. 'Resolved, That a Special Meeting be holden next Tuesday at eight o'clock, as preparatory to a General Meeting to promote that end.'" At this Special Meeting the third stage of the proceedings is indicated by the following minute: "The object of the intended Society was maturely considered, and determined unanimously to be: To promote the circulation of the Holy Scriptures in foreign countries, and in those parts of the British dominions for which adequate provision is not yet made; it being understood that no English translation of the Scriptures will be gratuitously circulated by the Society in Great Britain." At the General Meeting of the Tract Society on May 12th, 1803, the contemplated Bible Society was the great absorbing subject, but the practical preparations were not fully made till towards the beginning of 1804, in January of which year a Special Meeting of the Tract Society was held "for the purpose of promoting the Bible Society," when it was resolved "That the title of the Society should be 'The British and Foreign Bible Society,' agreeably to the suggestion of the Secretary, and that he be requested to prepare a circular letter on the subject." On March 7th, 1804, the Bible Society thus launched by the Religious Tract Society, was set fairly afloat by an independent meeting at the London Tavern. Lord Teignmouth was appointed the first President; the Rev. Joseph Hughes, Secretary, to represent the Dissenters; the Rev. C. F. A. Steinkopff, Lutheran Minister of the Savoy, to represent the foreign Protestants; and the Reverend Josiah Pratt, Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, to represent members of the Church of England; Mr. Pratt, however, was soon superseded by the Reverend John Owen.

The Bible Society at once leaped into popularity. In the fourth year of its existence, though the country was bowed down with the enormous expenditure of the war with Napoleon, the income of the Society amounted to £12,000. In 1815, the year in which that war was ended by the battle of Waterloo, its income was over £100,000; in 1883, its income amounted to £210,600. From 1804 to 1884, the copies of the Bible issued by the Society numbered nearly one hundred millions, on which nine and a-half millions of pounds have been expended.

It could hardly be expected that a Society formed under such circumstances should escape criticism. It was first attacked in 1810, as a rival of the Christian Knowledge Society, which it was alleged it would seriously injure. This was a widespread feeling, but it was most keenly expressed in print by Dr. Wordsworth, Domestic Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and afterwards Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1812, this attack was followed up by another, led by the learned Herbert Marsh, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, and author of a History of Translations of the Bible. The objection offered by him and other Churchmen was that the Bible Society circulated the Holy Scriptures "without note or comment." It had been a common practice from the days of the Reformation onwards to print the Prayer Book with Bibles intended for private use, as may be seen in old copies still existing in many families; and Dr. Marsh maintained that this was the best way of providing a wholesome commentary. English Bibles were always printed with more or less of comment until the Bible Society introduced a contrary practice; and the object of the Society in omitting all notes was in the main to avoid controversy and disunion. At the same time (1812) a new objector arose in the person of Dr. Maltby, afterwards Bishop of Durham, who contended that "out of sixty-six books which form the contents of the Old and New Testament, not above seven in the Old, nor above eleven in the New, appear to be calculated for the study or comprehension of the unlearned." As Dr. Maltby had no authority as a theologian, or as a Biblical critic, his theory had not many supporters. More serious opposition was raised against the Society in 1825, when a long-standing controversy respecting the circulation of the Apocrypha was decided by determining that the object of the Bible Society was that of promoting the translation and circulation of the Holy Scriptures, and that by that term the Canonical Books of the Old and New Testament were alone intended. [ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ.]

During the eighty years of its existence the Society has promoted the translation, printing, or distribution of the whole or part of the Bible in 255 languages or dialects, fifty-nine by indirect means, 196 by direct means, and its work is extending every year.

(10)—Trinitarian Bible Society.—In 1831 several members of the British and Foreign Bible Society expressed great dissatisfaction that it numbered among its managers Unitarians, and at the Annual Meeting in May the following Resolutions were moved:—

I.

"That the British and Foreign Bible Society is pre-eminently a religious and Christian institution.

"That no person rejecting the doctrine of a Triune Jehovah can be considered a member of a Christian institution.

"That in conformity with this principle, the expression 'of Christians,' in the Ninth General Law of the Society, be distinctly understood to include such denominations of Christians only as profess their belief in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity."

II.

"That the words of the ninth law, and of the others which prescribe the terms of admission to the agency of the Society, be not taken to extend to those who deny the Divinity and Atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ."

These being rejected, a large number of members, including Viscount Lorton, the Duke of Manchester, Rev. Hugh McNeill, etc., seceded from the Society, and passed the following Resolution at a Meeting which they held in the following December:—

"That deeply sensible of the duty of following peace with all men, and of the great evil of divisions among Christians, it is with unfeigned regret and sorrow that this Meeting conscientiously felt obliged to separate from the British and Foreign Bible Society, on the grounds of its not acknowledging God by prayer and praise at its meetings; and of its admitting to membership, management, and association, not only at home, but still more upon the Continent, those whom this meeting deem unfit to become members, or to take part in the management, of a Religious Society. That this Meeting earnestly desire grace from God, to conduct all their proceedings in the spirit of love; and it will give them the sincerest joy to merge their own efforts as a separate Society, and to join themselves again to the British and Foreign Bible Society, whenever its constitution shall be so amended as to give a pledge of its being conducted on Scriptural and Christian principles."

This was the origin of the new Society, and of the distinctive name which it adopted. Somewhat later it made a fresh charge against the original Society, of departing from first principles by circulating for the use of Roman Catholics the Rheims and Douay Version, thereby, it was alleged, perpetuating dangerous error. This, in fact, seems the principal matter of attack against the original Society, judging by the pamphlets issued.

An attempt was made on the part of the Trinitarian Society to effect a union in 1881, and proposals were made to the British and Foreign Bible Society that they should withdraw the Rheims Version. But the latter replied that they saw no reason for departing from their principle, and that they had been privileged to see an unmistakeable prospering of their work.

Biblia Pauperum, i.e., "The Bible of the Poor," a title given to a book, printed before the invention of movable types, containing forty engravings on wood-blocks of scenes in the life of our Lord, with explanatory inscriptions. They were chiefly used by the itinerant preaching friars. The stained-glass windows in Lambeth Chapel are copied from some of these blocks, and recently a facsimile edition has been published.

Bibliomancy.—A kind of fortune-telling by means of the Bible, which was invented by the Puritans. Texts of Scripture are selected at random, and by more or less manipulation of these, persons are made to imagine that they obtain knowledge of future events, or of secrets, or guidance in respect to their conduct in matters of present concern. Bunyan and Wesley are both said to have believed in this superstition, and even nowadays it would not be difficult to find some advocates for it.

Bibliotheca.—A library, as in the case of the great Latin collection of works in about thirty folio volumes, called "Bibliotheca Patrum," the "Library of the Fathers," published at Lyons in 1677; or of a similar work in fourteen folio volumes, printed at Venice by André Galland, between 1766 and 1781.

"Bibliotheca Sacra," the "Holy Library," was also one of the earliest titles given to that collection of the sacred books of the Old and New Testament which is known to us in England as the one Book, the Book of books, the Holy Bible. Both forms of this title are to be found in the early Fathers, St. Chrysostom [A.D. 347—407], writing it as "Ta Biblia" in Greek; and St. Jerome [A.D. 345—420] as "Bibliotheca Sacra" in Latin.

Bichini. [BIZOCHI.]

Bickersteth, EDWARD [b. 1786, ordained 1815, Rector of Watton, Herts, 1830, d. 1850]. One of the leaders in his time of the Evangelical Party, and widely loved for his holiness of life as well as for his zeal for religion. He was at one time Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, Editor of the "Christian Family Library" in fifty volumes, and author of some religious works. (Life, by Birks.)

Bicorni.—An Italian term, signifying "idiots," and occasionally used as a contemptuous designation of the BROTHERS.

Bidding of Prayers.—A very early custom of the Church, sometimes called Bidding the Beads. The priest named the several subjects for which the prayers of the congregation were asked, and then the people said their beads in a general silence; the priest also kneeling and saying his. A form of Bidding Prayer is still in use in the Church of England before University sermons, and occasionally before the morning sermon in Cathedrals, and in the Chapels Royal.

The modern Bidding Prayer consists of an exhortation to intercessory prayer for the Royal Family, Ministers, &c., &c., which is said by the preacher when no service or prayer precedes the sermon, ending with the Lord's Prayer in which preacher and congregation join. It is ordered and an express form for it given by the fifty-fifth Canon of the Church of England.

Biddle, JOHN [A.D. 1615—1662].—Often called "the father of the English Unitarians." He was born at Wotton-under-Edge, in Gloucestershire, in the grammar-school of which town he was educated. Having shown signs of considerable talent, he was sent to Oxford; and, after having taken his degree there, became master of the grammar-school at Gloucester. Here he developed Anti-Trinitarian opinions, embodying them in a work against the Deity of the Holy Spirit, which, though it was only at that time in manuscript, led to his imprisonment in Gloucester gaol by the government of Cromwell. After a short release on bail he was summoned before a committee of the House of Commons sitting at Westminster, and, after venturing to publish his opinions, to the Bar of the House itself. The House of Commons ordered all copies of his "blasphemous pamphlet" to be burned by the common hangman in Cheapside and at Westminster. Shortly afterwards he published a Confession of Faith touching the Holy Trinity, in which he expressly denied the Deity of our Lord; and on this the Presbyterian "Assembly of Divines" petitioned the House of Commons that Biddle might be put to death. He was condemned to death accordingly, but escaped with imprisonment, which he had to endure, with short intervals of freedom, until the Restoration. His continued conflict with the Cromwellian government undermined his constitution, and he died on September 22nd, 1662, in the 47th year of his age. He is stated to have been a man of good life and severe devotion, always prostrating himself flat on the ground at his prayers. His followers at first called themselves "Biddleians," but the name was merged in that of UNITARIANS, his particular congregation soon disappearing.

Bier.—The modern spelling of this word does not, as its old English spelling does, express its meaning. The original form of the term is "beere," coming from the Anglo-Saxon word "beran," to bear or carry. The bier is in fact a "berrow," or "hand-berrow," on which to carry a dead body to burial. It was usually surmounted by a "hearse," or waggon-shaped framework, for the support of the "pall," or "hearse-cloth;" and a combination of the two fixed together and placed on wheels makes the modern "hearse," so familiar in the public streets.

Bigamy. The condition of being married twice (Lat.—bis). The word was imitated in Latin, from the Greek digamia, a double marriage; and both words were anciently used indifferently for marriage with two wives contemporaneously or successively. In modern language it signifies the former only, that is the marriage of a second wife during the life of the first.

Bigne, MARQUERIN DE LA [A.D. ab. 1546—ab. 1608].—A learned French divine, who first edited the great Library of the Fathers [BIBLIOTHECA PATRUM].

Bigot.—This is a word of uncertain origin, but is thought by some etymologists to have been derived from the profane expletive "by God!" (Comp. BEGHARDE). The received meaning of it is that of an obstinate and offensive adherent to opinions which are received rather as prejudices than as reasonable and true.

Bilney, THOMAS [d. 1531].—A Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, who was the first to be burned for heresy when Henry VIII. revived the old statutes against heretics. He was one of a party or society called the "White Horse Divines," of which Dr. Barnes, also burned by Henry VIII., Bishop Latimer, and Coverdale were leading members. "These, and a great many more," says Strype, "met often at a house called the White Horse, to confer together with others, in mockery called Germans, because they conversed much in the books of the divines of Germany, brought thence. This house was chosen because those of King's College, Queen's College, and St. John's might come in at the back side, and so be the more private and undiscovered." Bilney, with Barnes and Latimer, was summoned before Cardinal

Wolsley in 1527, and after some hesitation abjured the opinions brought against him, and "bore his faggot" in open acknowledgment of his recantation. He was constitutionally a melancholy man, and his recantation preyed much upon his spirits. "I knew a man myself," said Latimer in one of his sermons, "Bilney, little Bilney, that blessed martyr of God, who, what time he had borne his faggot, and was come again to Cambridge, had such conflicts within himself (beholding this image of death) that his friends were afraid to let him be alone. They were fain to be with him day and night to comfort him as they could, but no comfort would serve. And as for the comfortable places of Scripture, to bring them unto him, it was as though a man should run him through with a sword." After two years of this melancholy, Bilney left Cambridge and went into Norfolk, his native county, where he circulated the forbidden Lutheran books, and preached vehemently against nearly all the opinions then held in the Church except Transubstantiation, a doctrine to which he adhered to the last. He "entreated all men to beware by him, and never to trust their fleshly friends in matters of religion." He was apprehended and condemned as a relapsed heretic, being burned at Norwich, on August 31st, 1531. It is a pleasing feature of his dying hours that the monks and clergy came to visit him, and that he and they exchanged affectionate words at his execution. Dr. Call, provincial of the Grey Friars, is said to have been converted by his conduct when under sentence. In his last hours, also, Bilney furnished a remarkable illustration of a conviction that was very common among persons who suffered for their opinions in those terrible days. "I feel by experience," he said, the night before he was burned, "that fire, by God's ordinance, is naturally hot, but yet I am persuaded by God's Holy Word, and by the experience of some spoken of in the same, that in the flames they may feel no heat, and in the fire no consumption." And in confirmation of this opinion he quoted the words of the Psalm, "When thou walkest through the fire I will be with thee." He was seen in the fire saying at intervals "Jesus," and "I believe."

Bilson, THOMAS [A.D. 1536—1616].—A distinguished Elizabethan divine, who became successively Bishop of Worcester [A.D. 1596], and Bishop of Winchester [A.D. 1597—1616]. Bishop Bilson was one of the many instances of the learning which has flourished on the foundations of his great predecessor, William of Wykeham. Born at Winchester, he was educated in Winchester and New Colleges, and became Fellow of New College, Head Master of Winchester, and Warden of New College. His most celebrated works were one on Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion, published in 1585, and an exceedingly learned volume on The Sufferings of Christ for the Redemption of Man, and His Descent into Hell for our Deliverance. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, and in his old age was very active in the translation of the Bible which resulted from that gathering of Church and Puritan Divines. Bilson died on June 18th, 1616, and lies in the south aisle of Westminster Abbey.

Bingham, JOSEPH.—This great and learned man was born at Wakefield, 1668, and passed from the Grammar School of the town to University College, Oxford, where he was admitted 26th May, 1684, and devoted himself to patristic study. He took his B.A. in 1688, became Fellow of his College 1689, M.A. and Tutor 1691. As tutor, one of his pupils was John Potter, afterwards Bishop of Oxford and Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1695 Bingham became involved in the controversy on the doctrine of the TRINITY, which was then being carried on between Dean Sherlock, of St. Paul's, and Dr. South, Prebendary of Westminster. It is not possible here to enter fully into this controversy. Sherlock's views led him to urge strongly the distinction between the Three Persons, and this he did in such words that South and his other opponents lost sight of his equally strong assertions of the One God, and charged him with tritheism; 'ut distinction does not imply separation, and the charge was without just grounds. With Bingham the case was very much the same. He was called upon in Michaelmas Term, 1695, to preach before the University in his turn as a clerical M.A.; this he did at St. Peter's in the East, on St. Simon and St. Jude's day, and there put forth views identical with Sherlock's. These views, thus coming under the cognizance of the University, were formally censured, the words of the sermon being declared "false, impious, and heretical," in a decree of the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of Houses passed 25th November, 1695; it may be seen in the Biographica Britannica, under Sherlock. The decree did not wait, as in justice it should have done, for the conclusion of the subject, which Bingham promised at the end of the sermon; and though his name was not mentioned, the cry against him was such that he was forced to resign his Fellowship, even before the decree was passed (on the 23rd), and to leave Oxford. The controversy in general ran so high that a royal letter to the Bishopric was issued 3rd February 1695—6 to restrain it. (Cardwell's Documentary Annals, ii. 339.)

Bingham, as soon as he left the University, was presented by Dr. Radcliffe (the famous physician, founder of the Radcliffe Museum), who, as well as himself, was a native of Wakefield and a member of the same college, to the Rectory of Headbourne Worthy, near Winchester; and in Winchester Cathedral he preached on the 12th May, 1696, and the 16th Sept., 1697, two visitation sermons, in which he continued and concluded his Oxford subject; all three sermons are published in the eight-volume edition of his works by his great-grandson, the Rev. Richard Bingham, and also in Pitman's edition.

At Headbourne Worthy he entered on his great work, the Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or Antiquities of the Christian Church, which was published in ten volumes between 1708 and 1722, a most elaborate account of the whole primitive economy of the Church; the work is, and always will be, a theological classic, and a debt of gratitude is due to Bingham for it. He worked at it under great disadvantages, weak health, want of books, and poverty, having lost nearly all his money in the "South Sea Bubble." This work has been translated into Latin and German. He also wrote a History of Lay Baptism, and a book comparing the practices of the French Protestant Church with those of his own Church.

Bingham was presented in 1712 to the Rectory of Havant by the Bishop of Winchester. He died 17th Aug., 1723, and was buried at Headbourne Worthy, the living of which he had continued to hold with Havant. He lies under the east window of the church.

Binney, THOMAS, D.D.—A much-respected Nonconformist minister, born at Newcastle-on-Tyne 1798, died in London 1874. He received his early education in the north of England, then went to a college in Herts, after which he began his ministry at Bedford. This, however, did not last long, for he accepted an invitation to undertake the duties of the Congregational Chapel at Newport, Isle of Wight. Five years later, in 1829, he became minister of the Weigh-House Chapel, near the Monument in the City, a building which dated from the secession in 1662, after the Act of Uniformity. In 1833 this chapel was replaced by a new building, on which occasion Mr. Binney delivered an address which led to a somewhat bitter controversy. Some harsh words which he used of the Church of England were taken up by its defenders, and in the course of his retorts he said that "the Church of England destroyed more souls than it saved," a sentence which grieved many of his friends, while of course it roused the anger of Churchmen. However, he softened down the unjustifiable phrase by explaining that he was referring merely to certain theories of Baptismal Regeneration which he held to be dangerous. But he did better than this, for he showed by many acts afterwards that he had learned to respect the Church of England very sincerely. "He was not," says his biographer, Dr.

Stoughton, "when I was intimate with him in later life, what any one would call a rabid Dissenter. He greatly enjoyed joining in the morning and evening service of the Church of England, believed in a modified kind of episcopal government, and in very plain terms eschewed what might be called ultra-independency." The last time the present writer saw him he was in affectionate converse with some churchmen in the Archbishop of Canterbury's drawing-room, and he exerted his influence in his later days in promoting among his brethren a kinder feeling towards the Church. It was as a preacher that his power was most conspicuous; young men and city merchants flocked to his Chapel when he was announced to preach. His presence was singularly commanding; he was over six feet high, and his broad brow and bright eyes at once arrested attention. His writings are not likely to live. His best known work is How to make the best of both worlds. He retired from the Pastorate in 1869, but retained the Chair of Pastoral Theology at New College, London, until his death. "In thought, as in other things," says Dr. Stoughton, "he was a thorough Englishman, more practical than speculative." A collection of his sermons has been published.

Biothanata. [SEE NAMES OF REPROACH.]

Biretta.—An Italian name (French barette, Old English barret-cap) for the ancient academical head-gear, either square or three-cornered. It may be described as a tall skull-cap of silk or velvet, of which the upper part is pinched into either three or four ridges, for the cap to be held by, the sides being stiffened with cardboard, like the top of the modern academical cap or "trencher." It may be often observed in old portraits of Bishops and other dignitaries of post-Reformation times.

Birinus, the first evangelist of the West Saxons (who occupied England from the Thames to the English Channel, and from the borders of Cornwall to Sussex), was a monk of the Benedictine monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, and in 634 was sent to England as a missionary by Pope Honorius I., to the western parts, where no missionary had ever yet been. Being consecrated Bishop by Asterius, Bishop of Genoa (Bede iii. 7), he sailed for England, and preached among the West Saxons; and baptising the king Kynegils, his mission met with great success. Kynegils allowed him to establish his see at Dorchester (Oxfordshire), on the borders of Mercia, and here he built a church and remained as Bishop till his death in 660. In the church (afterwards the Abbey church of an Augustinian convent, founded in the twelfth century) are remains of early stained glass, portraying the labours of Birinus, and there is, or was, a bell with the inscription "Protege, Birine, quos convoco tu sine fine;" in English thus—

"Those whom I together call, Aye, Birinus, keep them all."

His see was afterwards divided into Winchester and Sherborne, the latter subsequently becoming Salisbury. [DORCHESTER.]

Birthdays.—In the early Church this term was applied to the festivals of martyrs, the days on which they suffered death in this world and were born to the life and glory of heaven. "When ye hear of a birth-day of saints, brethren," says Peter Chrysologus, "do not think that that is spoken of in which they are born on earth, of the flesh, but that in which they are born from earth into heaven, from labour to rest, from temptations to repose, from torments to delights not fluctuating, but strong, and stable, and eternal, from the derision of the world to a crown and glory. Such are the birth-days of the martyrs that we celebrate."

Bishop.—The title given to the highest spiritual officer in the permanent ministry of the Church of Christ. The English word is formed from the Greek word episcopos [epi = upon, skopos = one that watches], perhaps, though not certainly, through the Latin form "episcopus:" the original or "Anglo-Saxon" spelling being "biscop," where the first and last syllables, "e" and "os" are dropped. A similar process has taken place in all European and most other languages, as for example in the Welsh "oesob," the French "evêque," or "évêque," the German "bischof," the Dutch "bisschop," the Swedish "biskop," the Greek word being always assimilated, and never translated. The literal meaning of the designation is that of "overseer," and in this sense it was originally applied to all who had the oversight of souls, whether Apostles (Acts ii. 20); elders, presbyters or priests (Acts xx. 17 and 28; i. Timothy iii. 1; i. Peter, v. 2); or even to our Lord Himself (i. Peter, ii. 25), the Pastor and Bishop of souls. As a distinctive term for one particular class of ministers, the word "bishop" or "episcopos" is not found in the New Testament ; those assistants of the Apostles, or those permanent ministers who exercised the office of the Episcopate in its later sense being called "Evangelists" (Acts xxi. 8; Eph. iv. 11; 2 Tim. iv. 5), "Angels" (i. Cor. xi. 10; Rev. i. 20, &c.), "helps," "governments" (i. Cor. xi. 26), "presidents" (i. Thess. v. 12; Romans xii. 8; i. Tim. v. 17), or "rulers" of the Church (Heb. xiii. 7, 17).

The Episcopal office, as part of the permanent ministry of the Church, was a continuation of so much of the Apostolic office as was not specifically associated with the supernatural foundation of the Church by the gifts of MIRACLES and TONGUES. It was first evolved from the Apostolate in the form of a deputy Apostolate, the deputies being perhaps called in the first instance (as Bishops were to a much later age) Apostles, but afterwards Evangelists, Helps and Governments. They were a higher class of ministers than the bishops of the permanent ministry, exercising a wide and not closely defined authority, in a manner similar to the independent action of the Apostles themselves, and perhaps exercising miraculous powers as the latter did.

The evolution of the Episcopate as a permanent institution of the Church is traced as follows:—(1) The office of Apostle was endowed with all the ministerial authority which Christ, the Divine High Priest, could delegate to human persons, but it was an office intended for a special and temporary purpose, that of founding the Church throughout the world. (2) The office of an Evangelist was that of a deputy Apostle endowed with Episcopal gifts and authority (and sometimes, at least, with the miraculous powers given to the Apostles themselves), which were to be exercised in any place to which they might be sent as temporary missionaries and ministers, each one as a messenger of good things (Gr. evangelistēs), bringing and settling the means of grace and salvation among those to whom they were sent. (3) The office of an Angel was that of an Episcopal ruler over a certain fixed district in which there might be many churches, each Angel being what at a later period was called a "Metropolitan." (4) The office of a Bishop was of the same nature as that of an Angel, but with a jurisdiction and authority limited to one Church, or, as it was afterwards called, "Diocese."

This latest form of the Episcopate is that which has become its permanent form, that which can be traced in all parts of the Christian world, and in all ages of Christianity since the time when the work of the Apostles came to an end.

The special work of a Bishop, as distinguished from the functions of ordinary clergymen, is that of Consecrating other Bishops [CONSECRATION], Ordaining Priests and Deacons [ORDINATION], Confirming those who have been baptised [CONFIRMATION], Consecrating Churches and Churchyards, spiritually ruling and disciplining the Clergy and Laity of his diocese as their chief pastor [DISCIPLINE OF THE CHURCH], and representing his diocese in Councils of the Church [COUNCILS].

The Bishops of all English and Irish Sees formerly had seats in the House of Lords; but on the foundation of the Manchester bishopric, the Act provided that this should make no addition to the peerage; that the two Archbishops, and the Bishops of London, Winchester, and Durham should always hold seats, but that the others should take precedence in order of appointment. Thus the Bishop of Manchester waited until a vacancy occurred in one of the Sees other than those named, when he took his seat, and the newly-appointed bishop in turn waited. Since that time several new Sees have been created, namely, Liverpool, St. Albans, Truro, Newcastle, Southwell, the same law holding good. At the beginning of 1885 the following Bishops had not yet become entitled to places in the Lords—Truro, Llandaff, Newcastle, Chester, Ripon, Southwell. But the death of the Bishop of Lincoln made a vacancy for Truro, and the Bishop of Lincoln will not obtain his seat until the others named have all received theirs. The Irish bishops were all deprived of their seats at the Disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869. There is no necessary connexion between the position of a Bishop as a spiritual officer of the Church and his constitutional position as a Peer of Parliament; and those Bishops who have no seats in the House of Lords have just the same spiritual duties and authority as those who have.

There are at the present time 206 bishops of the Anglican Communion in Great Britain and Ireland, in the Colonies and other possessions of the British Crown, and in the United States and its foreign possessions, and the number is increasing year by year, through the subdivision of Dioceses, and by means of missionary work. Further particulars will be found under DIOCESES, and SCOTLAND, IRELAND, COLONIAL CHURCH, and AMERICA.

Bishop Coadjutor.—In the American Episcopal Church an Assistant Bishop, having all the spiritual power and authority of a bishop, and generally holding also the right of succession to the bishop for whose assistance he is appointed.

Bishop Designate.—One who has been nominated by competent authority to a bishopric, but has not yet been elected.

Bishop Elect.—One who having already been designated as bishop of a given diocese, and elected by the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral of that diocese. The election has next to be "confirmed" [CONFIRMATION OF BISHOP], after which the mandate is issued for his consecration. Finally, he does homage to the sovereign and is put in possession of the Temporalities; afterwards, he is enthroned in the Cathedral.

Bishop in Partibus.—This is a short form of the designation "Bishop in partibus infidelium." Such a bishop has no actual see, but is consecrated for missionary work under the title of some see of ancient times which is, or is supposed to be, extinct. It is a custom of the Roman Catholic Church, and one which is sometimes an absurd custom; for until recently the Roman Catholic bishops who were sent to exercise their office in England were regarded as bishops sent into a heathen country, and called Bishop of Chalcodon, Siga, &c.

Bishoping.—A popular term for the rite of Confirmation, derived from the fact that this rite is always celebrated in the Church of England and other Churches of the West by Bishops only.

Bishopric.—The dominion of a bishop, that is, the district over which his episcopal jurisdiction extends; the last syllable of the word representing the Anglo-Saxon word rice, which signifies "kingdom."

While the "ric" of the bishop was his diocese and its inhabitants, his sedes, "see," "seat," "stool," or "throne," was his episcopal town or "city." From the city or see it was the custom for an English bishop in the most ancient days to take his title, as in the cases of York, London, Caerleon, Canterbury, Rochester, Lindisfarne, Hexham, and others. But at a later time the title of the bishop was taken, like that of the king, from the district, or the people over whom he had jurisdiction assigned to him; and thus we hear of the bishops of Cornwall, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, the East Angles, the South Saxons, and the Mercians. After the Conquest the older custom was revived, and ever since that time each English bishop has taken his title, not from the district or its inhabitants, but from the town or "city" in which he has his "cathedra," or throne. Thus we have bishops of Norwich, Manchester, and Newcastle, not of Norfolk, Lancashire, and Northumberland.

Articles on the bishoprics of England and Wales will be found under their respective titles, as, for example, ELY, BISHOPRIC OF.

Bishops' Book.—A work put forth in the reign of Henry VIII. (1537), entitled, The Institution of a Christen Man, and known by its alternative name of "Bishops' Book" because it was drawn up, under Crammer's direction, by a commission of prelates.

The object was to strengthen the Reform movement by giving instruction to the people in the elements of faith and practice. The book "comprised an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, and also of the much-contested doctrines of justification and purgatory. The compilers at the same time felt themselves under the necessity of discussing other points to which the novel aspect and position of the English Church imparted great significance. They contended, for example, that the fabric of the Papal monarchy was altogether human; that its growth was traceable partly to the favour and indulgence of the Roman Emperors, and partly to ambitious artifices of the Popes themselves; that just as men originally made and sanctioned it, so might they, if occasion should arise, withdraw from it their confidence, and thus reoccupy the ground on which all Christians must have stood anterior to the Middle Ages. It was, nevertheless, admitted in this formulary that the Roman Church was not unchristian, but that, in connection with other national and independent communities, it entered into the formation of the universal brotherhood which Holy Scripture terms the Church" (Hardwick's Reformation, p. 202).

Bishop's Stool.—The Anglo-Saxon name for a bishop's see, equivalent to the more modern term "bishop's throne."

Bisomus.—A word often found in the inscriptions in the Roman catacombs, and meaning, a sepulchre made to contain two bodies.

Bissextile.—The name of Leap-year in the Roman or Julian calendar, still remaining in some of the tables in our Prayer-book. It is derived from the peculiar way of inserting the intercalary day in that calendar, which was immediately after the festival of the Terminalia, held on the seventh of the calends of March, that is, the 23rd of February; the next day, therefore, being the sixth of the calends, the intercalary day received the same name as this, and the year that of "bissextile," or double-sixth. This mode of intercalation, clumsy as it was, passed from the Roman state calendar to the ecclesiastical, and thence into our reformed Prayer-books, where it remained (as it still does in the Roman breviary) till the last revision in 1662. The original rule, 1549, was that the psalms and lessons of the 25th February were to be repeated; in Elizabeth's calendar of 1561, and the Prayer-book of 1604, this was altered for those of the 23rd; also that St. Matthias's Day in Leap-Year was to be kept on the 25th instead of the 24th. In 1662 the calendar was intercalated by the far simpler plan of adding a 29th day to February, and, consequently, St. Matthias's Day was permanently fixed to the 24th; still, however, the tradition of its variation continued in some degree; episcopal injunctions are found that it should be constantly observed on the 24th, and this writer was once asked by a parish clerk "whether it was not different in Leap-year."

Two derivations are given for the name of Leap-year, whereof the preferable one is that of the Prayer-book of 1604, that "the Sunday letter leapeth," one day being unmarked; the other is that the year exceeds or leaps beyond others in the number of its days.

Bizzochi.—A designation of uncertain meaning, given to the FRATICELLI. Perhaps it was derived from the wallet, or "bizzolo," which each of them carried from door to door, in which to put the scraps of food they begged for.

Black Ladies.—A name given to the Benedictine nuns on account of their dress, which was very similar to that of modern Sisters of Mercy.

Black-letter Days.—Holy days of an inferior rank, or "minor saints' days," the names of which appear in black instead of red letters in the calendar. Where two colours are not used in the printing, as is the case in ordinary cheap Prayer-books, the red-letter days are usually printed in italics, and the black in roman type. The practical difference between them in the public worship of the Church of England is, that black-letter days have no collect, &c., as the others have. The black-letter days were retained in some cases because the person commemorated was a public benefactor or national hero, in others because the day marked some civil date of importance. A few have become part of our current talk; e.g., "Hilary Term," "Martinmas Summer."

Black Monks.—A popular name given to the Benedictines, distinguishing them by the colour of their garments from those orders which wear white or grey clothes. [BENEDICTINE MONKS.]

Black Rubric.—The declaration on the subject of kneeling which is printed at the end of the Communion Service in the Book of Common Prayer. It is so called because, although its form is that of an explanatory rubric, and rubrics are properly printed in red, it is nevertheless printed in black. A similar explanatory rubric is given at the end of the Service for Baptism, respecting the salvation of baptised children dying in their infancy.

Blair, Hugh, D.D. [A.D. 1718–1800.] A Presbyterian minister whose sermons have attained great celebrity. He was born at Edinburgh, and after highly distinguishing himself at the university there, he was, in 1742, made minister of Collessie, in Fifeshire, and, in the following year, of Canongate, in Edinburgh.

In 1768 he was appointed to be one of the ministers of the High Church in that city. In 1777 he published the first volume of his Sermons, which, while in manuscript, met with the approval of Dr. Johnson, and when published acquired an extraordinary popularity. These were followed at intervals by three other volumes. A fifth volume had been prepared for press just before his death, at the age of 82, and was afterwards published. The success of these Sermons was prodigious; their moral tone was felt to be an improvement upon the metaphysical disquisitions which in those days characterised the ordinary sermon. Numerous editions have been printed in London, in five volumes, 8vo. and 12mo. They have been twice translated into French, also into Dutch, German, Slavonic, and Italian. Blair's "Lectures on Rhetoric and the Belles Lettres" were equally famous.

Blaise, St. [A.D. 316.] Bishop of Sebaste, in Cappadocia, chiefly known as the patron saint of woolcombers. During the Diocletian persecution he fled from his see, and took refuge among the mountains. Being found by some hunters, he was carried before the governor of the city, who ordered him to be tortured by having his flesh torn by the iron combs used by woolcombers. This torture failing to kill him, he was beheaded. He is commemorated in the calendar of the Church of England on February 3rd, and his name is still popular in Yorkshire, Norwich, and other localities where woollen manufactures are carried on.

Blandina, St. [A.D. 177.]—She was one of the forty-eight martyrs of Lyons; a slave, and of weakly body, naturally incapable of enduring the least of the horrible tortures to which she was submitted. Having been cruelly beaten with rods, she was tied to a cross, and exposed to savage beasts, who, however, it is said, would not touch her. Her persecutors then burned her with fire, whence she was taken to be fastened up in a net, and tossed repeatedly by a furious bull, and, lastly, was despatched by having her throat cut. Throughout her tortures she continued to exclaim, "I am a Christian; we do not allow ourselves to commit any crime." She is honoured specially among her fellow-martyrs, and her festival is observed on the 2nd of June.

Blasphemy.—The ordinary meaning of the Greek word blasphēmia, from which the English word comes, being that of speaking evil against a person, its received religious sense is that of speaking against God. So Job's wife tempted her husband to "curse God, and die" (Job ii. 9). Evil thoughts of God are blasphemy, as well as evil words, and to speak evil of God's spiritual work is the same kind of sin.

Blasius, St. [BLAISE.]

Blasius.—A Judaizing heretic of the second century, mentioned by early Church historians, but of whom little is known except the name. A Marcionite heretic of the same name is mentioned by the historian Theodoret.

Blayney, BENJAMIN. [A.D. 1730—1801.] Canon of Christ Church, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and rector of Polshot, and a distinguished Biblical critic of the eighteenth century, who did good service to the Church by labouring at a correct text of the English Bible. His edition of the Authorised Version was printed at the Clarendon Press in 1769, and was long in use as an authority. Dr. Blayney enriched this edition with many fresh marginal references and notes. He also published a dissertation on Daniel's seventy weeks, and on the sign given to Ahaz, and re-translated Jeremiah, Lamentations, and Zechariah.

Blessing. [BENEDICTION.] The word is derived from the old English word "bliss," or happiness.

Blomfield, CHARLES JAMES. [A.D. 1786—1857.] An eminent bishop of Chester [A.D. 1824—1828] and London [A.D. 1828—1856], and also a distinguished Greek scholar. He resigned his see a year before his death, having been the greatest pastoral bishop of the Church of England during the second quarter of the nineteenth century.

Blondus [d. A.D. 1248] or BLUNDUS.—The Latinised name of John Blunt, a divine of the thirteenth century, greatly renowned for his theological learning. He was elected Archbishop of Canterbury in the year 1232, but the Pope declared his election void. The pretences assigned were that Blunt was a pluralist, and that he had obtained his election by simoniacal practices; but it is supposed that his opinion respecting the Papal supremacy was the true obstacle to his confirmation in the archbishopric.

Blood, EATING OF.—In the early Christian Church the Divine Law which was given to the Patriarchs [Gen. ix. 4—6] and the Jews [Lev. vii. 26, 27; xvii. 12, 13; Deut. xii. 23, 24], respecting the use of blood, was made binding upon all Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles [Acts xv. 20, 29; xxi. 25], and Gentile Christians are found obeying the precept in the second and third centuries, Tertullian expressly declaring, in contradiction of the charge that they had human blood at their feasts, that they abstained even from the blood of animals, and considered it unlawful to eat sauces made with blood [Tertull., Apol. ix.]. That the Apostolic precept was ordinarily binding upon Christians was a fact recognised by the canons of several later councils, down to those of Orleans in A.D. 533 and the Trullan Council of Constantinople in A.D. 691. St. Augustine's interpretation of it as a rule for Christians was as follows:—"No Christian," he says, "feels bound to abstain from thrushes or small birds because their blood has not been poured out, or from hares because they are killed by a stroke on the neck without shedding their blood" [Aug., Adv. Faustus xxxii. 13]. Obviously he would have discarded all Rabbinical and fine-drawn niceties and exaggerations, but would have observed the principle as regards the consumption of blood actually drawn from an ox or a sheep, and made into food, or, as regards the eating of animals killed by wringing of the neck for the express purpose of retaining the blood in them.

Blunt, HENRY (1794—1843), Rector of Upper Chelsea, a leader among the Evangelical party, and one of the most popular preachers of his time. His published Sermons fill several volumes.

Blunt, JOHN JAMES [1794—1855].—Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge from 1839. His Undesigned Coincidences in the Writings of the Old and New Testament, after the manner of Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, is still a book much valued. He also wrote a History of the Reformation, Lectures on the Fathers, Duties of the Parish Priest, and many reviews.

Bocasoti. [BIZOCHI.]

Bochart [A.D. 1699—1677].—A Huguenot minister, son of a Huguenot minister, and nephew of Peter du Moulin. He was a great Oriental scholar and Biblical geographer. His principal work was entitled Geographia Sacra, and was of great authority, though now superseded by later erudition and discovery.

Bockelson, JOHN. [MUNSTER, ANA-BAPTISTS AT.]

Bockhold. [BOCKELSON.]

Body, MYSTICAL.—A term used for that which results from the incorporation of Christians with Christ. St. Paul states the fact of such incorporation in the words, "For we are members of His Body, of His Flesh, and of His Bones;" but he adds, "This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and His Church" [Eph. v. 32].

Boëthius.—A Roman Senator, whose full name was Annius Manlius Severinus Boëthius. He was made Consul in the year 487, under Odoacer, and after a distinguished political career was imprisoned at Pavia by the Emperor Theodoric, and eventually beheaded there in prison in 526. He was the author of a work on The Consolation of Philosophy, which was translated by Alfred the Great, and commented upon by St. Thomas Aquinas. Several theological works are also attributed to Boëthius; and he appears as a saint and martyr under the name "Severinus," commemorated on October 23rd, the day of his death. Modern critics consider that the writer of the Consolation was not the same person as the writer of the theological works attributed to Boethius.

Boehm. [BEHMEN, JACOB.]

Bogarmites. [BOGOMILES.]

Bogatzky, CHARLES HENRY [A.D. 1690—1774].—A pietistic writer, born at Jankowa, in Silesia, but resident nearly all his life at Halle. He did not follow any profession, though he began to study for the law, but gave himself up to Lutheran theology, and became well known as a writer of devotional books and hymns. His principal work is his "Golden Treasury of the Children of God," a book of short meditations for every day, which has passed through many English editions, and was once exceedingly popular as a devotional manual.

Bogomiles.—A Paulician sect, which appeared at Philippopolis, in Bulgaria, in the twelfth century, under the leadership of a monk named Basil. Their name is made up from two Slavic roots, Bog, signifying God, and mil, His mercy; but they were also known as "Phundaites," or "wearers of the girdle," and "Massilians," perhaps a corrupted form of "Basilians." Their principles were dualistic, spirit being opposed to matter, and a Christ such as the Docetæ believed in being opposed to a wicked Demiurge, or world-God. They set forth the Bible in seven books, namely, the Psalms, the Prophets, the four Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles, and the Revelation. They considered the Church, with its priesthood, saints, relics, &c., as the invention of the Devil. Their leader, Basil, was burned by the Emperor Alexius, in the square before the Church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, and the sect which he had founded did not survive his death.

Bohemia has been the scene of most stirring and important events in the history of Religion. In the reign of Lewis the German, son of Charlemagne, some of its nobles were baptised, and the country was thus formerly recognised as part of the See of Regensburg. A few years later (about 863), some missionaries came from the Greek Emperor, and the real evangelisation of the country began and prospered. A reaction presently took place of national against German influences, and there was a massacre of Christians, but the faith again rose triumphant, and a bishopric was founded in Prague, in 973. Heathenism lingered on here and there for another century, then disappeared.

But there was always a characteristic assertion of nationalism in the country. The services of the Church were conducted in the Slavonic language, and the Bible was translated into the same tongue. Communion was in both kinds, and the clergy were in the constant habit of marrying. Gregory VII. had issued a Bull forbidding the use of the Oriental Liturgy, which the original missionaries had brought with them, and after some trouble carried his point. But he thereby created much irritation, and in consequence some refugees from the Waldensians spread themselves through the land and established themselves.

In the middle of the fourteenth century, two events happened which had important religious results. The archbishopric of Prague was founded in 1346, and two years afterwards the University of that city. The first, by severing the connexion with the See of Mainz, increased the independent feeling of the nation, the more so as German influence, as contrasted with Slavonic, was thoroughly in unison with the Papacy. The new University immediately took a foremost place among the seminaries of Europe, and its professors were among the most learned. Another factor is to be recognised in the great movement which we are now to witness. The Emperor Charles IV., author of the famous "Golden Bull," was an enlightened and patriotic ruler, eager for the reform of ecclesiastical abuses. But they were too strong for him. He was more successful in his efforts for political and material reforms, putting down turbulent robber-nobles, and clearing the highways of thieves. Consequently, commerce and husbandry revived, and it was a time of great prosperity. It was he who not only founded the University of Prague, but also caused the Bohemian people to be well trained in martial exercises.

In the University of Prague was educated John Huss (q.v.), the pupil of some of the earliest professors, and in course of time he succeeded to the Rectorship. The marriage of the King of England, Richard II., with Anne of Bohemia, was the cause of much intercourse between the two countries, and thus it came about, not only that the writings of Wycliffe were circulated in Bohemia, but that some of his disciples appeared there preaching. Huss became an ardent student of the new teaching, his opinions spread rapidly, and Prague was placed under a Papal interdict for countenancing him. But there was another most serious complication. The Great Papal Schism exhibited to astonished Christendom three Pontiffs each claiming to be the genuine successor of St. Peter [PAPAL SCHISM], and a cry rose from every side for peace, for Church reform, and for purity of doctrine. This last object was taken up even by those who looked upon Wycliffe and Huss as false teachers. The result of the clamour was the summoning of the Council of Constance in 1414 [COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE]. There Huss appeared, bearing a safe-conduct from the Emperor Sigismund; it was disregarded, and he, and soon afterwards his pupil, Jerome, were burnt. [JEROME OF PRAGUE.]

The result of this shameful treachery was to kindle in Bohemia a fierce anger. The University of Prague published a manifesto addressed to all Christendom, vindicating the memory of their Professor, denouncing his death as murder, and the Council as an assembly of the satraps of Antichrist. The nobles went further, and took an oath that they would regard any man who called them heretics as a liar, and would defend themselves against any attempt to hinder them from hearing the Gospel. Meanwhile, the Council had elected a new pope, Martin V., whose first care was to put down Hussism in Bohemia. He adjured all the kings of Christendom "by the wounds of Christ," to aid him in exterminating "that sacrilegious and accursed nation." Thus exhorted, Sigismund and his neighbours resolved upon a new Crusade, and the undismayed Bohemians prepared to meet it. Space will not suffer us to follow out in detail the history of the horrible war which followed, and lasted for eighteen years. We can only summarise. The first blood was shed in October, 1419. The Hussites met on a plain near Prague, some 40,000 in number, for celebration of the Eucharist, which they received in both kinds. They were attacked by the Imperial troops, who were put to flight under the brilliant leadership of Ziska [Ziska], whose endeavours were seconded at this critical moment by the Turks, who attacked the Empire on the eastern frontier, and forced the Emperor to draw off his forces. Ziska then issued a passionate appeal to the nation, signing it "Ziska of the Chalice; in the hope of God, Chief of the Taborites." The last name was derived from the habit of the Hussites, of meeting on hill-tops, to which they gave such names as "Zion," "Tabor," etc. In answer to his appeal, thousands, poorly armed and disciplined, flocked to Ziska's standard on "Mount Tabor," and he led them into Prague, defeating another Imperial army on the way and seizing their arms for his own men. At Prague much violence was committed by the victorious Hussites. Some of the monks were killed, they being peculiarly obnoxious for their opposition to Huss, and 500 churches and monasteries were pillaged. Then Sigismund himself appeared before Prague, and besieged it with 100,000 men. He was driven in disgrace away. He came again the same year (1420), and once more was defeated. The enthusiasm of the Bohemians was unbounded. They held a Diet and declared that Sigismund should not be King of Bohemia, that they would offer the crown to no man who should deny them (1) free Gospel-predaching, (2) Communion in both kinds, (3) Secularisation of Church property, except so much as might yield a subsistence to parochial clergy, (4) Equal laws to laity and clergy alike. Sigismund sent proposals to the Diet, that if they would accept him as king he would satisfy all their just demands. They indignantly replied that he had broken his word with Huss, and could not be trusted again. Again, therefore, the war broke out, cruelties and excesses were committed on both sides, cities were burned, and fields drenched with blood. All industries were suspended. The little nation kept the Empire at bay, and Ziska registered one victory after another. Before he died, he fought sixteen pitched battles, of which he did not lose one. He was succeeded by PROCOPIUS (q.v.), whose success was equally great. But now discord began to show itself. There had always been differences of opinion, inevitable in the throes of a great change; the Taborites were uncompromising in their hostility to the Empire, but there were others who, while insisting on their right to communion in both kinds, were unwilling to break with the Church of Rome. [CALIXTINS.] These differences had been sunk in face of the common danger, but on the death of Ziska, the "Taborites" acknowledged Procopius as leader, the Calixtins chose another named Coribert, and the "Orphans" (those who declared that in Ziska they had lost their father, and would never have another) refused to choose any one. But again the common danger sufficed to heal the differences, and the devoted Hussites once more met from 70,000 to 100,000 picked soldiers of the Empire at the battle of Aussig, between Dresden and Toplitz, on Sunday morning, June 16th, 1426. Wonderful to tell, 15,000 fell on one side, and only thirty on the other. All the waggons, artillery, tents and provisions fell into the hands of the victorious Hussites.

Pope Martin then called on none other than Cardinal Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, to lead a crusade against the heretics. The latter, accepting the invitation, found no response in England when he appealed for help, but crossing to Belgium, and preaching in Mechlin, he raised a furor of excitement in his favour. Contemporary writers declare that 180,000 men joined him, but this is probably an exaggeration. The effect in Bohemia was to move hundreds of Roman Catholics to unite with their heroic fellow-countrymen in defence of national liberty. In June, 1427, the Hussites met the great army off the town of Meiss, and sent it flying in all directions. The booty was so immense that there was not a man in Bohemia who was not made rich. [Wylie's History of Protestantism, i. 196.] The Pope urged Beaufort to make another attempt, but he had had enough of it, and returned home. Procopius then hoped to make peace, and proposed honourable terms to Sigismund. They were refused, war was resumed, and at Reichenberg, Aug. 14th, 1431, the Hussites again routed an Imperial army. Then the Pope and the Emperor sent friendly letters to them; the Council of Basle was in session, and they were invited to send deputies. With some hesitation they consented; a company of 300, led by Procopius, appeared. Three months' fruitless debate ensued; the deputies then departed, but invited the Council in its turn to send representatives to Prague. There things went more smoothly, and the conclusion was arrived at that the few points already named should be accepted, but that the right of interpretation should belong to the Council. This is the agreement known as the Compactata. Thereupon many of the Bohemians, especially the Calixtins, returned to their obedience to the Roman See, the cup being guaranteed to them, and Sigismund was acknowledged as King of Bohemia. The Taborites, however, headed by Procopius, rejected the arrangement, the breach widened between them, and a fierce battle was fought at Lipau, twelve miles from Prague, May 29th, 1434. The Taborites were defeated, and Procopius was slain. So ended the Hussite wars.

When peace was thus made and Sigismund was master of the situation, he at once broke the Compactata, and restored the dominancy of the Church of Rome in Bohemia. A cry arose on every side against this fresh treachery, and war was on the point of once more breaking out, when Sigismund died. Several chequered years followed; the Compactata was soon annulled by the Pope. Moreover, the old dissensions broke out among the Hussites. The Bohemian king, Podiebrad, found his position excessively difficult, and his reign was a distracted one. The Taborites withdrew in disappointment; they were allowed a city to dwell in—which they named Tabor—with certain lands round it, and here they practised husbandry and labour, and were prosperous. It once happened that Æneas Sylvius, afterwards Pope Pius II., travelling that way, was entertained by them, and, heretics though they were, he greatly enjoyed the welcome they gave him. About 1455 they formed themselves into an organised body, which called itself the "United Brethren." Calixtins as well as Romanists from that time hated them, and even King Podiebrad persecuted them. When they wanted bishops to carry on their ministry they fell back upon Acts i.; they selected twelve men, and put twelve sealed-up voting-papers into the hands of a child, who, after prayers, distributed them. Nine were blanks, the receivers of the other three received imposition of hands from some Waldensian pastors. One of the three was afterwards martyred at Vienna. At the beginning of the sixteenth century there were 200 congregations of these United Brethren in Bohemia and Moravia. When, therefore, the doctrines of Luther reached Bohemia, there was soil ready prepared for the sowing. The Calixtins were doubtful. Except in the matter of the cup in Communion they were in union with the Roman Church, and though some of their leaders for a while welcomed the Lutherans, they finally joined the Imperial powers against them. The records are once more filled with persecution and martyrdom; men and women died in the fire with invincible courage. The "Brethren" were driven from their homes, though they had tried to keep aloof from the strife. But the national spirit rising once more under these cruelties, the Emperor Ferdinand called the Jesuits to his aid, and under their zeal and skilfulness the Roman religion, which seemed ready to die, once more revived. Maximilian II., who came to the Imperial throne in 1564, was anxious to restore peace, and a parliament at Prague in 1575 enacted that those bodies which communicated in both kinds, the Calixtins, the United Brethren, the Lutherans, and the Calvinists might draw up a common Confession of Faith. But the bright hopes of the Protestants were dashed by the death of Maximilian. The intrigues which followed for the crowns of the Empire and of Bohemia are no part of our subject. They ended in the establishment of Matthias as Emperor, and of his cousin Ferdinand as King of Bohemia. The Jesuits were triumphant; again the persecution began; at last came the crisis. In 1618 some of the principal barons met to consult on public affairs. A royal mandate was issued, forbidding them to meet on pain of death; the Protestants marched straight to the Hradschin, the palace crowning the heights on which New Prague is built, entered the council chamber, and threw the royal councillors out of the window. This act, known as the Defenestration of Prague, was the signal for the great THIRTY YEARS' WAR. The details of that war will be found in their place. As far as Bohemia was concerned, it ended in the suppression of Protestantism; fire and sword did their work efficiently: the flower of the nobility perished on the scaffold; 36,000 families of the commonalty emigrated. There were four millions of people when the war began, not one-fifth of that number when it ended. And thus Bohemia lost its place among the nations. Its very language and literature were trampled under foot, and science and art also. "I do not know any scholar who distinguished himself in Bohemia after the expulsion of the Protestants," says a Roman Catholic writer; "with that period the history of the Bohemians ends, and that of other nations in Bohemia begins."

Bolingbroke [A.D. 1672—1751]. — A freethinking nobleman of great ability, whose opinions had much influence on the higher classes during the reigns of Queen Anne and the first two Hanoverian kings. He may be said to have originated that contemptuous patronage of Christianity as a useful kind of religious police system, which was common among the statesmen of the eighteenth century.

Bollandists. [ACTA SANCTORUM.]

Bollandus, JOHN [A.D. 1596—1665].—The first of the learned succession of hagiologists, who, from him, have been called BOLLANDISTS (q.v.).

Bolsena, MIRACLE OF. [CORPUS CHRISTI.]

Bona, CARDINAL [A.D. 1609—1674].—A learned liturgical writer, whose original name was John Bonne de Lesdiguières. He was born at Mondovi, in Piedmont, on October 10th, 1609, became a Cistercian monk at the early age of fifteen, at forty-two became General of his Order in Italy, and after filling important literary posts under Pope Alexander VII., was made Cardinal by Clement IX. (1669). His earliest work was one entitled De Divina Psalmodia, his most important an historical commentary on and exposition of the Roman Liturgy, and everything connected with it, entitled De rebus Liturgicis. The latter was originally printed in 1671, but in 1747 an edition, with elaborate notes by Sala, was published at Turin, and this is even more valuable than the original work.

Bonaventura, St. [A.D. 1221—1274], called The Seraphic Doctor. He was born at Bagnarea, in Tuscany, his family name being Giovanni Fidanza. In 1243 he entered the order of Friars Minors, and studied at Paris under Alexander Hales; afterwards he taught divinity in the same university, and took his doctor's decree, in company with St. Thomas Aquinas, in 1255. In the following year, on the death of John of Parma, he was elected General of his Order, whereupon he laboured to reform its decayed discipline, and defended it warmly against the attacks of Giraldus of Abbeville, and William de St. Amour. At a general chapter of the Order held at Pisa, he directed the Minorites everywhere to exhort the people in their sermons to pray to the Blessed Virgin and worship her, when they heard the sound of the bell. He also first introduced the establishment of religious confraternities, or sodalities, of laymen, which he set on foot at Rome in 1270. In 1272 he had the singular and distinguished privilege conferred upon him of nominating to the Popedom, the Cardinals being unable to come to any conclusion amongst themselves, and unanimously agreeing to leave the matter in the hands of Bonaventura, who named Theodore, Archdeacon of Liège, known as Pope Gregory X. This Pope, in gratitude, made him Cardinal-Bishop of Albano in 1274. He attended the first session of the Council of Lyons, but died before its conclusion, aged fifty-three. His funeral was attended by nearly all the prelates present in that assembly. He was canonized by Pope Sixtus IV. in 1482, and is commemorated on July 14th. His works occupy eight folio volumes, in the original edition of 1588.

Boniface, St. [A.D. 680—755], Archbishop of Mayence, called the Apostle of Germany. His baptismal name was Winfred, and he was born at Crediton, in Devonshire; he was educated first in the monastery of Exeter, then in that of Nutehalling in Hampshire. Here by the advice of the Abbot Winbert, he took holy orders. At thirty years of age he was ordained priest, and, after labouring for the conversion of his own countrymen, in 716 he passed over into Freiland, to assist the aged Willibrod, then at Utrecht. He returned shortly after to England, but in 718 departed a second time for Hessen and Freiland, taking with him commendatory letters from Daniel, Bishop of Winchester. About this time, being at Rome, he was appointed by Gregory II. missionary for the Germans eastward of the Rhine. He commenced his labours in Thuringia and Bavaria, after which he passed through Hessen and Saxony, baptising the people and consecrating churches to the service of the true God. In 723 Pope Gregory recalled him to Rome, and consecrated him Bishop, whereupon he took the name of Bonifacius. Upon his return into Hessen he built churches and monasteries, and brought over from his native country colonies of priests, monks, and nuns. In 732 he received the pallium, together with the primacy over all Germany, and power to erect such bishoprics as he thought fit. In virtue of this authority he founded the sees of Freisingen and Ratisbon, in Bavaria (in addition to the original see of Passau); Erfurt, in Thuringia; Baraburg (afterwards Paderborn), in Hessen; Würzburg, in Franconia; and Eichstadt, in the palatinate of Bavaria; also re-establishing Salzburg. In 743 he presided in the Synod of Leptines; the year following, he founded the monastery of Fulda, and about 745 he was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Mayence. Ten years after this he returned to his apostolical labours in Freiland, where he preached and converted many thousands of the Pagans; but while he was preparing to give to them the rite of confirmation, he was suddenly attacked by a furious troop of these heathen, at a place called Dockum, where he perished, together with fifty-two of his companions, June 6th, 755. He is commemorated on the day of his death.

Boni Homines. [PERFECTI.]

Boni Pueri and Boni Valeti, two of the many names given to the BERNARDS.

Bonivard [1493—1570], Prior of St. Victor, a great scholar and wit. His hatred to Duke Charles of Savoy, who had stood in the way of his further preferment, induced him to join with the patriots of Geneva to prevent their city becoming subject to the Duke. In 1519 the Duke entering the city, Bonivard fled, but was caught and imprisoned for a time, and afterwards released. In 1530 he again fell by treachery into the power of Duke Charles, who imprisoned him in the Castle of Chillon, at the extremity of the Lake of Geneva. His captivity has been rendered immortal by the pen of Byron. In 1536 the castle was taken by the Bernese, and Bonivard was set at liberty to find his Priory demolished; but the Genevese gave him a liberal pension till his death. His literary works are interesting but not reliable.

Bonner, EDMUND [A.D. about 1495—1569].—Bishop of London during the persecution of the Protestants by Queen Mary. He was, in fact, Bishop of London for thirty years [A.D. 1539—1569] in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; but for fourteen years of that long period—under Edward and Elizabeth—he was imprisoned and deprived of the authority of the crown, and during those years he was superseded by Ridley and Grindal.

Bonner was born about the middle of Henry VII.'s reign, and was, therefore, three or four years younger than Henry VIII. Among the evil reports which surrounded him in later life, there was one that he was the illegitimate son of George Savage, rector of Davenham, in Cheshire; but however this report may have originated, it is now well known, on the authority of Lord Lechmere, Baron of the Exchequer and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster early in the last century, that the traditions of his family distinctly contradicted this report, and that the Bonners were respectable tenant-farmers, renting land of the Lechmeres near Severn End, their very ancient seat in the parish of Hanley Castle, Worcestershire; and letters from the bishop still existing among the muniments of Sir Edmund Antony Harley Lechmere, of Severn End and Rydd Court, confirm the contradiction, by showing that Bonner was on such friendly terms with his father's old landlord as would hardly have been possible if the report had been well-founded.

Bonner also received his early education at the expense of the Lechmere of the day, probably at the Grammar School of Hanley Castle. From school the future bishop went to Oxford, where he matriculated, and on July 13th, 1519, took his degree at Broadgates Hall, now Pembroke College. Shortly afterwards he took holy orders, and was made Doctor of the Canon Law in 1525. At this time he was appointed Dean of the Faculties for York diocese by Cardinal Wolsey, and it is probable that he had come under the notice of the Cardinal through his connection with some office belonging to the great college which Wolsey was building opposite to Broadgates Hall. After the fall and death of the Cardinal, Bonner passed into the service of Henry VIII. as one of his chaplains, and was much employed in the diplomatic work connected with the king's divorce from Catharine of Arragon. He was sent as ambassador to Denmark, to the Emperor Charles V., and to Francis, king of France; his bold and determined defence of the liberties of Englishmen in France, and of the king's independence of the Pope being such, that the French king threatened him with a hundred strokes of a halbert, and the Pope talked of burning him alive, or throwing him into a cauldron of melted lead.

From the time of Wolsey's death, in 1530, to that of Henry VIII., in 1547, Bonner lived chiefly abroad, engaged in his successive diplomatic employments, and was ambassador to Germany at the time when Edward VI. succeeded his father. He had held several parochial charges, was Prebendary of St. Paul's, and for three years Archdeacon of Leicester. In 1538, while ambassador to the Court of France, he was nominated to the bishopric of Hereford; but before the day arrived for his consecration he was appointed to the see of London, and was consecrated in St. Paul's Cathedral about six months afterwards, on April 4th, 1540, under a commission from Archbishop Cranmer, by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, and two other bishops. Cranmer's absence from his consecration was, doubtless, accidental, for he must have been on friendly terms with Bonner, since he had appointed him to the office of Master of the Faculties, an office similar to that which he had held under Wolsey.

The career of Bishop Bonner up to this point, that is, for the first twenty years of his official life, had been that mixed one of churchman and statesman which was so common among the clergy of mediæval times, and the natural reward of his successful diplomacy was a bishopric; but for the rest of his life he takes his place in history as Bishop of London: one so popular among the Romanists in London, that when he came out of the Marshalsea prison after his long imprisonment during the reign of Edward VI., "all the people by the way bade him welcome home, both men and women, and crowded round to kiss his hands;" one so odious to the Reformers that no language was too strong to express their abhorrence of his character and administration.

As Bishop of London Bonner was brought into a prominent official connection with the persecution carried on against the Protestants during the reign of Queen Mary, under the influence of the Spanish monks and friars who were brought to England through her most unhappy marriage with Philip of Spain. In virtue of his office he examined in his Consistory Court all who were sent before him by the civil authorities under the accusation of heresy, provided they were resident in the cities of London or Westminster, or the counties of Middlesex or Essex. During the three years and a-half over which the persecution extended, as many as one hundred and seventeen of the two hundred and seventy-seven who were eventually burned on the charge of heresy, were thus sent before him, the persecution being chiefly confined to the metropolis and the east of England. The popular idea of Bonner is that he went about seeking for prey, like a wild beast thirsting for blood; and although he was never present at one of the burnings, he is represented in this light by the poet Cowper:—

"When persecuting zeal made royal sport
With tortured innocence in Mary's court,
And Bonner, blithe as shepherd at a wake,
Enjoyed the show, and danced about the stake."

It should, however, be remembered that Bonner "received in his judicial capacity those who were sent to him as prisoners, those who had been apprehended and committed to prison by order of the Privy Council, or of Commissioners appointed by the Queen. The Bishop of London, as the law then stood, had no more power or authority to refuse to exercise his office as ecclesiastical judge than a judge of assize has to refuse to try the prisoners brought before him at a gaol delivery." The test of orthodoxy or heresy laid down by the government of the time was "an acknowledgment of the dogma of Transubstantiation, and a reception of the Holy Communion in one kind only." Neither Bonner nor any other bishop could alter or abolish this test; and the duty laid upon them by the law was that of declaring to the civil authorities whether the accused persons brought before them accepted or rejected this test. When any accepted it, a return to that effect was made to the sheriff by the bishop, and the former set the person free. When any rejected the test, a similar return was made to the sheriff, and the person was detained, to be afterwards executed by burning under the sheriff's direction.

But large as was the number of persons burned under the influence of the Spanish friends of Queen Mary, the number of the accused who escaped under the influence of the English bishops was far greater. "The bishops," writes Foxe, the martyrologist, "afraid belike of the number, to put so many at once to death"—he is speaking of twenty-two persons who had been sent up to Bonner from Colchester by Lord Oxford and seven other magistrates—"sought means to deliver them; and so they did, drawing out a very easy submission for them, or rather suffering them to draw it out themselves." Upon this submission these twenty-two prisoners were all returned by Bonner as not guilty of heresy, and were sent home free. Perhaps it was the same as regards the attempt in other cases, though not always as to the success; for Philip and Mary and their advisers were frequently rebuking Bonner and other bishops for their leniency.

The Bishop's manner and appearance evidently gave countenance to that unfavourable view of his character which was entertained by so many of his contemporaries. He was short and stout in person, with the aspect of a free-living man; and Sir John Harrington, who just remembered him, says that when a particularly ill-favoured figure, intended for Bonner, was shown to him in Foxe's "Book of Martyrs," to vex him, "he laughed, saying, 'A vengeance on the fool; how could he get my picture drawn so right?'" Anecdotes are told of him which show his good nature. But allowing that some of those who were sent to him for examination were provocative, and that martyrdom had a strange fascination for them, which a man of Bonner's disposition was not likely to appreciate, and which often made it impossible to save them from their fate, it is, nevertheless, impossible to excuse the levity and brutality with which he treated persons whose courage and consistency deserved admiration, as the terrible fate impending over them demanded pity.

One is glad, for the credit of human nature, to believe that the educated and cultured men who were sent to the Bishop for examination met with treatment of a very different kind. "I was brought into his presence," wrote Archdeacon Philpot, "where he sat at a table alone, with three or four of his chaplains waiting upon him, and his registrar. 'Master Philpot, you are welcome; give me your hand.' With that, because he so gently put forth his hand, I, to render courtesy for courtesy, kissed my hand, and gave him the same. 'I am right sorry for your trouble, and I promise you I knew not, until within these two hours, of your being here. I pray you, what was the cause of your sending hither? for I promise you I know nothing thereof as yet, neither would I you should think I was the cause thereof. And I marvel that other men will trouble me with their matters; but I must be obedient to my betters; and I suppose men speak otherwise of me than I deserve.'"

Justice compels us to add that Bonner's admirably-kept register still gives testimony to the business-like manner in which he carried on the affairs of the see of London. That he was not a man of the highest principle is only too evident; but he at least had the courage of his opinions, for he went to the Tower or the Marshalsea for them with as much resolution as Crammer or Ridley, and submitted to lose his bishopric twice rather than change them. Refusing to take the oath of supremacy under Edward VI., he was imprisoned for five years by the Privy Council, which treated him so harshly that it actually issued an order for his bed to be taken away, and that he should be made to lie on straw. When the Council was committing him to the Fleet, Bonner retorted upon them, "I have a few goods, my carcass, and my soul. The two former you may take away, the last is out of your power." He refused to take the oath of supremacy to Queen Elizabeth, as he had refused to take it to her brother, the boy-king Edward, and was imprisoned in the Marshalsea from 1560 until his death on September 5th, 1569. An order of his successor, Grindal, exists among the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum, which is dated September 9th, 1569, and which directs that as Bonner had been under sentence of excommunication in the Court of Arches for eight or nine years without seeking absolution, he was not entitled to Christian burial, and that he was to be buried at night. He was accordingly buried in the prisoners' pit in the churchyard of St. George's Church, Southwark, presumably without any burial service being said over his remains.

Bonosians.—The followers of Bonosus, Bishop of Sardica, in the end of the fourth century. Their distinctive theological tenet was that our Lord was the Son of God by adoption only, and not "God of," that is preceding from, "God," as is declared in the Nicene Creed.

Bons Hommes.—A name given to the strict FRANCISCANS, or Friars Minims. They were introduced into England by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, in the reign of Henry III. There were houses of the Bons Hommes at Berkhamstead, Aashbridge, and Edyngton.

Borbelites. [BARBELITES.]

Borbonians. [BARBELITES.]

Borrelists.—Mennonites or Dutch Baptists, who were the followers of Adam Borrel in the seventeenth century. They are very similar to the Quakers.

Borromeo, St. CHARLES [A.D. 1538—1584], was born of illustrious and pious parents, at the Castle of Arona, on the Lago Maggiore. He studied at Milan and at Pavia, and at both was distinguished, though but a boy, for his virtue and piety; he knew, it is said, but two streets, that which led to church and that which led to the schools. Pius IV., who was his uncle, having adopted him, invested him at the early age of twenty-three with the purple, and employed him in the most difficult and important business, both civil and ecclesiastical. Borromeo it was, in fact, who inspired the aged pontiff with an energy and activity so surprising in one of his years. The Council of Trent, at the conclusion of their sittings, having recommended to the Pope that a compendium of Christian doctrine should be drawn up, Pius entrusted the execution of this work to his nephew, who, associating with himself Francisco Foreiro, a Portuguese; Leonardo Marini, Archbishop of Lanciano; and Egidio

Foscarari, Bishop of Modena, completed, in 1566, the work which is known as the celebrated Catechismus Tridentinus, Catechismus Romanus, or Catechismus ad parochos. In order to avoid the solicitations of his parents to marry, he took priests' orders, and soon after was made Archbishop; but he was not allowed by the Pope to go into residence till 1565, upon which occasion he was received by his people like a second St. Ambrose, whom he thenceforth took as his model. He at once gave up every other benefice, abandoned all his paternal property, and divided the revenues of his church, according to the ancient use, into three portions: one for the poor, another for the wants of his church, and the third for himself, of the use of which last he gave a rigid account to his provincial synod. In his palace he made a like reformation; everything that savoured of the world, and luxury, and pomp he dismissed; he reduced the number of his servants, lay always on hard boards, and observed protracted rigorous fasts. In fact, his entire house resembled that of a religious community, and his pious and admirable example before long spread its good effect throughout Italy. Grieved at the sad lack of discipline and religion amongst the clergy of his diocese, he set himself to reform this evil, for which purpose he held, at different periods, six provincial councils and eleven diocesan synods; and, in order to see that the wise and admirable regulations of these councils were properly enforced, he regularly visited, in person, the various churches of his vast province. Thus the Church of Milan, for so many years plunged in sloth and anarchy, soon appeared as an example to other churches. It is not to be supposed that such reforms could be carried out without opposition; and, accordingly, the Archbishop experienced his full share of obloquy and resistance. To such an extent was this carried on the part of the religious order of the Humiliati, that they induced a friar of the Order, named Farina, to attempt the life of St. Charles. To effect this, the assassin posted himself at the entrance of the palace chapel, where the Archbishop and his family were at prayers before the altar; when only five or six paces from him, the man fired, and although the ball tore his clothes, it simply marked his back and fell to the ground. The intended murderer and his two accomplices were put to death, and the whole order of the Humiliati suppressed by Pope Pius V. Devoted as the Archbishop was, at all times, to the exercise of his spiritual calling amongst even the lowest of his flock, his Christian spirit chiefly shone amidst the miseries and dangers which the Plague brought upon the devoted city. Selling everything that he had it in his power to part from, in order to purchase what was required for the sick, he threw himself, regardless of everything but his high calling, into the midst of the danger. He himself confessed the dying, administered to them the Holy Sacraments, and, mounted on a bench, preached to all penitence and amendment of life. At other times he walked in procession through the city in tears, praying, barefooted, with a cord around his neck, and holding aloft the symbol of the Cross. In vain his friends attempted to turn him from his dangerous course; animated, as it were, with fresh zeal by their opposition, he plunged into the very darkest abysses of contagion. But, although he was preserved throughout the prevalence of this frightful scourge, his strength soon after began insensibly to waste away, and, whilst on a visitation progress, he was compelled by ill-health to cease from his object, and return to Milan, where he terminated his blessed and laborious career, aged only forty-six years. In 1610 he was regularly canonised by Paul V., at the universal and pressing instance of the people of his province. His works were published at Milan, in 1747, by Jos. Ant. Saxius, in five vols., fol., and in the Ambrosian Library at Milan are thirty-one volumes of his letters.

Borrow, GEORGE [1803—1881], was born at East Dereham. His education appears to have been irregular in his youth, and he was much indebted to his after-exertions for his knowledge. He acquired a taste for literature and languages from people with whom he was thrown in Norwich. He had a natural fondness for adventure, and this led him to familiarise himself with the life, habits, and language of gipsies, not only in the British Isles but in Spain. He published the results of his experience in a book called "The Zingali; or, an Account of the Gypsies in Spain, with an original Collection of their Songs and Poetry, and a copious Dictionary of their Language;" two vols., 8vo., 1841. Mr. Borrow was then employed by the British and Foreign Bible Society, as a sort of colporteur in Spain of bibles in the Spanish tongue. Of this employment he gives an account in a work published in 1843, three vols., 8vo., entitled, "The Bible in Spain; or, the Journeys, Adventures, and Imprisonment of an Englishman in an attempt to circulate the Scriptures in the Peninsula." This book is written in a highly humorous and interesting style, and gained for its author a great reputation among English writers. Mr. Borrow was also employed in Russia by the Bible Society.

Bossuet, JACQUES BENIGNE [A.D. 1627—1704].—A famous French preacher, and a controversialist of great learning. For a year or two [A.D. 1669—1670] he was Bishop of Condom, but resigned his see on becoming Preceptor to the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XIV. In A.D. 1681, however, he became Bishop of Meaux, continuing in that see for about a quarter of a century; and it is by this title that he is best known.

Bossuet belonged to an eminent legal family at Dijon, where he studied under the Jesuits, and he inherited from his family that capacity for intellectual acquirements which made his learning conspicuous from his earliest days. At twenty-four years of age he took his doctor's degree in the University of Paris; and after being for some time under the discipline of St. Vincent de Paul, became a Canon of Metz. Before he reached thirty years of age he was appointed by the Bishop of Metz to answer the Huguenot Catechism of Paul Ferry, and his refutation met with such success that the Queen-Mother, Anne of Austria, requested him to undertake the conversion of the Huguenots throughout the diocese of Metz. His success in carrying out this work, and his remarkable preaching, made the Queen-Mother his enthusiastic patroness, and by her means it was that he became Bishop of Condom, a court chaplain, and tutor to the young king. From the time of his appointment to the see of Meaux he became a still more active controversialist than he had been before, his best known work being one published in 1688, on The History of the Variations of the Protestant Churches, which drew out replies and counter-replies in great number, after the manner of the age. He was also a strong opponent of the Quietism revived by Madame Guyon; and as the great Fénelon, Archbishop of Cambray, had his sympathies enlisted on the Quietist side, an unhappy difference arose between the two learned and pious bishops. Bossuet even denounced Fénelon as a heretic, causing his exile at the hands of Louis XIV. Bossuet died in his seventy-sixth year, leaving a great reputation behind him. In an age when controversy ran high in France, he established for himself a character as the champion of the Roman Catholic doctrine maintained at the Council of Trent; but he was strongly opposed to the extravagant claims of the Popes to supremacy, and was so much the champion also of the independence of the French Church that one of his works on the subject was put into the Index Expurgatorius of the Roman Court. Had he lived a century and a-half earlier, he might have advocated the reformation of the Church of France on the lines officially adopted in the reformation of the Church of England.

Botolph or Botulf, Sr.—Little is known of the origin and life of St. Botolph, and he is not mentioned by the historian Bede. He appears to have been a man of noble family and British extraction, who was born in the sixth century, and spent his early days in Germany with his brother Adulph, who eventually settled there as Bishop of Utrecht. Botolph returned to England, and founded a great monastery in a desolate part of East Anglia, which ancient writers call Ikanbro. This was very probably Boston, or Botoiph's-town, in the south of Lincolnshire. St. Botoiph is commemorated on June 17th, and there are no fewer than fifty churches dedicated in his name, ten of which are in Norfolk and three in London. These last are close by the old gates that led to the North of England—Bishopsgate, Aldersgate, and Aldgate. The idea was probably to offer a church where the prayers of the saint might be asked for by persons starting to travel northwards. When the Danes destroyed his monastery, his remains were divided between Ely and Thorney.

Bougres. [BULGARIANS.]

Bounds, BEATING THE.—The popular name for the religious processions or "perambulations" around the boundaries of parishes, which were anciently, and are still in many places, observed in Rogation week, and especially on the Thursday of that week, which is Ascension Day. In the Book of Homilies there is a Homily in three parts for the three Rogation days, and then an "Exhortation to be spoken to such parishes where they use their perambulations in Rogation Week, for the oversight of the bounds and limits of their town." The processions were headed by the clergy and other officials of the parish, bearing white wands, and singing the 103rd and 104th Psalms. At certain appointed stations the procession halted, and crosses were dug in the turf or marked upon an adjoining wall. It was a rough custom for these marks to be beaten with the white wands, and for some of the boys accompanying the officials to be hoisted and also beaten with the rods, that the place where the boundary ran might be printed forcibly on their memories. The writer has heard old men say, "Aye, that's the bound. I was beaten there sixty years ago."

Bourdalone, Louis [A.D. 1632—1704].

—A Jesuit so famous for his eloquence that he has been called "the Prince of French preachers." He preached much before the Court of Louis XIV., and at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was appointed to preach before the Huguenots with the view of converting them from their Protestant opinions. Towards the close of his life he gave up preaching, and devoted himself to ministrations in hospitals, prisons, and houses of charity. His sermons occupy fourteen or fifteen volumes.

Bourignonists.—French QUIETISTS of the seventeenth century, who took their name from Antoinette Bourignon de la Porte, a Flemish lady [A.D. 1616—1680], who rejected all churches and sects, and claimed to found and govern a new religious body solely by the guidance of her own personal inspiration.

After her death she was succeeded by Peter Poirer, a Calvinistic preacher of much energy, under whom her principles spread into Holland, Germany, Switzerland and England; but they were held in England only as opinions by persons belonging to various religious bodies, and who were never organised into a sect.

Bourneans.—The followers of a Birmingham preacher named Bourne, who taught the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked in its most extreme form.

Bower, ARCHIBALD [1686—1766].—He was educated in France as a Jesuit, but on his return to England became a member of the Established Church. He is the author of the most copious history of the Popes in the English language.

Bowing at Name of Jesus.—This custom, at one time universal in the early English Church, was, like many others, much disturbed at the Reformation, and it therefore became necessary to re-enact it. This was first done in the 52nd Injunction of Queen Elizabeth, 1559, and again in the 18th Canon of 1603, in these words:—

the name of Jesus shall be in any lesson, sermon, or otherwise in the Church pronounced, due reverence be made of all persons, young and old, with lowness of courtesy and uncovering of heads of the men-kind, as thereunto doth necessarily belong and heretofore hath been accustomed."

1603.
" likewise
when in time of divine service the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all persons present as it hath been accustomed; testifying by these outward ceremonies and gestures their inward humility, Christian resolution, and due acknowledgment that the Lord Jesus Christ, the true eternal Son of God, is the only Saviour of the world, in whom alone
all the mercies, graces, and promises of God to mankind for this life and the life to come are fully and wholly comprised."

In the later Canon the meaning and reason of the practice are fully explained, and on it as an enactment the practice now rests; its use in the Creeds may be called nearly universal, though at other times it varies much.

Bowing, strictly so called, that is the inclination of the head and body, or head only, is the proper use of the English Church for the expression of reverence: genuflexion, or the placing of one or both knees for a moment on the ground, being of modern introduction. This latter, for instance, is never mentioned in the Sarum Missal, which in the Creed directs the choir to "incline," and even in the Canon of the Mass the priest is bidden to do only the same. For women, the corresponding obeisance is of course the old-fashioned "courtesy."

By English readers this custom has long been associated with the familiar text in the Epistle to the Philippians (ii. 10), "That at Name of Jesus every knee should bow;" but there is little more than verbal justification for this; the preposition "at" (which insufficiently expresses the idea of our Lord's universal supremacy) was taken into our Authorised Version from Tyndale [1557], all others reading "in;" this is the more correct representation of the original, and to it accordingly the Revised Version has returned.

Other obeisances made within a church are those at entering and leaving the building, made of course towards the altar, though the last century carelessness perverted them to the desk as a personal salutation to the clergyman; and, further, those made at the Holy Communion. All these, though not, like the special subject of this article, under positive enactments, have lingered in many places, and now are widely revived.

Boy Bishop.—The election of a "boy bishop" was one of those singular ceremonies, mixing sacred things with profane, which existed in the mediæval Church of Rome. The origin of it is not clearly understood,* but it is known to have existed in the thirteenth century both in England and on the Continent. Its nature was that in cathedrals or collegiate churches one of the choir-boys was elected "bishop" by the others, who were called his chapter; this was on St. Nicholas' Day, the 6th of December (chosen as the day of the great patron of children), and the "bishop" remained in office till Holy Innocents' Day. During this time, with the knowledge and sanction of his elders, he exercised nearly if not quite the whole of the episcopal functions: saying offices, sometimes even Mass; giving benedictions, preaching sermons, going on visitations, occasionally filling up vacancies; and, if he died during the time, being buried with episcopal honours. This tampering with the Offices of the Church was certainly wrong, and was so far seen to be so that injunctions of councils were made to restrain it; and John Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, issued a decree in 1279, that the "puerile solemnities" were not to begin till the evening of St. John Evangelist's Day, and were to "totally terminate" on the evening of the Holy Innocents' Day.

In England, at the time of the Reformation, the custom was abolished by a proclamation of Henry VIII. in 1541, but restored in 1556 by Queen Mary; and "John Stube, Querester," of Gloucester Cathedral, was in 1558 the last boy bishop elected in England. Though Queen Mary died on the 17th November, this young prelate preached his sermon in the Cathedral on the Holy Innocents' Day; it still exists in MS. in the British Museum, and extracts may be found in a paper on the subject in Notes and Queries, 5th S., iv. 501, to which this article is much indebted.

There is great probability that the school-ceremony at Eton, known as the "Montem," was in its origin the election of a boy bishop; this was originally held in the winter, changed to the summer in 1758, and given up in 1846. And it is stated (Notes and Queries, 4th S., vii. 21) that a boy bishop is even now annually elected in the Propaganda College at Rome.

Boyle Lecture.—This consists of a series of eight sermons for the defence of Christianity against Infidels; to be preached during the course of three years in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall. The lectureship was endowed by the will of the Hon. Robert Boyle in 1691. This excellent man, often called "the great Christian philosopher" [A.D. 1627—1691], was seventh son of the great Earl of Cork of the Stuart times. He was one of the principal founders of the Royal Society, and President of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and was distinguished alike as a philosopher in such science as was known to the seventeenth century, and as a zealous and faithful layman, ready for every good work in the Church of England.

Brachitæ.—An early sect of the Manichæans; their date is placed about the end of the third century, but no further particulars are known of them.

Bradford, JOHN [A.D. 15...—1555].—One of the Marian martyrs. For the last five years of his life he was in orders, and was made Prebendary of Cantlowes, or Kentish Town, in St. Paul's Cathedral, by Bishop Ridley; but for several years he had been clerk to Sir John Harrington, Paymaster to the Forces, and then student of the Inner Temple until 1548. While he was clerk to Sir John Harrington, he defrauded the Crown of £520, equal to more than £5,000 of our present money. The sum was eventually refunded by Sir John Harrington, who was threatened with a charge of complicity by Bradford, and who, though he at first refused, saying he would not "have his head under" Bradford's "girdle" by committing himself, yet at last supplied the money, which was sent to the Privy Council through Bishop Latimer, who tells the story in the first of his published Sermons. While a student in the Temple, he was converted by Sampson, afterwards Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and

* It bears, of course, great resemblance to the story of St. Athanasius "playing at bishops" in his childhood, told by Sozomen, i. 17., of which Mr. Kohle has made use in the Lyra Innocentium (vi. Children's Sports, 7, "Enacting Holy Rites") but though this may have suggested the idea, it cannot strictly be called its original.

shortly went to Cambridge, intending to study there for three years and then take orders. But after ten months' study, on October 19th, 1549, he was made Master of Arts by special desire of the Senate, and on August 10th, 1550, was ordained Deacon by Bishop Ridley. When Queen Mary entered London, Bradford was the Canon in residence at St. Paul's, and being mixed up with a disturbance which took place at a Paul's Cross sermon, he created so unfavourable an impression before the Privy Council that he was sent to the Tower, and severe language was used in Parliament respecting his seditious spirit both when free and when in prison. In 1554, he was removed from the Tower to the King's Bench under an accusation of heresy. He was brought before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at Southwark, on January 22nd, 1555, and was afterwards confined in the Poultry for five months. When all hope of his recantation was over, Bradford was burned at Smithfield, on July 1st, 1555, dying a brave and self-possessed death. Foxe, the martyrologist, gives a detailed account of Bradford's imprisonment; and it is singular to find that he and his fellow-prisoners, soon to suffer like himself, spent their time in the most fierce and irreconcilable controversies about predestination, Bradford's opponents telling him that he was a great slanderer of the Word of God. They also charged him with the maladministration of funds which he received from friends for the maintenance of himself and his fellow-prisoners.

Bradwardine, THOMAS [A.D. 1290—1349].—He was called "The profound doctor," on account of his deep learning in theology and mathematics. He was for some years Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and read lectures in Divinity there notwithstanding his high office. During the wars of Edward I. with France, Bradwardine acted as his confessor, and his influence with the king for good was very great; nothing preventing him from pointing out to his sovereign his faults of extravagant ambition and uncontrolled passion. And while he was thus exercising a good spiritual influence over the great and powerful king, he also employed himself diligently among the soldiers, animating their courage on the eve of battle, and restraining them from excess in the hour of victory. In A.D. 1349, he was elected to the archbishopric of Canterbury, and when objected to by the king was elected a second time. He was consecrated at Avignon, and returned to England; but within three or four months he died of the plague. Fuller, the Church historian, characterises him as the most pious man that sat in the chair of St. Augustine, from Anselm to Cranmer.

Psalms with Nahum Tate, the poet-laureate, and nearly forgotten even in that capacity. He was son of Nicholas Brady, major in the Royal Army (descended from Hugh Brady, Bishop of Meath, from 1563 till his death in 1585), and born at Bandon, Cork, 1659; was King's Scholar from Westminster, and Student of Christ Church, and afterwards D.D. of Dublin. His Irish preferences were a chaplaincy to Edward Wettenhall, Bishop of Cork (d. 1713), a prebend in that Cathedral (held from 1688 to 1692), and a parish in the same county; but taking a somewhat prominent part on the Orange side in the Revolution, he went to England, 1690, with a petition to Parliament from the inhabitants of Bandon, and afterwards settled there. After holding one or two London lectureships, he became rector of Clapham and vicar of Richmond. These parishes, with a royal chaplaincy in ordinary and one in the army, he retained till his death, 20th May, 1726. His works, besides the version of the Psalms, were one of the Æneid, a tragedy called "The Rape," and some volumes of sermons, all long ago forgotten. The Psalms were first published 1695, and licensed by Order in Council, 3rd December, 1696; they obtained, as is well known, a very wide use, either instead of or along with the older version of Sternhold and Hopkins. Probably a hundred years ago they were sung in nearly every church in England where there was singing at all, and the only hymns known were those which the printers had added to the end. They became gradually displaced by hymns, and now are seldom heard; which is not to be regretted, since (except in a few detached verses) they have little merit of any kind.

Brahminism, or Hindooism.—The religion professed by about 150,000,000 of the people of India or Hindostan. It takes its name from the Brahmins, the highest "caste" or religious and social class of those who profess it; these, again, receiving their designation as Brahmins from Brahma, the Supreme Being of their system.

Brahminism is founded on four sacred books called Vedas, written in Sanskrit; and know by the names of the Rig-Veda, the Yagur-Veda, the Sama-Veda, and the Atharva-Veda. Collectively they are known as "The Veda," of which word the original meaning is knowledge by sight, the contents of the work being said to have been "seen" by those to whom Brahma revealed them. The most important and ancient of these sacred books is the Rig-Veda, or Veda of Praise, which is the foundation of the other three. Each Veda consists of two divisions, the Sanhita or Mantras, which are hymns to the gods, and the Brahmanas or Sutras, which are prose commentaries on the hymns of much later date. The Rig-Veda hymns are more than a thousand in number, addressed to various gods and written by many different authors. All the manuscripts of the Veda are comparatively modern, but the hymns themselves are alleged to be very ancient, the most recent of them being said to have been written B.C. 1200, and the earliest B.C. 2000. Accepting these dates, the earliest portion of the Veda is contemporary with the patriarch Abraham, the latest with the prophet Samuel.

The religion of Brahminism, as set forth in the Rig-Veda, is that form of polytheism which finds its gods in the forces and aspects of Nature; and nearly half the hymns are addressed to the two most prominent of these deities—Indra, the Firmament, and Agni, Fire. But at a later date than the Rig-Veda new elements were introduced by the "Institutes of Manu," which consisted mainly of a priesthood, a ceremonial system, and the worship of Brahma. At a still more recent date, when the minute ceremonial and its necessary priesthood had become an intolerable burden to the Hindoos, the system of Buddha [Buddhism] was introduced as a revolt against them. Then came a reaction, and Buddhism was entirely expelled from India, finding its home in China and Japan. From this time Brahminism changed to its present form, in which a Supreme Being is acknowledged, who is supreme over the universe, over man, and over 330 millions of other gods. The gods universally acknowledged, however, are seventeen in number; the great triad, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, the creating, preserving, and destroying principles (with their corresponding feminine principles) being the most important. The other deities are mostly personified powers of Nature, including those mentioned in the Veda. Besides these, veneration is paid to the planets, to sacred rivers such as the Ganges, and to a host of local gods. Of the three principal gods, Brahma is now little worshipped, all the worship having been attracted to Vishnu and Siva. Vishnu is worshipped chiefly in the form of Avatars or incarnations, manifestations on earth in various forms, animal and human, ten in number, of which one is yet to come. The most revered of these avatars of Vishnu are Krishna and Rama. Siva, the principle of destruction, is worshipped with frequent animal sacrifices, and his devotees inflict terrible and protracted tortures on themselves, such as suspending themselves by hooks driven through the flesh in various parts of their bodies. Their images have in many cases a monstrous character, with many heads, arms, or bodies.

But this gross system of idolatry and polytheism is explained away for the more educated classes into a monotheistic philosophy. There is one Supreme Being, it is alleged, from whom all other Divine beings proceeded by a series of emanations, and this Deity is also called Brahma, like the first person of the triad, who is recognised as the Creator.

The soul of man is regarded as a limited portion of the Divine Essence, separated off from his infinity and, in the case of the good, to be finally reabsorbed into the Divine Essence. This world is a place of trial, in which souls are embodied for the purpose of determining by trial the place and condition of their future existence. This is settled by striking a balance between the good works done in this life and their rewards in the next, and the evil works and their punishments. But the highest condition of all is that of absorption into the essence of the Supreme Brahma, and this is attained only by those who carefully observe the ceremonial prescribed in the laws of Manu, by acquiring the highest knowledge through one of the systems of philosophy, and by devotion to the gods.

A peculiar power of Brahminism rests in its system of "caste," which made a sharp division between the classes of society, and to which the Brahmins, or highest and teaching caste, attributed a sacred character. The castes originally were only four: the Brahmins, from whom alone the priests were taken; the Kshatriyas, or princes and warriors; the Vaisyas, or commercial class; and the Sudras, the labouring and wage-earning class. There are now a number of subdivisions of every caste except the Brahmins, who still reign supreme, though there are signs that their influence is dying out through contact of the Hindoo population with Europeans.

Brahmoo Somaj.—A reformed Brahminism, in which One God (Brahma) is recognised, and His worshippers are viewed under the aspect of His Church (Sanscrit, Sumdja, an assembly), and in which the leading principle is thus indicated by the name "the Church of the One God." The sect was originated in the year 1818 by Rammohun Roy, a Hindoo of large property and good education, well versed in the Vedas, and having acquaintance also with Christianity; who came to England on an embassy from the King of Delhi in 1831, and died at Bristol in 1833. The Brahmoo Somaj is a revolt against Hindoo polytheism, and an attempt to form a Hindoo Church on a basis of pure Theism. The only form of English religion with which it heartily allies itself is UNITARIANISM.

Bramhall, JOHN, Archbishop of Armagh. —This "Athanasius Hibernicus," as his biographer, John Vesey, Bishop of Limerick (died Archbishop of Tuam, 1716), calls him, was born, of the Bramhalls of Cheshire, at Pontefract, in 1593, where also he had his early education, probably at the old Grammar School. In 1608 he went to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where he was B.A. 1612; M.A. 1616, B.D. 1623, D.D. 1630. When in holy orders he held for a time a living in York, and then the Rectory of Ewington in that county, to which he was presented by Sir Christopher Wandesford of Kirklington. While in possession of this he came first into public notice in the following manner:—In 1623, while the Spanish marriage of the Prince of Wales (afterwards Charles I.) was expected, and the hopes of the Roman Catholic party very high, two of their priests, Hungate, a Jesuit regular, and Houghton, a secular, challenged the Yorkshire clergy to a public disputation at Northallerton. Bramhall accepted the challenge, and so dealt with them on transubstantiation and half-communion that (as Bishop Vesey says) one of them, it appears not which, died of the mortification of his defeat. On hearing of this Archbishop Matthews of York, after reprimanding Bramhall for disputing without his leave, made him one of his chaplains for disputing with success, and he so remained till the Archbishop's death in 1628. He was also elected a Prebendary, first of York and then of Ripon, where after Matthews's death he went into residence as sub-dean. He was now becoming widely known as a learned divine and a champion of the Church; besides his dispute with the Roman Catholic priests, he had preached before the Archbishop against the Papal usurpations, and on taking his doctor's degree had defended the thesis that the Pope was the cause of all religious controversy. He was invited to Ireland by Lord Wentworth (afterwards the famous Earl of Strafford) and his own first patron, Sir Christopher Wandesford—both Yorkshiremen like himself—who were going over respectively as Lord Deputy and Master of the Rolls. Though he had high prospects in England, Bramhall consented, resigned all his posts, and went with them. In Ireland he received rapid preferment, being Treasurer of Christ Church, Dublin, 30th August 1633, Archdeacon of Meath 1st October, 1633, Bishop of Derry 24th May, 1634, and to this see he was consecrated at Dublin by Archbishop Ussher of Armagh, 26th May. At this time the Church of Ireland was by no means recovered from the unsettlement of the Reformation, and very much of its revenue had been lost by (among other reasons) the very extensive lay impropriations, and a system of long leases at small rents which had been carried on for a great length of time. To the remedying of this the Bishop of Derry at once applied himself, and so succeeded that he may well be called both the temporal and spiritual restorer of the Irish Church. "Some few impropriations," as Bishop Vesey sums it up, "he obtained by power of reason and persuasion, more by law, but most of all by purchase." He thus and otherwise recovered for the Church in four years the sum, it is stated, of from thirty to forty thousand pounds; and he obtained in the Irish Parliament which met 14th July, 1634, an Act for the Regulation of the Length of Leases. In spiritual matters, he moved in the Convocation which met at the same time for the adoption of the English Articles of Religion in the place of those of 1615, which included the unauthorised "Lambeth Articles" (see that article) of England, and were strongly Calvinistic. In this Bramhall succeeded, and the Articles of 1615, though never formally repealed, and indeed (strange to say) for a time subscribed in some dioceses along with the others, fell into oblivion; but with the English canons, which he would also have adopted, he was not so successful. Archbishop Ussher opposed him, but committed to him the drawing-up of a set of canons based on those of England, which he accordingly did: on this part of his life see Mant's History of the Church of Ireland, i. 489 et seq. These valuable services of the Bishop of Derry, joined with his previous opposition to Rome, made him most unpopular with the Catholic party, and even before the actual explosion of the Catholic Rebellion of 1641 he was impeached of high treason. Bramhall was then at his see, but resisting his friends' entreaties he hastened to Dublin, and went down to the House of Lords, where he was taken into custody, as it seems, by Black Rod, at the order of the House. On the 26th April he wrote from his confinement to Archbishop Ussher, then in England, asking his help: the Archbishop, at the request of Lord Strafford, the night before he was to be executed, obtained from Charles I. an order for his discharge, and this, though not at once, was obeyed. The Bishop at once returned to his see, but had not been there long before the rebellion burst out by the massacre of the 23rd October, and Bramhall, being persuaded that his life was not safe, was induced to depart for England: there was indeed but one bishop, John Leslie of Raphoe, who remained in Ireland during the Great Rebellion. In England Bramhall continued doing his utmost in all ways for the king and his cause, till after the battle of Marston Moor, 2nd July, 1644, when he and other Royalists left England, and landed at Hamburg on the 8th; thence he went to Brussels, where he mostly remained till 1648, and is related to have occupied himself in his old work of controversy with Jesuits. In the latter year he returned for a time to Ireland, but was forced again to leave the country, and his vessel being chased by two of Oliver Cromwell's ships of war, he was only saved by a shift of the wind. During this second sojourn abroad he published at the Hague [1650] that Consecration and Succession of Protestant Bishops Vindicated, which, with the notes on it of the late Rev. A. W. Haddan, is one of the classics on the subject.

At the Restoration Bramhall returned (October, 1660) to England. He had been nominated in August to the archbishopric of Armagh, vacant since Ussher's death in 1655; and he was appointed by letters patent of 18th Jan., 1661. The first work was of course to fill up the episcopate; of the twenty-five sees then existing, the incumbents of eight only, including Bramhall, survived; the four archbishoprics were all vacant. These seventeen vacancies were filled as follows: to two archbishoprics (Armagh and Cashel), and the principal see of Meath, translations from among the eight were made; four sees were united to others;* and to nine of the remaining ten, together with the three vacancies caused by the translations, Bramhall and three of his brethren consecrated in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, on the 27th Jan., 1661. Hardly ever, if ever, had any such number of bishops been consecrated at once since our Lord Himself consecrated the Apostles on the evening of the first Easter-day; certainly it has not happened again. Kildare, the only see still left vacant, could not then be filled on account of its extreme poverty; a prebend of St. Patrick was, however, very shortly annexed, and a bishop consecrated on the 6th March.

Bramhall's services as archbishop were not less than they had been as bishop; he was of course President of the Convocation, which met on the 8th of May, and he was also elected Speaker of the House of Lords; and he succeeded as in former times in recovering much lost income for the Church. His conduct in persuading such of his clergy as had only Presbyterian Orders to receive ordination from him entirely on the legal ground, putting aside the question of spiritual validity, has been much questioned; but considering all the circumstances, and the great necessity of maintaining peace and quietness, the Archbishop is not to be too hardly judged; there is no doubt whatever that the ordinations were not, as it has been said they were, hypothetical or conditional in any way; such an idea has arisen from a misreading of a special clause, inserted in the letters of Orders granted under such circumstances [Mant's History i., 624].

Bramhall did not long survive as Primate; he had already had two paralytic strokes, and the third, which came on in court, during a trial at law concerning his private estate, proved the last. This was in June, 1663, and before the end of the month he died, and was buried in Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, Bishop Jeremy Taylor preaching his funeral sermon. Bramhall's works are chiefly controversial; thus, besides the Consecration of Protestant Bishops already mentioned, and other works on the Roman controversy, he wrote against the sceptical works of Hobbes; some few sermons also remain, but others which he left in MS. were, as his biographer says, "terne by the rats." His works, with Life prefixed, were published by Bishop Vesey at Dublin, 1677; and in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, edited by Mr. Haddan, five vols., Oxford, 1842—46.

Bramhall married, when Rector of Ewington, a lady named by birth Halley, the widow of another Yorkshire clergyman; by her he had one son, Sir Thomas Bramhall, created baronet in his father's lifetime, 31st May, 1662, who died without issue; and three daughters, of whom the eldest married Sir James Graham, son of the seventh Earl of Menteith, and had an only daughter, through whose marriage with Sir Arthur Rawdon, Bart., the Earl of Loudoun is the present representative of the Archbishop.

Brandenburg, CONFESSION OF.—A Confession of Faith drawn up in the City of Brandenburg, by order of the Elector, with a view to reconcile the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the Confession of Augsburg.

Brandon, Sr. [A.D. 482—577], of Clonfert. He founded the monastery of Clonfert, in the county of Longford. He is chiefly celebrated for a seven years' voyage in search of the Fortunate Islands, which he undertook in the year 545, and which seems in reality one of those missionary enterprises for which the early Church of Ireland was so famous. The church of Brancepeth, near Durham, is dedicated in his name, and he is commemorated on May 16th.

Brandon or Brendan, Sr. [A.D. 573].—Abbot of Birr, now represented by Parsonstown, at the south-west extremity of King's County, in Leinster. He was a friend of St. Columba, who looked up to him as possessing the gift of prophecy. He is commemorated on November 29th.

Brannock, Sr.—A Devonshire hermit of this name, who is said to have been son to a prince of Calabria, gives his name to Branton in that county, and to Brampton in Somersetshire. He is commemorated on January 7th. The antiquary, Leland writes in the reign of Henry VIII., "I forbear to speak of his cow, his staff, all his oak, his well, and his servant Abel, all of which are lively represented in a glass window of 'Bramton' Church."

Brasenose College. [OXFORD, UNIVERSITY OF.]

BRASSES IN CHURCHES, sepulchral tablets, made generally of the mixed metal called latten, and inlaid on slabs of stone, to form part of the pavement of the church, or to lie on the top of an altar-tomb. Brasses are either (1) figures of the persons commemorated,

* Three remained united, but Cloyne was, after a few years, again separated from Cork, to which it had been joined, and so continued till these twenty-two Irish sees were reduced to twelve in 1834.

or (2) inscriptions with or without ornamental scroll-work, or (3) floriated crosses with inscriptions at the foot or in a surrounding border. The oldest in England is that of Sir John d'Abernon (1277), at Stoke d'Abernon, in Surrey, the next that of Sir Roger de Trumpington (1289), near Cambridge. The former of these is on the ground, the latter on an altar-tomb. Many brasses were destroyed in the Civil Wars of the seventeenth century; the Matrix, i.e., the incised stone in which one was formerly laid, is still a common object to be seen on church floors. The disregard for objects of antiquity which marked the last century is another reason why many brasses have been injured; the writer of the present article, while supervising the restoration of an ancient church, found two elaborate brasses thrown away under some pews fifty years old. The matrices belonging to them were found in the church, and they were restored. Brasses are particularly valuable as illustrating both ecclesiastical and civil costume of past ages. Most of the best are of foreign workmanship. [MONUMENTS.]

Brawling in Church.—An offence consisting of unauthorised speaking or talking during Divine Service; and of which clergy as well as laity may be found guilty.

"Brawling in church, or interrupting the minister in Divine Service," says the Book of Church Law, was formerly met by several old statutes, which imposed a fine upon the offender; but an Act of Parliament was passed in 1860, "to abolish the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts . . . in England and Ireland, in certain cases of brawling," and to provide a more effective remedy. This Statute [23 and 24 Vict., ch. 32] enacts as follows: "§2. Any person who shall be guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour . . . in any cathedral, church, parish or district church or chapel . . . whether during the celebration of Divine Service, or at any other time, or in any churchyard or burial-ground, or who shall molest, let, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other unlawful means disquiet or misuse any preacher duly authorised to preach therein, or any clergyman in Holy Orders ministering or celebrating any sacrament, or any Divine Service, rite or office, in any cathedral, church, or chapel, or in any churchyard or burial-ground, shall, on conviction thereof before two justices of the peace, be liable to a penalty of not more than five pounds for every such offence; or may, if the justices before whom he shall be convicted think fit, instead of being subjected to any pecuniary penalty, be committed to prison for any time not exceeding two months. §3. Every such offender in the premises, after the said misdemeanour so committed, immediately and forthwith may be apprehended and taken by any constable or churchwarden of the parish or place where the said offence shall be committed, and taken before a justice of the peace of the county or place where the said offence shall have been so committed, to be dealt with according to law." A summary power is thus placed in the hands of churchwardens of apprehending any offender (either personally, or by the intervention of a constable) who shall be guilty of "riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour;" the last term being doubtless intended to include such offences as keeping the head covered—except on account of infirmity, which is provided for by Canon 18—during the time of Divine Service, or even when service is not going on, in a consecrated building.

Bray, THOMAS [A.D. 1656—1730], was born at Marton, in Shropshire, and brought up at the school at Oswestry, whence he was removed to Oxford. Having afterwards taken holy orders, he was appointed to the livings of Over-Whitacre and Sheldon. Here he composed his Catechetical Lectures, a work which so pleased Bishop Compton, that he selected the writer to act as his commissary to settle the church affairs of Maryland. He arrived in America, March 12th, 1700, and for two years devoted himself, in the face of the most harassing opposition, to the labours assigned to him. He then returned to England, became incumbent of St. Botolph's, Aldgate, and died February 15th, 1730, aged seventy-three. In 1712, he published one vol. of his Martyrology, or Papal Usurpation, fol., designing to follow it up by another which he left unfinished. In 1726 appeared his Directorium Missionarium, and his Primordia Bibliothecaria. One of his chief objects in Maryland had been to establish parochial libraries in each parish for the use of the clergyman,—a plan which was afterwards extended to England and Wales; and a society still exists, although but little known, under the title of the Associates of Dr. Bray.

Brazenose College. [BRASENOSÉ.]

Breacca, St. [A.D. 550].—An Irish female saint, to whom churches were dedicated in St. Breock and other Cornish villages. She is commemorated on June 4th.

Brendan, St. [BRANDON, St.]

Brethren. [TUNKERS.]

Brethren, CHRISTIAN. [CHRISTIAN BRETHREN.]

Brethren of the Common Life. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

Brethren of the Free Spirit.—A later name for the mediæval sect of Antinomian fanatics, known originally as Amalricians. The name was assumed from the words of St. Paul, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" [Rom. viii. 2]. The liberty thus claimed was, first, freedom from outward ordinances, and secondly, freedom from the guilt of sin. They were a wandering sect, and seem to have been part of that body of fanatics who were in mediæval times represented by the BUGHARDS, and at a later date by the FAMILISTS.

Brethren, PLYMOUTH. [PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.]

Bretschneider, CARL GOTTLIEB [1776—1848].—A great controversial writer; author of a Greek lexicon, and leader of a German school of theology which professed to take a medium line between rationalism and orthodoxy.

Brett, THOMAS [A.D. 1667—1743].—A non-juring divine of great learning, chiefly known for his Dissertation on the Principal Liturgies used in the Christian Church, which was published in 1720. He was successively Lecturer of Islington, Rector of Betteshanger, in Kent, and of Rucking. He was received into communion with the Non-jurors by Bishop Hicke, on July 1, 1715.

Breve. [BRIEF, PAPAL.]

Breviary.—The ecclesiastical name of the volume containing the daily offices, as distinct from the Missal, which contains the office of Holy Communion; from the Manual, those of Baptism, Burial, &c.; from the Pontifical, those proper to Bishops; and others. Our "Prayer book" contains, though these names are not used, a short Breviary, Missal, Manual, and Pontifical, bound in one volume.

There was in the early ages of Christianity great diversity among the rites of public worship in different dioceses and convents, which as time proceeded tended more and more to uniformity; the Roman Breviary was first settled by Pope Gregory VII., in the eleventh century; that of Salisbury or Sarum by St. Osmond, bishop of that see, about the same time, in 1085; those of York, Bangor, Hereford, and Lincoln, whose names are known from the preface to our Prayer-book, were already existing, and continued in use; in the same way other continental churches had their own "Uses;" and thus in what are called the middle ages a certain number of Breviaries and other office-books had acquired a standing.

Pope Gregory's Breviary and some others were in 1536 for a time superseded by the reformed Breviary of Cardinal Quignonez, which was published in that year under Papal sanction. This, though of course in Latin, approached in some degree to the character of the present English Prayer-book, and was widely used; but the Roman Church, instead of going on like us in reformation, went back again, and in 1568 the old Breviary, revised by Pope Pius V., was imposed throughout the whole obedience, except where a different Use could prove two centuries' prescription. This is that still generally in use, and it has lately been turned into English by the Marquis of Bute.

The English Breviaries already mentioned existed side by side till, in 1516, a reformed Sarum Breviary was published; another, still further amended, came out in 1541; and the next year this was adopted throughout the whole province of Canterbury. In 1549 came the great Reform, of Service in the vulgar tongue, and the Breviary offices of Matins, Lauds, and Prime, were translated and condensed into Morning Prayer, while those of Vespers and Compline in the same way formed Evening Prayer. What was added in 1552, before the Lord's Prayer and after the third Collect, forming our present offices, affected the arrangement in no degree.

The Breviary was usually divided into four parts, to every season a part; if the edition of that of Sarum, now published at Cambridge by Messrs. Procter and Wordsworth, cannot be studied, a summary of its contents may be found in Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia, ii., xxii.; and for a catalogue of the old copies which remain see Mr. F. H. Dickinson's List of Printed Service Books, London: Masters, 1850.

Brevint, DANIEL [A.D. 1616—1695].—Was born at Jersey, and educated, first at Saumur and afterwards at Oxford, where he became a Fellow of Jesus College. Being expelled from the university by the Covenanters, he passed over into France, and became chaplain to the Vicomte de Turenne, being employed in the negotiations for conciliating the members of the Church of Rome and Protestants. After the Restoration he became Dean of Lincoln, and died in 1695.

Briavel, Sr.—A hermit of the Forest of Dean, in Gloucestershire, whose memory is still preserved in a village of that name. He is commemorated on August 7th.

Brice, Sr. [d. A.D. 444], or Britius, Briccius, Brice. He was Bishop of Tours and successor of St. Martin in A.D. 397. He was expelled from the city under a false accusation, after he had held the see thirty-three years, and then betook himself to Rome, where he was cleared of the charge. The people of Tours elected a new bishop, but St. Brice returned for the last seven years of his life. He is commemorated on November 13th, and the church of Brize-Norton, in Oxfordshire, is dedicated in his name.

Bridal Ring.—The giving of a bridal ring was a ceremony used by the Romans before the times of Christianity, and adopted by Christians in the rite of espousal or betrothal, and not in the solemnity of marriage itself, as is our present custom.

Bridal Wreath.—The bridal wreath or crown was placed on the heads of the newly-married pair when they left the church, after receiving the benediction and celestial veil. The ceremony of "crowning" is still retained in the Greek Church.

Bride, St. [A.D. 450—521], also called Brigid, or Bridget. The patroness of Ireland, designated Thaumaturga, or the wonder-worker. She was born at Fochard, county Louth, about the middle of the fifth century, being the illegitimate child of her father Dubtach. She early took the veil at the hands of St. Mel, a disciple of St. Patrick, and retired into a cell at Kildare (the cell of the oak), where she was soon joined by so numerous a community that she was compelled to separate them into distinct bodies, and to build nunneries for them in different parts of the country, all of which acknowledged her as their mother and foundress. She herself lived chiefly at the head establishment at Kildare. Little is known of her beyond these few particulars, and the account of her miracles given in modern accounts of her life. Her name is mentioned in the Martyrology of St. Bede, and her festival is observed on the 1st of February, on which day [A.D. 521, or 523] she is said to have died, in her seventieth year; she was buried at Kildare, but afterwards, about 1185, translated to Down.

Bridget, St. [A.D. 1304—1373].—A Swedish saint, connected with England through the monastery founded on the north bank of the Thames, at Isleworth, by Henry V. She was the daughter of Birgir, Prince of Sweden, born in 1304, and was married in her sixteenth year to Ulpho, Prince of Nericia, in Sweden, who was but eighteen. After the birth of eight children, Bridget and her husband resolved to lead a life of religious retirement. For this end, and to break all worldly ties, they undertook a pilgrimage to Compostella; and Ulpho died shortly after their return to Sweden in 1344. About this time Bridget built the great monastery of Wastain, in the diocese of Linköping, in which she placed sixty nuns, and, separated from them entirely, thirteen friars, priests, in honour of the twelve apostles and St. Paul, four deacons, representing the four doctors of the Church, and eight lay-brothers. The order thus founded was called the Order of Brigittines, or the Order of our Saviour, because the chief object of the particular devotions of the Order is the Passion of our Lord. In the year 1406 Philippa, the daughter of Henry IV., was sent to Lunden, in Sweden, to be married to King Eric XIII. of Sweden and VII. of Denmark, under whom the three crowns of Scandinavia had been united. The English princess was escorted by Henry, third Baron Fitzhugh, whose attention was attracted by the Brigittines, then recently established in Wastain, and he offered to establish a branch of the Order on his manor of Hinton, near Cambridge. Eventually it was established by Henry V., brother of Philippa, in commemoration of their father, at Isleworth. This was the last monastery founded in England before the Reformation.

St. Bridget, having visited the Holy Land, died at Rome on her return, July 23rd, 1373, aged seventy-one, and her body was afterwards translated to the monastery of Wastain. She was canonised by Pope Boniface IX., on October 7th, 1391, and the next day, October 8th, was appointed for her festival.

Bridgewater Treatises.—The Earl of Bridgewater, by his will dated February 25th, 1825, left the sum of £8,000 in trust to the President of the Royal Society, to be paid to the person or persons nominated by him to write, print and publish a treatise or treatises "On the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation; illustrating such work by all reasonable arguments: as, for instance, the variety and formation of God's creation in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms; the effect of digestion; the construction of the hand of man, and an infinite variety of other arguments: as also by discoveries, ancient and modern, in arts, sciences, and the whole extent of literature." Davies Gilbert, the then President, acting on the advice of the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, appointed eight gentlemen to write treatises on the several branches of the subject. Their names and subjects were as follows: (1) Rev. Thomas Chalmers, D.D., The Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man; (2) John Kidd, M.D., The Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man; (3) Rev. W. Whewell, Astronomy and General Physics considered with reference to Natural Theology; (4) Sir Charles Bell, The Hand, its Mechanism and Vital Endowments, as evincing Design; (5) Peter Mark Roget, M.D., Animal and Vegetable Physiology considered with reference to Natural Theology; (6) Rev. Dr. Buckland, On Geology and Mineralogy; (7) Rev. W. Kirby, On the History, Habits, and Instincts of Animals; (8) William Prout, Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Functions of Digestion, considered with reference to Natural Theology.

Brigittines. [See BRIDGET.].

Brightman, Thomas [1566—1607].—A famous English Presbyterian minister. His principal work was a Revelation of the Revelation, a book which has been very widely read. In it he formulated new ideas regarding the millennium, which found great favour with the Puritans of the seventeenth century.

Brief, PAPAL.—An official letter written in the name of a Pope by the Cardinal-Secretary of State, and of inferior importance to a BULL. Briefs are sealed with the Pope's signet ring, called the "Seal of the Fisherman," from its design, which is that of St. Peter drawing his net to land. [BULL.]

Brief, ROYAL.—These were letters patent issued by the sovereign, directing the collection of alms in churches for special objects named in them. They were read after the Nicene Creed, and were granted for building and repairing churches, and for many benevolent purposes (such as the compensation of losses by fire) which are now provided for by societies or public subscriptions. Great abuses arose out of the briefs, and a statute was passed to regulate them in Queen Anne's reign. [4 Anna, c. 14.] The abuses still continued, however, as will be seen from the fact that of ninety-seven briefs for repairing or rebuilding churches or chapels, and forty-seven briefs for accidents by fire, inundations, &c., issued between Michaelmas, 1805, and Michaelmas, 1818, the sums collected amounted to £67,513 19s. 4½d., and the net sums paid over were £28,904 12s. 1½d.

An attempt was again made to reform the system in 1821, but with so little success that briefs were at last abolished, in 1828, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 28. "King's Letters," which were only discontinued a few years ago, were documents of a similar character, granted to the Incorporated Societies for Church Building, Missions, and Education.

Bristol, BISHOPRIC OF.—Since the year 1836 the diocese of Bristol has formed part of the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol. It had a previous existence of two hundred and ninety-four years, having been one of the six dioceses which were formed out of a small part of the endowments of the monasteries by Henry VIII. in 1541-2 (The others were Gloucester, Peterborough, Chester, Oxford, and Westminster). The diocese of Bristol was the most peculiar in its geographical arrangement of all the dioceses in England and Wales. It consisted of the city and liberty of Bristol and of the county of Dorset, which was separated from this portion of the diocese by the whole of Somersetshire, and which had hitherto been in the diocese of Salisbury. This arrangement was abolished by an Order of Council made on October 5th, 1836, when the diocese of Bristol was dissolved, the county of Dorset re-annexed to the diocese of Salisbury, and the city of Bristol, with its surrounding parishes, annexed to the diocese of Gloucester, the new diocese thus formed receiving the title of the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol.

During the three centuries of its existence the diocese of Bristol was presided over by forty-three bishops, of whom the first was Paul Bush, deprived, after the accession of Queen Mary, on account of his marriage; the last bishop, Joseph Allen, was succeeded in 1836 by J. H. Monk, Bishop of Gloucester, who thus became the first Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. A movement is now being actively made to separate the two, and to restore the Bishopric of Bristol, and an Act of Parliament sanctioning this was passed in 1884. The list of Bishops is as follows:—

Accession.	Accession.
Paul Bush . . . 1542	Hugh Boulter . . 1719
John Holyman . . 1554	William Bradshaw 1724
Richard Cheyney. 1563	Charles Cecil . . 1733

The cathedral of Bristol is the ancient church of the Augustinian monastery, which was founded in A.D. 1142, and consecrated on Easter Day, 1148. The only portions of the original church remaining, except the chapter-house, the great gateway of the Abbey, and the gateway of the abbot's lodgings, are incorporated into the present walls of the transepts. The greater part of the ancient monastic church is Decorated work of the late thirteenth and fourteenth centuries [A.D. 1283—1341], but the central tower and the roofs of the transepts are Perpendicular [A.D. 1481—1526]. There is much other ancient and interesting stained glass in the cathedral. The ancient Norman nave of the Augustinian abbey was pulled down shortly before it became a cathedral, doubtless with the view of rebuilding it in a style more in accordance with the reconstructed choir. That rebuilding was, however, delayed for three centuries and a-half, when [A.D. 1867—1875] the present noble nave was erected in the Decorated style, from the design of the late Mr. G. E. Street.

British America.—The religious history of the greater division of North America will be found under the head of UNITED STATES, but a few words are necessary with regard to that portion which belongs to the British Crown. The early history of Canada is French; it was discovered by a Frenchman, Jacques Cartier, who took possession of it in the name of his king. Consequently, the first religious teachers were Roman Catholics, though there were a few Huguenots also.

But the neighbourhood of the British hunters and traders caused an admixture of races on the border. The conquest by General Wolfe in 1759 placed Canada under the British Government, but the French population received guarantees that their religion and laws should not be interfered with. The religion of the British settlers, who now began to multiply, was of course on the same footing as that of the original British, now United, States. The first congregation of the Church of England was organised in 1766; it met in the Roman Catholic Church of the Franciscans at hours when the latter did not require it. In 1791 a grant of crown lands was made for the support of the Church of England clergy. But the great disadvantage from which the Church suffered for so many years was that, though episcopal, it had no resident bishops. Every minister had to go to England to receive ordination. Two years after the consecration of the first bishop for the United States, the first prelate for Canada was sent, Dr. Inglis, who in 1787 became Bishop of Nova Scotia. There are now fifteen bishops of the Anglican Communion, and about 700,000 lay members.

The Presbyterian congregations were due to Scottish preachers. There were at one time several communions of them, answering to the divisions in the native country, but they have now come together, under the title of the "Presbyterian Church in Canada." The Congregationalists and Quakers date from the Puritan days. In Upper Canada, where the majority of the population are descended from the French settlers, the prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. They have two archbishops and fifteen bishops.

Britius, St. [BRICE, ST.]

Broad Churchmen.—A name applied somewhat loosely to certain theologians in the Church of England. The phrase owes its origin to an article in the Edinburgh Review, written in 1854 by the late Mr. Conybeare. He defined the position and the tenets first of the Low Church School, then of the High Church, and then proceeded to say that there was another school of great influence, though numerically smaller than either of the others, and this school he named "Broad Church." But some of those who are included by him within it were among the most earnest protestants against being so labelled. This was not to be wondered at, for men of the widest divergency of views were called by Mr. Conybeare Broad Churchmen. Many were men engaged in teaching at the Universities or in public schools; and it may be probably asserted as a characteristic of so-called Broad Churchmen that authority in their estimation, whether of the Church or of the Scriptures, is subordinated to the teaching of God in the conscience. But there are innumerable shades of opinion comprised under this name. Among Broad Churchmen were classed Whately and Arnold, Head Master of Rugby, 1828—1842, Maurice and Hare, all firm believers in the supernatural aspects of Christianity and in our Lord's Deity. But there have been others of whom this could not be said, and who regard the special inspiration of the Bible as an open question. The Christology of such is restricted to the human aspect of Christ's earthly life, His Deity, and His pre-existence as God being passed by. Self-control rather than Divine grace is considered the power by which holy living is to be attained.

Brotherhood.—It is not easy to determine the origin of brotherhoods in the Christian Church. St. Basil in the fourth century gave them their first written constitution, and St. Jerome evidently approved of fraternities rather than "hermits," so that we may conclude that they were established throughout the fourth and fifth centuries. In the eighth century we find that the term "fraternity" was confined to monastic and clerical bodies, and not given to laymen; but in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries it is used to denote a "gild," whose majority would most likely consist of lay members. The history of the different monastic orders will be found under their several heads.

Brown, JOHN [A.D. 1722—1787], commonly known as "Brown of Haddington," because he was minister of the Burgher branch of the Secession Church of Haddington, where he also kept a school. His Self-Interpreting Bible, published in 1778, has been often reprinted, and is a very admirable work for its calm spirit, and at the same time its fervent piety. From the multitudinous marginal references which it contains has been compiled Brown's Concordance to the Bible. His Dictionary of the Bible, published in 1769, has also been reprinted several times, the last edition being issued as late as 1868; and his Short Catechism is widely circulated still.

Browne, ROBERT [A.D. 1550—1631], was the son of a Northamptonshire gentleman, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and in 1571 became chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk, in which position he speedily plunged into controversy by inveighing against "the calling and authorising of preachers by bishops." His preaching and the zeal he displayed in it would have got him into heavier trouble than it did, only that Lord Burghley, to whom he was related, defended him when attempts were made to imprison him. Finding, however, that his liberty was endangered, he went in 1581 to the Netherlands with his disciples. There he wrote three treatises, setting forth the tenets with which his name henceforth became connected. The first was entitled A Book which sheweth the Life and Manners of all true Christians, and how unlike they be unto Turks and Papists and Heathen Folk. Also the points and parts of all Divinity: that is, of the revealed will and word of God, are declared by their several Definitions and Divisions in order as followeth. The second was an exposition of the 23rd of St. Matthew, and inveighed against "ungodly communion of all false Christians, and especially of wicked preachers and hirelings." And the third was A Treatise of Reformation without tarrying for any, and of the wickedness of those preachers which will not reform until the magistrates command or compel them. The titles will sufficiently indicate the principles of Browne's teaching, namely, the setting forth of Individualism, and the protest against interference of external powers with religion. It is "the reign of the saints," as the phrase came afterwards to be. But dissensions arose in the little community, in consequence of which Browne went to Scotland in 1584, and began preaching at Edinburgh, especially urging the necessity of holding no communion with churches where evil-doers were not rigorously excommunicated. This doctrine, as well as his rejection of sponsors for the baptised, caused him to be arraigned before the Session at Edinburgh, and for a short time he was imprisoned. He then came once more to England, was again protected by Lord Burghley, and in 1586 was elected Master of St. Olave's Grammar School, in Southwark, undertaking, in order to qualify himself, not only to refrain from preaching his peculiar doctrines, but to live as a member of the Church of England. He kept his word, and five years later Lord Burghley gave him the living of Achurch-cum-Thorpe, in Northamptonshire, a cure which he held for forty years. Fuller (Ch. Hist., vol. iii., p. 64) accuses him of neglecting his duties and leading a life not over strict. He died in Northampton Gaol, having been sent thither for striking a constable who required payment of a rate, but it seems probable that this was done at a time when old age rendered him irresponsible. His followers, known for a while as Brownists, developed into the INDEPENDENTS (q.v.).

Brugglenians.—A small sect of Swiss fanatics of the 18th century, of the canton of Brugglen. They were led to believe that their leaders, two brothers named Rohler, would on a given day carry them to heaven.

Brully, PIERRE.—A martyr to the Protestant faith, burned at Tournay, Feb. 19th, 1545.

Bruno, St. [A.D. 1040—1101].—The founder of the CARTHUSIAN (q.v.) Monks. He was canonised by Pope Leo X. in 1514, and his festival is observed on October 6th.

Bryanites.—A sect of Methodists, also known by the name of "Bible Christians,"

Bucer, MARTIN [A.D. 1491—1551], whose historical surname is the Greek form of Cowhorn, his real paternal name, was born at Schelestadt, in Lower Alsacia, and was a Dominican friar at Strasburg until the age of thirty. Afterwards, falling in with some of Luther's tracts, he was so impressed by them as to seek an interview with the writer, which took place at Heidelberg in 1521, and was followed by his adopting for the most part the religious views of Luther. For twenty years he taught at Strasburg, and succeeded in spreading his peculiar views. At Cologne, where he had been invited by Archbishop Hermann, he was not so successful, and the opposition he met with on the part of the canons compelled him at last to relinquish his attempt to introduce the Lutheran tenets. In 1529 he was deputed by the four towns of Strasburg, Memmingen, Landau, and Constance to the conferences appointed by Philip, landgrave of Hesse, to be held at Marburg. Here Bucer exhibited astonishing subtlety and fertility of mind, far outstripping the most refined of the scholastic theologians in ingenuity, so as fully to justify the character applied to him by Bossuet, Le grand architecte des subtilités. He succeeded in effecting a kind of conciliation between the Lutherans and Zwinglians, and patched up a hollow truce. He afterwards attended other conferences on the same subject, and drew up the concordat of Wittenberg in 1536, but endeavoured in vain to bring over the Swiss Churches. In 1548, at Augsburg, he refused to sign the celebrated INTERIM of Charles V., and this made it dangerous for him to remain in Germany. He was then invited to England by Archbishop Cranmer and the Duke of Somerset, and after lecturing for some time at Cambridge, was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity there in 1550. He was three times married, his first wife being a nun, named Elizabeth Pallase, who bore him thirteen sons, only one of whom survived him, and that one being of weak intellect. Bucer himself died at Cambridge on February 28th, 1551. His influence tended more than that of any other foreigner to turn the current of the English Reformation into the direction taken by the Protestant communities abroad. Something of the character of his teaching is indicated in the theological proposition which he maintained before the University of Cambridge, namely, "That all good works which men seem to perform before justification are really sins, and merit the Divine displeasure: but after we are justified good actions are necessarily done by us." He also maintained strongly the doctrine of the "Divine decrees," by which one portion of mankind is supposed to be predestined and elected by God to salvation, and another portion to damnation; and he opposed the doctrine of Christ's corporeal presence in the Holy Eucharist. The use of chancels for divine service he declared to be anti-Christian, and that of vestments, including the surplice, highly objectionable, though not actually sinful. He was also one of the party which endeavoured to forbid kneeling at prayers and the reception of the Holy Communion. He had likewise a special aversion to the use of church bells.

On New Year's Day, March 25, 1550, Bucer presented Edward VI. with the manuscript of a work which he had written in Latin, Concerning the Kingdom of Christ (it was printed after the king's death, under the title De Regno Christi libri duo. Basle, 1557). In this work Bucer pressed the king to introduce a stern system of ecclesiastical discipline, under which punishments, especially excommunication and death, were to be dealt out broadcast. Able-bodied men and women who would not work were, for example, to be excommunicated; men and women who committed adultery were to be put to death; and all the capital punishments ordered in the Mosaic law were to be adopted into the law of England. This book made a great impression upon the mind of the young king, and it seems to have been in consequence of studying it that he began to write A Discourse about the Reformation of many Abuses, in the first part of which occur the words, "The ecclesiastical" governance of this realm "consisteth in setting forth the Word of God, continuing the people in prayer, and the discipline . . . For discipline, it were very good that it went forth, and that those that did notably offend in swearing, rioting, neglecting of God's Word, or such-like vices, were duly punished, so that those that should be executors of this discipline were men of tried honesty, wisdom, and judgment." This so-called "discipline" was a system of religious tyranny which would have been intolerable to Englishmen, but it was supposed that Edward VI. was resolved to introduce it, and that if he had lived to come of age he would, with Tudor determination, have imposed it on the nation. Bucer's book evidently influenced the Reformatio Legum, and was probably known to Peter Martyr, who had much to do with the latter.

But the most permanent effect of Bucer's influence was produced by his work on the First Prayer Book of Edward VI.—that of 1549. Alasco, Peter Martyr, Hooper, and Bucer appear to have been continually corresponding about the Prayer Book and the usages enjoined by it, and their dislike of certain portions of it at length resulted in the publication of Bucer's Censure, which was nominally a reply to Cranmer's request for his opinion respecting the Prayer Book, but practically a criticism of its contents from the anti-sacerdotalist point of view. It can hardly be doubted that Bucer's objections led to the revision of the book, or that, while a large number of them were disregarded, it was in deference to them that the Communion Service was so considerably altered, and especially that the Invocation of the Holy Ghost and the Commemoration of the Departed were omitted. Under the same influence the office for Baptism was altered by the disuse of exorcism, of the chrism, or white robe, and of the chrism, and that for the Visitation of the Sick by the disuse of anointing. His objections to kneeling at the Communion were vigorously opposed by Archbishop Cranmer and others, notwithstanding the support which they received from the Privy Council, and the tenacity with which they were urged by Bishop Hooper.

Buchanites.—A Scotch sect which appeared in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and is chiefly interesting as furnishing a strange example of religious extravagance. The absurdities related and believed about Mrs. Buchan, the foundress, were very numerous and shocking. It is stated that some of the descendants of the Covenanters of the Scottish Lowlands were among her adherents.

Buck, CHARLES [A.D. 1771—1815].—A Nonconformist minister, author of a Theological Dictionary published in London in 1802, and which has gone through many editions.

Buckeridge, JOHN [d. A.D. 1631], Bishop of Rochester 1611, of Ely 1626. He wrote a work on the temporal power of the Pope, against Cardinal Bellarmine.

Buddous, or Budde, JOHN FRANCIS [A.D. 1667—1729].—A Lutheran theologian, of some eminence as a writer on moral theology.

Buddhism.—The religion professed by one-third of the population of the world, namely, the people of China, Japan, Siam, Burmah, Nepaul, Ceylon, Mongolia, Tartary, Thibet, and Cashmere. It is an offshoot of Brahminism, and originated in India six centuries before the Christian era with Siddhartha, better known as Sakya-mouni, or by the title of Buddha [Eng., "The Enlightened"], which he assumed, and from which his followers are named "Buddhists." But it has been questioned whether there ever was such a person as Buddha, and whether the whole mass of traditions respecting him are not unhistorical. Of this opinion were Professor Wilson, as shown at length in his Essay on Buddha and Buddhism, and also Professor Maurice, as shown in his Lectures on the Religion of the World.

There is no God in the religious system of Buddhism, but there is a kind of worship of Buddha, for which temples are erected, and which consists simply of prayers and the burning of perfumed woods before the images and alleged relics of Buddha, which are innumerable. There are also a vast number of Buddhist monks, or "bonzes," who live a strict life in communities like those of Christian monks of the Middle Ages, act as preachers and teachers, and employ themselves in study. The end and object of the Buddhist religion is "Nirvana," of which term the meaning is doubtful, some considering that it signifies absolute annihilation, others that it is absorption into Buddha, which may be regarded as a form of the religious idea of absorption into God. This end is to be attained by extinction of self, and thus the strict practice of Buddhism is a rigid asceticism, similar to that of the early Egyptian HERMITS.

It must not be supposed, however, that Buddhism maintains the same form in all the countries where it is professed. It has ever shown a remarkable power of assimilating with itself some of the features of other religions. In some countries it retains its original form of a religion without a deity; in others it bears clear traces of the influence of other religions: as of some obsolete Christian heresy in Thibet, and of polytheism in China.

Budnæans.—The followers of Simon Budnæus, an early professor of Ultra-Socinian principles in Poland, who was deposed from the ministry in A.D. 1684, and, with all his followers, excommunicated.

Budoc, St. [A.D. 500].—An Irish saint, whose ministrations in Devonshire are kept in memory by the name of the village of Budeaux.

Bulgarian Church.—The Bulgarians are a separate race, whose origin is uncertain; they were Christianised by Methodius, who was also the Apostle of Bohemia. [BOHEMIA.] After the destruction of the Greek Empire by the Turks, the religious history of the Bulgarians for centuries is almost nothing. Some thirty years ago American missionaries established schools among them, and translated the Bible into Bulgarian. In 1870 a national Church was established, which the Greek Patriarch has declared schismatical, but which is recognised as orthodox in Russia.

Bulgarians.—A name given in medieval times to the various bodies of the ALBIGENSES (q.v.), from the supposed origin of that sect in Bulgaria.

Bull, GEORGE [A.D. 1634—1710].—Bishop of St. David's from April 29th, 1705, until his death, and a very eminent theological writer. He was descended from an ancient Somersetshire family, and, his father dying when he was only four years of age, was left with a small estate of £200 a year, which provided him with a learned education and a maintenance in hard times. He received his early education at Tiverton Grammar School, but went up to Exeter College, Oxford, at fourteen years of age. In 1655 he was ordained deacon and priest on the same day, and at the unusually early age of twenty-one, by Skinner, the ejected Bishop of Oxford, and was able so far to comply with the Puritan Government of the time that he held the benefice of St. George's, near Bristol, worth £30 a year, and afterwards that of Suddington St. Mary, near Cirencester. Like Bishop Sanderson, when his Prayer-book was taken away by the Puritan soldiers, Bull recited the services of the Church, and a striking anecdote is narrated by Nelson, his biographer, in connection with this fact. Being called upon to christen the child of one of his chief parishioners, he repeated the service from memory with great gravity, devotion, and fluency, "to the delight and admiration of the whole company. After the ordinance the father of the child returned Mr. Bull many thanks, and praised extempore prayers, intimating, at the same time, with how much greater edification they prayed who entirely depended upon the Spirit of God for His assistance in their extempore effusions than those did who tied themselves up to premeditated forms; and that if he had not made the sign of the Cross, that badge of Popery, as he called it, nobody could have formed the least objection to his excellent prayers. Upon which, Mr. Bull, hoping to recover him from his ill-grounded prejudices, showed him the Office of Baptism in the Liturgy, wherein was contained every prayer which he had offered up to God on that occasion, which, with farther arguments that he then urged, so effectually wrought upon the good man and his whole family, that they always after that time frequented the parish church, and never more absented themselves from communion."

In 1678 Bull was made Prebendary of Gloucester, and it was during the occupancy of his stall in this cathedral that he published those learned works, his Defence of the Nicene Faith, his Judgment of the Catholic Church, and his Primitives and Apostolic Tradition—all in Latin—which made his name famous among Continental theologians as well as among English Churchmen.

In 1705 the political dispensers of bishoprics found out that there had been a prophet among them for half a century who had been a learned defender of the Church of England against her opponents; and in the decline of his vigour he was appointed Bishop of St. David's, a position which he occupied from his seventy-second to his seventy-seventh year. Bishop Bull was buried at Brecon, where he died on February 17th, 1710.

Bull, PAPAL.—The highest form of a Pope's Apostolical letters, taking its name from the metal seal attached to it (Lat. bulia). These seals were originally, according to the importance of the matter, of gold, silver, or lead: one "Golden Bull" was that by which Pope Clement VII. made King Henry VIII. Defender of the Faith, and it is preserved at Westminster. At present, however, gold and silver are not wasted upon bulls, which are all leaden. They are directed by the Pope to three commissioners, and published by one of them; the seal has on one side the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul, and on the other the Pope's name and pontifical year; a bull is necessary at the consecration of every bishop. Even in countries of the Roman obedience bulls require some ratification by the civil power before they are acted upon: in England they are of course invalid, being made so by 28 Henry VIII., c. 16., and by 13 Eliz., c. 2, and it is high treason to procure them. Some of the most important bulls are:—

1. The bull Unam Sanctam, 1302 (Boniface VIII.), declaring the universal supremacy of the papal power.

2. The bull In Cena Domini, 1536 (Paul III.), excommunicating heretics: read every year on Maunday Thursday, whence its title.

3. The bull Unigenitus Dei Filius, 1713 (Clement XI.), against Jansenists and other Protestants, and specially against the Réflexions Morales of Pasquier Quesnel [d. 1719].

4. The bull Pastoralis Regiminis, 1742 (Benedict XIV.), against impeding the provisions of the court of Rome.

5. The bull Ineffabilis Deus, 1854 (Pius IX.), declaring the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin Mary.

6. The bull Pastor Aeternus, 1870 (Pius IX.), declaring the infallibility of the Pope.

The titles are generally the first words of the instrument.

Bullarium.—A collection of Papal bulls.

Bullinger, HENRY [A.D. 1504—1575].—Pastor of Zürich during the time that the Protestant refugees spent there while the Marian persecution was rife in England. He also corresponded with many who rose to high positions in the Church of England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and one of his theological works, the Decades, was recommended to the unlearned Clergy by Convocation in 1586. Bullinger thus came to exercise a great influence on the Church of England of the Elizabethan age—greater, perhaps, than that of any of the other Continental Reformers. As he was a disciple of Zwingli, and his successor at Zürich, this influence was of a very decided Zwinglian tone, and was represented by the Evangelical school of a much later period. [ZWINGLIANS; EVANGELICALS.]

Bungener, FELIX [A.D. 1814—1874].—A Protestant writer of much value, ordained at Geneva, but who five years afterwards took to literature as his calling. For many years he edited an Annual Contravening Romanism and Nationalism. His chief work, however, is a History of the Council of Trent.

Bunsen, CHRISTIAN KARL JOSIAS, CHEVALIER DE [A.D. 1791—1860].—He was born in the principality of Waldeck, and educated at Göttingen, where he distinguished himself in classics and philology. He studied Oriental languages in Paris. Becoming Niebuhr's secretary at Rome, he was introduced to the King of Prussia in 1822, and his abilities procured him rapid advancement in the diplomatic service of Prussia. He succeeded Niebuhr on the latter's retirement as Prussian Minister in Rome, but on a difference arising between the Papal States and Prussia in 1838, he was recalled. In 1839 he became ambassador to the Swiss Confederacy, and in 1841 Prussian ambassador to England; he held this post till 1854. Chevalier Bunsen was almost a naturalised Englishman; one of his sons was ordained in the English Church. He was a representative man in intellectual English circles, gathering around him literary celebrities from various countries. Dr. Arnold, Archdeacon Hare, and Professor Maurice were his intimate friends. He was instrumental in establishing the Anglo-Prussian Bishopric of Jerusalem. [See JERUSALEM BISHOPRIC.] His literary fame is established as an ecclesiastical historian and Egyptologist. Among his many works we may mention Hippolytus and his Age, The Church of the Future, The Signs of the Times, Outlines of the Philosophy of Universal History applied to Language and Religion, Egypt's Place in Universal History. His wife has published a most interesting memoir of him.

Bunting, JABEZ [A.D. 1779—1858].—A celebrated Wesleyan minister. From the age of twenty he devoted himself with great success to active ministerial work. He was four times chosen President of the annual Conference, in 1820, 1823, 1836, and 1844. From 1834 till his death he was president of the theological institution of the Wesleyan Methodists, and by his brethren his judgment was considered final in all matters of religious government.

Bunyan, JOHN [A.D. 1628—1688].—The writer of the most popular religious romance that ever appeared in the English language. He was the son of a travelling tinker, probably of gipsy origin, was born at Elstow, near Bedford, and was brought up by his father to his own trade. Being a wild youth, he soon forsook this trade and enlisted in the ranks of the Puritan army, and was present at the siege of Leicester, where he probably saw enough of military operations of this nature to enable him to keep up the "vraisemblance" to them in another religious romance, The Holy War. It was doubtless at this period of his life that he educated himself in reading and writing, and listening beneath the pulpit of the Puritan army chaplain would be a likely way for him to have acquired the knack of extemporary preaching. About the year 1655 he became converted to a better life, joined a Baptist congregation at Bedford, and occasionally preached in the Baptist Meeting-house, where he became so popular that the Baptist community soon built a chapel for his express use. In 1660 the return of the Royalists led to severe measures being taken against ministers who were conspicuous among the Puritan party. Bunyan was accordingly committed to prison for holding an unlawful assembly, and in Bedford Gaol he remained for twelve years and a-half, though not in strict confinement. Here he "tagged laces"—that is, tacked or fitted the tin or brass points on to the end of boot and stay laces—for a living, and achieved a world-wide fame by writing the Pilgrim's Progress from this World unto a Better. Having been set free from imprisonment by the interest of Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, in whose diocese Bedford was then situated, he returned to his ministrations among the Baptists of Bedford, and also travelled so much among them in other parts of the country during the remaining sixteen years of his life, that he came to be called "Bishop" Bunyan. During these later years of his life he also wrote other works of a similar character to the Pilgrim's Progress, but far inferior to it, and long forgotten, except among the literary classes. Few particulars are known of this portion of his life, but he seems to have been a man of irreproachable character, rough, still showing the results of imperfect education, yet to the last showing also the fruit of great natural talent and imagination. He died of a fever in London, on August 31st, 1688, and was buried in Bunhill Fields, where a modern recumbent figure marks his grave. A more beautiful but indirect memorial of him exists in a recumbent figure of Albert, Prince Consort, who is represented in the character of the armed pilgrim Christian on an altar tomb in the Royal Mortuary Chapel at Windsor.

The general outline of the Pilgrim's Progress is perhaps drawn on the lines of popular traditions, handed down from the Middle Ages. Bunyan seems also to have been indebted for some of his ideas to two books found in most houses at that period: The Practice of Piety, and The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven, two volumes of which Bunyan speaks emphatically as being brought to him by his first wife. The book is also largely impregnated with incidents and homiletic discussions such as could easily be derived from the experiences of a Puritan preacher. Yet, making all allowances, the work is a marvel of imagination and poetry for a man in such a condition of life, and whose acquaintance with the literature of his own or preceding times must necessarily have been very limited. The book has been through numberless editions in its native language, has been frequently translated, and has been a great element in the religious education of the middle classes.

Burial.—The burial—i.e., interring—of the dead has been almost the universal practice in Christendom. It was in use among the Jews, and, descending from them, has become common to all Christian nations. Attempts to introduce the Eastern practice of cremation, or burning, have not hitherto met with much success, either in France or in England; while the simple exposure and abandonment of the dead which is adopted by certain Hindoo sects has been happily never so much as heard of in the West, and would be indeed impossible. A description of cremation as practised in a very simple way in Japan may be seen in Miss Bird's Travels in Japan [ii. 306, et seq.], and it is quite possible that owing to the crowded state of England at present it may become necessary for sanitary reasons to enforce cremation by law. The objections to it are mainly those of sentiment; on theological grounds a man of faith can have none, and the right way of regarding the process in this light would be simply as the last stage of preparing the corpse for interment: the collected ashes would be suitably interred, and the religious rites performed over them. Very slight modification of the present service of the Church of England would be necessary.

RELIGIOUS RITES.—In some form or other these date from primitive times. They subdivide into (1) those in the house of the deceased; (2) on the way to the church; (3) in the church; (4) at the grave; (5) in commemoration. The early and mediæval offices comprehended all five sections, and of (3) the celebration of the Holy Communion was always a part; every section is still found in the Service of the Greek Church, which is also far more elaborate than the West in having separate offices for laics, priests, monks, and infants (Beaumont and Campian, Interleaved Prayer-book). As an example of early offices, the Sarum Manual and Primer contain under the above heads (1) a commendation of the soul to God, to be said "in the chamber or in the hall"; (2) a short litany and prayer for the soul's repose; (3) if the corpse were not to be interred that same day, "the vigils of the dead," consisting (a) of special vespers, followed by the compline of the day,* (b) of special matins on the next morning; but if the interment were to be immediate, the mass for the dead was at once said; (4) the

* The vespers were called "Placebo," from their first word, "I shall please (Eng., walk before) the Lord in the land of the living" (Ps. cxvi. 9); the matins "Dirige" for the same reason, "Make thy way plain before my face" (Ps. v. 8), from which our word dirge.

"inhumation," or actual interment, immediately preceded in all cases by the mass; (5) the repetition of the mass for thirty days, thence called "trentals," or in the vulgar tongue, "the month's mind."

Of these five sections, the later reformed English offices have retained only parts of the third and fourth, and have discarded any special office, except a collect for the Holy Communion, which was seemingly left optional, even in 1549. But the Holy Communion has often been celebrated at funerals, and occasionally is so now.

Some Protestant bodies, as the Kirk of Scotland, at present confine their religious rites to the first section.

The sounding of bells in connection with death and burial dates from old time in England. Bede mentions it, and in the early part of the fourteenth century Bishop Grandison of Exeter, among the statutes of St. Mary's College of Ottery, gives orders to regulate its use. Among other things, he says that "great people" are to be rung for with big bells and many bells, and "little people" with small bells and few bells; also that the bells are not to be rung too long, or early in the morning, as is the custom at Exeter, "because sounding brass or tinkling cymbal profits not the departed souls, and much harms ears, building, and bells" (Maskell, Mon. Riv. I. ccxlv). The bells as ordered by our present canons are the old mediæval passing-bell, probably now not used in a single parish in England; "the death bell," commonly so called, still pretty universal in the country, though in large towns practical difficulties have very much caused it to be silently dropped; the bell before the funeral, always used; the "peal" after the funeral, also very much out of use in towns, but common in the country.

Until the year 1880 the law required that all burials in churchyards and consecrated portions of cemeteries should be performed according to the service of the Church of England, and by ministers of that church only. But the Burial Laws Amendment Act gave the right to the relations or representatives of any deceased person to bury without any religious service, or with other service than that of the Church, and also to nominate for the performance of that service any person they might choose. But such right was confined to churchyards and cemeteries: it gave no new right with regard to churches or consecrated cemetery chapels. Nor did it give right as to the tolling of the bell, the bell being regarded as part of the church.

The Act also gives certain rights to the clergy of the Church to alter the Burial Service under given conditions. In case of intention to bury without the Church Service, notice must be given not less than forty-eight hours before the time. It may be given by any relative or friend who has charge of the burial, and must be in writing, endorsed on the outside "Notice of Burial." If the hour is inconvenient for the incumbent, he must within twenty-four hours name another hour in the day fixed for the funeral. He may object to burial on Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas Day, stating his reasons in writing.

It is illegal to make the ceremony an occasion for delivering any address intended "to bring into contempt or obloquy the Christian religion, or the belief or worship of any Church, or denomination of Christians, or the members or any minister of any such Church or denomination, or any other person."

Burian, or Burien, St. [about A.D. 550].—The daughter of an Irish king, who settled in the district of the Land's End, in Cornwall, during the sixth century. At the end of the tenth century, when King Athelstan completed the conquest of Cornwall and the Scilly Isles, he erected a collegiate church as a thanksgiving for his victories, and dedicated it to St. Burian.

Burkitt, William [A.D. 1650—1703], was born at Hitcham, in Suffolk. His father was a Nonconformist minister. His education began at a school at Stowmarket, and was carried on at another school at Cambridge. At the age of fourteen years Burkitt was admitted a scholar of Pembroke Hall, and upon his removal from the University, after he had taken his degree, he became chaplain in a private gentleman's family, where he remained for several years. He was ordained by Bishop Reynolds, and the first clerical duty which he undertook was at Milden, in Suffolk. Here he continued, first as curate and afterwards as rector, for twenty-one years. In 1692 he was presented to the vicarage of Dedham, in Essex, where he remained up to the time of his death. In 1687, and subsequently, he made liberal collections for the French Protestants, and by his influence procured a minister to go and settle in Carolina. Among other charities, he bequeathed in his will the house in which he lived, with the lands belonging to it, to be a residence for the lecturer who should be chosen from time to time to preach the lecture at Dedham. His best known work is a Commentary on the New Testament, which was once very popular.

Burn, Richard [d. A.D. 1789], rector of Orton, in Westmorland, and Chancellor of the diocese of Carlisle. As compiler of the Justice of the Peace, he is well known, and he is equally celebrated for a similar digest of the Ecclesiastical Law. They gained a very high reputation (and deservedly so) as works of great practical utility.

Burnet, Archbishop [A.D. 1614—1684].—Alexander Burnet, firstly Bishop of Aberdeen, and then for the last twenty years Archbishop of Glasgow and of St. Andrew's, was the son of a Presbyterian minister in Peebles, but was educated in England, where he became rector of a parish in the diocese of Canterbury. He was ejected from his benefice in 1650, and went abroad. He was consecrated to the Bishopric of Aberdeen in the year 1663, and in the following year was translated to the Archbishopric of Glasgow. Here he incurred the displeasure of the Earl of Lauderdale, the Secretary of State and High Commissioner in Scotland, for taking the lead in opposing the "Assertory Bill," which conferred on the king the power to change at his pleasure "the external government and policy of the Church" in Scotland. Burnet was suspended from his Archbishopric from 1669 to 1674, Leighton, the Bishop of Dunblane, being appointed to act in his place. On the murder of Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, in 1679, Burnet became his successor. He died on August 24th, 1684, and was buried in the Church of St. Salvator, in the city of St. Andrew's.

Burnet, GILBERT.—His father was Robt. Burnet, Lord Cramond, a Scotch Lord of Session, and his mother, sister to Sir Archibald Johnstone of Warriston, who took so prominent a part on the Presbyterian side in the Scotch civil wars, and was knighted and made Lord Warriston by Oliver Cromwell, as a representative of Scotland. Bishop Burnet's mother was herself a strong Presbyterian, and as Lord Cramond was as strong an Episcopalian, what is now called "heredity" may be thought to throw some light on their son's life. Burnet was born at Edinburgh, September 18, 1643, and admitted at the University of Aberdeen in 1653, where, in 1657, he became M.A., and for a year studied his father's profession of the law: this he afterwards exchanged for divinity, and, though pressed to do so, refused to return to law on his elder brother's death. He travelled in England and abroad for some time, and returning to Scotland, was ordained deacon and priest in 1665 (so the date is given, but if there is no error, he was two years, if not three, under age) by George Wishart, Bishop of Edinburgh, and presented to the parish of Saltoun, in Haddingtonshire (East Lothian), by Sir Robert Fletcher. He made an eminently successful parish clergyman: and that he was profoundly in earnest may be inferred from the fact of his sending round a memorial to all the bishops of his acquaintance, complaining of their "worldliness and neglect." He was incumbent of Saltoun for five years, and during the last was also Professor of Divinity at Glasgow, where, it is said, "his moderation exposed him to the ill-will of both Episcopalians and Presbyterians." In 1672 he published a "Vindication" of Episcopacy in Scotland, which procured for him the repeated offer of Scotch bishoprics. In 1673, Burnet, by reason of his preaching, was made a Chaplain in Ordinary to Charles II., and obtained considerable Court favour, which he lost again by his opposition to the Tory measures of the Duke of Lauderdale, Charles II.'s High Commissioner to the Parliament of Scotland. Burnet now resigned his professorship at Glasgow, and settled in London, where he was made Preacher at the Rolls and Lecturer at St. Clement's; and when Lauderdale's Scotch conduct was inquired into before the Commons, he regained so much of his Court favour as to be offered (on the death of Bishop Brideoake, 1678) the see of Chichester. It was, however, declined, and that Burnet was not to be bribed into sanctioning, even by silence, the vice of the Court appears from the fact that he wrote a letter of serious remonstrance to the king on his evil life, which is printed in Burnet's Life, by his son, prefixed to the History of his Own Times (vi. 271, ed. 1833). In the great controversy of that day Burnet took the Protestant side, and in the proposed exclusion of the Roman Catholic Duke of York he endeavoured to take the middle course of favouring the scheme of a regency; he also attended the unfortunate Lord Russell on the scaffold, and preached, 5th November, 1684, a strong Protestant sermon at the Rolls. All this setting the Court once more against him, he was deprived of his preachingship and lectureship, and forced (by fear of an indictment for high treason) to leave the country. After travelling in France, Germany and Italy, and visiting Rome, he was invited by the Prince of Orange and his wife, James II.'s daughter, to their court at the Hague. When his patrons came to the British crown, Burnet, who had landed with William in Torbay, on Monday, the 5th of November, 1688, was speedily preferred to the Bishopric of Salisbury. Bishop Ward died 6th January, 1689, and Burnet was nominated on the 9th March. Being elected and confirmed, he was consecrated on the 31st March by Bishop Compton, of London, and the Bishops of Winchester, Llandaff, and St. Asaph, to whom Archbishop Sancroft, refusing to consecrate himself, had (16th March) issued a commission.*

Both as parish clergyman at Saltoun and as Professor at Glasgow, Burnet had done his duty well; so also as Bishop of Salisbury, he was assiduous in the discharge of his functions: the special attention which he paid to his confirmations and ordinations is greatly to his credit. He died 17th March, 1715, at Clerkenwell, where he was buried in St. James's Church; his epitaph styles him "the strenuous and unwearied defender of liberty, his country, and true religion, and the eternal enemy of tyranny and superstition." After his death his youngest son, Thomas, published his History of his Own Times, vol. i., 1724, vol. ii., 1734; his other great history, that of the Reformation, he published himself, vol. i., 1679, vol. ii., 1681, vol. iii. (a few weeks before his death), 1715. An earlier historical work of Burnet's was Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, or rather, of the events of their Scotch administration: this was published in 1677, though written in Scotland before. A Life of Bishop Bedell, of Kilmore, was also written by Burnet. Among his theological works were a Treatise on Pastoral Care, 1692; Four Discourses to his Clergy, 1693; Exposition of the XXXIX. Articles. Though censured as heretical by Convocation, 1701, this last was long considered a standard work.

* This commission, which gave great offence to Sancroft's party, the Archbishop afterwards withdrew from the Lambeth Registry, grounding his action, probably, on the fact that it had been made revocable. But Burnet (after Sancroft's death, in 1693) threatening proceedings in Chancery, the commission was replaced. (See Birch's Life of Archbishop Tillotson, pp. 303, 304, 305.)

Burnet was thrice married: first, to Lady Margaret Kennedy, daughter of John, 6th Earl of Cassilis; secondly, to Mary Scott, of a Scotch family long settled in Holland, who died 1698; thirdly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Richard Blake, and widow of Robert Berkeley, of Spetchley: she died in 1707, having published a Method for Devotion, of which two more editions appeared shortly afterwards.

Burnet, THOMAS [1635—1715].—This not very orthodox divine was born at Croft, in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge. He is chiefly noted for a work entitled, The Sacred Theory of the Earth. This work was originally published in Latin, in two vols. 4to., the first two books, concerning the Deuge and Paradise, in 1681; the last two, concerning the Burning of the World and the New Heavens and New Earth, in 1689. The approbation this work met with, and the special encouragement of Charles II., who realised its beauties, induced the author to translate it into English. Of this translation he published the first two books in 1684, folio, with an elegant dedication to the king; and the last two in 1689, with an elegant dedication to Queen Mary. Of the Sacred Theory of the Earth, which is the principal of all his productions, the theory is well imagined, supported with much erudition, and described with great elegance of diction; but it can only be considered as an ingenious fancy: its mistakes arise from too close an adherence to the philosophy of Des Cartes, and the whole fabric is a mere visionary system of cosmogony.

Archbishop Tillotson, Burnet's patron, obtained for him a royal chaplaincy, and Oldmixon says that he would have become his successor in the Archbishopric of Canterbury but for the scandal caused by another and similar work, entitled Philosophical Archeo- logy, or the Ancient Doctrines of the Origin of Things, which contains an imaginary dialogue between the serpent and Eve respecting the Fall. The praise bestowed on this work by Charles Blount, the Deist, brought Burnet into such discredit that he had to leave the Court. The latter part of his life was spent in the Charterhouse, where he lived to the age of eighty.

Burroughes, JEREMIAH [1599—1646], M.A. of Cambridge, rector of Tittleshall, Norwich, left England in 1638, in consequence of the measures of Laud, and became preacher at Rotterdam, afterwards returning, and becoming an Independent minister in London, attracting overflowing congregations. His learned exposition of Hosea has been reprinted by Nicholls in his collection of Puritan preachers.

Bursary.—An annual allowance made to deserving students at a Scottish University to assist the payment of their expenses in the Bursar's department. It is equivalent to what is called a College "exhibition" in the English Universities.

Burse.—This is the old form of the word now spelt "purse," the bursar of a college and the purser of a ship being in each case the officer symbolically carrying the purse in which money is received and out of which it is paid. But burses or purses are used for other purposes, as in the case of the large and highly ornamented square bag in which the Lord Chancellor or his official carries the Great Seal. The name is also given to a more or less decorated square receptacle, not unlike a portfolio, wherein the smaller linen cloths employed in the Holy Communion are kept when not in use.

Burton, EDWARD [A.D. 1794—1836].—He was Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford at the time when the Church of England began to be stirred by the Tractarian movement, and he was an important literary precursor of the movement referred to, his chief works being a revised text of the Greek New Testament, with short annotations; an Enquiry into the Heresies of the Apostolic Age, Testimonies of the Anti-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of Christ, and Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First Three Centuries.

Burton, HENRY [A.D. 1579—1648].—A Puritan preacher, who had been Clerk of the Closet to Prince Henry, the eldest son of James I., and after his death to Prince Charles, but on the accession of the latter to the throne, he was dismissed, and Neile, the Bishop of Durham, was restored to the office which he had filled under James I. Burton was also rector of St. Matthew's, Friday Street, London, where he made the pulpit a place for the publication of his views. The Privy Council at last arrested him, when he was tried for treasonable writings and speeches by the Committee of the Privy Council, which sat in the Star Chamber, and was called by its name. Prynne and Bastwick were tried at the same time, and the whole three were heavily fined, sentenced to have their ears cut off in the pillory, and to be imprisoned. Burton also lost his benefice, was degraded from his ministerial office, and his degrees were taken from him by the University of Cambridge. On the accession of the Puritans to power, Burton was restored to his living, and the House of Commons voted him £6,000 out of the estates of the Royalists as compensation for his sufferings, of which, however, he never received a penny. He died previous to the Restoration, but before his death difficulties arose between him and his associates, and he separated himself from them.

Burton, ROBERT [A.D. 1576—1640].—The author of a quaint book, full of learning and wit, entitled The Anatomy of Melancholy. He was a student of Christ Church and Rector of Segrave, in Leicestershire; but he still continued to live on his fellowship at Christ Church, and died there at the very time that he had fixed for his death in the horoscope which he had cast of his nativity.

Busby, RICHARD [A.D. 1606—1695].—A famous head-master of Westminster School. He was born at Lutton, in Lincolnshire, and after receiving his early education as a King's Scholar of Westminster, was elected a Student of Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. on October 21st, 1628, and of M.A. on January 18th, 1631. Being too poor to pay his fees to the University for his degrees, the Vestry of St. Margaret's, Westminster, voted him £11 13s. 4d., which he not only repaid afterwards, but added to it an annual sum for the support of the parish school. In 1631 he obtained a prebendal stall in Wells Cathedral, the income of which he lost during the Civil War. In 1638 or 1640—for authorities differ—he became head-master of Westminster School, and continued so for fifty-five years; and used to boast that at one time sixteen out of the bench of bishops had been his pupils.

During the rule of Cromwell he was removed by the ruling powers from his situation, to make room for the second master, Bagshaw, who was a Dissenter and republican; but he was reinstated at the Restoration. In 1660 he obtained a prebendal stall in Westminster, and was made treasurer and canon residentiary of Wells; and at the coronation of Charles II. he carried the ampulla containing the oil of consecration. From the inscription on his monument, it appears that, as a schoolmaster, he possessed the happy art of discovering the latent seeds of talent in his pupils, and the still greater power of bringing them forward; while he felt, as a wealthy pluralist, that riches were showered upon him only to enable him to relieve the poor and to encourage men of learning, and for the promotion of piety. His discipline was severe, and he used to declare that a rod was his sieve, and that whosoever could not pass through it was no boy for him—an observation verified in the case of Dr. South, of whom, when young, he observed, "I can see great talents in that sulky boy, and will bring them out with my rod." But notwithstanding his rigid discipline he contrived to gain the love of his pupils, who could scarcely fail to admire the independence of their master, who, when the king entered his schoolroom, did not condescend to take off his hat, observing afterwards to some of the suite that a master should appear as great a sovereign in his school as the king did at court. Of his numerous benefactions done in secret no record has been preserved; but it is known that he gave £250 to the funds required to repair the chapel of his college, and another sum for the renovation of Lichfield Cathedral. He offered to found a lectureship of £100 per annum at each University for instructing the undergraduates in the rudiments of the Christian religion; but the offer was rejected, because it was accompanied with stipulations supposed to be inconsistent with the statutes. He died at the advanced age of eighty-nine, April 6th, 1695, without experiencing any of the evils which length of years seldom fails to bring, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Bushnell, HORACE [A.D. 1802—1876].—An American theological writer of our time, of great power and influence. He began his professional life as a tutor for two years in Yale College, where he had been a student. His intention was to go to the bar, but his religious impressions became so deep that he changed his purpose, and entered the college once more as a student in the divinity school. In February, 1832, he was ordained as a Congregationalist minister at Hartford, Conn. Six years later he read a paper before a "Society of Inquiry" in Massachusetts, in which it was alleged he put forward unsound views respecting the Trinity, but it was ten years later before he was formally arraigned on a charge of heresy. The occasion of this charge was the publication of his book, God in Christ (1849), a work well known in our own country. The points of attack were his views on the Atonement and his Sabellianism. His view of the Tri-personality, so ran the accusation, "reduced it to a mere instrumental revelation of God . . . a sort of pantheistic evolution, in which the so-called Persons are merely the dramatis personæ for dramatising God to us." The charge was not without ground, but a committee of five appointed by the Congregational Central Association to examine the book, decided by three to two that the alleged errors were not fundamental. Attempts were, however, repeatedly made to condemn him, and were renewed afresh on the publication of his next book, Christ in Theology (1851). The result was that in 1852 his congregation agreed unanimously, but without any instigation of his, that they were "a true Congregational Church," and not amenable to any external authority whatever. For seven years he continued his pastorate of this congregation, throwing himself heart and soul into various social and political movements, and preaching with wonderful power and beauty. His health then became so weak that he resigned his charge, to the sorrow of his congregation (July, 1859). He continued to write, and his books were and still are widely read. They have doubtless to be read with caution, but they are full of manly earnestness, of heavenly piety, of deep knowledge of the soul and its needs; and in some of his later writings he considerably modified opinions which he believed himself to have put forth unguardedly. His books best known in England are The New Life, and Christ and His Salvation. He died at Hartford, Feb. 17, 1876.

Butler, ALBAN [A.D. 1710—1773].—A Romanist writer, the son of Simon Butler, of Appletree, in Northamptonshire. When only eight years old he was sent to Douai for his education, about which time he lost both his parents. At Douai his progress was rapid, and he early attained in succession to the offices of Professor of Philosophy and of Theology. Having made the tour of Europe with three of the family of Talbot, he returned to England, and was appointed to a mission in Staffordshire, where he commenced his great work, The Lives of the Saints, which was completed during his subsequent sojourn at Paris, and published, 1745, in five vols. 4to.

Butler, JOSEPH, one of the greatest divines of the English Church. He was the youngest of eight children of Thomas Butler, a tradesman of Wantage, and an English Presbyterian, and was born at that place, 1692. After his first education at the Grammar School, where the Rev. Philip Barton was then master, he was sent by his father, who intended him for the Presbyterian ministry, to a dissenting academy, which was established first at Gloucester, then at Tewkesbury. The principal was named Samuel Jones, a minister of some note, and the college was rather celebrated in its time, having pupils who took high rank both in the Church and out of it. Among the former, besides Butler, was Thomas Secker, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1768); among the latter Samuel Chandler (d. 1766), author of a Vindication of the Christian Religion. While at Tewkesbury Butler met with Dr. Samuel Clarke's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God (published 1706, originally Boyle Lectures), and studying it, entered into a correspondence on the subject with the author (1713, 1714). His remarkable letters, five in number, are Butler's earliest writings, and, with Clarke's answers, have always been added to his works. To his friendship with Clarke which they began, is doubtless partly owing the turning of Butler to the Church. His father did not like it, and as a modern dictionary has it, "he called in the advice and assistance of several clergymen"; they could, however, do nothing, and Butler was at last entered at Oriel College, Oxford, March 17th, 1714. Here one of his friends was Edward Talbot, second son of William Talbot, Bishop successively of Oxford, Salisbury, and Durham; and though Talbot died (Treasurer of Salisbury and Archdeacon of Berkshire) as early as 9th Dec., 1720 (aged less than forty), all Butler's subsequent preferment was owing to this. By Talbot's father he was ordained deacon, while still without a degree (though as a student in the faculty of law he then had, according to old regulations, some of the privileges of a graduate), in the Palace Chapel at Salisbury, 26th October, and priest in St. James's, Westminster, Dec. 21, 1718, and was at once made Preacher at the Rolls, so remaining till 1726. In 1721 also he became Prebendary of Salisbury; in 1722 Rector of Haughton-le-Skerne, and in 1725 Rector of Stanhope, both on the collation of Bishop Talbot, now of Durham: in 1733 Chaplain to the Lord Chancellor (eldest son of Bishop Talbot, who had died 1730); in 1736 Clerk of the Queen's Closet and Prebendary of Rochester; in 1738 Bishop of Bristol; in 1740 Dean of St. Paul's, and Prebendary of Portpool in the Cathedral. According to the ideas of the time, it was the deanery, not the bishopric, which demanded the resignation of other preferments; he had, however, already resigned (1739) his prebend of Salisbury, and he now vacated that of Rochester and the rectory of Stanhope. In 1746 he was made Clerk of the King's Closet, and on Oct. 16th, 1750, confirmed Bishop of Durham, on which he resigned the deanery of St. Paul's. He died at Bath, June 16th, 1752, and was buried in his first cathedral at Bristol. In 1767 an absurd rumour was started that Bishop Butler had died a Roman Catholic, for which the only grounds were that he had placed a cross in his chapel, and that a charge to his clergy "squinted very much towards that superstition," it was alleged, by laying some stress on outward form and ceremony. But his old friend, Archbishop Secker, entirely disproved the accusation by referring to his other writings and his character.

The works of this great bishop which remain are (besides his letters to Dr. Clarke) his Analogy (to give it its usual short title), some sermons, and his first and only Charge to the Durham Clergy, which has been mentioned above. The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, was first published in 1736, when the writings of the celebrated infidels of the day had so far undermined faith that, in the words which the Bishop so sadly writes in his preface, it was taken for granted that Christianity was discovered to be fictitious; and to the proof, first of religion itself, then of Christianity, the bishop contributed the Analogy. The absolute proof had been given before by others; the relative proof the bishop here gives by taking the "constitution and course of nature"—the phenomena which appear to us—and, assuming what had already been proved (s.g., by Dr. Clarke in the book already mentioned), the existence of a Divine First Cause, showing that this constitution and course is what might naturally be looked for: that it is in strict "analogy" with both natural and revealed religion; thus setting forth the true province of philosophy, and the true relations between it and faith. The sermons, first published in 1726, are rather dissertations than what is now understood by sermons; they are fifteen preached at the Rolls and six in other places; in some of them the germ of the Analogy may be traced, while others are aimed against the selfish and immoral system of Thomas Hobbes, by showing that the true nature of man is inclined to virtue, and not to vice, and so leads us up to God Himself.

Buxtorf, JOHN [A.D. 1664—1629].—The head of a family which for more than a century was celebrated in Hebrew literature. Buxtorf was born at Camen, in Westphalia, of Protestant parents, his father being the minister of the parish. He studied first at Marburg and Herborn, and afterwards at Basle and Geneva, under Gryneus and Theodore Beza. After travelling about for some time, he fixed himself at Basle, where for thirty-eight years he filled the chair of Hebrew Literature, and where he died. His works are numerous, including a Hebrew and Chaldaic Lexicon, a Concordance, and a Hebrew Bible in 4 vols. His son and grandson were also eminent Hebraists.

Baronius, or Barozaki [A.D. 1567—1637].—A learned Pole of the Dominican Order, born at Prosovitze. He became Prior of the Dominicans at Cracow, and finally settled at Rome, where he was employed on a continuation of the Annals of Baronius, of which he completed nine volumes (xiii.—xxi.).

Cabbala.—The secret oral tradition respecting the mystical sense of the Pentateuch, so called because it was reputed among the Jewish doctors that it was "received" [Heb. Kabbal, to receive] by Moses from God, by Joshua from Moses, and by the seventy Elders from Joshua. But it really originated in Babylon during the Captivity, and was collected and put into writing about A.D. 125 by Simon ben Jochai. It professes to give a mystical meaning to every word and every letter of the Law; and its peculiar system of assigning mystical numbers to letters and words was, it can hardly be doubted, copied by early Christian writers.

Cacangelics.—A polemical term, invented by bitter Roman controversialists of the Reformation age in opposition to "Evangelics," and signifying "messengers of evil."

Cadock, St. [A.D. 550], was nephew to Brecon, King of Brecknockshire, and founder and first abbot of Llanccarven, in Glamorgan-shire.

Cædmon.—The author of the first Christian English poem was a native of Northumbria. Cædmon was a servant in one of the Yorkshire abbeys, in the seventh century. The story goes that he had shown no inclination at all to verse-making until one night, when, sleeping in a stable, he had a wonderful dream. He was ordered to sing a song, and when he said he knew none, he was told to "sing the beginning of created things." From that time he devoted his whole time to his art. His chief work, written about 670, was a paraphrase of parts of the Bible, the parts chosen by him being the Creation of the World, the chief points in the history of the Children of Israel, the life of Daniel, and the whole of the Gospels. Bede says of him: "Others after him tried to make religious poems, but none could vie with him, for he did not learn the art of poetry from men, nor of men, but from God," and this was the common idea of his contemporaries. He died somewhere at the end of the seventh century, but the exact date is not known.

Cæremoniarius.—The clergyman or layman in the Roman church who is appointed expressly to regulate the ceremonies of solemn services. Such a skilled officer is also recognised as necessary in the case of such services as Coronations, State funerals, &c., and on many other occasions for the purpose of keeping ritual order and ritual propriety, instead of allowing things to take their chance.

Cæleon.—This name, meaning the "Fort or Town of the Legion," was given by the Romans to Chester, upon the border of North Wales, and to the place in South Wales which is still called Cæleon-upon-Usk, and which was called Urbs Legionis by the Latin writers of the Middle Ages. It was the place where the early British martyrs, Aaron and Julius, suffered [AARON, ST.], and of which Adelfius, one of the three British bishops who attended the Council of Arles in A.D. 314, is thought by some to have been bishop. [ADELFIVS.] Cæleon was a metro-political province of the ancient British Church. Eleven occupiers of the see are named by Bishop Stubbs, who remarks that while there is probably some truth in the list, there is more that is fabrication.

Cæsarius of Arles [A.D. 468—542].—One of the greatest of early French bishops. He was born at Châlons, and spent a portion of his early life in the monastery of Lerins. In consequence of ill-health he removed to Arles, and having in A.D. 502 been consecrated to that see, he remained there for the rest of his life. He presided at several Councils, and was much mixed up with the Pelagian controversy, in which he followed the opinions of St. Augustine on Grace and Free Will.

Caianites. [GALANITÆ.]

Cainites.—A perverse sect of heretics of the second century, or the latter half of the first, who adopted Cain, Esau, the Sodomites, Korah, and Judas Iscariot as objects of veneration.

Cajetan [A.D. 1469—1534].—Surnamed from the Latin name of Gaëta, his birthplace. He was made a cardinal by Leo X., who also made him his legate in Germany, the principal object of his mission being to bring back Luther to the obedience of the Holy See before his separation was finally completed. In 1519 he was appointed to the see of Gaëta. He died at Rome. His principal work was a Commentary on the Bible in five folio volumes.

Calamus.—A "reed" or tube, made of gold or silver, through which the contents of the chalice were drawn into the mouth. The custom of using such a tube was a step on the way to the withdrawal of the cup from the laity, its use being alleged to be necessary to provide against spilling the consecrated wine through want of care on the part of lay communicants.

Calamy, EDMUND [A.D. 1600—1666], was born in London. He took his B.A. degree at Cambridge in 1619, being a member of Pembroke Hall. In 1626 he was made a lecturer at Bury St. Edmunds, where he continued until the publication of Bishop Wren's articles compelled him to give up his office and leave the diocese. He then received the valuable living of Rochford, in Essex, but was obliged by frequent fits of ague to relinquish it, whereupon he openly renounced the Church, and declared himself a Presbyterian. In 1639 he was made lecturer of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, in London, which office he filled for twenty years. He joined with four others in printing a pamphlet, which they published under the pseudonym of Smectymnus, this strange word being made up of the initials of their several names, Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, William Spur- stow. This book was written as a reply to Bishop Hall's Divine Right of Episcopacy; and it may be doubted whether anything which has ever issued from the press of the religious world has surpassed this work in severity of language. In 1641 Calamy was appointed one of the well-known Assembly of Divines. His views became more moderate when the Independents supplanted the Presbyterians; and he was one of the Presbyterians who remonstrated against the execution of King Charles. At the Restoration Charles II. made him one of his chaplains, and offered him the see of Lichfield and Coventry, which he refused. When the Act of Uniformity was passed, he resigned his preferment, and refused, like many others, to attend the church in which he had so long officiated. Calamy died Oct. 29th, 1666, of a broken heart, occasioned by the sight of the misery caused by the Fire of London.

Calamy, EDMUND [A.D. 1671—1732].—Grandson of the last, a Presbyterian minister, chiefly known as having edited Baxter's Life and Times, which publication gave rise to a dispute between Calamy and Bishop Hoadly.

Calderwood, DAVID [A.D. 1575—1651].—A Presbyterian minister, who, on James VI. visiting Scotland in 1617, presented to him a protest against the establishment of Episcopacy. For this he was summoned before the High Commission at St. Andrew's, but refusing to submit, he was sent to prison, and only released on promising to leave the country. He retired to Holland in 1619, and there wrote his Altare Damascenum, or the Pattern of the English Hierarchy and Church obtruded on the Church in Scotland. On the death of James VI., in 1625, he returned to Scotland, and in 1638 became minister of Pencaitland, in East Lothian. In 1643 he was elected one of the committee for drawing up the Directory for Public Worship in Scotland. But his great work was his History of the Kirk of Scotland, from the Reformation to the death of James VI.; it was not published during his lifetime, but the MS. was preserved in the British Museum, and the Wodrow Society printed and published it between the years 1842 and 1845.

Calendar.—An ecclesiastical almanack, indicating the special days and seasons observed by the Church in general, or by a particular Church. It is obvious that such a guide must have suggested itself wherever the art of writing and the religious distinction of days was in use. Something in the form of a written calendar long in use is indicated about 250 years before Christ by the Alexandrian Jew known as Jesus, the son of Sirach: "Why doth one day excel another whereas all the light of every day in the year is of the sun? By the knowledge of the Lord they were distinguished: and He altered seasons and feasts. Some of them hath He made high days and hallowed them, and some of them hath He made ordinary days" [Ecclesi. xxxiii. 7-9]. According to the theory generally accepted in the Christian Church, Sunday is hallowed by our Lord's Resurrection, which took place on that day, and is a sufficient justification for substituting it for the last day of the week as the sacred day of the seven.

The Calendar may be defined as a guide to and a record of that system of "seasons and feasts" which our Lord has "altered" from their original institution by His work, and of those "high days" which He has "hallowed" by His sufferings or His triumphs. The name of the Calendar is taken from the Latin word, Calendarium, which was a list of the days of the year divided into months, the first days of the month being designated "Calends," so named because the priest called the people to notice that it was new moon.

An ecclesiastical calendar may be so constructed as to indicate all the holy days, "moveable" or "immoveable," in a particular year, in which case it will serve as a guide for that year alone, or it may be so constructed as to show the "immoveable" festivals only, as is that of the Prayer Book. In the latter case it is supplemented by "Tables" for finding Easter Day and the other moveable holy days; and from the two together a calendar for the whole of any year during a long period may be made. Probably Calendars were practically constructed in the first instance by taking or making an ordinary Calendarium, and writing the names of the special Church days against the days of the year already written. Thus a monthly table would result, which would comprise, first, a list of days under their usual number and designation, secondly a list of the holy days or days of Church observance, including Sundays, such fasts and principal festivals as had then come into use, and the gradually lengthening list of martyrs and other holy persons who were commemorated in Divine service.

Christian calendars exist of as early a date as the fourth or fifth centuries, but the earliest known one of the Church of England is attributed to the Venerable Bede, who died in A.D. 735. The original manuscript is in an ancient copy of Bede's works preserved at Fleury, and hence it was called by Martene, who first printed it [Vet. Script. vi. 635], Calendarium Floriacense. Later mediæval calendars exist in great abundance and in considerable variety, a copy being found in almost every public Service Book or private Book of Hours that has been preserved. In all these the list of principal saints is invariable, but there is considerable variety among the minor saints—names occurring in the north, for example, which do not occur in the south, and local names in the calendars of monasteries.

When, at the Reformation period, an endeavour was made to secure as much uniformity as possible in all matters connected with religious observances, the Anglican Calendar was much simplified, and was finally settled in the year 1562 in the form with which we are familiar in the Prayer Book. The saints commemorated may be divided into four classes, namely:—The Apostles and other holy persons of the First Age, or specially connected with our Lord; Martyrs in the age of persecution; Martyrs and other saints especially connected with England; and French and other saints not included in either of the preceding classes.

Notices of these will be found under their respective names. They are further divided into "red letter" and "black letter" saints. The former are those for whose days a special collect, &c., is provided, and so called because in Rubricated Prayer Books they are printed in red. When only one ink is used, they are distinguished by difference of type. It is not always possible to state on what principle the compilers of the English Calendar made their selection of names. In many cases, probably, it was the recurrence of secular anniversaries which had become associated with certain days. In others, English and French martyrs seem to have been specially favoured.

Calendar Brethren.—A fraternity, embracing both sexes, which arose in Germany in the thirteenth century, and spread over parts of France and Hungary. Its chief objects were the care of its sick members, the burial of the dead, and the providing masses for their souls. It took its name from the custom of meeting on the Kalends, or first day of each month; this meeting was usually closed by a meal, but after a time it became abused as an occasion of riotous living, and the Reformation broke up the fraternity.

Calixtines.—A section of the Bohemian Church by whom great resistance was offered to the withdrawal of the cup, chalice, or calix (hence their name) from the laity. As they were the advocates of continuing to administer in each kind [Lat. Sub utraque specie], they also received the controversial name of UTHAQUISTS. [BOHEMIA.]

Calixtus, or Callistus, St. [A.D. 223].—The fifteenth of the Bishops of Rome, who succeeded Zephyrinus in A.D. 211, occupied the Papal throne for five years, and then suffered martyrdom by being drowned in a well. His memory was greatly venerated for many ages, but in some works of a contemporary writer, Hippolytus, which have been discovered within the last few years, both Calixtus and Zephyrinus are accused, apparently with some reason, of having given way to the heresy of the PATRIPASSIANS, which led on to that of Sabellius, in which the doctrine of the Trinity was transmuted into a form of Unitarianism. The name of

St. Calixtus has always been associated with one of those great cemeteries of martyrs, the Catacombs, in which nearly 200,000 of the early Christians are said to have been laid.

Calixtus, GEORGE [A.D. 1586—1656].—A noted German divine of the sixteenth century, who was Professor of Divinity at Helmstadt for forty-two years. He was chiefly remarkable as the head of the school of SYNCRETISTS, by whom an earnest endeavour was made to put an end to the divisions caused by the Reformation.

Call.—A term used to express that spiritual inclination to an office of the Christian ministry which is otherwise known by the theological word VOCATION.

Calmet, AUGUSTINE [A.D. 1672—1757].—A learned Biblical scholar, who contributed largely to the interpretation and historical illustration of the Holy Bible, and laid the foundation for most of the knowledge on the subject which was possessed by English divines down to recent years. Calmet was a Benedictine monk, and was engaged in the tuition of the younger monks; and his lectures to them formed the basis of a Commentary on the Old and New Testaments which he wrote in Latin, but which was translated into French, and published in twenty-three quarto volumes in 1707—16. This was followed by a History of the Old and New Testament, and by his famous Dictionary of the Bible in four folio volumes.

Caloyers.—Monks of the Greek Church. The name signifies "a good old age." Greek monks follow the rules of St. Basil, which are more rigorous and ascetic than those of the West. They are divided into Cenobites, i.e. dwellers together in one monastery, Anchорites, who live apart, but near monasteries, and resort to them on great days, and Hermits, solitary recluses. Their Hours are much the same as those in the West [CANONICAL HOURS], but they have four Fasts in the year, namely, Lent; the Fast of the Apostles, beginning the eighth day after Whit-Sunday and lasting three weeks; the Fast of the Assumption, lasting fourteen days; and Advent. Their largest monastery is that of Mount Sinai.

Calvary.—A name applied to an artificial rock or hill on which are placed images representing the Crucifixion and the groups surrounding it. Calvaries are very common on the Continent, as adjuncts to churches or religious houses. Thus, in the yard adjoining St. Paul's Church, at Antwerp, there is a high mound with a winding footpath, at various parts of which are groups of figures, representing the procession to Calvary, as well as the Death upon it, and beneath it is a tomb, in which the spectator beholds through bars the representation of the dead Christ.

The name is also given to the image group of the Virgin Mary and St. John near the Cross. On the Continent such Calvaries are very common by the wayside, placed as invitations to prayer.

Calvin, JOHN [1509—1564], was born at Noyon, in Picardy; the son of Gerard Calvin, or Chauvin, an official of the cathedral, who had risen from poor estate. Gerard Calvin's eldest son, Charles, became a priest at Noyon, but, as many priests of that day did, openly professed unbelief while he continued to hold his chaplaincy. He died in 1536, refusing the Sacraments. In 1523 John Calvin went to study classics in Paris, where he is said to have been so strict and severe in manner that his fellow-students dubbed him "The Accusative Case." He had been intended by his father for the Church, and not only received the tonsure, but was even made Curé of Pont l'Évêque, his grandfather's birth-place. But he was never ordained priest, and in 1529 was sent to Orleans College, where he applied himself to the Civil Law under Petrus de Stella, a study in which he afterwards made great progress at Bourges, under Andrew Alciat; here also he studied Greek, under Wolmar.

By this time he had become deeply moved by the doctrines of the German reformers. He says of himself: "Every time I looked down into myself my conscience was goaded with fierce stings. But God took pity on me and conquered my heart, and subdued it to docility by a sudden conversion." The result was that he began to teach, and though of shy and retiring habits, he was so full of zeal that he threw himself into his new work with ardour.

On the death of his father he returned to Paris, and there published Notes on Seneca de Clementia, which, though ostensibly a commentary on a heathen writer, was really a covert appeal to all readers on behalf of toleration in matters of faith. When the persecution in France began, Calvin moved from place to place for safety. At Poitiers he, for the first time, celebrated the Lord's Supper according to the Reformed manner, and the spot is still known as Calvin's Cave. In 1535 he went to Basle, where he studied the Scriptures in the original Hebrew. Here he wrote the first edition of his Institutes, and dedicated it to Francis I.

He then resolved to visit Italy, where the Reformation was making some progress, under the protection chiefly of Renée, Duchess of Ferrara, daughter of Louis XII. His letters to her, written subsequently, are among the most interesting of his writings. "I do not hesitate to affirm," says Guizot, "that the great Catholic bishop who, in the seventeenth century, directed the consciences of the mightiest men in France did not fulfil this difficult task with more Christian firmness, intelligent justice, and knowledge of the world, than Calvin displayed in his intercourse with the Duchess of Ferrara." She, on her side, was always loyal and generous to him; but her husband, Hercules d'Este, displayed so much hostility to the Protestants that he left Italy, and after wandering from place to place, reached Geneva in August, 1536, with no other expectation than that he would stay there for a day or two. But here he met with another reformer, as enthusiastic and fearless as himself: like himself also both in being a Frenchman and a refugee. His name was William Farel. He had succeeded in persuading the Genevans to "live according to the holy Evangelical law and the Word of God, which had been made known to them, forsaking all masses and other papal ceremonies and frauds, images and idols, and living together in unity and obedience to the law." But he lacked, and was conscious that he lacked, the power of organisation, and he saw that Calvin possessed it in a wonderful degree. With extreme difficulty, and after many refusals, he persuaded Calvin to become permanently resident in Geneva, and the latter began a course of lectures on Divinity on September 1, 1536. In a few months he had drawn up the formula which is memorable as the first Confession of Faith by the Reformed Church of France.

M. Guizot gives the following account of it:— 'It was simple in form, moderate in tone, and free from many of the theological controversies which afterwards arose among the Reformers; its principal object was to separate the Reformed faith clearly and entirely from the Church of Rome, its traditions, its priestcraft, and its worship; at the same time, it was entirely in harmony with the facts, dogmas, and precepts contained in the Scriptures, the authority of which it asserted as the fixed basis and law of the Christian faith. The Confession is divided into twenty-one articles. The starting-point of the first three is the law and word of God, 'as they are contained in the Holy Scriptures,' and at their close all the Ten Commandments are inserted according to the version given in the Book of Exodus. The ten subsequent articles enumerate and announce the fundamental doctrines of evangelical orthodoxy: namely, the natural depravity of man; the redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ; the necessity of faith in Christ for regeneration and salvation; and they end with the insertion of the whole of the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer; together with this previous declaration:— 'All that Jesus Christ did and suffered for our redemption, we believe truly and without doubt as it is stated in the creed which is recited in the Church.' The eight remaining articles treat of the Sacraments of the Church, which they reduce to two, Baptism and the Lord's Supper; they very briefly indicate the essential principles of ecclesiastical organisation, the duty of the pastor to his flock, of believers to the civil powers. 'By which we mean that every Christian is bound to pray to God for the prosperity of the rulers and governors of the country in which he lives, to obey the statutes and decrees which are not in opposition to the commandments of God, to strive to promote the public welfare, peace and profit, and to take no part in schemes which may provoke danger and dissension. At the same time, in the hands of the Church, and to be exercised by its authority, these articles formally establish the punishment of excommunication, which we hold to be a sacred and salutary weapon in the hands of believers, so that the wicked, by their evil conversation, may not corrupt the good and dishonour Christ. We hold that it is expedient, and according to the ordinance of God, that all open idolators, blasphemers, murderers, thieves, adulterers, and false witnesses, all seditious and quarrelsome persons, slanderers, pugilists, drunkards, and spendthrifts, if they do not amend their lives after they have been duly admonished, shall be cut off from communion with believers, until they have given satisfactory proof of repentance."

But the strain was greater than the Swiss could bear. They who had resisted the foreign dukes, and established their political independence, were determined also to be independent of moral laws. Calvin, they said, was a good expounder of Scripture, but had no right over their morals: he was only restoring papal tyranny, with himself for Pope. The malcontents were seconded by the partisans of the old religion, and in March, 1538, Calvin and Farel were expelled from the city, on the ground that that they had withheld the Communion from some who refused to accept their doctrinal views.

Calvin travelled about for four months, visiting the Reformed bodies in various parts, and then settled himself at Strasburg, where the reformers Bucer and Capito esteemed him highly; there he set up a French Church, became its first minister, and was likewise chosen Professor of Divinity. His affection for the Church of Geneva still continued, as was shown by the answer which he wrote to Cardinal Sadolet's Epistle to the Church of Geneva, inviting them to return to the ancient faith. The cardinal's letter was calm, temperate, and generous in tone. Calvin's answer was also courteous and respectful, but thoroughly uncompromising in his assertion of his own position and of the evils of Rome. It is said—but there is no proof forthcoming—that the two antagonists afterwards met, and were mutually pleased. But Calvin's letter was regarded as triumphing over the cardinal.

Two years later the divines of Strasburg desired him to assist at a Diet, which the Emperor had convened at Worms and Ratisbon, for settling the differences in religion; he complied with their request, and had a conference at that meeting with Melancthon. By this time the town of Geneva was very pressing for his return; at last he yielded to their importunity, and went thither in September, 1541. The first thing he did was to settle a form of discipline and a consistorial jurisdiction, with a power to inflict censures and canonical penances even to excommunication; this method was thought by many persons to be too rigorous and too nearly approaching to Roman tyranny; notwithstanding, the matter was carried, and this new canon legally passed by an assembly of all the people, November 20th, 1541, the clergy and laity pledging themselves to an unalterable conformity to it. Calvin made for himself a great many enemies by his inflexible severity in maintaining the rights and jurisdiction of his consistory, these rigours being sometimes the occasion of disturbances in the town.

His conduct towards Servetus has been justly condemned [SERVETUS], but it must be remembered that religious toleration was a virtue which men were only beginning to learn, and the condemnation of Servetus was approved even by the gentle Melancthon.

Calvin was a man of indefatigable industry and very considerable learning, had a good memory, and was a brilliant writer. His earnestness on behalf of his opinions has, perhaps, never been surpassed; even Maimbourg and Moreri allowed him to be a person of wisdom and learning, of a very regular and sober life, and so far from covetousness that he died worth only £50, including the value of his library; but they add that he was a melancholy and also irascible man, and that even his friends charged him with being satirical.

He had always been of feeble and delicate frame, and on the 27th of May, 1564, he died, in perfect calmness, exhorting all about him to cling to the Gospel which he had taught them, and to walk worthy of the Divine goodness. He was buried, according to his own request, in that portion of the burial-ground of Geneva allotted to the poor, and the precise spot is unmarked and unknown.

Calvin's whole works have been published in several editions. His Commentaries on the Scriptures are still regarded as of great value, from their critical power and spiritual insight. But his chief work is his Christian Institutes, the design of which was to exhibit a full view of the doctrines of the Reformers; and as no similar work had appeared before, it leaped at once into popularity. It went through several editions in his lifetime, has been translated into all the principal modern languages, and its effect upon the Christian world ever since has been so remarkable, as to entitle it to be looked upon as one of the very few books which have done something to change the world. Many lives of Calvin have been written; one of the best is M. Guizot's, St. Louis and Calvin.

Calvinists.—The school of religious thought which professes to be founded on the theology of CALVIN. The peculiar doctrines believed by them are held in combination with either the Episcopal, the Presbyterian, or the Independent theories of Church government, and are usually classified under five heads, called "The Five Points." They are (1) Particular Election, (2) Particular Redemption, (3) Moral Inability in a Fallen State, (4) Irresistible Grace, and (5) Final Perseverance. These may be more fully explained thus: (1) That God has chosen a certain number in Christ to everlasting glory of His free grace and love, without respect to His foresight of their faith and good works, or any conditions. That the rest of mankind He has been pleased to pass by and leave for destruction. (2) That Christ Jesus, by His sufferings and death, made atonement for the elect only. (3) That mankind are totally depraved by the Fall, and unable to perform any good action; and by the imputation of Adam's sin, as well as by the guilt of an actual corrupted nature, they are obnoxious to eternal damnation and all miseries. (4) That God doth effectually call by His Word and Spirit those whom He hath been pleased to elect to life, so that they cannot but yield to His grace. (5) That such as be so called cannot finally fall from that state of grace.

Calvinistic Methodists.—The followers of George Whitfield. [METHODISTS.]

Camaldolites.—A reformed congregation of Benedictine monks, founded by St. Romuald, a noble of Ravenna, in the eleventh century. St. Romuald opened a monastery for his friends and followers at Camaldoli, near Arezzo, about thirty miles east of Florence, and after the death of their founder they took their name from this monastery, instead of being called Romualdines, as they had been during his lifetime. There are two divisions of the Camaldolites; viz., monks who live in community like other monks, and hermits who live in solitude. The rule of the order in both divisions is a very austere one. There are also Camaldolese Nuns, who assume the name of "Nuns of Our Lady of Pity."

Cambridge, UNIVERSITY OF.—This and the other more ancient Universities have long been so merged, for very many practical purposes, in their colleges that their distinct existence is popularly lost sight of. [UNIVERSITIES.] Of late years their independent origin has been brought into view by the admission at Cambridge and Oxford of "non-collegiate students." The University existed before the colleges, and from it the colleges took their rise. [COLLEGIATE SYSTEM.]

These seventeen colleges, in which all members of the University of Cambridge were domiciled before the change just referred to, were founded at various periods ranging from the thirteenth to the nineteenth centuries, but they represent in the aggregate an educational institution which has existed in the same locality from a much more ancient date than the foundation of any existing college.

Of the University of Cambridge the origin is not very clearly defined. We put aside Dr. Caius' fable of its foundation in a.c. 375 by a Spanish prince named Cantaber, who brought professors and lecturers from Athens (De Antig. Cantab. Acad., 1568), and come to history. The Venerable Bede records that when Sigebert succeeded to the throne of East Anglia, in the year 631, being the first Christian king of that part of England, he set up a "school," for the instruction of youth in literature, similar to institutions which he had seen in France, where he had spent most of his previous life; and that Bishop Felix, who came to him from Kent, furnished him with masters and teachers. There is some foundation for this statement in the fact that Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, with the assistance of Benedict Biscop, established a system of instruction and examination nearly analogous to the University system, which was continued by Aldhelm, one of his successors. It is by no means improbable that this "school" of Sigebert's was set up in Grantabridge as the most important town in East Anglia.

When East Anglia was recovered from its Danish conquerors in the ninth century, Cambridge again became a great educational town, many students going to reside there, and halls being built where they could receive instruction from learned men. These "tutors" and "professors" were almost certainly in the first instance members of the monasteries which abounded in and around the town of Cambridge. It was in the nature of things also that, in connection with such lecture halls, the domestic life of the students should be maintained to some extent in the same form as it was in the colleges of later date.

Subsequent notices are given by Fuller in his History of the University, but not from contemporary writers, as, for instance, that King Henry I. obtained his surname of Beaucerk from the learning which he imbibed at Cambridge; but the real foundation of the University in anything approaching to its later shape can hardly be placed earlier than 1109, when (in old Fuller's quaint and charming translation from Peter of Blois) "Jofred, abbot of Crowland, sent over to his manour of Cotenham, nigh Cambria, Gislebert, his fellow-monk and professour of Divinity, with three other monks, who, following him into England, being thoroughly furnished with Philosophical Theorems and other primitive sciences, repaired daily to Cambridge; and having hired a certain publique Barne made open profession of their sciences, and in short space of time drew together a great company of scholars."

At first the students must have lodged and boarded with the townsmen, but the gradual increase in the number and importance of the body led to the establishment, first of hostels or halls for common life, of which Fuller gives a list of thirty-four (the last, he says, existed till 1540); and then of regularly incorporated colleges, which in some cases grew out of such of these hostels as received from any source an endowment.

In 1381 the charters and records of the University were burned in the course of a dispute between its members and the townsmen. There are, however, evident traces of its corporate condition as a University at a much earlier date, for its Chancellor, Masters, and some of its privileges are mentioned in royal letters of Henry III. as early as 1231, and the earliest existing charter, preserved among the public records, is dated 45 Hen. III., i.e., about thirty years later. The present condition of the University, as a legal body, was given by the Act 13 Eliz., c. 29, and at the same time a body of statutes was passed which regulated the University till 1558; a new body then replaced them, which in its turn is now in the act of yielding to a third; of these last some received the Royal approval in Council 27th February, 1882, and others still await it.

THE COLLEGES.

St. Peter's College (usually called Peter-house).—Founded by Hugh de Balsham, subprior and afterwards Bishop of Ely, in 1257.

Clare College.—Founder, Richard de Badow, 1326. Re-founded in 1342 by Elizabeth, sister of the Earl of Clare.

Pembroke College, 1343.—Founder, Mary, widow of Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke.

Gonville and Caius.—Originally Gonville Hall, founded 1347 by Edmund Gonville. Enlarged and almost re-founded in 1558 by Dr. Caius, physician to Queen Mary.

Trinity Hall.—Founded by John Crandars, prior of Ely, enlarged in 1345 by the Bishop of Norwich.

Corpus Christi College.—Founded by two religious guilds about 1350. Frequently called Benet College, from its close proximity to the church of St. Benedict.

King's College.—Founded by Henry VI. in conjunction with Eton, in imitation of Wykeham's foundations of Winchester and New College, Oxford.

Queens' College.—Founded by Margaret of Anjou and Elizabeth Woodville.

St. Catherine's College.—Founded in 1473 by the Provost of Keys.

Jesus College.—Originally a Benedictine nunnery founded in 1133 by Malcolm IV., King of Scotland. Converted into a college by Bishop Alerch, tutor of Edward V.

Christ's College.—Founded by Bishop Bingham, 1442; re-founded by Margaret, mother of Henry VII.

St. John's College.—Originally a hospital of St. John the Evangelist, a house of Canons Regular, restored and re-founded by Bishop Fisher in 1515.

Magdalene College.—Originally a Benedictine priory. Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, began the erection of a college, but he being beheaded for high treason, the unfinished college was given to Lord Audley, who finished it.

Trinity College.—The largest in the world, formed by the union of two colleges and several hostels, which was done in 1546.

Emmanuel College.—Founded on the site of a Dominican convent by Sir Walter Mildmay, in 1584.

Sidney Sussex College.—Originally a Franciscan monastery, turned into a college by Frances, aunt of the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney, and widow of Thomas Ratcliffe, Earl of Sussex, 1589.

Downing College.—Founded in 1801, in accordance with the will of Sir George Downing.

Camendish College.—Founded in 1873 to enable students to obtain education with the greatest possible economy.

Selwyn College.—Founded in 1882 in memory of Bishop Selwyn.

A detailed account of each College, and varied information on University life, will be found in Dickens's Dictionary of Cambridge.

Cameronians.—A body of Scotch Presbyterians. After the COVENANTERS had been defeated by the Duke of Monmouth at Bothwell Bridge on June 22nd, 1679, the war or rebellion was still continued under the leadership of Richard Cameron and Donald Cargill, who issued a "Declaration" at Sanquhar on June 22nd, 1680, openly proclaiming war against the King of England and Scotland and all his adherents; repudiating monarchy also as well as prelacy, and avowing their intention of setting up some other form of government. Cameron was killed in a skirmish a month later, and Cargill, after going through the form of excommunicating the king, was apprehended and executed at Edinburgh, on July 27th, 1681. After the Revolution of 1688 the three then remaining ministers of the Cameronians were received as ministers of the Established Kirk; but the body of the sect refused to receive the ministers who were thus reconciled to the Establishment, and preferred remaining without a minister until the beginning of the eighteenth century, when some ministers who had been expelled from the kirk for refusing to take the oath of allegiance were accepted as the leaders of the sect. In 1743 Alexander Macmillan, one of these ministers, established the Reformed Presbytery. Under this new name the Cameronians still exist, and are, perhaps, the only true representatives of the Covenanters among Scottish Presbyterians. It is only since the Volunteer movement began that any members of the sect have been allowed to take the oath of allegiance without suspension and expulsion from it; and in their dislike to "prelacy" they are not surpassed by any sect whatever. There are thirty or forty congregations of Cameronians or Reformed Presbyterians in the Hebrides, and some are also found in Ireland and America.

Cameronites.—A school of French Protestants, taking their name from John Cameron [A.D. 1580—1625], a man of some learning, born at Glasgow, but established as a teacher of theology among the Protestants at Sedan, Saumur, and Montauban. His special point was the reconciliation of Calvinistic and Arminian doctrine respecting the Divine decrees of mankind to salvation or damnation. His attempt was not successful, but it was followed up by Moses Amyraut, from whom the Amyraldists took their name.

Camisards.—A large party among the French Protestants of Languedoc in the beginning of the eighteenth century, who rose against the tyranny and cruelty exercised by Louis XIV. and his government after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (by which toleration, had for a time been shown to Protestants) in 1685. The name is supposed to be derived from the "camise," or white blouse in which they were accustomed to array themselves when making their night-attacks; but among themselves they were known as "the Children of God." They were cruelly persecuted, and finally dispersed with horrible barbarities. The last of their captains, Cavalier, escaped from France, entered the English service, became Governor of Jersey, and died in 1740.

Campanile.—The detached bell-tower of a church. In Italy there are very fine and lofty examples of such bell-towers, both round and square: that of Florence, 267 feet high and 45 feet square, was designed by the famous Giotto; the tower of Avinelli at Bologna is 320 feet high and two yards out of the perpendicular; that of Pisa is 150 feet high and four yards out of the perpendicular; that of Cremona is 395 feet high.

Campaniles are not unknown in connection with English churches. There was one to old St. Paul's, and a fine one until the last generation opposite the south porch of Salisbury Cathedral, since the wanton destruction of which the peal of bells has had no home. There are also such detached towers at Elstow, near Bedford; at Ledbury and Pembridge, in Herefordshire; and at Berkeley, in Gloucestershire. There are traditions that they were the work of guilds of masons who were thrown out of employment by the cessation of church building at the Reformation.

Campbell, JOHN M'LEOD, a Scottish divine of great spiritual influence, born at Kilninoe, in Argyllshire, in 1800, of which parish his father was minister. After being a student of both Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities, he became minister of Row, in Dumbartonshire, in 1825; but having with great earnestness preached that Christ died for all, otherwise "there is no sufficient warrant for calling upon men to believe in God's love to them," he was prosecuted for heresy and deposed by the Assembly in 1831. The sermons preached to his flock were published in two 12mo volumes the same year. In 1833 he began an independent ministry in Glasgow, and held it till he was compelled by failing health to resign it in 1869. The most important of his works is his treatise on the Atonement, in which he maintains that our Lord's whole work from beginning to end, and not merely the vicarious act of satisfaction for sin by His death, is an atonement—a making of fallen man at-one with God. This work has had a very marked influence on the controversies which have gathered round this important subject. In 1868 the University of Glasgow made its author a D.D. All who knew him declared that his life was one of singular holiness. Dr. Norman Macleod declared that his character was that of the most perfect Christian he had ever known. He died in 1872.

Campbellites, AMERICAN.—A sect of American Baptists founded by an Irish Presbyterian preacher, named Thomas Campbell, early in the nineteenth century. He started his sect on the principle of unsectarianism, but gained few followers. Divisions quickly arose, and he finally settled down by reconstructing the sect on Congregational principles as to church government, with baptism by immersion as its distinctive point of practice. The Campbellites, who also call themselves "Disciples of Christ," or simply "Disciples," now number many congregations in the United States, and a few also are found in England.

Campeggio, CARDINAL LORENZO [A.D. 1474—1539].—This cardinal was brought into close connection with England. He was sent as Papal Nuncio to England to raise money through Henry VIII. for a war with the Turks; on which occasion the king appointed him to the Bishopric of Salisbury, which see he occupied from 1524 until he was deprived of it by the same king in 1535. Campeggio was sent to England again as ambassador to sit, with Wolsey, as representative of the Pope in the question of the divorce between Henry VIII. and Queen Katherine of Arragon. After his failure, Campeggio took no further part in public affairs.

Campion, EDMUND [1540—1581], was educated at Oxford, where he was Proctor, and afterwards took deacon's orders in the Established Church. Going to Douai, he joined the Romish communion and became a Jesuit at Rome in 1573. In 1580 he was sent by Pope Gregory XIII. on a mission to England, and in the following year was indicted for high treason for adhering to the Bishop of Rome, Queen Elizabeth's enemy, and for raising forces in his interest. He was condemned to death, and executed at Tyburn, persisting obstinately to the last in defending the Pope's authority against that of the Queen. He had some time before, in a written paper, challenged the English clergy to a disputation. He was an amiable and highly-cultured man.

Camp Meetings.—Open-air meetings for prayer and preaching, held chiefly by the various sects of Methodists. As some persons attend them from distant places, especially in America, such meetings often assume the form of actual encampments, and hence their name. They were, however, often held in Scotland, long before the time of the Methodists, by the Covenanters.

Canada. [COLONIAL CHURCH.]

Cancelli.—The name in the early Church for the "screens," as we now call them, which enclose the altar-space from the choir, aisles and the nave in any large church. [CHANCEL.]

Candidate, Lat. candidatus, white-robed. —It was a Roman custom for a man who sought any public office to be clad in a white garment of a special character, called the toga candida.

In the Christian Church, candidates for baptism used to receive a white vesture from the priest when admitted into the Church. Confirmation then, as a rule, immediately followed baptism; consequently, the white vesture, called the chrisome, would be worn by the candidate for that rite. Hence, it has been a very general custom down to our own time, for female candidates for confirmation to be clothed in white. The white garment typifies the purity of heart and intention required from one seeking any responsible office, ecclesiastical or secular, or dedicating himself to the service of God.

In the case of candidates for baptism, when adults, the Rubric directs that "timely notice shall be given to the Bishop, or whom he shall appoint for that purpose, a week before at least, by the parents or some other discreet persons, that so due care may be taken for their examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, and that they may be exhorted to prepare themselves with prayer and fasting for the receiving of this Holy Sacrament."

Candidates for Confirmation, if they have been baptised as infants, are to be brought by their godfathers and godmothers

"to the Bishop to be confirmed by him, as soon as they can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments in the vulgar tongue, and be further instructed in the Church Catechism set forth for that purpose." If baptised as adults, the Rubric says that "it is expedient that every person thus baptised should be confirmed by the Bishop as soon after his baptism as conveniently may be, that so he may be admitted to the Holy Communion."

It rests with the curate of every parish to bring or send in writing, with his name subscribed thereunto, the names of all such persons within his parish as he shall think fit to be presented to the Bishop to be confirmed. (Rubric at end of Catechism.)

Candidates for Holy Communion must be confirmed, or ready and desirous for confirmation. The curate has power to reject open and notorious evil livers, or those who have by word or deed caused the congregation to be justly offended, or those betwixt whom he perceives malice and hatred to reign. Candidates, moreover, are required "to examine themselves, whether they repent them truly of their former sins, stedfastly purposing to lead a new life, having a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ, with a thankful remembrance of His death, and be in charity with all men." (Church Catechism.)

Candidates for Holy Orders are required to be "apt and meet, for their learning and godly conversation, to exercise their ministry duly, to the honour of God, and the edifying of His Church." Each bishop exercises a discretion as to what amount of learning is "apt and meet." The standard varies in different dioceses; for full information, application should be made to the Bishop before whom the candidate proposes to present himself. Persons cannot be admitted to the Diaconate until they are three and-twenty years old; and to the Priesthood until they are "four-and-twenty years complete" (Canon 34). Each candidate must also exhibit letters-testimonial of good life and conversation from three beneficed clergymen who have known his life and behaviour for three years next before. (Canon 34.)

Candlemas Day (Feb. 2).—A name sometimes given to the festival of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, the name being derived from the fact that lighted candles were borne about in processions and placed in churches in memory of Him who "came to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of His people Israel." Candle-carrying on this day remained customary in England till its abolition by an order in Council in the second year of King Edward VI. [PURIFICATION, FEAST OF.]

Candles, USE OF.—A candle (from candeo, "I burn") was originally made of wax. When it grew thinner in shape towards the end, it was a "taper." It is a matter of dispute whether the "many lights" of which we are told at the breaking of bread at Treas (Acts xx. 8) was symbolical or not. "There is no ground," says Dean Plumptre, "for assuming that the lamps at this early period had any distinctive ritual or symbolic character, though it would be a natural expression of respect that two or more should be placed in front of the Apostle, or other presiding elder at such a meeting, beside the loaf which was to be broken and the cup which was to be blest." (Bishop Elliott's Commentary on the Bible,—"Acts of the Apostles.")

The same writer inclines to the belief that the "many lights" are emphasised by way of answer to the calumny propagated by the enemies of the faith that the meetings were held in darkness for indulgence in shameful sins. The advocates of the ceremonial use of lights dwell on the fact that the early Christians were familiar with the symbolical meaning of the candlesticks in the Temple service, and that this has been continued from the beginning. There is no proof, however, of the use before the fourth century; it is mentioned both by Athanasius and Jerome. In the Roman Catholic Church it is a strict rule that wax candles must always be alight during the Mass; even a village priest cannot say Mass without two candles. One must always be used also when the Communion is brought to the sick or when Extreme Unction is given. The two candles are to symbolise the two natures of Christ, His Divinity and Manhood.

Candlish, ROBERT SMITH, was born in Scotland in 1807. He was educated at Glasgow, entering the University there in 1822. He then went as private tutor to Eton till 1831, when he was licensed as a preacher in the Established Church of Scotland. Three years later he was ordained to St. George's, Edinburgh, and soon became famous for his preaching. He joined Dr. Chalmers in the movement which afterwards led to the formation of the Free Church, and in 1839 moved in the General Assembly the suspension of the Strathbogie ministers [CHALMERS]. The same year the Prime Minister nominated him Professor of Biblical Criticism in Edinburgh, but the appointment was denounced by the Earl of Aberdeen in the House of Lords, and cancelled. He took a prominent part in organising the Free Church after the disruption in 1843, and in 1849 the General Assembly appointed him successor to Dr. Chalmers as Professor of Divinity to New College, Edinburgh, but he did not accept it. He remained at St. George's till 1861, when he succeeded Dr. Cunningham as Principal of New College. From that time till his death in 1872 he was the most prominent man in the General Assembly. His writings show great ability, though they have now little influence. The chief are Contribution to the Exposition of the Book of Exodus, An Examination of Maurice's Theological Essays, The Gospel of Forgiveness, Select Sermons, The Two Great Commandments, The Fatherhood of God.

Canistes.—An ancient sect of heretics mentioned by Theodoret and Clement of Alexandria. It is not known when or where their opinions were current, or what they were. Some think that the Cainites or Cainists are meant; others that they were so named from their shameful vices, just as it is said in the Revelation, "without are dogs" (Rev. xxii. 15); while, again, it has been thought that cynic or "Doggish" philosophers were the persons in view.

Canon.—This word is from the Greek, and signifies primarily a *can*e, or reed. Hence come two derivatives in our tongue of widely different meanings—"cannon," meaning etymologically a hollow tube (Cf. Milton's P. L., vi. 519), and canon, a straight rod used for making straight lines, or for measurement, and hence, by a natural metaphor, a rule in art, in criticism, or in morals. In Gal. vi. 10, "As many as walk by this rule" is in the Greek, "by this canon." So in 2 Cor. x. 13–16. In this sense canon is frequently used in classical Greek; e.g., Aristotle says that the good man is the canon and measure of truth. Chief epochs or eras in history were called "time-canon," and in music the monochord was the canon, as being the basis of all musical intervals. Consequently, in religious matters the word canon branched off into several meanings. Thus it was sometimes a name given to the creed, or to a roll or catalogue of the clergy, or of saints. It is also a name given to certain dignitaries of the Church, as well as to rules and laws in doctrine and discipline. These will be found under the various heads which follow.

Canon of Scripture.—The list of books received by the Church as the rule of faith and practice. These Scriptures are called in the Sixth Article of Religion, "The Canonical Books." The expression is found in Origen, and may mean either books which form the rule for faith, or books "admitted by the rule of the Church." Dr. Westcott gives strong reasons for believing that the latter was the sense originally intended.

The Canon of Scripture naturally falls into the two divisions of the Old and New Testaments.

(1) The former division the Church of England accepts from the Jews. The Canonical Scriptures of the Sixth Article are identical with those of the Hebrew Canon as at present received by them, and as testified to in the first century by Josephus. The collection of writings known by us as the Apocrypha, and read, according to the article just referred to, "for example of life and instruction in manners," but "not to establish any doctrine," is received in the Roman Catholic Church as not inferior to the other Scriptures. The ground for this acceptance is that these writings were received by the Hellenistic Jews among their standard religious literature, but rejected by the Jews of Palestine because of their hatred of the Greek language and literature; and that though there is, admittedly, not a single quotation from the Apocrypha in the New Testament, it is alluded to in Hebrews xi., and is quoted by the early Christian Fathers. But it is not denied that "among the Fathers of the fourth century there was serious doubt," and the doctrine expressed by the Church of England in Article VI. is based upon the opinion of Jerome, the greatest Biblical doctor of the early Church.

(2) The New Testament Canon rests first of all upon the fact that the Christian Church in its earliest days received the writings of the Apostles and Evangelists as the Scriptures of Truth. Thus St. Peter speaks of St. Paul's Epistles as Scriptures (2 Pet. iii. 16), and the Epistle of St. Barnabas quotes St. Matthew with the formula, "It is written." Justin Martyr, in the second century, speaks of the Gospels (which he calls "Memoirs") as being used in the congregation. [BIBLE.]

Canons Apostolical.—The ecclesiastical regulations known by this name were certainly not written by the Apostles. They were, in all probability, drawn up from time to time from the second century down to the sixth. There are eighty-five of these canons, the first fifty of which are of higher antiquity than the rest. The whole are accepted by the Greek Church; in the West only the former portion are held binding. "The greater number—seventy-six out of eighty-five—relate to the clergy, their ordination, the conditions of consecration, their official ministrations, orthodoxy, morality, and subordination; also to their temporalities, and to the relation of the diocese to the province." The criticism which the sixteenth century set on foot disproved absolutely their Apostolic origin, and further showed that some of them were unknown in the days of St. Jerome. Their value lies in the light which they throw on the practice and discipline of the early Church.

Canon Law.—The collection of ecclesiastical constitutions and rules, relating to faith and morals, for the government and regulation of the Church. Its regulations, as far as the whole body of it is concerned, are only held binding in the Roman Catholic Church, but many of the regulations have passed into the ecclesiastical system of the Church of England and other Protestant bodies. Its sources are manifold. First, of course, come rules and regulations gathered directly from Holy Scripture. Following these we have what are known as the Apostolical Canons. [See CANONS APOSTOLICAL.] To these came to be added the opinions of the great Fathers of the Church, the decrees of Councils, and the decretals and bulls of Popes. Of course laws proceeding from the Church could have no force, except ecclesiastically, until the empire became Christianised. The Council of Nice put forth certain canons respecting morals as well as doctrines, and as these were ratified and circulated under the sanction of the emperor, we may put this as the beginning of Canon Law. The history of the early codification of the various ecclesiastical enactments is obscure. A compilation was made by Dionysius Exiguus in the seventh century, and another is said to have been made by ISIDORE OF SEVILLE [q.v.], but the famous collection of doctrines bearing his name are now deservedly known as the FORGED DECRETALS [q.v.]. The first great collection, however, was that known as the Decretum of Gratian. It was begun by two bishops of Chartres, A.D. 1114, and completed by Gratian, a Benedictine monk (1150). It comprises ecclesiastical legislation from the time of Constantine to that of Pope Alexander III. About 1230 Raymond of Pennafort published his decretals, a collection of epistles written by popes, or by cardinals under their direction, to settle successive controversies concerning social and moral subjects. A supplement to this work was published by Pope Boniface VIII. in 1298, and to this was added a successor by Pope Clement V. in 1308. Later additions were made by Pope John XXII., in a collection called Extravagants, i.e., documents travelling beyond the limits of previous decrees. A celebrated lawyer of Bologna, of the fourteenth century, named Andreas, wrote a Commentary on the various decretals, and called it Novella, after his daughter, who was a brilliant scholar, and had given him much assistance. The books named form together the Corpus Juris Canonici, or "Body of the Canon Law." But though this work gives law to Roman Catholic Christendom, it has undergone much modification from time to time, especially by the Concordats, that is, treaties entered into by the Pope with those sovereigns and governments whose municipal system does not admit of the application of pure and simple canon law.

In our own country Canon Law was never accepted in its entirety, but before the Reformation a modified form of it stood on an equal footing with civil law, and they were studied together. English Canon Law thus comprised two divisions—Legative Constitutions, i.e., ecclesiastical enactments made in national synods at the time of the infancy of the House of Commons, and Provincial, the decrees of synods held under fourteen archbishops of Canterbury, from Langton to Chichele. When the Reformation began it was enacted that a review of the Canon Law should be made, and that until this was done all ecclesiastical enactments which did not interfere with the law of the land should be in force. This review was begun, but has never been completed; and hence has arisen much of the confusion that hangs round the ecclesiastical law of England.

Canon of a cathedral, or other large church, an ecclesiastical dignitary so called because he was one of the list of ecclesiastics connected with that church. With the establishment of monasticism it came to pass that those clergy who lived on a cathedral foundation were sustained by the proceeds of the undivided cathedral property, and bound to say Divine service in the choir with the same regularity as monks. This, however, was subject to modification. Those canons who thus followed monastic rules and lived under a common roof were known as Canons Regular, and those who went abroad in the world and performed spiritual offices in the same manner as prebendaries and canons of cathedrals of the present day, were called Secular Canons, because they moved in seculo (in this world), and took upon them, which the Regulars did not, the cure of souls. In their case the property of the cathedral was divided into portions, one for each canon, who was known as a prebend, the word being derived from prebenda, the rations served out by the Roman State. The Canons Secular of cathedrals were accustomed to meet in a united body, as well as the Regulars. This united body was known as the CHAPTER [q.v.]. At the Reformation those cathedrals which were served by Canons Regular, i.e., which had a monastery attached to them, had to be placed on a new foundation, as the monasteries were dissolved. [CATHEDRAL.] This, of course, greatly altered the position of canons. They were allowed to marry, and became heads of families. Under the nepotism which so widely prevailed in the eighteenth century, the canonries became sinecures, in which bishops too frequently placed their sons, bestowing upon them parochial preferment at the same time. An old gentleman who died a few years ago was heard to complain bitterly that, having to reside by law three months at one canonry, three at another (for his father had successively held two sees), three at living No. 1 and three at living No. 2, he found it extremely hard to get any holiday. The Pluralities Act put an end to such difficulties as his. Recent ecclesiastical legislation (c. g. 3 & 4 Vict., cap. 113) has made much alteration with respect to cathedral canonries. Many were suppressed, and the incomes handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commission. At Oxford five of the six canonries are attached to the Professorships of Divinity (2), Hebrew, Pastoral Theology, Ecclesiastical History; the sixth is joined to the Archdeaconry of Oxford. At Ely two canonries are joined to the Professorships of Greek and Hebrew at Cambridge. It has been warmly urged by many Church reformers that all canonries ought to be connected with religious instruction or learning, instead of being the sinecures which some of them are. Of late years it cannot be denied that among our cathedral canons have been and still are some of the brightest lights of the Church of England.

CANONS, HONORARY.—Whilst the changes which we have just described were in hand, a suggestion was made that it would be most desirable to institute a body of Honorary Canons, as recognition of ministerial diligence or other services rendered to the Church. The Rev. W. Palmer, in his "Narrative of Events," &c. (1883), thus describes this movement:—"The Government, in co-operation with the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Howley) and the Episcopate, brought forward the Reform Bill for the Church of England, providing for Church extension on the principle of taking from benefices of deans, chapters, and dignitaries, upon vacancy, funds which had long been treated as sinecure, and applying these funds to relieve the spiritual wants of the millions of Churchmen who had grown up suddenly in the manufacturing districts of the country, and were destitute of teachers. It was a gigantic plan of Church extension. Looking at the substance and essence of religion in preference to its adjuncts, it seemed impossible to avoid thankfulness for a plan which, for the first time, made provision, however inadequately, for the prodigious spiritual destitution of the English people; for their preservation in Christianity and all that it involves.

"But in so vast a design it was unavoidable that many interests, ideas, and principles should be affected. It was easy to overlook the greater good which was the ultimate end, in the contemplation of minor but more immediate inconveniences. Amongst the strongest pleas adduced at the time against the abolition of sinecures, or offices which had long been practically sinecure, was the argument that by the suppression or suspension of such offices, the provision for a learned clergy expending their time in the composition of works of theology would be fatally impaired. Dr. Pusey had published a work on cathedral institutions, in which he strongly resisted the suppression of cathedral offices, which he wished to make effective. Mr. Manning was eloquent in the same cause. They did not consider that in fact those offices never had been ordinarily given to learned men, and that they had from time immemorial been sinecure.

"The archbishop and prelates were hard pressed by arguments in Parliament against the ruin of a provision for a learned clergy, and still more of the power of rewarding distinguished clergy by their appointment to poor but dignified offices, such as those of prebendaries and dignitaries in cathedrals.

"Had this opposition succeeded, the funds for Church extension would have been vastly reduced, for these benefices, though their estates were usually let at nominal rents, returned upon renewal of leases, at the fall of lives, great sums of money as renewal fines. Sometimes a fine amounting to £20,000 or £30,000 would be paid; and the estates of one prebendal stall in London were computed to be likely to return, when out of lease, £100,000 per annum.

"The author was one of those who were strongly in favour of the principle and objects of the Bill. He could not think that the maintenance of a learned clergy was the primary object of the Church, and was contented to leave that desirable object to the providence of God and the call of necessity.

"The Archbishop, on the other hand, and the advocates of the measure, were severely pressed by the leaders of the High Church party to abandon great part of the scheme, and the Archbishop did not seem well able to answer their arguments.

"The author then, being convinced that the opposition to the measure was grounded on a narrow view and an imperfect conception of facts, and that prebendaries and sinecurists had never been remarkable for learning; and feeling that the opposition was thus unreal, ventured to write direct to the Archbishop of Canterbury, suggesting to his Grace that under the circumstances, if the opponents of the measure insisted that the Bishops under the Bill would no longer have the power of marking their sense of distinguished clerical services by honorary offices and distinctions such as the sinecure prebendal stalls and dignities, that object might be attained consistently with the suppression of sinecures by creating honorary canonries in each cathedral, to which the Bishops should appoint, and which, being merely honorary and unendowed, would precisely meet the demands of the opponents of the Bill. The author explained that this was the course adopted by Napoleon I. on the reconstruction of the Gallican Church in 1801, when he constituted honorary canons in every cathedral, whom the Bishops might appoint in unlimited numbers.

"The author was surprised to receive an answer from the Archbishop by the next post, directing him to send up at once all particulars of the plan, with all the documents and books which he quoted to establish the matter of fact. He thereupon sent up his books and authorities, and also a sketch of several clauses embodying the plan, for insertion in the Act of Parliament. The clauses were in a few days accordingly inserted by Parliament with scarcely any change, all opposition having ceased upon their introduction; and a compromise was come to with the opponents, by which they consented to retain the sinecure offices, without their estates; and hence the unendowed offices of prebendaries and dignitaries in some cathedrals, while in others the honorary canons are established as above stated. The author included in the clauses a provision that the number of honorary canons should not be indefinite, as in France; that they should be twenty-four in each Cathedral, and that only two should be appointed in each year. He was informed some years after by the secretary of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whom he accidentally met at the Bishop of London's, that the records of the whole affair, including his correspondence, were preserved in the records of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners."

The following passage (Section 23) from the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 113, expresses the object of the institution of honorary canonries:—

"And whereas it is expedient that all bishops should be empowered to confer distinctions of honour upon deserving clergymen, be it enacted that honorary canonries shall be hereby founded in every cathedral church in England in which there are not already founded any non-residentiary prebends, dignities, or offices; and the holders of such canonries shall be styled honorary canons, and shall be entitled to stalls, and to take rank in the cathedral church next after the canons, and shall be subject to such regulations respecting the mode of their appointment, and otherwise, as shall be determined on by the authority hereinafter provided, with the consent of the chapters of the said cathedral churches respectively."

Canon of the Mass.—In the Roman Catholic Church that portion of the service which begins after the Sanctus, and comprises "the very words of our Lord, and prayers received from Apostolical tradition or piously ordered by holy Popes."

Canonical Hours.—Hours set apart for prayer and praise. Their origin is to be traced to the Jews, who appear to have prayed thrice a day (Ps. lv., 17; Dan. vi., 10), and the Apostles carried on the same custom (Acts. ii. 15; iii., 1; x. 30). Several early Christian Fathers, Clement, Tertullian, Jerome, all speak of these times as hours of prayer. Gradually the hours were increased first to five then to seven, the latter being adopted because of the devout cry of the Psalmist in Psalm cxix., 164. In this fully developed arrangement the hours are distinguished as follows:—1st Prime, about 6 a.m.; 2nd, Tierce, about 9 a.m.; 3rd, Sext, about noon;

4th, Nones, about 2 or 3 p.m.; 5th, Vespers, about 4 or later; 6th, Compline, about 7; and 7th, Matins and Lauds, at midnight. Owing to persecution Christian assemblies were largely held at night, and when persecution ceased these night meetings took place in commemoration of the martyrs until experience proved them to be a danger to morality. In consequence Matins and Lauds were placed at daybreak. The book which contained the offices for the several lessons, prayers, readings, hymns and psalms, was called the Breviary. In England the expression "Canonical Hours" is sometimes applied to the hours within which marriage can only be legally performed in church unless by special license.

Canonical Obedience.—The obedience which is due to an ecclesiastical superior. In England every clergyman takes the oath of canonical obedience to his bishop before being instituted to a benefice, or licensed as a curate.

Canonisation.—An act of the Pontiff of Rome, whereby he decrees, after enquiry, that a certain person is henceforth to be added to the canon or roll of the saints, and to be publicly venerated in all parts of the Catholic Church. The custom of canonising dates from very early Christian times, and was adopted from heathen nations: the Greeks and Romans, for instance, exalted their heroes to the ranks of the gods. With the Romans the creation of each new god depended on the Senate, and people were forbidden to have private gods of their own, or to worship new gods unless they were duly sanctioned. Similar laws were made for regulating canonisation, or the making of saints. Probably the Apostles and a few other chief saints, such as St. John the Baptist, were regarded as saints by general consent, without any further process. Down to the tenth century the power of canonisation rested with each metropolitan. The procedure was as follows:—The bishop in whose diocese a martyr died sent an account of the martyrdom to the metropolitan, with a petition that the martyr might be canonised; the metropolitan summoned the other bishops of the province to discuss the matter, and gave his decision; the bishop of the diocese then had the power to canonise or not, according to that decision. After the tenth century each bishop could decide whether a person was worthy to be canonised; but in this case the honour paid to the saint would be confined to the diocese over which the bishop ruled.

In 993 the first general canonisation was decreed by Pope John XV.; the saint then canonised was to be honoured throughout the whole Church. This was Ulrich, a former bishop of Augsburg, who died in 973; he had already been revered as a saint in the diocese of Augsburg. Still, individual bishops exercised their ancient rights of adding saints to the calendars in their own dioceses, until in 1170 Pope Alexander III., on account of many alleged abuses, confined this power to the Pontiff. Notwithstanding this, several canonisations by individual bishops were still performed, and were even tolerated by the Roman see. But in 1634 Urban VIII. decreed that if such acts of canonisation continued they would have no validity; at the same time, he laid down minute regulations for the exercise of this power. The appeal for canonisation was generally supported by the bishop or some other functionary. The appeal itself must be made at Rome, in the presence of a promotor fidei, commonly called "devil's advocate," whose duty it is to detect flaws and weak points in the proposed saint's character or in the evidence produced. If the inquiry is satisfactory, and the eminent virtue of the proposed saint be proved and certified by miracles, duly authenticated, then three successive congregations are convened, at the third of which the Pope presides, and the public are admitted; the Papal consent is given, and a day fixed for the canonisation to take place at St. Peter's. On the day of canonisation a mass is said in honour of the new saint, his statue is unveiled, a day is fixed on which his memory is to be annually celebrated, and thanksgivings are offered to God, since the Church has now, it is said, another patron and intercessor.

"Canonisation" differs from "beatification" in that the "canonised saint" is to be venerated by the whole Church; whereas he who is "beatified," or "blessed," is to be regarded as such only by a particular church or order.

Canopy.—Etymologically, a net hung over a bed to keep off gnats from conops, a gnat), thence the tester of a bed. Applied ecclesiastically to the covering over an altar, throne, stall, or tomb. The word is also applied to the ornamental projections over doors and windows, and particularly to the sound-boards over pulpits. The most beautiful canopies in old churches belong to the Decorated and Perpendicular styles.

Canterbury, ARCH-BISHOPRIC OF.—This ancient patriarchal see is scarcely inferior in ecclesiastical importance to that of Rome. Even so early as the days of St. Anselm [A.D.

CANOPY IN WEST-MINSTER ABBEY.

1098] Pope Urban II. gracefully designated its then incumbent as "alterius orbis papa," though knowing nothing then of the great western world of America which would look to the Archbishop of Canterbury as its Christian father. The see was founded by Ethelbert, King of Kent, under the advice of St. Gregory, Bishop of Rome, when St. Augustine and his companions came to establish among the Saxons the Christianity which had so long been known in the country. St. Augustine landed at Ebb's Fleet, in the Isle of Thanet, in 596. On June 2, 597, Ethelbert was baptised, and Canterbury having been constituted a bishopric by him, Augustine was consecrated to the see by Vergilius, Archbishop of Arles, on November 16th, 597. The ecclesiastical plan suggested by St. Gregory was that the country should be divided into two provinces, with twelve bishoprics in each, the Archbishops being seated, after the death of St. Augustine, at London and York. But Canterbury, not London, became the permanent seat of the southern archbishopric, and there were never twenty-four dioceses in England until the time of the Reformation. St. Augustine died on May 26, 605, and King Ethelbert in 616. Laurence, the second Archbishop, with Mellitus, Bishop of London, and Justus, Bishop of Rochester, soon became disheartened at the continued paganism of Eadbald, the son and successor of Ethelbert, and determined to retire to France, as their predecessors, the British bishops, had retired to Wales under similar though much more disheartening circumstances. Eventually, the conversion of King Eadbald caused Laurence to remain at his post, and thus the continuity of the Anglo-Saxon Episcopate is unbroken, Archbishop having since succeeded Archbishop in regular order for nearly thirteen centuries.

The Diocese of Canterbury, over which the Archbishop presides as any ordinary bishop would, consists of the county of Kent (with the exception of a small district around Gravesend and Rochester, which belongs to the see of Rochester). To this is added a district in Surrey containing about 80,000 persons around Croydon and Addington, the Archbishop's country residence, and Lambeth Palace, his London residence, on the south bank of the Thames. The population of the diocese in 1881 was 653,269.

The Province of Canterbury comprehends twenty-four dioceses; namely, those of—

Until the year 1152 all the sees in Ireland were also included in the Province of Canterbury.

Over these twenty-four dioceses of England and Wales the Archbishop of Canterbury exercises what is called a metropolitical jurisdiction, the nature of which is explained at length in another article [ARCHBISHOP]. His great office makes him the sacerdotal head on earth of the Church of England, and he is practically regarded as the Patriarch of all Churches of the Anglican succession. He is styled—the title being confirmed by Pope Innocent VI. in A.D. 1354—the Primate of all England and Metropolitan; and he is, ex officio, the first subject of the Crown after the Princes of the blood Royal. The endowment of the office is now fixed at £15,000 a year.

The following is a complete list of the ninety-two Archbishops who have sat on the throne of Canterbury from the foundation of the see and province to the present time.

The Cathedral of Canterbury, the existing fabric of which was erected between 1070 and 1495, occupies ground which has been the site of successive churches from the primitive ages of Christianity to the present time. Respecting the earliest of these churches, there is a trustworthy historical notice in the Ecclesiastical History of the Venerable Bede, who died in A.D. 735. Writing of St. Augustine, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, the historian says that “Augustine, having his episcopal see granted to him in the royal city” of Ethelbert’s kingdom of Kent, “and being supported by the king, re-covered therein a church which he was informed had been built by the ancient Roman Christians, and consecrated it in the name of our Holy Saviour, Lord, and God, Jesus Christ; and there he established a residence for himself and all his successors.” The ancient church thus restored by St. Augustine, about A.D. 600, became the cathedral of the newly-formed see of Canterbury. Its original erection, wholly or in part, was attributed to a British king of Kent, named Lucius, whose date is traditionally placed in the middle of the second century [A.D. 156]. Whether or not there is any truth in this tradition, it is certain that if the information given to St. Augustine was correct, the church must have been built before the beginning of the fifth century, when the Roman occupation of Southern Britain was given up; and thus the Cathedral of Canterbury is among the most ancient churches of the Christian world which still remain on their ancient sites.

The venerable church which St. Augustine thus restored, and in which he ministered, existed until the Norman Conquest; and Eadmer, Precentor of the Cathedral at that time, describes it as resembling the ancient Basilican Church of St. Peter at Rome, that most venerable fabric which was destroyed in the sixteenth century to give place to the present structure. The walls of St. Augustine’s church were heightened by Archbishop Odo [A.D. 942–959], but it was greatly damaged by the Danes when they sacked the city of Canterbury, and murdered its archbishop, St. Alphege, at Greenwich [A.D. 1011]. It was destroyed by fire in 1067, and nothing of it is known to exist in the present building. Its ruins were pulled down by Lanfranc, the first archbishop after the Conquest [A.D. 1070–1089], and the building begun by him was finished by his successors during the next half-century, being dedicated in 1130 in the presence of the kings of England and Scotland and all the English bishops. Fifty years later a fire again occurred, which consumed the choir in which Lanfranc and St. Anselm had worshipped, and in which St. Thomas à Becket was cruelly murdered. The rebuilding of it was immediately commenced, under the supervision of a French architect, William of Sens, who carried on the work until 1178, when he fell from a scaffolding—as did Baseir, the architect of Ely Cathedral, seven centuries later—and though not killed, was so injured as to be obliged to return to France. The architect who succeeded William of Sens was an Englishman, who bore the same Christian name, and is thus distinguished as the “English William,” and under him the new choir was completed in 1184. The nave of Norman times was replaced by another between the years 1378 and 1410, and the central tower, or "angel tower"—so called from the statue of an angel which surmounted it—was added in the fifteenth century, not long before the Reformation began.

The most ancient portions of the existing cathedral are the western half of the crypt, and the towers of St. Andrew and St. Anselm, eastward of the eastern transept. These portions of the church date from the times of Archbishops Lanfranc and Anselm. Next to these are the eastern part of the crypt, the choir, the retro-choir, and the corona, usually called "Becket's crown." The choir screen is early fourteenth-century work, the nave and transepts late fourteenth-century; and the latest portion of all is the central tower, dating, as has been said, from just before the Reformation. As a whole, the prominent architectural features of the cathedral may be said to be late Norman, the earliest of Pointed or Early English, and Perpendicular. The north-western tower was rebuilt in 1834, and much restoration has been effected at later dates.

Apart from its glorious architecture, the cathedral of Canterbury is most interesting on account of its associations. It has been the Metropolitan Church of the Southern Province for thirteen centuries, and in later times it has been the chief church of the Anglican communion throughout the world. Within its walls are the graves of most of the Archbishops of Canterbury down to the time of Cardinal Pole, the last of them who was laid there. In graves known or unknown within its walls there lie the bodies of St. Blaize, St. Wilfrid, St. Alphege, and St. Anselm; while it was for three centuries and a-half [A.D. 1170—1538] regarded with the greatest reverence as containing the shrine of Thomas à Becket. The cathedral is also the burial-place of Henry IV. and of Edward the Black Prince, whose armour is still preserved over his tomb, although his good sword was appropriated by Oliver Cromwell. In short, to use the words of Dean Stanley, "There is no church, no place in the kingdom, with the exception of Westminster Abbey, that is so closely connected with the history of our country."

Until the Reformation, Canterbury Cathedral was the church of a large Benedictine monastery. In A.D. 1538 it was re-founded by Henry VIII. as a Cathedral Body of Secular Clergy, and it now consists of a Dean, six Canons, twenty-five Honorary Canons, six Preachers, and four Minor Canons; the income of this body amounting to about £10,000 a year.

Canticle.—A prose hymn for use in Divine Service, of which the leading principle is that of ascribing praise to the Personal Word of God in association with His written Word. Thus, in the Church of England a canticle is sung after every lesson, and each of them, except the Tu Deum, is taken out of the Bible. The Benedictus, the Magnificat, and the Nunc Dimittis, were canticles spoken or sung in prophetic association with the Incarnation of the Word.

Canto Fermo.—An Italian term, answering to the English, "Plain Song," and signifying the solemn monotone, with slight inflections, which is used in singing the prayers and responses of Divine Service.

Cantor.—The principal conductor or "chanter" of Divine Service in a church where there are many singers, as a Cathedral. He is usually called the Præcantor, but the term "Cantor" is familiar in connection with one division of the singers in a double choir: those who sit on one side being called decani, or the singers belonging to the side of the Dean, those on the other, cantoris, the singers belonging to the side of the Cantor, or Præcantor.

Cape Town, Bishopric of. [SOUTH AFRICAN CHURCH.]

Capitularies.—A word derived from the ancient Frankish Empire. Each tribe had its own laws, but there were also general laws issuing from the imperial power. These laws, being framed in chapter (capitula), came to be called in Charlemagne's time capitularies. The word was also applied to chapters of canons or of military orders, to the statutes issued by such chapter, and to the separate members of the chapters.

Capuchins.—In the Roman Church, a monastic order which grew out of the Order of St. Francis, and was instituted by Matthew de Baschi, of Urbino. He was an observant of the Convent of Monte Falco, and, having convinced himself that the friars of his time wore a different capuche, or cowl, from that worn by St. Francis, he obtained the leave of Pope Clement VII., in 1526, to resume what he held to be the original form. He obtained further permission to retire into solitude and live a hermit life, with as many others as chose to embrace the strict observance. The new Order multiplied fast, for in 1529 they had four monasteries, keeping strict rules as to hours for worship, for mental prayer, for silence, for discipline. They had no revenues, but were to live by begging (and were not to ask for meat, eggs, or cheese, though they might eat them if offered); everything about their churches was to be poor and mean, their very chalices of pewter. It was a terrible shock to the Order when in 1543 the third vicar-general, Bernardine Ochino, became a Protestant [OCHINO]. The Pope, in his anger, was very near dissolving the Order, but their eager and submissive entreaties saved them, and the result was that this Order became one of the most extreme types of monasticism. It stands in contrast to Jesuitism, inasmuch as the latter represents the clever and unscrupulous casuistry of the Roman Church, whereas the Capuchins exhibit a strong sympathy with the coarse instincts of the ignorant masses. They had found their way into France and Germany by the end of the sixteenth century, and into Spain early in the seventeenth. The Order was abolished in France and Germany at the end of the eighteenth century: it figures much in the history of the French Revolution. In Germany it revived again, but the monks were driven from their convents in 1880. There are still several thousands of them, chiefly in Austria and Switzerland. There are five Capuchin convents in England, two in Wales, and three in Ireland.

Caput Anni.—New Year's Day.

Caput Jejunii (i.e., "Head of the Fast").—Ash Wednesday. The same day was sometimes called Caput Quadragesimæ.

Caraites. [KARAITES.]

Cardinal.—The word is derived from "cardo," a hinge, and hence it comes to mean principal, that on which other things hinge: thus we speak of the cardinal virtues, cardinal numbers, &c. Hence, in the Church, the clergy who were appointed to the parish churches, and who held a fixed position there, were termed cardinal priests, to distinguish them from those who held subordinate positions, or who were only attached temporarily to a church. After a time the title of cardinal was given to deacons as well as priests. In Rome, as in many other Churches, the deacons were confined in number to seven; and as gradually there arose hospitals and charitable institutions with chapels attached to them, the deacons who had charge of them were styled cardinal deacons. It was the duty of the Roman cardinals to attend the Pope's council, and give their opinion on ecclesiastical matters. In process of time the title of cardinal, formerly belonging to all principal priests and deacons, became restricted to Rome. At length bishops also received the title, for in the eleventh century the six bishops whose sees were in the immediate neighbourhood of Rome were called cardinal bishops (it is uncertain how long before this they had enjoyed this honour); they were the Bishops of Ostia Portus, St. Rufina, Albano, Sabina, Tusculum, and Præneste. A council held at Rome in 1059, under Nicholas II., decreed that the election of the Pope should rest with the six cardinal bishops, the clergy and people giving their assent subsequently. As the cardinal priests and deacons were the most important and influential of the Roman clergy, the election of the Pope was at length confined to the cardinals alone (1179); hence, their importance and power began to increase very greatly. The number of the College of Cardinals has fluctuated a good deal. In the twelfth century it was fixed at fifty-two, made up of six cardinal bishops, twenty-eight cardinal priests, and eighteen cardinal deacons; but vacancies were often kept open for a long time, so that sometimes the numbers sank very low. On one occasion in the thirteenth century there were only seven. Leo X. increased the number to sixty-five, and in 1586 the limit was fixed at seventy, which is the present number. They consist of six bishops, fifty priests, and fourteen deacons. Together with the Pope, they form the governing council of the Roman Church; they are elected solely by the Pope, and in virtue of their position they now take precedence of bishops, archbishops, and even patriarchs. In the case of a vacancy in the Roman See, the cardinals meet to select one of their own body as a successor, a majority of two-thirds being necessary for a valid election. In 1243 Pope Innocent IV. gave the cardinals the red cap, as a distinctive badge; their scarlet habit was given by Paul II. in 1464. The title of "Eminence" was bestowed by Urban VIII. (1630). Although the cardinals are chosen from all countries, they nominally hold the titles of the various churches in Rome itself. Thus, for example, Cardinal Manning, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, is Cardinal Priest of the Church of St. Andrew and St. Gregory in Rome. The great majority, however, of the cardinals are chosen from Italy.

Cardinal Altar.—A name formerly given to the high altar in St. Paul's Cathedral, because one of two minor canons, who were called cardinals, said mass there.

Cardinal Virtues.—These are Prudence, Justice, Temperance, and Fortitude.

Carey, WILLIAM, the son of a village schoolmaster, was born in 1761 in Northamptonshire. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a shoemaker at Hackleton, but at eighteen became a Baptist preacher, and, his mind becoming impressed by the immense tracts of land lying under heathenism, an intense desire took possession of him that the Gospel should be carried to those lands. He ventured to express this desire at a meeting of ministers in Northampton, but they refused to listen to him. Nothing daunted, however, he proceeded to write on the subject, and in 1792, with the pecuniary aid of friends, he published his tract, Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens. On the 30th of May, in the same year, he preached a heart-stirring sermon at Nottingham, and on October 2nd the first Baptist Missionary Society was founded. The next year Carey and his family, accompanied by John Thomas, who had formerly been a surgeon in Calcutta, sailed for India. The little band met with many difficulties and disasters, and on reaching Bengal they lost nearly the whole of their property; but they struggled on through poverty and sickness, Carey devoting most of his time to the study of Bengalee. He had a wonderful aptitude for languages, and had learned Greek, Latin, Hebrew, French and Dutch before leaving England. In 1796 Carey became superintendent of an indigo factory at Mudnabuty, belonging to Mr. Udney, but in three years it was necessary to close the factory. Meantime, however, Carey had completed the translation of the New Testament into Bengalee, and Mr. Udney presented him with a wooden printing-press. He wrote a grammar of Bengalee, and also learned Sanscrit, and he preached to the natives, but without making much impression. In 1799 four new colleagues (two of whom, William Ward and Joshua Marshman, became hardly less famous than himself) landed at Serampore, fourteen miles above Calcutta. They were to have joined Carey at Bengal, but the British Government was strongly opposed to them, and at length it was decided to move the mission entirely to Serampore, where they were under the protection of Colonel Bie, the Danish Governor. Here all the families were united in a common household; the printing-press was set up, and on March 18th, 1800, the first sheets of the Bengalee Gospel were struck off. Mr. and Mrs. Marshman opened schools for European children, and thus were able mainly to support the mission. The missionaries preached and sang hymns in the streets, but though they interested many, they could not get them to give up their caste and be baptised. At length a man named Krishnu, who had been surgically treated by Mr. Thomas, came forward, with his wife, daughter, and brother, and desired baptism, and on December 26th, 1800, Krishnu was baptised in the Ganges, the others at the last moment drawing back. About this time Lord Wellesley appointed Carey teacher of Bengalee in the college which he had just founded at Fort William, Calcutta. He held this appointment for about thirty years, still, however, labouring for the mission. He died on the 9th of June, 1834, in his seventy-third year. To him belongs the distinguished honour of being the pioneer of our Indian Missions, and of having translated the Scriptures into no less than twenty-four Indian dialects, besides compiling grammars and dictionaries of several tongues. An American university conferred on him the degree of D.D. John Thomas died of ague about 1802, Dr. Ward of cholera in 1823, and Dr. Marshman only survived Carey three years and a-half.

Carlisle.—The See of Carlisle was founded in 1133, Athelwald, or Adelulf, becoming its first bishop. A Norman priest named Walter, in the time of William Rufus, had founded in the city a college of secular priests, and designed to build a church, but died before it was completed; but Henry I. continued the work, and in 1121 founded a house of regular canons of St. Augustine. When, in 1133, Carlisle was raised to a bishopric, the Priory Church of St. Mary became the cathedral. Carlisle is the solitary instance of a cathedral foundation springing from the Austin canons; in all other cases they were churches of the Benedictine monasteries before they were converted by Henry VIII. into chapters of secular canons. The records of the ancient architecture of the cathedral are very meagre. The Norman church remained much as it was built in the reign of Henry I. till the middle of the thirteenth century, when the bishop and canons set to work to rebuild the choir on a much larger scale; this work, in the Early English style, was probably begun in the time of Bishop Sylvester de Everdon, 1247, and completed by Bishop Ireton, 1292; but scarcely was it finished when the whole of the new choir, the east end, and all except the side aisles were destroyed by fire. The north transept also was greatly injured. The choir was partially rebuilt, but want of funds hindered its progress during the reign of Edward II. Under Bishop Welton, in 1352, the restoration was resumed, and finished under his successor, Bishop Appleby (1363—1395), when the triforium and clerestory, in the Decorated style, were added to the choir, the east end raised to its present height, and the ceiling richly gilded and coloured. The east window is one of the most beautiful and one of the largest in the world. The cathedral suffered again by fire in 1392, and was then restored by Bishop Strickland (1400—1419), who also rebuilt the central tower; this work is in the Perpendicular style. All that now remains of the original Norman church is a portion of the nave, and this is walled off from the choir and transepts, and forms the parish church of St. Mary. A complete restoration of the cathedral was commenced in 1863 by Mr. Ewan Christian, at a cost of £15,000. The chapter of Carlisle consists of the dean, two archdeacons, and four canons. The diocese comprises the entire counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and part of Lancashire. The population is 401,280, number of benefices 291, number of curates 78, with 19 rural deaneries.

Carlstadt, ANDREAS RUDOLPHUS BODENSTEIN, was born probably in 1481, at Carlstadt, in Franconia. He studied in Italy, and afterwards at Wittenberg, where, in 1513, he became professor of divinity and archdeacon of the cathedral. Two years later he went to Rome, and on his return found that Martin Luther had become famous. After a useless resistance, he became Luther's helper, and in 1517 published some theses, De Naturâ, Legi, et Gratia contra Scholasticos et Communem Naturam. In the spring of 1519 he wrote an answer to Dr. Eck's Obelisks, in which he defended Luther. When Luther went to Wartburg, Carlstadt began to pull down the images, and created a great disturbance, which was only stopped on Luther's return to the city. In 1523 he became pastor of the village of Oilamund, and here he had a slight dispute with Luther on the use of images. When he found himself foiled he began to attack Luther, on which the Elector of Saxony banished him from Oilamund. He wandered about for a long time, until the controversy between Luther and Zwingli began, when, on taking the part of the latter, he was well received in the towns favourable to Zwingli. In 1531 he became pastor of Altstalten, and three years later professor at Basle, where he remained till he died of the plague in 1541.

Carmelites.—One of the four Orders of mendicant friars, founded in the twelfth century by Berthold, a crusader, who had vowed to embrace the religious life if he should be victorious in battle. He settled as a monk in Calabria, where it was believed the Prophet Elijah appeared to him in a vision; he then removed to Mount Carmel (1156), and from this place his successors take their name of Carmelites. Albert, Patriarch of Jerusalem, a native of the diocese of Amiens, and kinsman of Peter the Hermit, gave them sixteen rules of severe discipline in 1205, which Pope Honorius III. confirmed. The severity of these rules was relaxed by Innocent IV. in 1245. The habit was at first striped, but they afterwards changed it for brown, with a white cloak and scapulary.* They are sometimes called White Friars. A second order of Carmelites, known as the Discalceati, or barefooted friars, was established in the sixteenth century, chiefly by the zeal of St. Theresa (q.v.), a nun of this order belonging to the convent of Avila, in Castile, who restored the ancient rigour of the rule. Pope Clement VIII. gave them large privileges, and they had many houses in Spain and France.

In Spain they are still numerous, but have been swept away in France. In England there are now six nunneries, and one house of friars, and in Ireland also they have several establishments.

Carnival.—A name given in Roman Catholic countries to the days immediately preceding Lent: strictly, Carnival time extends from February 3rd, the Feast of St. Blasius, to the end of Shrove Tuesday, though practically the rejoicings and festivities that are usual on these occasions are confined to the three days before Ash Wednesday; hence Quinquagesima Sunday, the first day of Carnival, has sometimes been called "Carnevale."

Three derivations are given of the word, viz., (1) "carni-vale," farewell to flesh meat; (2) "ubi caro valet," in allusion to the indulgence in flesh meat before Lent; (3) "carn-avallare," to devour flesh meat.

The rejoicings at Carnival time, especially in Rome, have in some years been carried to such lengths that some of the Popes, Clement XI. and Benedict XIV., for example, tried to restrain them; but, on the other hand, most of the Popes have encouraged the keeping up of this holiday with all the customary gaiety. Paul II. and Pius IX. were conspicuous examples of this. Amid all the festivities, the people were urged to attend religious rites and services; and the custom, begun by the Jesuits in 1556, has since become universal to "expose" the Blessed Sacrament for adoration throughout Carnival time. At the present day, Carnival time has been shorn of almost all its old splendours.

Caroline Books were four books written against image worship, probably in the eighth century. They are contained in the Capitularies of Charlemagne, but their authorship is unknown. They set forward the use of Christian art for instruction, and protest against its misuse for superstitious purposes.

Carols.—Hymns sung principally at Christmas, in imitation of the Song of the Angels which the shepherds heard at the birth of Christ. The derivation of the word is uncertain, though most probably it is of Celtic origin: cf. Welsh, "carawl." The custom of singing carols at Christmas time dates as far back as we can trace. In the second century it was ordered that "in the night of the Nativity they do celebrate public

* The scapulary is said to have been shown to them in a special vision by the Virgin in 1287, who promised to go at times into Purgatory for the relief of those who wore it. [SCAPULARY.]

Church services, and in them solemnly sing the Angels' Hymn." In the thirteenth century, St. Francis of Assisi obtained permission to make certain innovations in Divine worship, in order to bring the great truth of the Incarnation home to the people. He accordingly originated the custom of making representations of the birth of Christ, called "cribs," in churches, and, further, composed hymns or carols to be sung at these cribs; hence the custom of singing carols, setting forth the birth of Christ, soon became very popular. The custom of singing carols has also served to emphasize the fact that Christianity is a joyous and bright service of God.

Christmas Carols are sung in Divine Service, sometimes as a separate service, and sometimes in the open air at night time; most of them are of a religious character, but there are a few which are merely incentives to feasting. There are also Epiphany and Easter Carols.

Among the best known carols of a religious character are the "Adeste Fideles," "Hark, the Herald Angels sing," "God rest you, merry gentlemen," "The First Noel." Among the more festive carols, the most famous is "The Boar's Head," sung in Queen's College, Oxford, every Christmas.

Carpenter, MARY.—A noble and pious philanthropist [1807—1877], whose work was devoted to the reformation of the criminal classes. She was a Unitarian, and the daughter of an eminent Unitarian minister, Dr. Lant Carpenter, and early gave herself to philanthropic work with an ardour that has rarely been equalled. She originated the system of reformatory schools for vicious girls, and, assisted by Mr. Davenport Hill, she drew up the Bill establishing them, which was passed in 1854. In 1857 she was one of the principal promoters of the Industrial Schools Act. She visited India no less than five times on educational and reformatory enterprises. (See Life and Work of Mary Carpenter, by J. E. Carpenter, 1879.)

Carpocratians.—A Gnostic sect, named after Carpocras, or Carpocrates, their founder; he flourished early in the second century as a follower of Simon Magus. The principal features in the heresy of Carpocrates and his followers were the denial of the Divinity of Christ and of the resurrection of the dead; the rejection of the Old Testament; a belief in the pre-existence and transmigration of souls. They also held that evil did not exist in reality in the world, but only in the imagination of men's minds; the result of this was that evil deeds, if not openly encouraged, were at least permitted, by the leaders of this heresy. Hence the Carpocratians were notorious for immoral and scandalous conduct. The heresy flourished most in Alexandria, the native city of their founder. It never obtained much success in the West; it made its appearance, however, in Rome in the year 160. Many of the Fathers, including St. Irenæus and St. Augustine, denounced the sect in their writings.

Carranza, BARTHOLOMEW, called Miranda, from his birth-place in Navarre. He joined the Dominicans in Castile, and became so noted for his great learning and eloquence that he was called in to assist at the Council of Trent in 1556. A very eloquent speech which he delivered in that year is still preserved. Two years before this, in 1554, he accompanied Philip II. of Spain to England, on the marriage of that king to Queen Mary. Carranza was chosen by the queen as her confessor, and in 1557 Philip raised him to the Archbishopric of Toledo, and made him Primate of all Spain. The admirable qualities of Carranza were here seen to great advantage. A further mark of confidence was now reposed in him; the Emperor Charles V., in his retirement at Xuste, chose him for his confessor and director. In spite of all these honours, Carranza fell under the displeasure of the Inquisition for alleged heresy, and was treated with the greatest severity. Being dragged from his see and placed in prison, and his goods confiscated, he appealed to Rome, whither he was taken in 1567. He suffered many indignities at the hands of Pius V. and Gregory XIII., and eventually, in 1576, was forced to publicly renounce the errors of which he was accused. He was then handed over to the Monastery of Minerva, where he died the same year, aged 72 years. As in the time of his prosperity Carranza was noted for his good morals and admirable conduct, so in time of adversity, his patience and humility under persecution were admired by all. Many works from his pen have come down to us, including The Sum of the Councils and Popes, from St. Peter to Julius III., and A Treatise of Patience. In Latin he published books concerning residence of bishops, and guides of souls; he also issued a Spanish Catechism for his diocese.

Carthage, ANCIENT CHURCH OF.—The African Churches were not planted by the Apostles, nor were any preachers, so far as we know, sent thither by them. Petition is positive that the Africans were the last people of the empire to receive the Gospel. St. Augustine, in his book de Unitate Ecclesie, does not affirm that Christianity was planted in Africa in apostolic times; he only asserts that some barbarous nations received the message of the Gospel later. Tertullian, in his Prescriptions, does not range the African Christians with those of apostolic times. Salvian, in his seventh book de Providentiâ, seems to say that the Church of Carthage was founded by the Apostles, but being of another country, and much later in time, his testimony is not so reliable as that of St. Augustine and Tertullian. Nicephorus and Dorotheus relate that Simon the Canaanite, surnamed Zelotes, and St. Peter preached the Gospel in Africa, but this account appears altogether fabulous.

But, by whomsoever it was founded, the Church of Carthage exerted a vast influence upon the whole of Christendom. Like Egypt, Carthage had undergone great changes through foreign conquest: originally a Punic settlement, it was altogether crushed by the Roman conquest. Consequently, the Church of Carthage was a Latin Church; and Dean Milman says that "Carthage, not Rome, was the mother of Latin Christianity."

The first great name in its annals is that of Q. Septimius Florens Tertullianus, in the latter part of the second century. [TERTULLIAN.] After him, we come to the great name of St. Cyprian, and the schism of the Donatists which began in his days. [CYPRIAN; DONATISTS.]

The invasion of the Vandals, who took Carthage in 439, almost ruined the African Churches; many of the bishops were banished, and the see of Carthage was vacant for some time. But when, in 534, Belisarius recovered Africa for the Emperor Justinian, the Catholic religion revived, and held its own till the Moors and Saracens conquered the country. This event made such havoc in the Church that in Gregory the Great's time there were not more than three bishops there, who had a very small number of Christians under their care.

Carthusians.—An Order of Benedictine monks, founded by St. Bruno, a priest of the Cathedral of Cologne, about A.D. 1084. Their name was derived from Chartreux, a desert spot near Grenoble, in Dauphiné, where they first settled. They did not aim at being numerous, but rather prided themselves on being select and few. Their discipline was strict and severe, and their dress coarse, and so contrived as almost to disfigure their persons. They had no abbot, but were under a Superior, who was called the Grand Prior. Their laws limited very narrowly the quantity of land and the number of flocks and herds they should possess. This regulation was designed as a protest against the luxury and wealth which had been fatal to the spiritual life of so many of the ancient Benedictine houses. The Carthusians, on the whole, kept their strict rules, and there was less degeneracy among them than in any other monastic Order. But the Order never became popular. They had but nine houses in England, the first being founded at Witham, Somerset, A.D. 1181; and the most remarkable that which is still called the Charterhouse, London. [CHARTERHOUSE.]

in a monastery, or its charters and other documents. Also applied to the room in which such documents were deposited.

Cartwright, THOMAS, was one of the earliest and most learned champions of Puritanism; and he may be regarded as the founder of Presbyterianism in England. Born in 1535, he went to Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1547, and eventually became a Fellow of Trinity College in 1562. He is said to have been a most hardworking student, and never to have slept above five hours a night; his studies, however, were interrupted when Mary became Queen of England, in 1553, for Cartwright then left Cambridge, and studied as a lawyer's clerk. On the accession of Elizabeth, however, he returned to Cambridge, took his B.A. degree in 1567, and two years later was appointed Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity; his lectures now were so hostile to Episcopacy and the established customs of the Church of England, that he came under the displeasure of the Vice-Chancellor of the University, John Whitgift, a strong Episcopalian; the result was that Cartwright was deprived of his professorship in 1570, and of his fellowship in 1571. He now went to Geneva, but was persuaded to return to England in the following year [1572]. On his return, a bitter controversy arose between the Puritans and Episcopalians, Cartwright championing the former and Whitgift the latter.

Hooker, in his preface to The Ecclesiastical Polity, refers to Cartwright's method of conducting the controversy, and says: "There will come a time when three words uttered with charity and meekness shall receive a far more blessed reward than three thousand volumes written with disdainful sharpness of wit." Cartwright's statements, in his published replies to Whitgift, were accounted so dangerous to the peace of the Church and of the kingdom that a warrant was issued for his arrest on December 11th, 1574. He, however, fled to Antwerp, and ministered there to the English congregation. Meanwhile, the first Presbyterian body in England had established themselves at Wadsworth, and Cartwright had published a translation of Travers' work, naming it a Full and Plain Declaration of Ecclesiastical Discipline, in which it was sought to prove that a Presbyterian form of government, after the Geneva fashion, was the true form of Church government. Cartwright remained abroad till 1585. During his absence from England, he published a second reply to Whitgift [1575—1577]; visited the Channel Islands, in order to aid in establishing Presbyterianism there [1576]; received an offer of the Divinity chair at St. Andrew's University, Scotland, from James I. [1582], but refused it; and finally, in 1583, issued, in conjunction with Walter Travers, a rough draft of a Presbyterian Book of Holy Discipline which was gradually adopted by Presbyterian bodies all over England, so that in 1590 the movement originated by Cartwright boasted of 500 ministers. Efforts were now made to suppress it, and Cartwright himself was, by order of the Court of High Commission, committed to the Fleet [May, 1590]. This was the second time that he had been imprisoned; for on his return to England, in 1585, he was arrested by order of Aylmer, Bishop of London, and suffered two months' imprisonment; he was then released through the influence of his friend and patron, the Earl of Leicester (a strong defender of the Nonconformists), and received from him the chaplaincy of a hospital at Warwick, where he stayed till his second imprisonment. He was again released in 1592, and allowed to return to his hospital at Warwick, on condition that he did "not meddle with controversies, but inclined his hearers to piety and moderation; and this promise he kept during his life." [Walton's Life of Hooker.] His old opponent, Whitgift, who was made Archbishop of Canterbury in 1583, now showed him many acts of kindness, of which the Earl of Leicester says that Cartwright was deeply sensible. In 1603-4, the two opponents died within a few weeks of each other, "each ending his days in perfect charity with the other."

Cartwright's books against the Discipline and Prayer Book of the Church of England were answered in the famous Ecclesiastical Polity of Richard Hooker, published in 1594. Many writings of Cartwright were published after his death, including Commentaries on Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, Colossians, and on the whole Gospel history. His greatest work was A Confutation of the Rhenish Translation of the New Testament, published in 1618. Other works from his pen are a Catechism [1611], Christian Religion [1616], and Harmonia Evangelica [1627].

Casas, BARTHOLOME DE LA, honourably distinguished as the Father and Protector of the Indians in the West Indies. He was born at Seville in 1474; his first visit to the West Indies was with Columbus in the year 1493. Subsequently La Casas returned to Spain and took holy orders; he paid a second visit to the West Indies some years afterwards, and found the natives so cruelly treated by the Spanish colonists, that the native population of Hispaniola had decreased from 60,000 in 1508 to 14,000 in 1516. La Casas loudly denounced such treatment, and sailed back to Spain to lay the case before the king, with the result that in 1517 Charles V. sent over a commission, under La Casas, to make inquiries. The Commission decided against the freedom of the Indians, but took measures to prevent cruelty and ill-usage being practised upon them. La Casas then set sail for Spain again, in order to try to get better terms for the oppressed, but without success. He now took to writing treatises on behalf of the Indians, in one of which he lays down the great principle that the authority exercised over the newly discovered countries should be for the benefit of the natives by spreading Christianity among them, and at the same time preserving to them all their rights and liberties; in a word, that the discoverers were to rule as Christians, and not as tyrants. La Casas entered the Order of the Dominicans in Hispaniola in 1522. He was subsequently made Bishop of Chiapa, in Mexico; having spent many years in his diocese, ever acting as the champion of the natives, he returned to Spain in 1551, and died in a convent at Madrid, 1566.

Cassian, JOHN, the founder of monasticism in the West, and the first semi-Pelagian teacher. The date and place of his birth are uncertain: he was brought up at a monastery in Bethlehem, where he became very intimate with the Abbot Germain. In 390, these two made a visit to the hermits in Egypt, and remained there seven years. They then repaired to Constantinople, where Cassian became a disciple of St. Chrysostom, the bishop, who made him a deacon. In 404, Chrysostom was driven out of his see by the malice of his enemies, and Cassian and Germain were sent by the faithful in Constantinople to represent to the Pope the injustice and cruelty to which Chrysostom had been subjected. On the death of St. Chrysostom, in 437, Cassian settled in Rome, and contracted a friendship with Leo, afterwards Pope Leo the Great. In 410, Rome was taken by Alaric, and Cassian retired to Marseilles; here he was ordained a priest by Bishop Venerius; and here, too, he introduced the monastic system for the first time in the West, by founding two monasteries, one for men and the other for women. For the instruction of his monks, he wrote The Institutions of a Monastic Life, in twelve books; and the Collations or Conferences of the Fathers of the Desert, in twenty-four books. In this latter book he gives an account of the lives and customs of the hermits in the Egyptian desert. At Pope Leo's request he wrote a treatise on the Incarnation against the errors of Nestorius; in this treatise many of the errors of Pelagius were also indirectly attacked; but, probably owing to his Eastern training, he was not able to thoroughly sympathise with the Anti-Pelagian views of St. Augustine; moreover, in his thirteenth conference he appears as a Semi-Pelagian, and St. Prosper accordingly wrote against him in defence of the faith. Cassian, however, has not been condemned as a heretic, nor have his peculiar doctrines been formally condemned by the Church.

Cassock.—A close-fitting garment with tight sleeves, used by clergy of all orders, and also by laymen officially employed in the conduct of Divine worship, such as choirmen, sacristans, clerks, &c. It is worn beneath the surplice or alb. Black is the usual colour, but in some churches violet, as a matter of taste, is preferred, while scarlet also is sometimes employed for acolytes and servers on great festivals. In the Roman Church, priests and the minor orders wear black, bishops purple, cardinals scarlet, and the Pope white.

Castalio, SEBASTIAN, a native of Savoy, born in 1515, died in Switzerland in 1563. He was a great linguist, being especially noted for his knowledge of Hebrew and Latin. Among his published works are Latin Dialogues, which was frequently adopted as a standard book: a Latin translation of the Bible, published in 1551, and dedicated to Edward VI., King of England, a work of great merit, although the force of the original has in many passages been sacrificed to elegance of diction and fanciful phraseology. In 1555 Castalio published a French version of the Bible, and dedicated it to Henry II., King of France. The Latin version of Castalio was violently attacked by Calvin and Beza. Previously to this, Calvin and Castalio had disagreed at Geneva on doctrinal questions, and Castalio had in consequence left the post of rector of the school in that city, and settled at Basle in 1544. Castalio worked hard as a student amid great poverty and discouragement.

Casistry.—The dealing with cases of conscience: that is, deciding what is right or wrong in doubtful cases. The name "casuist" does not seem to have been known until the Middle Ages. In the early Church, in the days of public penance, very little was left to the private judgment of the bishop or priest; there were written laws or canons regulating the whole exercise of penance for sins. Up to the thirteenth century, in cases of private confession, the confessor had to rely on his own discretion in doubtful cases of conscience brought before him; but from that time the whole question was reduced to a scientific system: text-books were drawn up for the use of confessors, affording help and guidance for particular cases. The greatest authority of the Middle Ages was St. Thomas Aquinas, whose works are still regarded as standard books of Casistry in the Roman Church. The most celebrated casuistical writers in the English Church since the Reformation are Bishops Jeremy Taylor and Sanderson.

Catabaptist (from kata, "against," and baptizō, "baptize").—One who opposes baptism, especially that of infants. [See ANABAPTISTS.]

Catabasion (from kata, "down," and basis, "a going").—A place under the altar of a Greek Church for the bestowal of relics.

Catacombs.—The subterranean cemeteries which exist chiefly near Rome, and which were excavated by the early Christians.

The soil of the Campagna, or undulating plain in the midst of which Rome stands, is composed in most places of three distinct strata: the lowest being a volcanic rock, called Tufa litoida; the uppermost a sandy material which is used for making cement, and goes by the name of Pozzolana; and an intermediate layer, called Tufa granolare, which is so far from being useless for making cement unless it is crushed to powder, and yet so soft as to be quite unsuitable for building or any similar purpose. Vast quantities of the upper or sandy portion of these strata used to be excavated for the making of the cement for which all Roman buildings are famous; and thus large Arenaria, or sand-pits, were formed under the soil, in great galleries twenty feet wide, and high enough for men and horses to work in them. The idea of the Christian catacombs seems to have been suggested by these sand galleries. Perhaps the persecuted race endeavoured to find concealment there on some occasions, and finding them too well known to be a secure refuge, provided other more secret retreats of a somewhat similar character.

These retreats have from about the seventh century received the name of catacombs, a word supposed to be derived from the Greek kata, "down," and kumbē, "a hollow," which was the name of a district on the Appian Way, where the largest of them is situated. In the first instance, they were galleries about eight feet high, and from three to five feet wide, leading out of some secluded portion of the Arenaria, and driven through the intermediate tufa granolare, which has already been mentioned. As the soft stone was excavated it was probably crushed, and passed observation (if attention was drawn to it) as the usual produce of the well-known pozzolana galleries; and often, when one gallery had been filled, as will presently be described, with the bodies of deceased Christians, the soil excavated from a new gallery was removed into it. These excavations appear to have been commenced almost in Apostolic times, one inscription having been found with a date belonging to the third year of Vespasian, which was A.D. 71; and they were continued until persecution ceased, some inscriptions having been found, indeed, of as late a date as the fifth century. There are about sixty different sets of these catacombs known in the Campagna, most of them being within three miles of the city. It has been computed by those who have almost lived in them for the purpose of studying their history and the antiquities which they contain, that there are 800 or 900 miles of galleries so excavated, and that they contain six or seven millions of sepulchral niches, each of which has been or is still the resting-place of a Christian body. This was an immense work, even though spread over three centuries; but it seems less wonderful when the fact is known that there was a body of Christians as well trained to such mining as Durham pitmen, who made it their trade to carry on these excavations and to bury the dead. They went by the name of Fossors, and the painting of one, named Diogenes, with his excavator's tools around him, is still to be seen on the side of one of these galleries.

There can be little doubt that the primary purpose which these catacombs were intended to answer was that of cemeteries, the Christians never burning their dead, as did the heathen. Why such studied concealment of their burial-places was necessary is not indeed clear; for though it was well known that such cemeteries existed, it was very rarely that they were discovered by the heathen. It is not unlikely that, as the celebration of the Holy Communion was a part of the rites of burial, the early Christians set great value on a special ceremony in the inhumation of their dead, which could only be securely performed in secret places. But though they were primarily intended for this purpose, there is abundant evidence that they were also used as places of ordinary Divine worship; this use also being dimly known to the Pagan Romans, so that their Christian fellow-citizens were often called a "skulking, darkness-loving race."

In using these galleries for the burial of the dead, the most ordinary practice was to excavate small coffin-like recesses, of the size of the body to be buried, in the sides of the gallery, tiers of these graves, like berths in a ship's cabin, occupying mile after mile of the galleries, in each of which a body has been laid, often that of a martyr, the aperture being then sealed with cemented slabs of stone or marble. On the outside surface of these slabs, or on the cement with which they are secured, an inscription was frequently cut, or marked with the end of a tool or the finger; and some of these inscriptions have proved valuable memorials of primitive Christianity, many indicating by the palm-branch what has been the fate of those whom they commemorate, others the occupation followed by the departed, and nearly all the faith with which Christians put their departed ones to rest in peace, in the "sure and certain hope" that there is "a resurrection unto eternal life."

In the time of fierce persecution it was to these cemeteries that the Bishops of Rome and their flock retired, and some portions of the galleries are excavated into larger spaces, which served the purpose of churches, and where the altar still occasionally remains. It is reported that, on one occasion, such a meeting of Christians for Divine worship was reported to one of the emperors, when he came with a troop of soldiers and blocked up the entrance, so as to prevent their escape.

Years afterwards the relics of this whole congregation were discovered in the place where they had been worshipping, and in their midst were the silver vessels in which the Holy Communion had been celebrated. Perhaps the cases were not few in which the catacombs were in the same hour the church and the grave of martyrs. Thus it is known that Bishop Stephen, who had retreated here, and lived in concealment for some time, was at last murdered as he sat in his episcopal chair. Thus, too, St. Cyprian, in his eightieth Epistle, tells his brother successors that Xystus (the fifth Bishop of Rome who had suffered in the ten years during which Cyprian himself had been bishop) had, with four deacons, on the eighth of the Ides of August, been martyred in the cemetery in which he was writing, and only just before his own time for a like end had arrived. So also Caius lived eight years in a catacomb, and then came forth to a cruel death in the persecution of Diocletian's days.

The practice of worshipping in the catacombs is mentioned by St. Jerome in his commentary on Ezekiel, where he says that while he was pursuing his studies at Rome [about A.D. 354] he was accustomed to go with others on Sundays to visit the sepulchres of the Apostles and martyrs. They frequently entered the crypts, or hiding-places, which were dug deep in the earth, and had on each side the bodies of the dead, laid in the walls, and there was seldom any light (though here and there a shaft was carried up into some private field or vineyard) to mitigate the gloom of the place. The catacombs were not used as burial-places after the fourth century.

Cataphrygians. [MONTANISTS.]

Catechism (from the Greek katechō, to teach orally).—Oral instruction in any science or art, conveyed by questions and answers. The word from which it is derived is used in Luke i. 4, "That thou mightest know the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed," margin, "wast taught by word of mouth" (Katēchēthēs). It is, therefore, particularly applied to elementary religious teaching, for the use of those who are about to be confirmed. So entirely was this the case in the early Church, that every person applying for admission into the Church by baptism was known as a catechumen. The teacher was known as a "catechist," and the position of the candidate was called that of the "Catechumenate," as we talk of the "Episcopate" and the "Diaconate." A person admitted to the Catechumenate was signed with the cross, and received imposition of hands. He was then regarded as a Christian, though not one of the fideles. He now became one of the Audientes, or hearers, who remained in church till the sermon was ended, then withdrew before the celebration of the sacrament.

Presently he became one of the Gonaflectentes, who were permitted to kneel while prayer was being said for them. Next came the Competentes, who learned the Creeds preparatory to being baptised.

Catechising somewhat declined after the establishment of Christianity. For, in the first place, infant baptism became the custom of the Church, parents became instructors, and in place of individual instruction came external organisation. Missionaries went into heathen lands and converted the rulers, who thereupon caused their subjects to embrace the Faith. Such was the process under the new state of things. It was the Reformation which gave an impulse to the revival of catechising. Luther, in 1529, put forth his Longer and Shorter Catechisms, the one for the use of teachers, the other for scholars, and these books are still the recognised textbooks in Germany and Scandinavia. Almost contemporaneously appeared the Catechism of the Gallican Reformed Church, and in England Cranmer followed the example. He drew up two books, The Institution of a Christian Man, and A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, which contained an explanation of the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer. These, and a somewhat voluminous work of the same character, published in 1548, formed the basis of the Church of England Catechism which appeared in the first Prayer-book of Edward VI. It is almost identical with the first part of that which we have now. This has been variously attributed to Nowell, Dean of St. Paul's, to Poynt, Bishop of Rochester [1550-1], and to Goodrich, Bishop of Ely. The Explanation of the Sacraments was added at the Hampton Court Conference in 1604, and is said to be the work of Bishop Overall. In the middle of the sixteenth century a proposal was made to have a more advanced Catechism, and one was drawn up by Poynt, which was published in Latin and English. There was also a third in Latin, for the use of schools, composed by Dean Nowell. It is probable that Overall composed the Explanation of the Sacraments from these two books.

The other great Catechism which the Reformation produced in Great Britain is that of the Westminster Confession, and this also appears in a double form. The shorter was published in 1646, the longer in 1647. It is the standard book in all Presbyterian churches. [WESTMINSTER CONFESSIO.] The first question and answer form a noble opening of this celebrated document:—

Q. What is the chief and highest end of man?

A. Man's chief and highest end is to glorify God, and fully to enjoy Him for ever.

The following is a short analysis of the longer Westminster Catechism:—

What man ought to believe concerning God.—His Existence, the Holy Trinity, Creation, Providence, the Fall, Original Sin and the Punishment of Sin, the Covenant of Grace both in the Old and New Testaments, the Mediator, the Incarnation, Christ's Offices, His Humiliation, Death, Resurrection, Ascension, Present Intercession, Future Judgment, Church, the Elect, Justification, Sanctification, Assurance.

The Duty of Man.—Obedience to the Moral Law, the Ten Commandments, what things make Sins more heinous, their Deservings, Ordinances of the Word, Sacraments, and Prayer, The Lord's Prayer.

The Council of Trent, recognising the force of the impulse in favour of catechising, drew up the Catechism which is the authoritative work of the Church of Rome, Catechismus Romanus ex Decreto Conc. Trident. It was published, under the authority of Pope Pius V., in 1566.

Catena (Lat., "a chain").—A continuous chronological collection of extracts from writers, to prove that a given doctrine as regards faith or morals has been held without break from the beginning.

Catena Aurea.—The name given to the Commentary on the Gospels by St. Thomas Aquinas. [AQUINAS.]

Catharine, St., Virgin and Martyr, is one of the most celebrated of saints, both in the Greek and Roman communions. Her name has been retained in the calendar of the English Church (November 25). She was a noble and rich lady of Alexandria, but the records of her life are so much adulterated that little can be certainly asserted about her, except that she was martyred in the reign of the Emperor Maximin. A favourite legend concerning her is that she was placed upon an engine made of four wheels joined together, and stuck with sharp-pointed spikes, which, being moved, might tear her to pieces, but that by angelic agency the wheels fell to pieces; she was at last beheaded. Hence she is represented with a wheel. From her great learning, and the pious use she made of it, she is regarded as the patron saint of Christian philosophy. Her relics are said to be preserved in the church of the monastery which bears her name on Mount Sinai.

Catharine, St., of Sienna.—Born in Sienna, 1347, died at Rome in 1380. Her father, James Benincasa, was a dyer by trade, and brought up his children virtuously. St. Catharine is said to have been so accomplished in mind and body as to have gained among her friends the name of Euphrosyna. When she was very young she withdrew into solitude a little way out of the town, and having privately vowed to God ever to remain a virgin, she entered a nunnery close to the Dominican convent. She practised the greatest bodily austerities, and nursed the sick poor through the most loathsome diseases, being often repaid only by ingratitude. St. Catharine is said to have been the means of converting many, and one convert, Nannes, gave her a house, which she turned into a nunnery. By order of her superior she went to Pisa, where a pestilence was raging. While there, the people of Tuscany entered into a league against the Holy See, and Pope Gregory XI., then residing at Avignon, finding all other measures fail, sent St. Catharine as mediatrix, who effected a reconciliation between the parties. She then went to Avignon, and persuaded the Pope to return to Rome, which had been forsaken by its bishops for the last seventy-four years. She took much to heart the scandal arising after the death of Gregory XI., in 1378, when Urban VI. and Clement VII. were both elected Pope, and while labouring to obtain obedience to Urban she died at Rome, in the thirty-third year of her life.

Catharine, St., of Bologna; born of noble parentage at Bologna in 1413, died 1463. At the age of twelve she became maid of honour in the family of the Princess Margaret, daughter of Nicholas of Est, Marquis of Ferrara. She had early shown great piety, and on the marriage of the princess, two years later, she joined a community of Ladies of the Third Order of St. Francis, at Ferrara, who afterwards formed themselves into a regular monastery of the austere rule of St. Clare. A new monastery of poor Clares being founded at Bologna, St. Catharine was chosen its first prioress. Here she led a most devoted and self-denying life. She was believed to be favoured with gifts of miracles and prophecy, and a book of her revelations was printed at Bologna in 1511. Her body, richly dressed, is still shown in the church of her convent through bars and glass.

Catharine, St., DE RICCI.—Born at Florence, of an ancient Tuscan family, in 1522. She was named Alexandrina, but took the name of Catharine at her religious profession. She was educated in the convent of Monticelli, whence she returned home for a time, but in her fourteenth year she with great difficulty gained her father's permission to retire from the world, and in the year 1535 took the veil in the convent of the Dominicanesses at Prat, in Tuscany. After a long illness she died in 1589, at the age of sixty-seven.

Cathedral.—The principal church of a diocese, so called from its being the church in which the cathedra, the seat or throne of the bishop, as head of the diocese, is placed. A cathedral is usually much larger than other churches, and numerous clergy are associated with it, as canons, honorary canons, and minor canons. In recent times the cathedrals of the Church of England have assumed a more congregational character, being much more frequented by the laity than was formerly the case, especially on Sundays and festival occasions.

Some notice of each of the cathedrals will be found under the name of the bishopric to which it belongs. It may be mentioned here, however, that they are divided into two classes: those of the Old Foundation and those of the New Foundation. The cathedrals of the Old Foundation were never monastic churches, their clergy being "secular canons." These are York, St. Paul's, Chichester, Exeter, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln, Salisbury, Wells, St. Asaph, Bangor, St. David's, Llandaff. The cathedrals of the New Foundation were those which were the churches of monasteries as well as cathedrals, the clergy of which were monks before the Reformation. When the English monasteries were abolished, it became necessary to replace them in cathedrals by secular canons, and charters founding the cathedral corporations anew were granted for this purpose. The monastic cathedrals were Canterbury, Durham, Winchester, Bath, Carlisle, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, and Worcester; and these, with all those of sees founded since the Reformation, are cathedrals of the New Foundation.

The officials connected with a cathedral are generally—the dean, canons, archdeacons of the diocese, honorary canons, minor canons, lay clerks, choristers, organist, chapter clerk, architect, master of grammar school, vergers, bedesmen.

Catholic, from Greek katholikos, "universal." The word seems to have been given originally to the Christian Church to contrast it with the Jewish, which was national, and is traceable as an epithet of the Church up to the time of the Apostles' Creed. It expresses the universality of the Church, spread in all times, places, and amongst all the nations of the earth. In ancient times the word Catholic was a title of dignity. Vicared, King of the Goths in Spain, after he had driven the Arians out of his territories, in 585, was proclaimed Catholic by the Council of Toledo. The title, however, seems to have fallen into desuetude until Ferdinand, King of Aragon, after he had cleared all his kingdom of the Moors, reassumed it in 1492, and since that time it has become hereditary to his successors. In like manner Philip of Valois, King of France, for defending the rights of the Church, was honoured with the title of Most Christian King and of Eldest Son of the Church; the King of Poland, that of Orthodox; the King of Navarre, that of Most Faithful; while the Kings of Great Britain have retained the title of Defender of the Faith, conferred upon Henry VIII. by Pope Leo X., before he separated from the Communion of Rome.

The word "Catholic" has been claimed exclusively to itself by the Church of Rome, and vulgar speech has often conceded it, Romanists often being spoken of as "Catholics." But the repetition of this word in our Creeds is sufficient proof that the Anglican Church does not make this concession. (See Pearson on the Creed, art. ix.)

Catholic Apostolick Church.—The name assumed by the body of Christians which, by the rest of the Christian world, is known as LEVINGITES (q.v.).

Catholic Emancipation Act.—The Act passed in April, 1829, to remove from the Roman Catholics the political disabilities which they had so long suffered. (See Cassell's Dictionary of English History, s.v.)

Cecil, RICHARD, one of the principal leaders of the Evangelical party, was born in Chiswell Street, London, November 8th, 1748; his father was a scarlet-dyer to the East India Company, and his mother the daughter of a London merchant. Mrs. Cecil belonged to a Nonconformist body, and at first it seemed as if the early religious training of her boy would have borne fruit according to her heart's desire, but as he grew up he imbibed infidel views, which he proceeded to instil into others, and with such success, that long years afterwards it cost him much distress that in some cases he was powerless to undo his mischievous work. He was destined for business, but his tastes were artistic and literary, and he could not be persuaded to give his mind to mercantile pursuits. It was while idling at home, and hardening his heart by devouring all the sceptical literature that came in his way, that suddenly he began to reflect on his mother's patience under her many trials, and to wonder at its cause, and he came to the conclusion that it was through prayer and the study of the Bible that she gained her strength. He read religious books and heard preaching, till at length, though by slow degrees, the whole bent of his life was changed. His father, who was a Churchman, though apparently a careless and worldly man, declared that if he connected himself with any body of Dissenters he would give him no help, but that if he would enter the Church he would bear the expense of his university career, and accordingly Richard Cecil entered Queen's College, Oxford, on the 19th of May, 1773. He was ordained in 1776, and took temporary charge of the three churches of Thornton, Bagworth, and Markefield, in Lincolnshire; and whereas he found scarcely any religion in either of these places, he left them all with flourishing congregations. His living at Lewes was worth only £80 a year, and his health was not good. In 1780 he was appointed minister of St. John's, Bedford Row, a proprietary chapel, which had been built to accommodate those parishioners of St. Andrew's, Holborn, who were scandalised by the preaching of Dr. Sacheverell. St. John's was in such a dilapidated state that poverty almost compelled Cecil to refuse the incumbency, but friends and admirers came forward with promises of support, and he entered on it. At the same time he held three lectureships, one in Spitalfields, one in Long Acre, and another at Orange Street Chapel; none, however, were very remunerative, and one was a source rather of expense. His work at St. John's was very difficult; his supporters expected him to preach at once as he had done at his London lectures, but he found those about him so utterly ignorant, that he had to begin with the very simplest truths, and lead them gradually on to the full measure of the Gospel. At length, in spite of coldness from those who should have aided him, his work was crowned with success, and, gathering around him a large congregation, he became one of the best known evangelical preachers of his day. He had both good manner and good matter in preaching, and a wonderful power of gaining and keeping the attention of his hearers; if all else failed, he would startle them into listening by some thrilling announcement. He could adapt himself to any class of hearers, and had a great facility in introducing telling illustrations into his sermons, but always in a natural and easy manner. He was a great student of character, and herein lay much of his power. In 1800 the two small livings of Chobham and Bisleigh were given to him, but he only served them personally in summer. A few only of his sermons have been published, and they have been regarded as models; he had intended to publish many more, but when his health failed he enjoined his wife to burn them. His Visit to the House of Mourning was much valued at one time. We are indebted for most that is known of Richard Cecil to the notes of Bishop Wilson, of Calcutta, and his friend and biographer, Archdeacon Wilson. He was the founder of the Eclectic Society, instituted in 1783 to supply the lack of clerical meetings, such as we have in the present day. The first meeting was held at the "Castle and Falcon" Inn, in Aldersgate Street, four persons being present—John Newton, H. Foster, Richard Cecil, and Eli Bates; afterwards fortnightly meetings were held in the vestry of St. John's, where all sorts of religious subjects were discussed. Cecil was never a strong man, and his feeble health often prevented his taking as active a part in the evangelical movement as some of his friends. In 1807 he was seized with paralysis, a second stroke followed next year, and apoplexy ended his life on August 16th, 1810.

Cecilia, Sr.—Although the name of this saint has been kept in the calendar, and her memory cherished for many centuries, nothing is known of her actual history. Tradition says that she was martyred with her husband, Valerian, whom she had converted to Christianity. She is always considered to be the patron saint of music, and in the ninth century Paschal I. built a church for the reception of her relics, leaving money for the maintenance of a perpetual song of praise. There is another legend about her to which Dryden refers in his "Ode to St. Cecilia," when he says she is able "to draw an angel down."

Cecilian. [DONATISTS.]

Celebrant.—A term sometimes applied to the person who officiates at Holy Communion, as distinct from those who assist him.

Celebration.—A technical term, applied to the solemn performance of religious offices, as the celebration of Holy Communion, &c. Also the offering of acts of praise to God for any special instance of His mercy, or in reference to any of His perfections.

Celestine I., Str., a Roman by birth, succeeded Boniface I. as Bishop of Rome in 423, and held the seat eight years, five months, and three days. It is told of him that in his time some innovators in the provinces of Narbonne and Vienna, insisting upon the passage of Scripture, "Let your loins be girt," persuaded the clergy to change their former dress, and to wear great cloaks, girded with belts. Thereupon he wrote, in 428, a long epistle to the bishops of the two provinces, condemning this abuse. The great events of his pontificate were two: (1) the Council of Ephesus in 430, at which Nestorius was condemned [EPHESUS], and (2) the dispute about appeals of the African clergy to the Pope of Rome, which had made so much noise in the time of Zosimus (q.v.), and which was now raised again. The Bishops of the African Synod having sent their legates into the East to inspect the records of the Council of Nice, these legates brought a copy of the records back with them, which clearly destroyed the pretence of appeals to Rome, and determined the controversy on the side of the African Bishops; upon which they wrote a letter to Pope Celestine, defended the privileges of their churches, and denounced the Pope's insistence upon appeals as a piece of secular vanity and encroachment.

Celestines.—In the Romish Church, a religious Order established in the thirteenth century, so called from their founder, Pope Celestine V. They spread rapidly at first, but there are but a few convents of them at present. These monks followed the Order of St. Benedict, wore white garments with black capes and scapularies, and were devoted entirely to a contemplative life.

Celestius, a disciple of Pelagius. A somewhat obscure passage in Jerome leaves it doubtful whether he was an Italian or an Irishman. A contemporary says he was of noble birth, and a skilful pleader at the bar. He travelled with Pelagius to Rome, and thence to Africa, where he applied to be ordained priest, but Paulinus, a deacon of Julian, who was then in Africa, charged him with heterodoxy before Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, A.D. 411. The charge against him was the denial of original sin. Aurelius convened a council, by which Celestius was condemned and expelled from Africa. He appealed from this bar to the See of Rome; but, without taking any care to follow this appeal, set sail for Ephesus, where he was ordained priest, and firmly maintained his opinions. Pelagius having been delated by Eros, Bishop of Aix, and Lazarus, Bishop of Arles, to the Council of Diospolis in Palestine, A.D. 415, Celestius's doctrine was condemned there, and it is noticeable that Pelagius disclaimed it. The African Bishops, in the year 416, repeated the censure of the heresy of Pelagius and Celestius, and wrote to Pope Innocent, who agreed with their decision, A.D. 417. After the death of this Pope, Celestius, driven out of Asia by Atticus, Bishop of Constantinople, came to Rome, and waiting upon Zosimus, Pope Innocent's successor, laid a confession of his faith before him, took a great deal of pains to wipe off the imputation of heterodoxy, and declared himself willing to submit to his judgment. Zosimus, who was pleased by the deference shown to his see, put several questions to him, examined his confession of faith, and postponed his decision for two months. In the meantime he censured Eros and Lazarus, and wrote favourably of Celestius to the African Bishops. The indignant Africans, not at all checked by the Pope's opinion, held a council at Carthage at the end of the year 417, and confirmed their former censure. Zosimus, somewhat awakened by their remonstrances, summoned Celestius before him, but the latter, no doubt feeling that his case was hopeless, left Rome immediately. Upon this Zosimus condemned him, and approved the decisions of the African councils. In the year 419 the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius published an edict against Celestius. He seems to have gone to Constantinople, but found himself rejected there; thence he returned to Rome, and it is said that he retired with Pelagius into Great Britain, but this is uncertain. He is also said to have died in a Sicilian monastery. His tenets are to be gathered from the writings of St. Augustine against him. Some remains of his writings are found in Augustine's book, De Gratia et Peccato Originali.

Celibacy.—The unmarried state to which, according to the discipline of the Church of Rome, the clergy are bound, as are other persons who pledge themselves to it by a special vow. In the Jewish Church the priests lived in marriage, but were forbidden to marry a harlot, or a woman who had been divorced, or even a widow. We know that some of the Apostles of Christ were married, though St. Paul expressed the opinion that there were certain circumstances which made it better not to marry. This is a passage of his writings worth considering, for it is much relied upon by advocates of celibacy.

It is the seventh chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. Now, by a thorough consideration of this chapter it appears, firstly, that in some cases the Apostle advises marriage without exception of any order of person (verse 9). Secondly, he leaves it to choice and discretion. Thirdly, he recommends single life, not upon the score of merit, but of convenience, because the Church was likely to fall under a state of persecution (verse 28). Fourthly, that the advice was not particularly directed to the clergy, but to Christians in general. The Apostle nowhere limits his discourse to the former, but all along applies himself to believers in common. Indeed, some of the greatest divines of the Church of Rome have owned the celibacy of the clergy as neither of Divine nor Apostolical institution. Thus in the Canon Law, which may be looked upon as the sense of the Church of Rome for some ages, we have Gratian saying, "The marriage of priests is forbidden neither by evangelical, legal, nor by apostolical authority; but for all that it is altogether prohibited by the laws of the Church."

St. Paul, elsewhere, not only does not forbid, but even expressly permits, marriage to the clergy. For, laying down the qualifications of a bishop, in the Epistle to Titus he proposes this as one, "that he be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children." In the ancient Church many persons were admitted to holy orders who had their wives living and dwelling with them. In the Apostolical Constitutions the Apostles were introduced in this manner: "We have ordered that a bishop, priest, or deacon should be the husband of one wife, whether their wives be alive or dead." The preference for single life seems to have been started by Tertullian, who in the latter part of his time, being led away with the enthusiasms of Montanus, endeavoured to refine upon the Christian religion, and strain it up to angelical perfection. We may likewise observe that the excessive commendation of virginity and ignorance grew together, and that the reputation of celibacy was highest when knowledge was at the lowest ebb, as will appear to any one who considers the history of the tenth and eleventh centuries, and compares them with the other periods of the Church; whereas, when the argument is impartially considered, it will be found that there is no intrinsic excellence in single life above that of marriage, and that the imputations of discredit and disadvantage thrown upon marriage are no better than a reflection upon the state of creation and the order of Providence. That sobriety is not inconsistent with marriage appears plainly by the Apostle's assuring us "that marriage is honourable in all men, and the bed undefiled" [Heb. xiii. 4]. In the Council of Nice, when the celibacy of the clergy was proposed, under the pretence of promoting chastity, the celebrated Confessor and Bishop Paphnutius declared that cohabitation with a lawful wife was chastity, and was applauded for his sentence by the whole Council. He added that, though he had lived all his lifetime in celibacy, yet he did not think this yoke ought to be imposed upon the clergy. Clement of Alexandria affirms that just men under the old law had children, and lived in marriage with sobriety. "What," says he, "cannot people cohabit in matrimony with the character of temperance? Without all doubt: let us not, therefore, attempt to dissolve a union of God's institution" [Stromata, lib. 3]. And St. Ambrose says—"The Apostle commands a bishop to be the husband of one wife, not that he excludes an unmarried man, for that is farther than the precept reaches. There is, therefore, no more meant by this qualification than that by conjugal chastity he may guard his virtue, and preserve the grace given him in baptism" [Ambrose, Epist. 82, ad Verceil.].

To put the case in a single sentence, the celibacy of the clergy was looked upon as a thing indifferent in the first two centuries, was proposed in the third, magnified in the fourth, and in some places imposed in the fifth.

But, notwithstanding that it gained ground in some provinces of the West, celibacy never universally prevailed even there till the thirteenth or fourteenth century. In the East it has never been imposed or practised from the Apostles' time to the present age. It is very noticeable that among all the heresies from the Apostles' time to the Council of Nice, there was scarcely one which did not either condemn or decry marriage, and laud celibacy as a most perfect state. Thus did Saturninus, the Cerinthians, Basilidians, Marcionites, and Carpocratians; to whom we may add Tatian and many others.

Cellites or Cellite.—This name, derived from cella, "a cell," was given in early days to a class of monks midway between hermits and cenobites. They lived alone like hermits, but, unlike them, repaired at festivals to the church of the monastery to which they had attached themselves. In the middle ages the name was applied to a religious order, founded in 1300, which had houses at Antwerp, Louvain, Malines, Cologne, and other German towns; their special work was to nurse the sick poor and to bury the dead. They are sometimes called Alexians, from their founder, Alexius, a Roman, but they were a branch of the BÉGHARDS (q.v.).

Celsus.—A Greek philosopher, who wrote in the second century against Christianity, and was answered by Origen. Celsus's book has perished, and nothing is known of it or its author except what can be gathered from Origen's answer.

Cemetery (Gr. koinotērion, i.e. "a place to sleep in").—Applied by Christians, to whom death itself is but a sleep, to the place of burial. A cemetery is thus a place or piece of ground set apart for the burial of the dead who have "fallen asleep in Jesus." By later usage the term is applied to any burial-ground.

Canobite. [MONASTICISM.]

Cenotaph (Gr. kenos, "empty," and taphos, "a sepulchre").—A monument erected to the memory of a person buried in another place.

Cense.—To perfume with incense.

Censer. [THURIBLE.]

Censures, ECCLESIASTICAL.—The judicial sentences of the Church upon offenders against doctrine or morals. Thus men may be deprived of the Communion, or priests may be suspended from officiating. The different kinds of censure are the following: Excommunication cuts off from the Communion of the Church; Suspension forbids the use of the Ecclesiastical Functions, either wholly or with respect to some branches; Deposition degrades an ecclesiastic, and deprives him of his Orders; an Interdict in the Church of Rome forbids the administering of the Sacraments and performance of Divine Service in public.

When censure is passed by law made for the occasion it is said to be a jure; when by a superior for some particular fact it is ad homines. Censures lata sententia are incurred by committing a prohibited action, without any need of judgment pronounced; while sententia ferenda, though deserved, are not incurred until judgment is given by an officer commissioned for the purpose. Censures reserved are such as the superior who passes them reserves to himself the right of absolving from; those not reserved may be removed by an ordinary minister.

Centuries of Magdeburg.—The first comprehensive work of the Protestants on the history of the Christian Church was so called, because it was divided into centuries (each volume containing the events of one hundred years), and was first written at Magdeburg. Matthias Flaccius formed the plan of it in 1552, in order to prove the agreement of the Lutheran doctrine with that of the primitive Christians, and the difference between the latter and that of the Roman Catholics. Baronius wrote his Annals in opposition to the Centuries.

Cerdo.—The founder of an heretical sect in the second century; he was a Syrian Gnostic, whose teaching was very similar to that of Simon Magus. He held that there existed two principles, one good and one evil, equal to each other, and between these an intermediate deity, neither perfectly good nor perfectly evil, but with power to reward and punish. The evil principle was the Supreme

Being; the good principle, the unknown Father of Jesus Christ; the middle deity, the Creator of the inferior world, and the God and Lawgiver of the Jews. The Cerdonians rejected the whole of the Old Testament, and many parts of the New, accepting only the Gospel of St. Luke, and that in part, and portions of St. Paul's Epistles. They denied the Incarnation of our Saviour, saying that He was clothed with immaterial flesh, and that His sufferings were, therefore, not real; they also rejected the doctrine of the Resurrection. The name Cerdonians did not long survive; their tenets are confuted in treatises against the Marcionites. [MARCIONITES.]

Ceremony.—The derivation of this word is uncertain. Professor Skeat derives it from Sanskrit, Karman, "an action or rite." It is used in Shakespeare of ornaments:—

"Disrobe the images,
If you do find them deck'd with ceremonies."
Julius Cæsar, i. 1.

In law a ceremony is distinguished from a rite in consisting of gestures or acts accompanied, preceded, or followed by the utterance of words, whereas a rite is a service expressed in words. The use of ceremonies in religious acts is based upon the fact that man is a compound being, consisting of soul and body. If he were purely spiritual, sensible ceremonies would be superseded; being what he is, God demands the dedication of both his natures to His service. Hooker, in the second book of his Ecclesiastical Polity, has the most complete defence existing of the Ceremonial of the Church of England. Our Lord sanctioned the use of ceremonies, not only by following the prescribed ritual of the Jewish Law, but also by using things indifferent, not prescribed, but which had become parts of Jewish practice. Thus He joined in the synagogue worship, kept the Feast of Dedication, though it was not commanded in the Law (John vii.), used the Cup of Charity at the Passover (Luke xxii. 17), and sat down with the twelve, though the original command was to eat the feast standing.

It is generally held, with Calvin, that not only ceremonies which are for reverence and decency may be observed, but also those which are purely symbolical, so long as the doctrine symbolised is true. Even Bucer approved the sign of the cross in baptism, a ceremony which to many of the Reformers was peculiarly objectionable.

Of late years controversy has arisen in the Church of England concerning ceremonies which have been revived in some congregations, and which were prescribed in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., but were abolished in the second. The revivers took their stand on the ORNAMENTS RUBRIC (q.v.), and maintained that it restored the ceremonies in question, and also that the experience of years has shown that the neglect of ceremonial has been accompanied with a weakening of religious life. Each of the ceremonies thus introduced will be discussed under its own head. The controversy has been carried through the law courts, the defenders maintaining that what is not forbidden may lawfully be used, so long as it does not contravene the spirit of the Liturgy, their opponents holding that non-commandment involves prohibition. The case is thus stated by the late Dr. A. J. Stephens, in his Annotated Book of Common Prayer :—

"In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. there were many ceremonies prescribed which have not been retained; thus water was enjoined to be mixed with the wine in the administration of the Lord's Supper, and crossing in the consecration prayer; the bread was to be unleavened and round; exorcism was used in the office of baptism, and the infant anointed, after being dipped thrice, and having the chrisom put upon him; the bishop was to cross the confirmed person in the forehead; a ring and other tokens of spousage, as gold or silver, were to be given in matrimony; the sick person, upon desire, was to be anointed on the forehead or the breast; the priest was to cast earth upon the corpse, and to commend the soul to God; the church woman was to offer her chrisom; and crossing, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, were permitted to be used. These are ceremonies in the strictest sense; and it was for these that this preface ["Of Ceremonies," in the English Prayer Book] was made to apologise, more than for the few ceremonies which are now retained."

The result of the litigation to which we have referred was the judgment of the court that certain ceremonies were unlawful [FOLKESTONE RITUAL JUDGMENT], but the defenders took objection to the constitution of the court, and many have refused to obey it. In a few cases the clergy were deprived of their livings in consequence, and a Royal Commission was appointed, at the instance of the late Archbishop Tait, to examine the whole question of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the matter must be said to be still unsettled. [ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS; RITUALISM.]

Cerinthus.—A Gnostic teacher, who flourished in the reign of Domitian, A.D. 81—96. Born in Judæa, he was educated at Alexandria, but returned to his native country to teach his peculiar tenets; finally he settled at Ephesus, where he was opposed by the Apostle John. According to a well-known tradition, St. John, upon one occasion, entering the public bath at Ephesus, saw Cerinthus within, and immediately rushed out, saying, "Let us flee, lest the bath fall in, as long as Cerinthus, that enemy of the truth, is within."

The accounts of Cerinthus and his teaching are all by his opponents, and it is only fair to remember this fact. Like other Gnostics, he is alleged to have claimed special knowledge, revealed to him by higher powers; he asserted that there would be an earthly kingdom of Christ, lasting for one thousand years, and that this kingdom would be marked by sensual pleasures, or, as he expressed it, by "nuptial festivals." Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, says that Cerinthus was himself "a voluptuary, and altogether sensual." Unlike his predecessor, Simon Magus, Cerinthus did not pretend to be anything more than a teacher. He taught that the Creator of the world was an angel distinct from and inferior to the Supreme God, and that this creating angel was the author of the Old Testament; he taught, too, that Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary, and that His higher nature descended upon Him at His baptism, and left Him before His crucifixion. Cerinthus appears certainly to have believed in the resurrection of the body, and so could not have agreed with the other Gnostics in regarding matter as altogether evil. So, too, he differed from them in regarding the Creator as not hostile to the Supreme God, but unconsciously an instrument in His hands.

Chad or Ceadda, the patron saint of Lichfield, was one of four brothers, who were all priests, and one of whom, Cedd, was Bishop of the East Saxons—i.e., of London. Little is known of Chad's birth and parentage, except that he was a native of Northumbria, and a pupil of Aidan, after whose death he went to Ireland in 661. Cedd had established a monastery at Lastingham, in Yorkshire, and at his death bequeathed the charge of it to Chad, his younger brother.

At this time the see of York was vacant, and Wilfrid, a priest, was sent to France to be consecrated by Ægilbert, Bishop of Paris, there being at the time no Archbishop of Canterbury. King Oswy was offended at the slight which he considered had been offered to the English Church, and sent to Lastingham for St. Chad to be consecrated to the see. As Wilfrid had not yet returned to England, St. Chad had no hesitation in accepting the office, to which he was consecrated (in A.D. 666) by Wini, Bishop of Wessex, and two other bishops, who differed from the Roman Church about the proper date for celebrating Easter. For this reason Theodore, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, declared that St. Chad was not legally bishop, but, after conversation with Chad, he himself confirmed the appointment. St. Chad, however, retired in favour of Wilfrid, and was shortly afterwards appointed to the bishopric of the Mercians at Lichfield. It was his custom to travel through his diocese on foot, until commanded by the archbishop to ride in a waggon when journeying any great distance. He died three years after his appointment to Lichfield, in March, 673. His name is retained in the Church of England Calendar, March 2.

Chalcedon. [COUNCILS.]

Chalice (Lat. calix, "a cup").—The cup used at the Holy Communion. The word is used in one of the side-rubrics of the Consecration Prayer.

Chalmers, THOMAS, D.D., LL.D., born at Anstruther, in Fifeshire, March 17th, 1780, died at Morningside, Edinburgh, May 30th, 1847. He was brought up in strict Calvinism, educated at St. Andrew's University, and licensed to preach when in his nineteenth year. At first he was so absorbed in the study of mathematics and natural science that he neglected his profession, and when in 1803 he was ordained minister of Kilmany, he opened voluntary classes in his favourite subjects at the University of St. Andrew's, nine miles distant. In 1808 he published his Inquiry into the Extent and Stability of National Resources, which attracted much notice for the originality of its views in political economy. But soon after this, domestic calamities, and an illness which nearly cost him his life, caused him to think more seriously of his religious profession, and while preparing an article for Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopedia on "Christianity," he became so impressed that he altered the whole course of his life, and devoted himself earnestly to pastoral duties. And one of the first visible results was that the whole aspect of his congregation at Kilmany changed. They no longer looked at him with stupid wonder, but with fixed and reverent attention. Instead of empty seats, there was now a throng, not only from the village, but from neighbouring places, some coming from St. Andrew's, Dundee. In July, 1815, he was chosen minister of the Tron Church, Glasgow, and here his eloquent preaching made a great sensation, as it did the following year in London. Huskisson, Wilberforce, Canning, were all electrified by him. In 1816 he delivered seven Discourses on the Christian Revolution, Viewed in Connection with Modern Astronomy; they were published in 1817, and had a great popularity. In 1819, wishing to devote himself more to the care of the poor, and to test his own schemes for providing for them, he removed to St. John's parish, in Glasgow, where the population of 12,000 consisted entirely of the working classes; here he established schools, and organised several schemes. He divided and subdivided his parish, and himself superintended the working of the machinery, and regularly visited each family. At the commencement of this ministry he employed the services of a young man who afterwards himself became famous, EDWARD IRVING (q.v.). In 1823 he became professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrew's, and in 1828 was transferred to the chair of theology in Edinburgh. In 1833 came his Bridgewater Treatise on the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man, which was received with immense favour, and gained him, in the words of Dr. Hanna, "literary honours such as were never united previously in the person of any Scottish ecclesiastic;" the Royal Society of Edinburgh and the French Institute electing him as a fellow of their respective bodies, while the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L. In 1834 he was made convener of the Church Extension Committee, and laboured with such energy that in the course of seven years 220 new churches were built and upwards of £300,000 had been subscribed by the nation. But now came the collision which led to the great disruption. [SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF.] Of the seceders Chalmers was the most illustrious. He had foreseen the catastrophe and provided for it, and when the Free Church was formed, in 1843, he was elected the first Moderator; and it was largely through his prudence that the new body obtained so large a hold upon public opinion. But he steadily declared that he held fast to the Establishment principle and the theology in which he had been educated. He resigned, as a matter of course, his Professorship on his secession, and immediately became Principal and Theological Professor of New College, founded by the seceders. He preached to overflowing congregations in London in May, 1847, returned to Edinburgh on the 28th of that month, and three days later was found dead in his bed. He published his own works in 25 vols., to which 9 more were added posthumously by his biographer, Dr. Hanna.

Chamier, DANIEL [1565—1621].—A great French Protestant divine. It is said that he drew up the Edict of Nantes. He was many times a commissioner for his party in important business, and also president or moderator in several synods. The time he spent in secular business and studies did not hinder him from being a skilful controversialist, of which he gave proof in his conference with Father Cotton, and in his writings, the most considerable of which is his Panstratia Catholica, where he handles the controversy between the Protestants and Roman Catholics with a great deal of learning. His work against Bellarmine, though consisting of four volumes in folio, is not complete. An abridgment of it was made by Spanheim.

Chancel.—The upper end of the church, in modern churches generally the east end; containing the Lord's Table, the sedilia and desks for the clergy, and usually for the choir as well. The floor is commonly raised above the general level, though not always so. It is characteristic of some very old churches that the chancel is depressed a step (e.g., at Monkton, in the Isle of Thanet). The name chancel is derived from the lattice, screen, or railing (cancelli) by which this part is separated from the rest of the church.* In former times the chancel was held to be so sacred that, in time of Divine Service, the laity were not permitted to enter it. It was called the "sanctuary," the "Holy," the "Inaccessible." In the midst stood the altar, at a sufficient distance from the wall in the rear to admit of a tier of seats for the bishop and his presbyters, with a space between them and the back of the altar. On one side was the prothesis, or side table, and on the other a place for the deacons.

In the churches of the present day, chancels are variously constructed, and innovations have been made on the primitive model, corresponding with changes of circumstances and variations of opinion and taste. The main design of the chancel has, however, been invariably preserved, viz., the placing in it of the altar, or communion table.

There has been a very considerable amount of controversy from time to time in the English Church concerning the use of the chancel and its furniture. In 1549 the Rubric ordered that the service should be said "in the Quire." Bucer and other reformers declaimed against this, and in 1552 (second Prayer Book of Edward VI.) service was ordered to be "said in such place of the church, chancel, or chapel, and the minister shall so turn himself as that the people best shall hear." At the same time, to prevent wanton destruction, it was added that "the chancels shall remain as in times past." In Queen Elizabeth's Prayer Book the service was to be said "in the accustomed place," which was generally the chancel; at the same time discretion was left to the ordinary to modify the order according to convenience. Some ordinaries used this discretion to order a "reading pew," i.e., reading desk, outside the chancel in the body of the church, and in course of years this reading pew became an established institution in the majority of churches for the morning and evening prayer.

But a further discretion came to be used with respect to chancels. As they were "in times past" was found to mean differently, according to circumstances. In some churches, especially cathedrals and collegiate churches, the altar remained attached to the east wall. In others it had been removed, and a table placed in the body of the church. But, says Nicholls [Commentary on the C.P.], "this latitude being granted, several inconveniences arose. Great irreverence was used towards the holy table, hats and gloves were thrown upon it, and the churchwardens and overseers were frequently writing their accounts thereon, the processioning boys eating their loaves and cakes, and dogs leaping up at the bread, to the great scandal of our Reformation, not only among the Papists, but also among the Protestant churches abroad." One of Queen Elizabeth's injunctions was, "That the holy table in every church be decently made, and set in the place where the altar stood, and there commonly covered, as thereto belongeth, and so stand." Archbishop Laud enforced uniformity on this point, ordering that the Communion Table should stand "altarwise, at the east end of the chancel, and be railed in." The Revolution threw all this into confusion, but at the Restoration the ancient custom was reverted to, and has ever since so remained.

The chancel of a church is the rector's freehold, and he is therefore bound to keep it in order. But where the rector is a layman the law has decided that he is not entitled to make a vault or affix tablets in the chancel without the leave of the ordinary.

Chancellor of a Diocese.—The word Chancellor was originally applied to the secretary who sat in a place railed in (in cancellis) to take down the judge's sentence in a court of law, or to act as the king's private secretary, and stand between him and his subjects. Thus we still have the Lord Chancellor, "the keeper of the Queen's conscience," as symbolised by his holding the Great Seal. The diocesan chancellor is the keeper of the seals of an archbishop or bishop, and judge of his diocesan court. This office now includes those of Official Principal, whose duty is to hear and decide matters of temporal cognisance determinable in the bishop's court, and Vicar-General, who exercises the jurisdiction properly spiritual, when the bishop himself is hindered by infirmities or other impediments. The diocesan chancellor is now generally a layman.

Chandler, EDWARD [born 1670; Bishop of Lichfield 1717, of Durham 1730; died 1750].—One of the ablest Christian apologists of his century. His chief work, A Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, was drawn forth by a work of the deist Collins, A Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, in which the latter had denied that the Old Testament prophecies had occasioned any Messianic expectation at the time when our Lord was born. Chandler's work displayed great rabbinical and general research. Collins replied with The Scheme of Literal Prophecy Considered, and the controversy closed with Chandler's rejoinder. "It was," says Mr. Overton, "the most solid and profound, if not the most brilliant work which the Deistical controversy had yet called forth."—English Church in the Eighteenth Century, i. 194.

Chandler, SAMUEL [1693—1766].—An eminent minister for forty years of the Presbyterian Church in the Old Jewry, City. He was the lifelong friend of both Archbishop Secker and Bishop Butler, having been educated with them at a dissenting school. On one occasion he heard Bishop

* The verb "to cancel" means literally to draw diagonal lines across writing, as denoting that it is thereby invalidated.

Gooch, of Norwich, deliver his charge, and remonstrated against some expressions in it. The result was a correspondence and a discussion, in which Gooch, who passed for a High Churchman, displayed and received most friendly feelings, and Sherlock, who joined in the discussion, was also much delighted with Chandler, and large overtures were made towards proposals for union. Chandler wished to have the Thirty-nine Articles expressed in Scripture words solely, to discontinue the Athanasian Creed, and to consent to the Episcopal ordination of dissenting ministers, provided it did not of necessity imply any invalidity in previous Orders. It is not known whether these proposals were actually pressed on the ministry by the bishops, but probably they were. (See Mr. Abbey's chapter in The English Church in the Eighteenth Century, i. 407.) Chandler's Commentaries on some of St. Paul's Epistles are largely quoted, as is also his Life of David, in D'Oyly and Mant's Bible.

Channing, WILLIAM ELLERY [1780—1842]. The most celebrated Unitarian preacher of modern times, and one of the noblest of philanthropists. He was born at Newport, Rhode Island, United States, the son of a judge. Both father and mother were Calvinists of deep religious feeling. After graduating at Harvard College, he passed through a time of very anxious religious doubt, which occasioned him such suffering as permanently enfeebled his health, but emerging from it he became a preacher in Boston. His fire and eloquence, as well as his personal character, drew large congregations, who soon discovered that their preacher was really an Arian. He was, however, so eagerly bent on the redress of social and moral evils, that he had hardly formulated with definiteness his own creed. It was a time of much controversy in America, parties dividing themselves into "Anti-Trinitarian" and "Anti-Calvinistic." Channing became the spokesman of both, but his endeavours to recognise the unity between "all lovers of truth and followers of Christ, both on earth and in heaven," caused him to be much esteemed by men of all schools.

Though the theology of Channing is unmistakably Unitarian, it has nothing in common with the coldness of Priestly or the coarseness of Belsham. He combats the traditional views of the Atonement, and of human depravity, and emphasises the "human element" in the character of Christ, but he maintains firmly the sinlessness, the miracles, and the Resurrection of Christ. One of his sermons on the Resurrection was preached, without acknowledgment, not long ago by a celebrated preacher in the cathedral of which he is a canon. Channing's last sermons were among his noblest. His literary essays, too, are of supreme beauty, notably that on Milton.

But high among all his works rank his labours for the abolition of slavery, for the promotion of temperance, and for the reform of prisons. A Roman Catholic writer calls him "the American Fénelon." He died at Bennington, Vermont, October 2, 1842. The centenary of his birth was the occasion of the publication of his works in one compact and very cheap volume. The best life of him is by his nephew, the late Rev. W. H. Channing. It has gone through many editions.

Chant.—A form of singing in which a portion of the words is recited without bars on one note, this recitation being followed, and sometimes preceded, by a musical progression. This kind of music is chiefly used for prose compositions, though occasionally it is employed for hymns. Thus, the well-known hymn, "My God, my Father, while I stray," is familiar to most of us as sung to Troyte's simple chant.

The chant is doubtless the oldest form of Church music, and is one of the most valuable, enabling prose compositions to be sung without being subjected to the necessity of being thrown into metrical form. And the recitation, as distinguished from music in strict time, enables the words to be sung more rapidly.

The chant is divided into two parts, and the colon placed in the middle of each verse of the Prayer-Book version of the Psalms, marks the division for chant use. It does not necessarily mark any break in the sense. Thus, Ps. xlv. 2, "My tongue is the pen : of a ready writer."

The oldest form of chant the name of which has come down to us, is the Ambrosian, this name being derived from St. Ambrose, who is said to have laid down definite rules and principles for the singing of the psalms and hymns of Divine Service, taking for his model the system of the Eastern Church. Little, however, is known of his mode. It is also thought, but not certainly known, that his plan substituted Antiphonal singing—i.e., the singing verse by verse between two alternate choirs—for the previous Italian Responsorial method, by which a single chorister was answered regularly by the entire choir. The fine composition which is called the Ambrosian Te Deum is well known, but it is doubtful how far it has been modified since St. Ambrose's day, if he was the author of it at all.

It is not until we come to Gregory the Great, however, that we have any certain knowledge of Church chanting. The "tones" which are named after him [GREGORIAN TONES] are still largely in use throughout Christendom. At the Reformation, the English Liturgy was published with a musical setting by John MARBECKE (q.v.), and this setting, and its modifications by Tallis, still hold their own.

The "Anglican Chant," so called, dates from the seventeenth century. In its original form it resembled the Gregorian in consisting of two parts, and therefore the old pointing of the Prayer Book was equally well suited to it. It differed first of all in omitting any opening inflection; the first words are on the reciting note. Further, the mediation consists of an inflection of two bars, and in the second part the reciting note is followed by three closing bars. The following specimen is by Dr. Turner:—

There are, however, two modifications of the Anglican Chant. The first is the Double Chant, a later development, consisting, in fact, of two single chants united, and therefore covering two verses instead of one. One of the best examples is the following by Dr. Boyce:—

The best of these date from the eighteenth century, and those of Boyce, Crotch, Goss, Turle, are very beautiful. The double chant, as time went on, was thrown into more florid forms. There is one by Ebdon in which nearly the whole of the second part of each half consists of runs of crotchets. It is as follows:—

Another form of the single chant has lately been adopted by Dr. W. H. Monk, who calls it the "New Form" Chant. Recognising the syllabic inflection of the Gregorian Chant, he has given us a Psalter, arranged for either Gregorian or Anglican chants, in which the larger part of the words is thrown upon the reciting note, and single syllables instead of grouped syllables on the inflections. Thus in his Psalter we have the clause, "Forsake me not, O God of | my sal | va— | tion." In the ordinary Cathedral Psalters this is pointed, 'Forsake me not, O | God of | mysal | vation.' But in the first half of this "New Form" chant, following some of the Gregorian chants, he has placed a note, which is to be sung or omitted, according as the clause ends with a single or double syllable. Thus, in Psalm lxxxiv., the note marked * is sung in the first verse where the sentence ends with the word "dwelling," but omitted in verse 2, where the word is simply "Lord."

Chantry.—Chantries were small buildings, originally founded, and endowed with land and other revenues, for the maintenance of one or more priests to say daily mass for the souls of the founder and his relations, or other benefactors. A chantry was often annexed to cathedral and parochial churches, either within the walls or attached to the exterior of the building. Chantries were dissolved by the statute of 1 Edward VI., c. 14.

Chantry Priest.—One whose office it was to serve the altar of a chantry.

Chapel.—The history of this word is very curious. It is derived—so all probability goes to show—from the Latin word cappa, "a cloak." In the early days of French history the kings carried with them in war time the cappa, or cloak of St. Martin [MARTIN, St.], and on the battle-field it was kept as a precious relic in a tent by itself, which was hence called capella. In course of time the name came to be applied to any consecrated building, or building used for Divine worship, not being the parish church.

The word has always had a wide meaning. Every cathedral has still its chapels in the sides and choir, and many parish churches have also chapels within them. An altar to the memory of any particular saint—such were generally built by rich persons as burial-places, or places for commemoration—constituted a chapel. The Lady Chapel of our cathedrals is generally, but not always, at the east end. (Thus it is not so at Gloucester, Ely, or Lincoln.) These separate chapels were often endowed with special bequests for the maintenance of Divine Service in them. Then there are chapels attached to the various colleges of the universities, and chapels of corporations, e.g., the Mercers' Chapel, in Cheapside, the chapels of the Inns of Court, of hospitals, and of almshouses. There are also Royal Chapels [CHAPELS ROYAL], and domestic chapels built by noblemen for family worship. A Chapel of Ease is for the use of parishioners who live at a distance from the parish church, and is served by the minister of that church or his curates. These chapels are consecrated, and must therefore be served only by ordained ministers. But of late, in crowded districts, what are called Mission Chapels are frequently built, and remain unconsecrated, and these may be used for lectures and readings of a secular character. In such cases the Communion Table is generally shut off by a movable screen. These chapels are often served by lay readers, who make way for the ordained minister on occasion of the administration of the Sacraments. There are also Parochial Chapels which, originally chapels of ease, have been separated from the mother-church. Such are known as District Churches, the incumbents being independent, save to the Ordinary.

Chapels Royal.—The chapel within St. James's Palace, the Lutheran Chapel in the same palace, that at Whitehall, and the minor chapels at Kensington and Hampton Court Palaces, are known as the Chapels Royal. They are governed by a dean, who is the Bishop of London for the time being, and by a sub-dean, and there are various chaplains, preachers, readers, and other officers attached to them. In addition to those named, the Chapel of the Savoy is a Chapel Royal, but it is placed upon Her Majesty's private list, and is under her sole control and direction, and not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of the Chapels Royal. The maintenance of the services in it is derived from the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster. "The Royal Hospital of St. Katharine, in the Regent's Park," is known as a Royal Peculiar. Its history is an interesting one. The Hospital of St. Katharine was founded near the Tower of London by Queen Matilda, wife of King Stephen, in 1148, and re-founded by Queen Eleanor, widow of Henry III., in 1273, for a master and three brethren (priests), three sisters, ten bedeswomen, and six poor scholars. It was removed to the Regent's Park in 1829, but the old site is preserved to memory in the name "St. Katharine's Docks," which now occupy it. A Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into several matters connected with this hospital, and a report presented to Parliament in 1871.

Formerly the Lent preachers in the Chapels Royal were selected by the Archbishop of Canterbury. A royal warrant (confirming a report presented to the Queen by the Chapels Royal Commissioners, dated June 2, 1862) now directs "that the preparation of the lists of preachers before Her Majesty, at St. James's and Whitehall, will henceforth be undertaken by the Dean of the Chapels Royal, instead of, as heretofore, by the Archbishop of Canterbury."

The course now is for the Bishop of London, as Dean of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, to name the preachers to the Lord Chamberlain, who submits the lists to Her Majesty for approval, and then the Lord Chamberlain officially makes the appointments.

It is usual for the Dean of the Chapels Royal (owing to ancient custom) to select the preachers for the Chapel Royal, St. James's, on the Sunday mornings in Lent, from the list of Archbishops and Bishops of England and Wales, and Ireland, and on the Wednesdays and Fridays from the list of Queen's Chaplains; the Dean himself annually preaching at St. James's on Ash Wednesday, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York, alternately, on Palm Sunday, the Dean of Westminster on Good Friday, and the Lord Almoner on Easter Sunday.

At the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, it is customary for the Dean of the Chapels Royal to select the Sunday morning preachers in Lent from the list of Deans of England and Wales, and Ireland, and the afternoon preachers from the list of Queen's Chaplains, or to resort to members of the Episcopal Bench if deemed desirable.

The fee payable by an Archbishop or Bishop, in consideration of having his duty performed by a deputy, when he is called upon by Her Majesty to preach in Lent, at either the Chapel Royal, St. James's, or the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, is £4 4s.; the fee payable by a Dean, £3 3s.; and the fee payable by a Chaplain-in-Ordinary, £2 2s. These fees are applied for through the Sub-Dean or the Clerk of the Cheque, and are now appropriated to the "Chapels Royal Fund," and distributed according to rules laid down by the Chapels Royal Commissioners.

Chaplain.—Originally a clergyman who performed Divine Service in a chapel. The name is now applied to those who are retained by judges, sheriffs, &c., in recognition of the sacredness attaching to all public duties and trusts. Bishops' chaplains not only attend them in their public duties, but also help in examinations of candidates for orders, carry on correspondence, &c. There are thirty-six Chaplains-in-Ordinary to the Queen, who receive from the Crown £30 annually; and twelve Honorary Chaplains, without salaries. Chaplains are distinguished by a broad silk scarf, worn in the place of the narrow stole of the general clergy.

Chaplaincies, FOREIGN, are established for the benefit of British residents in foreign countries. There are over one hundred of these chaplaincies in various parts of Europe. In the reign of Charles I. the congregations of the Church of England were placed under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, and, with the exception of the parts committed to the care of the Bishop of Gibraltar, they still continue so. In 1842 the Bishopric of Gibraltar was founded, with jurisdiction extending over the chaplaincies on the shores and in the islands of the Mediterranean Sea. There has since been added to this jurisdiction the chaplaincies in the South of France; throughout Italy, Spain, and Portugal; on the coast of Morocco, the Canary Islands, the islands of the Greek Archipelago; on the shores of the Black Sea, and on the Lower Danube. Practically the Bishop of Gibraltar exercises jurisdiction over other chaplaincies than those mentioned, for he holds a permanent commission from the Bishop of London.

There are three classes of foreign chaplaincies: (1) Those attached to embassies and legations; (2) those nominated in accordance with the Consular Act; (3) chaplaincies to British residents, sanctioned by the Bishop of London. The appointment to the first two classes rests with the Foreign Office, but the sanction of the Bishop of London is obtained before the appointment is completed. The Foreign Office has power to dispense with the services of any chaplain attached to embassies, legations, and consulates. In the case of the third class of foreign chaplaincies, the chaplains are usually nominated by the Continental Chaplaincies Committee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, or by the Colonial and Continental Church Society, or by the congregations themselves which have guaranteed the income; but in all cases the bishop's licence must be obtained. The British Government continues to contribute to the support of a few foreign chaplaincies, but the two societies above mentioned are responsible for the incomes of the majority of foreign chaplains. In addition to the permanent chaplaincies abroad, there are a great number which are kept up, for a part of each year, to supply the spiritual wants of the many English travellers.

Indian chaplaincies are appointed by the Crown, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for India. Candidates for junior chaplaincies must have been two years in orders, and be under thirty-four years of age. The India Office provides a free passage; and after twenty years' service there is a retiring pension of £365 per annum. The approval of the Bishop of London is usually required by the India Office before the appointment is completed.

Army chaplains are under the authority of the Chaplain-General of the Forces. County Lunatic Asylums must have chaplains in full orders, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 40, and the Poor Law Commissioners may direct salaried chaplains to be appointed to union workhouses under 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 76. There are a few livings which can only be held by chaplains of the Royal Navy, who with them receive their half-pay. Army chaplains, if presented to any living, may retain their half-pay.

Chapter.—A body of clergy belonging to a cathedral church, consisting of canons and prebendaries, presided over by the dean. This collegiate company came in the eighth century to be termed a capitulum ("little head"), it being a kind of head, not only to govern the diocese in the vacation of a bishopric, but also to advise and assist the bishop in matters relating to the Church, for the better ordering and disposing of the things thereof, and for the confirmation of such leases of the temporalities and offices relating to the bishopric as the bishop shall make from time to time. During the vacancy of a see the chapter has jurisdiction over the diocese. The bishop has the power of visiting the dean and chapter, but they have nothing to do with what the bishop transacts as Ordinary.

Chapter-house.—The apartment or hall in which the dean and chapter meet to transact their official business. Chapter-houses are of different forms: thus, that of Canterbury is a parallelogram, that of Westminster an octagon.

Charge.—(1) The spiritual care of a pastor over his flock, or of a bishop over his diocese; as in the Prayer for the Clergy and People: "Send down upon our Bishops and Curates, and all congregations committed to their charge, the healthful spirit of Thy grace."

(2) An address from a bishop to his clergy at his visitation, in which he instructs, exhorts, or charges them on matters of peculiar importance, or takes occasion to dilate on the general obligations and responsibilities of the ministerial office. A charge is addressed to the clergy; a pastoral letter principally to the people. It is also customary for an archdeacon, at his visitation, to deliver a charge on those matters which especially come under his supervision.

Charity.—It is hardly necessary to tell any reader that this word represents the same Greek word (agape) which is also translated "love." It was the distinguishing mark by which our Lord bade His disciples make their discipleship known to the world (St. John xiii. 35). Therefore the history of Christianity ought to be a history of the growth of charity, a record of deeds of love; and the history of their failure is the index of the falling away and of the imperfect realisation of the Christian character and calling. Yet so much has been achieved, that Christianity has striking trophies to show. Personal purity has been exalted, and the rightful position of woman declared and admitted by moralists; slavery has been judged contrary to God's will; prison reforms, plans of co-operation, care for the poor, international law,—all are fruits of the gift of Christian charity to men. [See Gesta Christi, by C. L. Brace, 1882, in which each of these points is clearly established.]

The establishment of the religious Orders in early times should be mentioned in this connection. Some of these were missionary in their character, intended for the healing of souls by bringing them to the Fountain of Life. Others were for the care of the sick, and to these latter the world owes the foundation of hospitals [HOSPITALS]. At the present time, among the many Orders in the Roman Church, we have to mention the Brothers and Sisters of Charity, as the name brings them under the present head.

Brothers of Charity.—This Order was founded in 1530, by a Portuguese named John di Dio. He began by hiring a small house in Granada which he filled with the objects of his care, and worked so devotedly with them that his example was widely followed, and before his death the Order was founded. Those of this Order do not study at all, nor aspire to holy orders, and the priests who are received amongst them can never accept any higher dignities. As their founder went every day to beg for the sick, crying as he went along, with a loud voice, Do good, my brethren, for the love of God, the Brothers of this Order are called in Italy, Fratelli ben Fratelli. Tourists on any Rhine steamer will remember meeting some of them going hither and thither on their benevolent work. They abound in Spain, Italy, and France, as well as in Germany.

Sisters of Charity.—This expression includes many Orders of unmarried women in the Roman Church, but the two most prominent are the "Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul," and "The Daughters of St. Charles Borromeo." Some account of the foundation of the first of these will be given under VINCENT DE PAUL. That of the second dates from 1652. Epiphanius Louys, Abbot of Estival, in that year gathered some sisters serving in the Hospital of St. Charles Borromeo at Nancy, formed them into an Order, and gave them a rule of life. They were to give their whole life to the care of the sick and of children. They have done admirable service among the poor, and it was the recognition of this good which brought about the revival of sisterhoods in the Church of England in this century. [SISTERHOODS.]

Charity Commission.—A body created in 1853, under the Charitable Trusts Act. The munificent endowments provided by the piety of past ages for educational and charitable purposes having been too often perverted and misused, the Legislature passed the Acts we have just named (16 and 17 Vict. c. 137, amended by 18 and 19 Vict. c. 124, and 20 and 21 Vict. c. 78). Under these Acts, the Commissioners, who are appointed by the Crown, have power to inquire into all charities in England and Wales, with reference to their objects and administration. The trustees of every charity are required to send a yearly account to the Commissioners. The statute does not apply to Scotland or Ireland, nor to the Universities.

Charles.—Several emperors of the Teutonic Empire have borne this name, the chief, so far as the history of Religion is concerned, being the first and the fifth. The first, called The Great, is commonly known by the French version of his name, Charlemagne. He was born about 742 at the Castle of Ingelheim, near Mayence, and crowned King of the Franks at Noyon in 768, after the death of his father, Pepin the Short. He began his reign by the defeat of the Duke of Aquitaine and Gascony. The death of his brother Carloman made him the sole and absolute monarch of France.

The next year he overthrew the Saxons near Osnaburg, and demolished the famous temple dedicated to their false god, Irminsul. About this time, Desiderius, King of the Lombards, continuing his predecessor's design of humbling the Roman pontiffs, attacked Pope Stephen and Adrian his successor, who begged Charles's assistance; whereupon he led a powerful army into Italy in 771, overthrew Desiderius, and destroyed the kingdom of the Lombards in 776, two hundred years after its foundation. The victorious prince then visited the Pope, and confirmed the gift his father had made the Church by the addition of the territory of Sabina, the dukedom of Spoleto and Beneventum.

After this, he turned his arms a second time against the Saxons, and forced their king, Witikind, to receive baptism.

The same zeal for religion set Charles upon a journey into Spain against the Saracens in 778. He won great victories over them, but as he was returning from Spain with a very rich booty, his army was set upon in the narrow Pass of Roncesvalles, in the Pyrenees, by the Gascons, who then lived on theft and robbery. This disaster was the theme of many a romance of song.

At last, after engaging in many other wars, he was crowned Emperor of the West at Rome, in 800, by Leo III., the Eastern Emperor, Nicephorus, consenting, and agreeing that the State of Venice should be the limit of both empires. Charles took the name of Cæsar and Augustus, the first two Emperors of Rome, with the spread and the two-headed eagle to symbolise respectively the Roman and the German Empire. This was the restoration of the ancient empire of the Cæsars, and was known as "the Holy Roman Empire," the first adjective signifying the sanction which it received from the Church. It lasted, though after the sixteenth century much shorn of its splendour, until 1806, when Napoleon put an end to it. Charles died at Aix-la-Chapelle, and was buried there in 814. There are many relics of him in the cathedral there.

Charles was a great patron of learning; always, while sitting at table, he had read to him either history or some book of St. Augustine. He collected the laws and customs of the nations which had become subject to him, gathered learned men to his Court (among them the English Alcuin), and founded universities and schools of learning.

His dynasty, known in history as the Carolingian, or Karling, divided itself after his death. Three main divisions sprang from it, Italy, Germany, France. His influence lasted in all these countries long after his family had ceased to rule. But each nation took its line diverse from the others, and in Germany only did the Imperial form of government prevail. France slowly became a consolidated monarchy under the descendants of Hugh Capet; Italy became a collection of republics.

Charles V. [1500—1558], the grandson, by his father, of the Emperor Maximilian, and by his mother of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, became King of Spain in 1516, and Emperor in 1519. His accession witnessed the beginning of the mighty religious struggle in Germany [LUTHER], and Charles had also heavy troubles in Spain, owing to the disaffection excited in the Spaniards by his love of his Flemish kindred; and added to this, there was the jealousy of France under Francis I., and of the Popes, who beheld with alarm his great power in holding two kingdoms. All this, however, belongs more to secular than to religious history. The Lutheran movement was the cause of fierce fighting all through Charles's reign. The marriage of his son Philip with Mary of England had serious consequences in our own country. Somewhat less than two years before his death he abdicated, and retired to the monastery of St. Xuste, in Estremadura.

Charnock, STEPHEN [1628—1680], a celebrated Puritan divine. He was educated first in Emmanuel College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Oxford in 1649, and obtained a Fellowship at New College by the Parliamentary interest. Afterwards he went to Ireland as Chaplain to Henry Cromwell, and was much admired as a preacher by the Presbyterians and Independents. On the Restoration of Charles II. he was disqualified under the Act of Uniformity, but he preached with much success in private meetings. His great work, Discourses on the Existence and Attributes of God, has many times been reprinted, and his collected writings are published in Nichols's edition of Standard Divines.

Charterhouse.—This word is an Anglicised form of the word Chartreux, indicating the Carthusian monastery [CARTHUSIANS] near Smithfield, founded by Sir Walter Manny, a military gentleman of great reputation, born in the diocese of Cambray. He was first Banneret and afterwards made Knight of the Garter by King Edward III. In 1349, during the terrible "Black Death," he purchased a piece of ground of thirteen acres near Smithfield, called "Spital Croft," and caused it to be enclosed and consecrated for a burying-place, and in the year following, as Stow reports, from an old inscription, there were more than fifty thousand persons buried there. Not long after, he built a chapel on the spot, where offerings were made for the deceased; and in the year 1371 he founded a house of Carthusian monks, which he built in honour of the "Salutation of the Mother of God." Sir Walter died in 1371, and was buried in this monastery. At the Dissolution of the abbey by Henry VIII., the rents of the Charterhouse amounted to £642 0s. 4½d. The then Prior, being commanded to renounce the Pope's supremacy and acknowledge the King in his stead, refused to submit, and was hanged at his gate for his non-compliance, and the monastery bestowed upon Sir Thomas Audley, Speaker of the House of Commons. His only daughter Margaret, marrying Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, the Charterhouse passed to the House of Norfolk, and thence to Thomas, Earl of Suffolk, of whom it was purchased by Thomas Sutton. A new history now begins. Sutton was born in Lincolnshire, in 1531, of an ancient and honourable family. He studied at Cambridge in the Colleges of Magdalen and Jesus, to each of which he left £500 by will. After travelling extensively on the Continent, he became steward to the Earl of Warwick, and secretary to the Earl of Leicester, by whose interest he was made Paymaster to the Northern Army, Victualler to the Navy, and Commissioner for the Prizes. He was sharer in several public farms, a partner in foreign adventures, especially in Muscovy and Hamburg, inasmuch that he had no less than thirty agents or factors abroad, and he was full of charitable works, of which that before us was one of the greatest. His first project was to erect and endow a hospital at Hallingbury Bouchers, in Essex, and for this purpose he procured an Act of Parliament, 6 Jac. I. But he altered his mind, and purchased the Carthusian monastery of the Earl of Suffolk for £13,000. In 1611 he obtained letters patent under the Great Seal for erecting his hospital at the Charterhouse.

After Sutton's death, in December the same year, the title was contested, but unsuccessfully, by Baxter, his nephew, who was heir-at-law. "The governors of this noble foundation," says an account written in 1721, "are to be sixteen, of which the Master is one, most of the rest being either Lords Spiritual or Temporal. The persons maintained in the hospital are chiefly old gentlemen and children. First, the constitution admits fourscore ancient men who have been bred to a military profession, and been serviceable to their king and country; or else decayed merchants who have lost their estates by unavoidable accidents; or ancient householders who have formerly lived creditably in the world."

Military men have the preference, being admitted ten years younger than members of other classes. The persons are chosen by particular governors, every one in his turn. There are forty boys at school, chosen by the governors in the same methods. They are only capable of admission between the years of ten and fifteen, and are to continue in the house not more than eight years. These boys, upon their removal to Oxford or Cambridge, have £20 per annum allowed them for eight years. The number of such, however, must not exceed twenty-nine at one time. The remainder of the forty-four are designed for apprentices, are taught the elements of education, and have £40 allowed to put them out. The yearly revenue amounts to £5,391 13s. 8d.

By the scheme approved by the Charity Commissioners in 1872, on the removal of the school to Godalming, there are to be on the foundation a number of Poor Brothers, not exceeding eighty, nominated and appointed by the governors. They are to be deserving men of good character, in decayed circumstances, being or having been officers in the army or navy, clergymen, merchants, or persons engaged in trading, professional, agricultural, or other similar occupations, who have become reduced by misfortune or accident without their own wilful default, and they must be not less than sixty years of age at the time of their appointment. These Poor Brothers have furnished rooms in the hospital, and certain allowances of food and money, and dine in the common hall, while for those who are sick or infirm duly qualified nurses are provided.

In the school, under the new scheme, there are always to be on the foundation not less than thirty junior and thirty senior scholars, the former elected by general competitive examinations, and the latter elected after examination from such boys as have been in the school at least twelve months previous to the commencement of the examination. There are also ten exhibitions, which can be held by boys below a certain age, and twenty exhibitions tenable by those who have left the school, and have gone to any university in the United Kingdom, or any other special place of education. The old premises of the Charterhouse School are now occupied by the Merchant Taylors' School.

Chartophylax.—In ancient monasteries an officer who had care of the charters and title-deeds. The name gradually came to be applied to the officer who acted as the bishop's private secretary, and to this day the office remains among the Uniate Greeks of the Austrian empire, the chartophylax directing the business of the bishop's court, and being his representative in the Cathedral chapter.

Chasuble (Lat. casula, a diminutive of casa, "a cottage").—St. Isidore of Seville describes the chasuble as "a garment furnished with a hood," and says that, "like a small cottage," it "covers the whole person." This garment was the same as the pænula, or planeta, the outer garment worn by the humbler classes. It was without sleeves, made in one piece throughout, circular, or almost so, in shape, with a small opening in the centre for the head to pass through. For the first three centuries at least the chasuble, or casula, was worn by clergy and laity alike as an out-of-door dress, and also by the clergy in Divine worship; but it was usual for the clergy to keep chasubles specially for worship, and gradually the Church vestments became richer and more splendid in material and ornamentation than those used for ordinary purposes. Hence the chasuble became a distinctively sacred vestment. It is reserved now for the officiating priest at the mass in the Roman Church; and, since the Westerton judgment, it has been worn by many clergy in the English Church when administering the Holy Communion. [ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.] As worn now, the chasuble has no hood, and in the Roman Church the shape has been considerably altered.

Cheke, SIR JOHN, was born in 1514. The son of a gentleman at Cambridge, he was educated at St. John's College, where he was chosen Fellow and University Orator; and, having the reputation of a great scholar, and particularly of an extraordinary linguist, he became the first Regius Professor of Greek, and was the main instrument of reviving the study of that language in England. He was sent for to the Court of King Henry VIII., and made preceptor to Edward Prince of Wales, which employment he managed to such great satisfaction that, after the death of King Henry, he was knighted by Edward VI.

Sir John Cheke kept up a learned correspondence with Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Thomas Elliot, and Ascham; with Sturmius, Camerarius, and several other eminent scholars beyond sea. Soon after the death of King Edward, Sir John Cheke was stripped of all his wealth for joining in the attempt to place Lady Jane Grey upon the throne, and was obliged to quit the kingdom on the score of religion. He retired into Germany, and settling at Strasburg, was chosen Greek Professor there. But in the year 1554, going from Strasburg to Brussels, to visit the English ambassadors and some other friends of his in those parts, he was seized, in his journey between Antwerp and Brussels, by some of King Philip's Court, who hurried him into a ship, and brought him to England, where he was imprisoned in the Tower. Here, under pressure, he recanted, returned to the Church of Rome, and recovered his wealth. But he died [in September, 1557] expressing his sorrow for his recantation. He lies buried in St. Alban's, Wood Street. A curious old manor-house belonging to him, and still bearing his arms, is to be seen at Mottistone, in the Isle of Wight.

Cheke's writings are many, chiefly on Greek studies, and they were valuable in their day because of his profound scholarship.

Chelidonius.—A bishop deposed by St. Hilary of Arles in a council held there in 444, on the ground that he had been judge at a trial for life and death before his ordination, and that the canons barred ordination to persons in such circumstances. Chelidonius went to Rome, and appealed to Pope Leo; Hilary followed him, and entreated the Pope not to disturb the existing law of the Church. He also complained that some Gallican bishops who had been justly deposed in their own country, officiated without restraint in Rome, and when Leo announced his intention of convening a synod to settle the cause, Hilary resigned his see, declaring that he ought to have been at once supported. In the end, Leo restored Chelidonius to his see, though Hilary ceased not to protest, and to declare that Chelidonius continued deposed; and this notwithstanding Pope Leo's letter to the bishops of the Province of Vienna, affirming his judgment. It is not mentioned by any authors of the time of what see Chelidonius was bishop, though Francis Chiffletius positively asserts that he was Bishop of Besançon, giving as his authority a MS. of St. Romanus discovered in the Abbey of St. Claude. This opinion has been followed by a great many learned men; but Quésnel, in his dissertations upon Leo, proves that this Life of St. Romanus is not the work of a contemporary author, and is undeserving of credit.

Cherubic Hymn.—The name given by the Greek Church to the hymn Tersanctus, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts," &c.

Chester, BISHOPRIC OF.—This was one of six bishoprics which were founded out of some of the endowments of ancient monasteries in 1541. It was formed of portions cut off from the dioceses of Carlisle, York, and Lichfield and Coventry, and comprehended the counties of Cheshire and Lancashire, with parts of the counties of York, Westmorland, Cumberland, and Flint. The small Welsh portion of this great diocese is now annexed to that of St. Asaph; the portions in Westmorland and Cumberland have been restored to Carlisle. Its northern territory has been portioned off among the dioceses of Ripon, Manchester, Liverpool, and Wakefield. The diocese of Chester is now, therefore, generally speaking, conterminous with the county of Cheshire, and it is in the Province of York. Its population numbers 646,031, and the endowment of the see is £4,500.

The Bishops of Lichfield and Coventry were occasionally called Bishops of Chester in mediæval times; Peter, the first Norman Bishop of Lichfield [A.D. 1072—1085], having removed the seat of his bishopric from the small city of Lichfield to the larger and more important one of Chester; but this arrangement was altered by the successor of Bishop Peter, and there was not any actual Bishopric of Chester until the Reformation.

The following list contains the names of all the Bishops of Chester, with the dates of their incumbencies, from the foundation of the see to the present time:—

	Accession.		Accession.
John Bird	1541	William Dawes	1708
George Coates	1554	Francis Gastrell	1714
Cuthbert Scott	1556	Samuel Peploe	1726
William Downham	1561	Edmund Keene	1752

John Pearson	1673	William Stubbs	1883
Thomas Cartwright	1696
Nicolas Stratford	1689

The Cathedral of Chester is the ancient abbey church belonging to the Monastery of St. Werburgh, that of St. John the Baptist having been used by the two Norman Bishops of Lichfield while they occupied Chester as the seat of the latter bishopric. It stands on the site of a very ancient church dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, which was the mother-church of Chester when the relics of St. Werburgh [WERBURGH, Str.] were removed thither from Hanbury in the year 875, nearly two hundred years after her death. This church was rebuilt in the tenth century by Ethelred, ealdorman of Mercia, and his wife Ethelfled, and was then, perhaps, re-dedicated in the name of the saint whose shrine it held. In the year 1095 it was again rebuilt, and turned into a Benedictine monastery by Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, under the direction of St. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury; but this Norman cathedral became ruinous before the end of the twelfth century, and has disappeared. Of the present cathedral, the eastern part is Early English, having been built at various periods between 1194 and 1230. The lower portion of the rest of the building belongs to the Decorated or fourteenth century period, while the upper part of the central tower, the transept and nave, are Perpendicular, as is nearly the whole of the exterior casing of the church, all this part having been constructed at some time between 1485 and 1537. The modern restoration, at an estimated cost of £50,000, was begun in 1844. When the see of Chester was founded, in 1541, the dedication of the church was altered to that of Christ and the Blessed Virgin.

The cathedral establishment consists of a dean, four canons, twenty-four honorary canons, and four minor canons; and its endowments amount to about £4,000 a year.

Chester-le-Street, BISHOPRIC OF.—The see of Lindisfarne was transferred to this place—anciently known as Cuncacester, from its situation on the river Cone—between Durham and Newcastle, in A.D. 900, Cuthheard being the first of seven bishops, the last of whom died in A.D. 990, when the see was removed to Durham. [DURHAM, BISHOPRIC OF.] Some crosses, with interlaced work of very early days, still remain as a memorial of the see.

Chichester, BISHOPRIC OF.—This represents the more ancient bishopric of the South Saxons, or of Sussex, the seat of which was at Selsey. Sussex was for about five years [A.D. 680—684] the missionary field of the restless Wilfrid, now Bishop of York, now of Hexham, now of Ripon, now of the South Saxons, now again of York. But Sussex still remained for some time under the pastoral care of the Bishops of Winchester; and it was not until the year 709 that Eadbert, Abbot of the Monastery of Selsey, was consecrated Bishop of Selsey. He was the first of twenty-two bishops who for three centuries [A.D. 709—1070] ruled the diocese now known as that of Chichester. Ethelric, the last Bishop of Selsey, was deprived and imprisoned, in his extreme old age, by William the Conqueror, and Stigand, chaplain to the Conqueror, was appointed in his place. At the same time the see was removed from the fast disappearing village of Selsey to the town of Chichester.

The population of the diocese of Chichester numbers 489,550. The income of the see is £4,200.

The following is a list of the ninety-two bishops who have presided over first the kingdom of Sussex, and subsequently the county of Sussex, from the foundation of the bishopric:—

The cathedral of the Bishops of Sussex was originally at Selsey, which the sea has long ago engulfed in its encroachments upon the south coast, although its ruins were still visible in shallow water in the time of Queen Elizabeth. A relic of it still remains in the shape of two large sculptured slabs of Byzantine character, representing the raising of Lazarus, which are now built into the wall of the south-choir aisle of the present cathedral.

When the see was removed to Chichester, in 1070, the Church of the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter became the cathedral for a time, but a new one was soon commenced near the same site, and completed in 1108. After being twice damaged by fire, this church was restored and much enlarged by Bishop Seffrid, the second of that name [A.D. 1180—1204]. Much of the ancient Norman church still remains, but additions of Early English and Decorated work are to be seen crowning the older constructions or encasing them in every part, the cathedral being completed, as it stood till modern times, by a beautiful central spire, erected in the fifteenth century. This spire fell in ruins on February 21, 1861. After vigorous attempts to prevent the disaster, the task was found to be impossible, and an hour and a half after the workmen had abandoned it, "the spire was seen to incline slightly to the south-west, and then to descend perpendicularly into the church, as one telescope tube slides into another, the mass of the tower crumbling beneath it," the fall being completed in a few seconds. The spire and the adjacent parts of the cathedral which its fall had destroyed were at once rebuilt through the zeal of the famous Dean Hook, the top stone of the former being laid in June, 1866.

The cathedral body of Chichester consists of a dean, four canons residentiary, a precentor, chancellor, and treasurer, twenty-nine prebendaries, and four minor canons; and the endowments yield about £5,000 a year income.

Childermas.—A popular name for the festival of the Holy Innocents, the third day after Christmas. "Childer" is still the common form of the plural word "children" in the North of England and elsewhere.

Chiliasts, or Millennarians.—Those who believe that after the Last Judgment the saints shall live a thousand years upon the earth, and enjoy all kinds of innocent pleasures. It is said that Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, who lived in the second century, and was disciple to St. John, was the first to hold this opinion. The authority of his name, supported by some passages in the Book of Revelation, brought a great many of the primitive fathers to believe in it, as, for example, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian. The Chiliasts were condemned by Pope Damasus, in a synod held at Rome against the Apollinarians. The opinion has constantly been revived, and is held by many still, who base their views upon their interpretation of the Book of Revelation.

Chillingworth, WILLIAM.—A learned theologian, who was born in 1602, at Oxford, where his father, William Chillingworth, was at one time mayor. He was admitted to Trinity College, in that University, in June, 1618, and was B.A. 18th June, 1620, M.A. 16th March, 1623, Fellow 10th June, 1628. Chillingworth could not fail to be attracted by the Romish controversy which was then prevalent, and which had received a special impetus through the marriage of King Charles I. with the daughter of Henry IV. of France. The Jesuit Fisher, Laud's great opponent in this controversy, had so much power with Chillingworth that he joined the Roman Church in 1629, and settled himself at the Douay College. But he did not remain a Romanist long: his keen love of inquiry, and impatience of evasive answers, soon unsettled him, and Archbishop Laud, who was his godfather (being at the time of Chillingworth's birth a Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford), and was then Bishop of London, succeeded in bringing him back to the Church of England. His Fellowship he had of course forfeited, but still he returned to Oxford, and employed himself writing in defence of Protestantism. For in his high conscientiousness he could not take orders, and so open up to himself the way to a profession. He might have been ordained, and would, no doubt, have received preferment from Laud, but he did not see his way to signing the Thirty-nine Articles. A controversy with the Jesuit party led to his chief work, The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation, which was published in 1638. It was written principally at the house of Lord Falkland, whose guest he frequently was, enjoying there constant intercourse, not only with his noble host, but with Hall and Selden. When finished, the book, through Laud's endeavours, was dedicated to the king.

A sentence out of this work has become such a by-word, that Chillingworth is not only better known by it than by anything else which he has written, but it is the sole thing by which to most men he is known at all. We will quote him:—"By the religion of Protestants I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon; nor the Confession of Augsburg or Geneva; nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England; no, nor the harmony of Protestant Confessions; but that wherein they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of their faith and actions, that is, the Bible. The Bible, I say, the Bible only is the religion of Protestants." The sentence has been mischievously used, age after age. It has been quoted by way of closing the door to legitimate criticism. Yet Chillingworth only meant that the Bible is a perfect rule of faith and practice, and certainly never dreamt of his dictum being used against the rights of historical inquiry or criticism.

Dean Plumptre has written an admirable monograph on Chillingworth in a collection of lectures entitled Masters in English Theology [1877]. He pronounces Chillingworth's a second-class treatise, acute and accurate, but in no sense far-sighted; clever in convicting opponents of bad logic, but nowhere displaying a power of surveying the whole field. He says the book is tedious, utterly unlike what it would have been if Butler or Hooker, instead, had had this controversy in hand. But at the same time the Dean quotes striking passages in which Chillingworth retorts on Romanists their charge of the "uncertainty" of Protestantism, of the want of an infallible guide, of their claims to have an authoritative interpreter of Scripture in their Pope.

His zeal for freedom of inquiry into the grounds of our faith, and for toleration of opinion, led him to some of the noblest passages of his writings. Thus:—"To say that God will damn men for errors, when they have used diligence to find out truth, but yet have missed it, men who are lovers of Him and lovers of truth, is to rob man of his comfort and God of His goodness; to make man desperate and God a tyrant." Such a sentence sounds almost a truism now, but it was strange to minds which had not yet learned toleration. It offended both Roman and Protestant dogmatists, and the latter were yet more bitter than the Romanists had been. They called him, but without any producible evidence, Arminian, Socinian, sceptic. And they were fierce in their denunciations when he no longer felt scruples as to signing the Thirty-nine Articles, justifying his action by maintaining that the subscription was "one of peace and union more than of belief," in which opinion Archbishop Laud is said to have supported him. He made the subscription on the 20th of July, 1638, when he was admitted to the Chancellorship of the Cathedral of Sarum, with a prebend attached; in 1640 he was also Proctor in Convocation for the Chapter.

Chillingworth, being a zealous Royalist, joined the king's army in the civil war, and was present at the siege of Gloucester in August, 1643, where he constructed movable towers after the old classical fashion, to attack the city withal. This is probably the last instance of the kind. But before they could be used a Parliamentary force, under Lord Essex, compelled the Royalists (Sept. 6th) to raise the siege. In the winter of the same year Chillingworth was besieged in his turn, being in the garrison of Arundel Castle, where he fell ill; and when Sir William Waller took the castle, on the 9th of December, he was removed to Chichester, where the bishop (Henry King) received him; here he died in January, 1644, and was buried in the cathedral.

Chillingworth was author, besides the work already named, of a treatise on the Apostolical Succession, of some published sermons, and of other smaller works. They were last published at Oxford (3 vols., 1838).

Chimere (Old French, chamarre, "a gown or coat").—The vestment in which a bishop at present ministers, worn over the rochet, which is a short and narrow surplice. The chimere is simply the usual outdoor dress of a bishop of three hundred years ago appearing as a Doctor of Divinity, changed from red to black at the Reformation, and still worn in red on certain occasions by Doctors at the Universities. It was sleeveless, and the lawn sleeves now worn are the sleeves of the rochet very much lengthened and widened: over this attire modern bishops usually put their doctor's hood, and so give the whole a more stately air. The word chimere is found in different forms in old French, Italian, and Spanish; and in English it has had many spellings, as chimmer, cymer, simar.

Chirothecæ (Gr. cheir, "hand," and thekê, "case").—The embroidered gloves formerly worn by bishops, and sometimes by abbots. In the English Church it is now thought more consistent with the ministerial function not to wear gloves, but in the Romish Church they are still used by bishops, and by those officials who carry staves, canopies, etc. They are also called manica (sleeves), and wanti (gants).

Choir.—This word, both in its Latin form of chorus, and in its English form (once often spelt quire, as it still is in the Prayer Book), has always been used in the two senses (1) of the singers of the church, and (2) of the part of the church where they sit.

1. The singers themselves.—A choir, and a surpliced choir too, was a familiar thing in Divine Service long before Christianity [see 2 Chron. v. 12: "The Levites which were the singers, arrayed in white linen, stood at the east end of the altar"], and when Christian worship was somewhat settled the choir was introduced into it. Singers are mentioned by St. Augustine (354—430); and that they were dressed in white linen is stated by Amalarius, a writer on Divine Offices, early in the ninth century. They were at one time considered to form the first minor order of the Church, and received a special form of ordination: this, however, was really nothing more than such a religious form of "admission to the choir" as is now often used. They are accordingly not now reckoned among minor orders even in the Romish Church; and Martene says, writing early in the last century [de Ant. Eccl. Rit., ii. 18], "The order seems to have become extinct about three hundred years ago."

A school of singers existed, of course; and it is traced at Rome nearly as far back as the singers themselves, probably owing its origin to Pope Gregory the Great, in the sixth century, from whom and his school we have the familiar "Gregorian Chant."

2. The singers' part of the church.—The division of the earliest churches was simply into two parts, for the clergy and the laity; the sub-division of the former into two, though still early, is somewhat later: it is found in the Council of Toledo in the seventh century, and the name "chorus" is used in the architectural sense of "choir." [CANTOR; DECANI.]

Choragus, or choir-ruler (Gr. choragos, "leader of a chorus").—That member of the choir who takes the lead in actual functions; not necessarily identical with the "choir-master," or teacher; distinct also from the precentor, or cleric who has charge of the music in its ecclesiastical aspect.

Chorepiscopus—Literally, a country bishop [Gr. chōra, "country," and episkopos, "bishop"]; sometimes represented in old English by the odd word "chor-bishop." An early canon provided that a bishop should always have his see in a city or town, and thus these chor-episcopi, first appointed late in the third century, to take charge of the more remote parts of the very large dioceses of Asia Minor, were considered as, so to say, an inferior class of bishops. They were of course, as far as order went, on a level with others, though they were sometimes consecrated by one bishop only, and were not, as a rule, or without their diocesan's licence, allowed the higher episcopal functions, such as the giving of the major orders of deacon and priest; the minor orders and confirmation they might give. Later on, certainly in the East, and perhaps in the West, they received in many cases no proper consecration as bishops, and one ritual is known for their appointment to their charge without imposition of hands. But even then they are stated to have taken, in some cases, too much upon them, to the infringing of the diocesan's authority, and this led at last, in the ninth century, to their abolition; as early as the fourth they had been restricted by the Council of Laodicea, which ordered that for the future travelling priests should be substituted for them.

Chorister.—Any individual member of the choir, man or boy, though the name is perhaps more commonly used of the latter. At cathedrals the adult choristers are usually called lay clerks or lay vicars; at Manchester, however, they are simply "singing-men"; and at York, "song-men."

Chrism.—A compound of oil and balsam, forming a sweet ointment—"ointment" is, indeed, the literal meaning of the word in Greek—used in primitive time, and in the old English, as in the modern Roman Church, at baptism, confirmation, and ordination, as also at royal coronations and dedications, or consecrations of churches and altars. The extreme unction of the dying was with simple oil; and this, then called the oil of the catechumens, was also used at baptism before the actual baptising, as the chrism was after [Maskell, Mon. Rit., i. 22]. The chrism was to be obtained by parish priests from the bishop, by whom both it and the oil were to be consecrated every year on Maundy Thursday: many orders for this may be seen in Martene [de Ant. Eccl. Rit., iii. 86, etc.], from the ninth century downwards; for an early order of the English Church see the Leofric Missal [ed. Warren, p. 257]. But the use of anointing in the general sense is far older, at least at baptism, being alluded to by Tertullian as in use in the third century [de Baptismo, cap. 7]; nor does the introduction of chrism, properly so called, appear to be much later [Smith, Dict. of Christian Ant., s.v.].

Of these old English unctions, only those at baptism and of the dying were retained by the first English book of 1549, and the former was mutilated by the omission of the first anointing with oil; the specification of chrism was also omitted, but there can be little doubt that, at least at first, the use of it continued as before.* How this and the oil were consecrated between 1549 and 1552, when both were finally abolished, is not clear, since the Act 3 and 4 Edward VI. cap. 10 abolished all Service-books except the Prayer Book, which contained no such form [Gibson's Codex, i. 300]: it is probable that after the old stock was used up—the rubric requiring annual renewal was of course no longer binding—consecration was hardly performed at all; and it is likely that in many places Edward VI.'s injunctions against "maintaining oil and chrism" were carried out to the extent of disusing them altogether, in spite of the rubric. In 1571 Archbishop Grindal, of York, inquires whether any clergy use "oyle and chrisme, or any other Popish ceremonie."

At coronations the original use was to anoint a king twice, first with oil and then with chrism, but a queen-consort with oil only; the later and modern use, however, dispenses with chrism, and uses simple oil in both cases, which is consecrated in the service just before its application [see the Service in Maskell's Mon. Rit.]. Chrism, therefore, is not now used in the English Church.

In the consecration of a church, which was one of the most elaborate offices in the whole Roman rite, the altar was anointed with both oil and chrism, and the walls were anointed with chrism in twelve places, both outside and inside. The whole office will be found in Maskell, as above. This use, like that in Baptism, is discontinued in the English Reformed Church.

The chrism of the Eastern Church contains, besides oil and balsam, no fewer than thirty-six other ingredients, among them cinnamon, musk, and saffron. It is used on the same occasions as in the West; but confirmation is here given by the priest immediately after baptism with the episcopally consecrated chrism, and the two anointings with chrism are therefore merged into one.

Chrimatory.—The vessel used as the receptacle for holy oil.

* The Interleaved Prayer Book, however (p. 201, 10th ed.), distinctly states that the use of chrism was laid aside in 1549.

Chrisome.—This is the old English name for the white dress of a child at its baptism. Its derivation is from the Greek verb to anoint, along with the familiar words, Christ and Christian, and the less familiar Chrism (all which see); and it, therefore, in its origin, signified the linen band tied over the forehead where the child had been anointed either at baptism or confirmation, to retain the anointing for a short time in its place [Smith's Dict. of Christian Ant., i. 163]; from this the name was transferred to the dress with which the child, at the baptismal anointing, was formally invested. Such a dress is of very old date, and alluded to by innumerable early writers; references to it may also be found in many of the early Orders of Baptism given in Martene [de Ant. Eccl. Rit., vol. i.]; in the English Church its use was almost universal, and allusions to it in one of the earliest offices known may be seen in the Missal of Leofric, Bishop of Crediton, afterwards of Exeter (1046—1072), which was written early in the tenth century in Lorraine, and brought to England by Leofric [p. 238, ed. Warren, 1883]. In the mediæval offices it was, however, omitted in the Use of Bangor [Maskell's Mon. Rit., i. 24], but in the Sarum Use it continued, and descended thence to the first English book of 1549, with the difference that it was placed before the actual anointing, instead of, as in the Sarum Use, after it. The rubric in 1549 provides that "the minister shall put upon him his white vesture, commonly called the chrisome," and afterwards "the minister shall command that the chrisomes be brought to the church, and delivered to the priests after the accustomed manner at the purification of the mother of every child." According to Bishop Cosin [Hierurgia Anglicana, p. 357], the custom was commonly practised in the north of England temp. Charles I.; and a kind of tradition of it yet remains in the very widespread use of nothing but white clothing for a child at baptism. An infant dying before its chrisome was returned to the church was called a Chrisome Child, and in this case the chrisome was sometimes used as a shroud. The expression, however, "chrisome child," or "chrisomer," which is also found, became much misused, and was often applied to all deceased infants, whether baptised or not; thus in the registers of Westminster Abbey [ed. Colonel Chester, 1876, p. 219] is this entry:—"1687, Oct. 22. The Princess Ann's child, a chrisome." The word was also used in the bills of mortality down to the last century.

Care should be taken not to confuse this word in spelling or sense with Chrism (q.v.). Even in Keeling's Liturgia Britannica the latter spelling is used throughout the rubrics already quoted.

Christ.—"We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ, or (marginally) the Anointed" [John i. 41]. Here is at once seen the official name of our Lord and Saviour in the three languages of Hebrew, Greek, and English.

These words of Andrew the fisherman to his brother Simon, "We have found the Messiah," show clearly that "the Anointed One" was looked for and expected among the Jews. In early prophecy the Expected One is called the Anointed [1 Sam. ii. 35; Ps. ii. 2], while in Dan. ix. 25, 26, the word Messiah itself is used in our English Version.

Anointing under the Law was the ceremony by which consecration, or setting apart to any office, was performed, and men were anointed to the three offices of Prophet, Priest, and King. The instances of Elisha the prophet [1 Kings xix. 16], Aaron the priest [Levit. viii. 12], David the king [2 Sam. ii. 4], are familiar; so our Lord and Saviour, uniting the three offices in Himself, was anointed to them all, not with the material chrisom, or sweet ointment of "principal spices" [Exod. xxx. 23], but with the oil of gladness of the Holy Ghost which those "principal spices" typified [St. Matt. iii. 16]. Thus in the one word CHRIST is conveyed to us a reminder of the prophetic, priestly, and kingly offices of our Lord and Saviour, who perpetually declares to us the will of His Father by His Word, constantly intercedes for us in heaven by the memory of His death, and continually reigns over the Church, which is His kingdom.

Christadelphians.—An obscure sect, founded by one Richard Watts, a Baptist preacher. They declare that Christians everywhere have apostatised from the truth, and that they themselves represent the original faith; that they are in fact "the sect everywhere spoken against." Their name ("Christ's Brethren") is intended to distinguish them from Christians, and with the same view they call their places of worship, not "churches," but "ecclesias." They style the Church of England, and Protestant Dissenters as well, "harlot daughters of Rome." Their tenets with respect to the Godhead are Arian; and they hold that men are not created immortal, but become so by spiritual regeneration. Mr. Blunt says, "It is believed that the Christadelphians are an increasing sect," and gives London as one of the few places where they have a meeting-house, but there is no mention of it in the London Directory among "Places of Worship." [Compare CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.]

Christendom.—A term now used exclusively to denote that part of the earth where Christianity is professed, opposed to Heathendom, a word of much later formation. But two older senses of the word are these:—

1. Christianity itself, the ending "dom" being here equivalent to the modern "ness" (an instance or two of the word "Christian-ness" may be found); parallel with "halidame," which was simply "holiness," not, as some etymologists would have it, "holy dame," or the Virgin Mary.

2. Baptism, as Wycliffe in the Epistle to the Romans vi. 4: "Soothly we be together buried with Him by christendom into death."

Christian.—

"Fair Antioch the rich, the great,
Of learning the imperial seat,
You readily inclined
To light which on you shined;
It soon shot up to a meridian flame,
You first baptised it with a Christian name."

Thus writes Bishop Ken, in his too little known Christian Year (Hymn for St. Luke's Day), on that Evangelist's words, "the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch" [Acts xi. 26]—at Antioch, that is, on the Syrian river Orontes—about A.D. 43.

Other names by which believers in Christ were called were "the brethren" [Acts xv. 1], "the believers" [Acts v. 14]. It is thus likely that at the time St. Luke speaks of, the name Christian was not self-assumed; and it is clear that it could not have been given by the Jews, since they would have considered it as profaning the title of their expected Messiah—the names given by them were Nazarenes or Galileans; it must, therefore, have been imposed by the heathen population of Antioch. It was at once adopted, and "I am a Christian" became the formula of the martyr's confession [Tertullian's Apologia, ii.]. Another form of the word was Christian, as if from chrēstos, "gracious"; this latter word is, indeed, given as our Lord's name by Suetonius, in his Life of Claudius. The mistake was not an unnatural one, since Chrēstos already existed as a Greek proper name. It is possible that St. Peter alludes to this in 1 Pet. ii. 3: "If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious."

The word is assumed by several religious sects, sometimes with, sometimes without, another word. In the Report on Religious Beliefs attached to the Census of 1851, no fewer than 96 congregations in England and Wales returned themselves simply as "Christians," intending thereby to dissociate themselves from any sectarian designation. Then there were "Orthodox Christians," "New Christians," "Primitive Christians," "New Testament Christians," "Original Christians," "United Christians," "Christian Army," etc. There were eight congregations calling themselves "Christian Association." [DISSENTERS.]

tion, or one assumed at pleasure, whether not legally authorised or authorised "by deed poll executed and enrolled in Chancery," or even by Act of Parliament, but the name given to a man when, in the name of Christ, he is baptised. Now, however, it has come to signify, even in cases where baptism is not administered, the name or names peculiar to the individual, as distinct from that which identifies the family.

The giving of a name has from the very earliest times been associated with baptism, though it has not always, as at present, been given or used at the actual performance of the rite; thus, in the primitive times when baptism was yearly performed at Easter, we see from St. Gregory of Nyssa and St. Cyril of Jerusalem that the names were given to the bishop, and recorded by him in the fourth or fifth week of Lent; so St. Augustine, in his Confessions, says "The time had come when I ought to give in my name"; and accordingly in the early Orders of Baptism given in Martene [i. 63, et seq.], the name is not always connected with the baptismal formula in the way now so familiar. This custom appears to have become general about the end of the tenth century, and in the English Church it is found in the Leofric Missal of that date. In the Sarum Service the name was given and used earlier than at present, viz. at the preparatory questions which answer to our "Dost thou in the name of this child?" etc., and the infant was also addressed by it at the giving of the chrism and chrisme. In 1549 this latter use of the name was dropped, and in 1552 all use except as at present ceased; in this year it was discontinued at confirmation, where also it had previously been used.

From what has been said it will be clear that giving a name is not essential to baptism; but some such idea had so far gained ground in the Middle Ages that if an infant was baptised (according to canons then, and even now in the Roman Church, in force—Lynwood's Provinciale, iii. 25) before its birth was complete, so that its sex was unknown, the name "Creature of Christ" was used. And this, if the child lived, was actually considered as the name, for there is an entry in the Staplehurst register, July 19th, 1579, of the marriage of John Haffynden and Creature Chese-man.

There was an ancient provision that the Christian name might be changed by the bishop at confirmation, and a constitution of Archbishop Peckham (1281) enjoins this to be done in the case of wanton names; from which Bishop Scambler of Peterborough (1563) appears to have concluded [Ellis's Historical Letters, 3rd series, iii. 361] that it could be done in no other case. It has, however, been done without this limitation; and as late as 1761 [Notes and Queries, 4th series, vi. 17], and Sir Edward Coke [Instituta, i. 3] decides it to be legal.

Christianity.—The religion which we profess is based upon a new and specific revelation in the Person of Jesus Christ. Its aim is to restore to mankind the lost fellowship with God in an eternal kingdom, set up here on earth, and called the Church, to be brought to its full and perfect consummation in the world to come. The history of Christianity, then, is the record of the facts pertaining to the nature and growth of the Kingdom of God upon earth, in their external and internal relations. This history falls into three main divisions: Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern. The Ancient history of Christianity is the narrative of the supremacy won by the Church over Greek culture and the Roman Empire. It closes, and Mediæval history begins, with the epoch of the Carlovingian dynasty. The Mediæval period comprises the victories of the Church over the Celtic, Teutonic, Slavonian, and Scandinavian tribes in the centre and north of Europe, the conflicts and rupture of the Eastern and Western branches of the Church, and the contest between the Imperial and Papal powers for supremacy. This period closes with the Reformation. The Modern history recites the struggles between Catholicism and Protestantism, and between Christianity and Philosophy, and the growth of Protestant civilisation.

I. ANCIENT CHRISTIANITY.—The first subdivision in this portion (1) reaches from Christ to the days of the Antonines. It comprises the age of the Apostles and of the whole of the New Testament Scriptures, and is prior to the most widespread persecutions, and to the more definite formation of the Catholic polity and theology. The energy of the Church is displayed in its zealous missionary work and its unparalleled expansion. During this time were also written the works of the Apostolic Fathers and the first Apologists, to which must be added some heretical writings. Next comes (2) the formation of the Catholic Church in the midst of conflicts and persecutions (A.D. 180—313). The Church, having won her victory over Judaism and the cruder forms of Gnosticism, is in conflict with popular heathenism, with the philosophic culture of the time, and with the civil power, and passes through each conflict with the calm conviction of final supremacy. At the beginning of this period it is diffused beyond the bounds of the Roman Empire; at the close it is firmly established as a social and moral power, its civil rights are recognised, and its superiority to Pagan religions and philosophy is conceded. This is the period of the severest persecutions by the Imperial power, with intervals of repose. A new philosophy, Neo-Platonism, aims to supersede Christianity by reforming heathen mythology, and though it fails, it proves a large factor in the formation of Alexandrian Christian theology. [ORIGEN; ALEXANDRIA.] Eastern and Western Christianity show divergence as regards method: the Western, or Latin, tendency is practical, resting on authority; the other is speculative and exegetical. Doctrinal controversy is chiefly concerned with the Person of Christ, starting from simple faith in Him as a Divine Redeemer, and seeking to formulate His relation to the Godhead. As the period closes, the struggle for supremacy between Christianity and heathenism takes decisive form: the latter put forth all its strength to crush the advancing faith, but so entirely failed that the great change under Constantine was universally accepted. During this time the diocesan system had become fully developed; the canon of Scripture was definitely formed; but the Church was afflicted with the Novatian Schism. (3) The Church was now allied with the State, heathenism was gradually rooted out in East and West, and the barbarian hordes which began to desolate the Empire were brought by degrees under Christian rule. Monasticism had become a powerful influence. The third and fourth centuries were the most marked period in Church history (the sixteenth alone ranking with it) in the development and formal statement of fundamental Christian doctrines, and the height of Greek Theology was now reached. The formulas of the Trinity and the Person of Christ were attained, and have ever since remained in the creed of the Church. Gnosticism was now at an end. The first great controversy was the Arian, the question at issue being whether in Christ there is absolute or only relative Divinity. [ARIUS.] Then came the question, Had Christ a real human soul? [CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCIL OF.] This being affirmed, and the Person of Christ declared to be One, with Two Natures, controversies arose on the relation of these two natures. [EPHESUS and CHALCEDON, COUNCILS OF.] Now, too, appears the greatest name in the Latin Church, Augustine, Bishop of Hippo. [AUGUSTINE.] With him is connected the first great controversy which began in the Western Church, which we may call Anthropological: questions respecting nature, grace, and their relations—predestination and freewill. Opposed to Augustine was PELAGIUS (q.v.). The Catholic idea of the Church, too, was more elaborated by Augustine than it had been before, he insisting on unity and episcopal succession against the DONATISTS (q.v.). Then arises a succession of ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORIANS (q.v.). (4) The West has now become the chief seat of learning and culture in the Church, the Empire is divided and falling to pieces, when, under Leo the Great, begins that transformation which makes Rome the seat of the Papacy, as it had once been of Paganism. The barbarian incursions which shattered the Roman Empire in the West infused a new life-blood into the old and dying world. The terrible miseries which ensued were as the labour-pangs of a new world. Chaos was brought into order by the power of the Christian Church. The Eastern Church was comparatively isolated: the Emperors claimed power over it, and controversies were determined mostly by political considerations; the Western Church had to look to Rome as its centre of unity, for the Roman bishop was its only metropolitan. The barbarian tribes had nearly all been converted to Christianity by Arian missionaries expelled from the Empire; but, one by one, they were won over to the Catholic faith, and thus the Roman power was consolidated, and, while the East was continually engaged in subtleties and distinctions of doctrines, the definiteness and concentration of the Western mind made its decisions obeyed. But doctrinal controversies still continued with vehemence, the chief being the MONOPHYSITE (q.v.). The other, the SEMI-PELAGIAN (q.v.), was left undecided, and was one of the foremost questions of the Reformation in the sixteenth century. (5) The next division of this period begins with the accession to the Papacy of Gregory the Great, in 590. This period witnesses the most marked contrast between the Eastern and Western Churches. The new states of the West are shaped more and more into a political and religious unity; the Frankish Empire takes the lead among the nations, and saves Europe from Mahometan subjugation; Frank arms and monastic zeal combine in propagating Christianity in Northern Germany; the Greek Empire is riven by the warlike fanaticism of the Mahometans, and in less than a century Asia Minor, Egypt, Africa, and Spain are subdued to the Crescent. The Iconoclastic dispute between East and West weakens the former, the former seeing in the use of images the progress of superstition, the latter following its usual policy by elevating the popular feeling into a dogma of the faith. [ICONOCLASTS.]

II. MEDIEVAL CHRISTIANITY: from Charlemagne to the Reformation.—(1) The end of the Greek Exarchate in Italy, in 752 [RAVENNA], the destruction of the Lombard Kingdom, in 774, the alliance of the Frank Empire with the Papacy, the division of the Mahometan Khalifate, in 750, into the Abbasides of the East and the Omniads in Spain, and the decline of the Greek Empire, all make the reign of Charles the Great a turning-point in human history. [CHARLEMAGNE.] The Papacy pushes its claim to universal obedience, which is tacitly acquiesced in by Charlemagne, though he and his successors assert Imperial rights as to the election of the Popes. The Papal claim is greatly strengthened by the FORGED DECRETALS (q.v.). The result of the claim of the Papacy was the final separation of the Eastern and Western Churches. The dismemberment of Charlemagne's Empire after his death encouraged the Papal claims, but the latter part of the ninth century saw the Popes become the puppets of rival Italian factions, and for awhile the Papacy became the shame and derision of Europe. Controversies concerning the Eucharist began; monasticism made progress, and gradually exempted itself from episcopal jurisdiction, and was made subject to the Pope only. The best life of the Church was seen in its northern missions. These troubles, and the confusions and struggles of the new nations, bring us to what is known as (2) "The Dark Age" (900—1073). The old classical learning had died out, theology was at a standstill or retrograde, art was unknown, the schools of Charlemagne were closed; the Papacy was under the feet of a Roman faction, which placed its tools on the Papal throne. Out of this evil state Europe was dragged by the establishment of the new German Empire under Otto the Great (936), which gave to Germany a centre of unity, restored order in North Italy, and for a century and a half controlled the Papacy. (3) Out of this order—the work of the secular power—came fresh claims from the Papacy which it had purified. Pope Gregory VII. (1073) declared that the Popedom was a theocratic monarchy to rule all the nations; and though this doctrine (as he formulated it) was never admitted, sufficient remained to make the Papal power for a couple of centuries the greatest power upon earth. By the enforcement of celibacy in the clergy, Gregory separated the priesthood from sympathy with their own national governments, and branded investiture with ecclesiastical office by the secular power as simony. The ban and interdict were the terrible instruments of this vast usurpation. [INVESTITURE.] The other salient characteristics of the Middle Ages come out in bold relief within this period. Feudalism belongs rather to secular than to ecclesiastical history; but the Crusades, in which the old contest between Europe and Asia, between Islam and Christianity, was revived, were a more distinctly religious movement. [CRUSADES.] Though they were ineffectual in restoring Christianity in the lost countries, they kept the Moslems in check, brought back something of Eastern learning to the West, and helped the Papacy to strengthen its hold upon popular impulses. Christian theology took a new form in Scholasticism. [SCHOOLMEN.] Not as yet widely felt, but beginning a new order of things, were three influences: (a) The germs of popular literature in the native languages (minnesingers and troubadours); (b) the Third Estate, in the Lombard cities and in France; (c) the protesting parties in the Church (Waldenses, etc.), who cried for religious reforms. (4) The accession of Pope Innocent III., in 1198, raised the Papal system to its height. He brought the chief kings of Christendom to submission, held the gates of the East through the new Latin Empire at Constantinople, and consummated his plans at the Lateran Council in 1215. But his successors were unable to carry out his schemes; they were exhausted by the long struggle with the Hohenstaufens (q.v.), and retired from this struggle only to become the vassals of France. The rise of the new Mendicant Orders of this period will be described under MENDICANT ORDERS. To the same period belongs the establishment of the Inquisition (q.v.). But now a new power appears: the mightiest for many ages. The rise of fanatical sects, both within and without the Church [FLAGELLANTS; FRATICELLI; ALMOGENSES], gave an indication that Rome was losing its hold of the common people; so did the tone of the modern literature, which now began to rise in all its glory first in Italy. Rome and Scholasticism could only use dead Latin; the Divine Comedy of Dante, the tales of Boccaccio, and the sonnets of Petrarch were in the common tongue. In England, Wycliffe's projected reforms touched the very heart of Church and State. (5) The Mediæval Church had done a good work in subduing the rude tribes of the north to the Gospel, in keeping the Church from being subject to the State, in collecting and transmitting ancient learning. It was a schoolmaster to the nations, but now their pupilage was ending. But when old weapons were found unavailing, the Church took up those of fraud and coercion. Exactions, simony, extortions were multiplied; the traffic in indulgences practically became the purchase of the right to commit sin. St. Bridget, in her time, had declared that at Rome the whole Decalogue had come down to one precept, "Give gold." The Popes were men of shameless lives. At the Councils of Constance and Basle attempts were made to reform scandalous abuses, but they were too deeply rooted to be thus cured. The invention of printing diffused among the people the culture which hitherto had been the monopoly of the clergy, and the revived study of Greek and Roman literature, owing chiefly to the flight of the Greek scholars before the Turks, who were pressing on Constantinople, opened up the sources of Christian history, and drew back the veil which had long hidden primitive Christianity and the sacred Scriptures. The Papacy was seen to lack historical foundations. The balance of power was moved from the centre to the west of Europe; Venice declined, and the discovery of a new world placed the future in the grasp of the commercial nations. The Greek Empire fell under Ottoman dominion by the capture of Constantinople, in 1453; but forty years later the Moslem was driven out of Spain, and in 1462 the Greek Church was made the standard of orthodoxy in Russia.

III. MODERN HISTORY.—Even Roman Catholic historians have ceased to describe the Reformation as a mere violent rupture with the past. The causes of it run back into the very heart of the Middle Ages; its warrant was found not only in the needs of the nations, but in the Holy Scriptures and the earliest traditions of the Christian Church. The immediate cause was not opposition to the Papacy, but a deeper spiritual experience: a sense of sin and a need of redemption. So widespread was this need that in the first period (1) of the Reformation (1517—1555) more was gained than was retained; a reaction then began (2) under the Inquisition and the Jesuits, which brought back France and Southern Germany to the Mediæval Church. No Celtic race finally accepted the Reform. The Council of Trent (1542—1562) committed Rome irretrievably to the Mediæval system. [TRENT, COUNCIL OF.] The Reformed Churches on the Continent were divided into two main portions, the "Evangelical" and the "Reformed," or Lutheran and Calvinistic. In England the old order was scrupulously observed, and the succession of bishops remained unbroken. (3) The Peace of Westphalia (1648) put an end to the Thirty Years' War, and established the political rights of the Reformed Churches and princes of Europe. All of the great Confessions of Faith had then been written. The subsequent period saw the progress of the Church in the midst of its conflicts with the civil powers, and also with philosophy. Its three chief foes were the Deism of England, the Atheism of France, and the Pantheism of Germany. The Anglican theology was shaped by such men as Hooker, Andrewes, Bull, and Waterland. In the early part of the eighteenth century a low tone of theology prevailed. Butler, in his Analogy, defeated the Deists on their own grounds. Whitfield and Wesley raised a religious fervour where there had been torpor. The French Revolution came like an earthquake upon Europe, and had a powerful effect both in humbling the Church of Rome and in creating a reaction against the infidelity which was so marked a feature of the outbreak. The Roman Catholic Church entered upon a new career, in alliance with absolutism, at the restoration of the Bourbons, and is still a mighty influence in Europe. But in the centre of the reaction, namely France, the division between Religion and Science is growing stronger every day. In Germany, Möhler, in his "symbolism," has constructed the most skilful modern defence of the Roman Catholic Church. The Greek Church also has renewed its strength, and the Eastern Churches are showing signs of life. Lutheranism and Calvinism remain stationary, and we may claim for Great Britain that her colonial possessions make her throughout the world the greatest missionary power. The rapid sketch of the history of Christianity here offered is supplemented by other articles, such as Missions, as well as by those indicated in the body of this article. [THEOLOGY; EVIDENCES.]

Christmas.—Christ's mass: such is the well-known derivation of this name; of other similar formations, Michaelmas is the most familiar; Martinmas (November 11th) and Lammas (August 1st) are occasionally heard; Childermas (Holy Innocents' Day) is almost forgotten.

The observance of the feast of Christmas is, as would be expected, of the very greatest antiquity, and, indeed, its origin cannot be traced. There is little doubt, though the first actual mention of it is by Clement of Alexandria, who died A.D. 220, that it is almost coeval with Christianity itself; St. Chrysostom in the fourth century speaks of it as then very old. The present date, December 25th, has been allotted to it in the West with practical unanimity, but in the East the date first used was January 6th, when this feast and that of the Epiphany were observed as one; and the Western date was adopted in deference to St. Chrysostom, who endeavoured to prove its correctness as follows. There was, it seems, a tradition that the angelic message of John the Baptist's approaching birth was given to his father, Zechariah, in the Holy of Holies on the Day of the Atonement; this day was just nine months before the 24th of June, the day kept then, as now, as the Baptist's nativity. Six months [Luke i. 26] after the message to Zechariah came that to the blessed Virgin Mary; and taking again nine months from this, we are brought to December 25th. In this tradition the first difficulty is that Zechariah was not High Priest, and none other entered the Holy of Holies; this is answered by the undoubted fact that if the High Priest were disabled, a deputy might, and did, officiate, and it may be supposed that Zechariah was such deputy; but the second difficulty is more serious, that Zechariah's "lot was to burn incense," and that he was plainly so doing, since the message was given "at the time of incense," and the angel was "standing on the right side of the altar of incense" [Luke i. 9, 10, 11]. Now, this altar did not stand in the Holy of Holies, and therefore the message was not given there. How far this weakens the tradition of the date, opinions will differ; and it is quite possible that the Day of Atonement was fixed on by assuming the correctness of the 24th of June for the Baptist's nativity; but it is, at any rate, certain that after St. Chrysostom Christmas was observed on December 25th in East and West alike, except in the Armenian Church, which still remains faithful to January 6th.

Other dates have been given for our Lord's actual birth; as, in ancient times, this very January 6th by Epiphanius [Heretics, li. 24], and April 21st and May 20th by some who are mentioned by Clement of Alexandria [Stromata, i. 6]. In England the first doubt of December 25th being the true date seems to have been raised by the Puritans at the Rebellion. Thus, in 1644, on the ordinance of Parliament for abolishing Christmas Day, it was publicly stated to be "evident" that our Lord was born in September or October; and in 1649 a tract was published to prove this, which was answered in the same year by the great John Pearson, afterwards Bishop of Chester [Minor Works, ed. Churton, ii. 153], and in 1653 by Dr. Henry Hammond [Works, 1684, i. 656]. In later times other dates have been given, viz. February 1st by Wieseler [Chronological Synopsis], though only as a probability; April 6th by Greswell [Harmonia Evangelica]; August 1st by Lewin [Fæsti Sacri]; but other modern authorities strongly maintain that the date of the event is the date of the commemoration, December 25th. A learned American cleric, the Rev. Samuel Jarvis, D.D., worked out, in 1844, a most elaborate system of chronology, now little read, which leads to this conclusion; McClellan also [New Testament, i. 390, et seq.] takes this view from independent calculations. As to the year, it is now well known that our present calculation is too late; this is stated in the margin of our Authorised Version of St. Luke's Gospel; the year of our Lord's birth, given by McClellan as above, was probably B.C. 5. If, therefore, the 1st of the next January, of B.C. 4, had begun the Christian era, i.e., if that year had been reckoned as A.D. 1, the year A.D. 1886 would be A.D. 1890; and in the same way, if the year of our Lord's birth had been reckoned as B.C. 1, the year of the creation of the world would be B.C. 4000 (according to the Usherian chronology), instead of B.C. 4004, as in the margin of the first chapter of Genesis. It must be remembered in these calculations that there is no year B.C. 0 or A.D. 0, but that we go at once from B.C. 1 to A.D. 1.

The offices used in England on Christmas Day have been gradually diminished. The Sarum Use provided for three celebrations of the Holy Communion; the first English Prayer Book of 1549 for two, as also on Easter Day; the second, of 1552, and all later ones, for but one. Our present collect is the second of the two for 1549; the successive Epistles and Gospels are as follows:—

Christolytes (CHRISTOS, Christ, and lōs, "to loose"), a sect of the sixth century, who held that when Christ descended into hell, He left both body and soul there, and, "loosed" from them, ascended into heaven with His Divine nature only.

Christopher, Sr.—An early saint, of whom nothing certain is known. He is said to have been a native of Lycia, and to have suffered martyrdom under Decius. The well-known legend about him, however, is so beautiful as to claim a place in this volume. It is as follows :—He was very strong, and of gigantic stature, and wishing to use his strength for the good of others, he used to carry people across a stream near which he lived. One night he was aroused by hearing some one call him, and going out, found a child waiting to be carried across. St. Christopher at first found his burden very light, but it grew heavier and heavier, so that he seemed ready to sink under it. When they reached the bank the child had grown to a man, who said, "Wonder not, my friend; I am Jesus, and you had the weight of the sins of the whole world on your back." The moral is obvious : "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of My brethren, ye did it unto Me." The figure of St. Christopher is very common all over the Continent; a wood engraving of his figure, supposed to be of the year 1423, is probably the earliest known example of that art.

Chrysostom, Sr.—John, called Chrysostom, or "Golden Mouth," on account of his eloquence, was born at Antioch in 347. His father, a man of high rank, died soon after his birth, but his mother, Anthusa, devoted herself to instructing her child. From his earliest years she taught him the truths of the Gospel, and in after life he often spoke of the good influence she had had over him. When old enough, Chrysostom went to the school of Libanius, a celebrated teacher of rhetoric, and soon entered upon the profession of a lawyer. He gained great reputation, and might have been led into evil life by his companions but for Melitus, Bishop of Antioch, under whose influence he was baptised at the age of eighteen, and became a Reader. But he had so low an opinion of himself that he felt unworthy to undertake the higher office of the ministry; so he and his friend Basil determined to retire from the world, but were dissuaded by Anthusa.

About this time an incident occurred which gave rise to one of Chrysostom's most celebrated writings. Two sees in Syria were vacant, and the bishops chose Basil and Chrysostom to fill them. Basil agreed to consent if Chrysostom would follow his example; the latter, thinking that his friend would fill the office well, and that the Church would gain a good servant, promised, without meaning to keep his word, and then hid himself till Basil was consecrated. When Basil reproached him, he answered by his Treatise on the Priesthood, in which he descants on its solemn character and the qualifications necessary for it, and declares his own unworthiness.

On the death of his mother, in 374, Chrysostom left Antioch and retired to the mountains near, where he lived with other monks, practising great austerities, until he determined, at the end of four years, to go by himself into a place of greater seclusion. Here his watching and fasting broke down his health, and obliged him, after two years, to return to Antioch. During his seclusion he wrote his Discourses on Compunction and the Defence of a Monastic Life. When he returned to Antioch, Melitus ordained him deacon. He filled this office for five years, working laboriously in his pastoral duties and in authorship. He wrote de Virginitate, the Epistola ad Viduam Juniores, and the Three Books of Providence. The last of these was for the comfort of a young monk, Stagerius, who had retired into seclusion, and was so oppressed with melancholy that he believed himself possessed with devils.

In 385 Chrysostom was made a priest by Flavian, who had succeeded Melitus four years before. His sermons now became famous. Flavian appointed him to occupy the cathedral pulpit, and he preached regularly on Saturday and Sunday, as well as in Lent and on saints' days. The most famous of his homilies are those On the Statues, delivered in March and April, 387. The Emperor Theodosius levied a new tax for defraying the expenses of the army. This angered the citizens, and they rebelled, ransacked the public buildings, destroyed the pictures of the Emperor, tore down the statues of him and of Flaccilla, the late Empress, and dragged them through the streets. Flavian, who might have quieted the mob, was from home, but hearing that Theodosius in his anger had determined to destroy the whole city, he hastened to Constantinople to implore for mercy. He was absent three weeks, and during this time St. Chrysostom preached every day, allaying the fears of the citizens, raising their hopes, exhorting the wayward to repentance, and converting those who were still heathens. At length Flavian returned, bringing word that the city was spared. The last of the Homilies on the Statues, delivered on Easter Day, contains a description of the interview between Flavian and Theodosius, and is a good example of Chrysostom's great oratorical powers. For ten years longer he remained at Antioch, still preaching, and writing the greater part of his Commentary on the Scriptures. In 397, Nectarius, Bishop of Constantinople, died, leaving vacant one of the most influential posts in the Church. Theodosius had died also, leaving as Emperor a son, Arcadius, who was quite incompetent to rule, and the chief power was in the hands of his Prime Minister, Eutropius. The latter had heard Chrysostom preach, and offered the see to him. The decision was very popular among the electing bishops, and the only difficulties arose from Chrysostom himself and from the people of Antioch, who were unwilling to lose him. They were overcome by stratagem, for Asterius, the messenger, induced St. Chrysostom to accompany him to a martyrs' chapel, where he was seized by the officers of the Government and taken to Constantinople. All the bishops welcomed him except Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, who wished the post to be given to Isidore, one of his presbyters, with whom he was concerned in some discreditable transactions. Eutropius threatened that if he would not consecrate Chrysostom he should be openly questioned about matters which would cause him trouble. The bishop yielded, and Chrysostom was consecrated Bishop of Constantinople, Feb. 26th, 398.

He soon showed the people that he did not intend to alter his habits of life. He lived in a very unostentatious manner, stripped the palace of its grand furniture, ate the simplest food in his solitary room instead of giving grand banquets, and never went to Court unless obliged. Some of his people contrasted him unfavourably with Nectarius, and accused him of meanness, moroseness, and pride. He was very unpopular with his clergy, whose moral tone generally was very low. Chrysostom saw that before he could correct the evils of the city he must bring back his clergy to simplicity of life, and rouse them to activity. He looked on the revenues of the Church as the property of the poor, and tried to retrench all needless expenses connected with his see for their sake. He revived the old custom of nocturnal services to counteract the attractions of the Arians, who gathered great crowds at night by open-air services, and he built several hospitals in Constantinople, which before had had only one. Besides these good works in Constantinople, he laboured to convert the Goths, who were either heathens or Arians. The Empress Eudoxia was for a while delighted with him. She was the daughter of a Frankish general, and had gained great influence with the king, quite supplanting Eutropius, who in 399 was obliged to fly for his life, and took sanctuary in the cathedral. He had been a man of bad life, and Chrysostom had been one of his sternest opponents, but he now refused to give him up, and in consequence was apprehended, and carried before Arcadius, but he so far prevailed that the sentence against Eutropius was changed to banishment. A few days after, the latter was, however, seized, and beheaded at Chalcedon.

The popularity of Chrysostom was at its height; it began now to decline, chiefly through Eudoxia. His refusal to give up Eutropius had offended her; so had his outspokenness concerning her open faults; and she was jealous of his influence over her husband. Eutropius removed, Chrysostom was the only hindrance to her gaining entire control over him, therefore she determined to ruin her rival. An opportunity soon occurred. Hitherto the Bishop of Constantinople had exercised jurisdiction over the dioceses of Thrace and Asia, and Chrysostom followed his example. He visited Ephesus, and deposed six bishops of the neighbourhood for different crimes. But on his return to Constantinople he found that Severian, the bishop left in charge, had behaved unworthily, and had been supported by Eudoxia. Thereupon he denounced Severian from the pulpit as a flatterer, and a few days afterwards in the same place he called the Empress "Jezebel."

The anger of the clergy at being rebuked for their vices came to the aid of the Empress, and the only thing needed was a leader. Theophilus had never forgotten that he had been compelled to consecrate Chrysostom, and was quite ready to head the party against him; and a pretext was soon found in Chrysostom's treatment of some Egyptian monks known as the "Tall Brethren," whom Theophilus had dealt with cruelly, driving them from their homes in the Nitrian desert, and whom Chrysostom had received kindly at Constantinople. Theophilus endeavoured to fasten upon them, and upon Chrysostom through them, the charge of holding the errors of Origen. He came to Constantinople, and after three weeks spent in bribing the most influential citizens, he held a synod at Chalcedon, in the middle of July, 403. Most of the members were his suffragans, and the chair was taken by the Bishop of Heraclea. There were twenty-nine charges, all frivolous or false, some referring to Chrysostom's conduct towards his clergy, and some to his private life. As the council was packed, and Chrysostom's refusal to recognise its authority was ignored, the imperial decree confirmed the sentence of banishment for life. No sooner was it made known than the infuriated people of Constantinople surrounded the palace, lest their bishop should be carried off by force; but on the third day he surrendered himself, and set sail towards Bithynia. That night Constantinople was shaken by an earthquake, and Eudoxia, who was superstitious, thought it was as a punishment, and persuaded Arcadius to send messengers to bring the bishop back. He was received with great joy, but refused to resume his office until his innocence should be declared by a larger council than that which had deposed him; however, as the people threatened the Emperor if their bishop were not restored, and as all the bishops implored him, he resumed his office, and Theophilus and his suffragans fled, leaving him for a time in peace.

But this did not last long. The feud burst out again when a statue of Eudoxia was erected between the palace and the Church of St. Sophia. Its dedication, in September, 403, was celebrated with a noise and revelry which disturbed the people in church, and St. Chrysostom preached against it. He is said to have begun the sermon with the words: "Herodias is once more maddening; Herodias is once more dancing; once more Herodias demands the head of John on a charger." At Eudoxia's furious demand, the hostile bishops returned; after consultation as to the best means of accusing him, they determined to use one of the canons of the Council of Antioch in 341, which says that a bishop deprived of his see cannot be restored by the secular arm. Chrysostom answered that the decree had been made by the Arians, and was therefore invalid. He was upheld by forty-two bishops, and continued to preach as before, but on Christmas Day Arcadius refused to communicate, because of the doubtful position of the bishop, and now, when Easter drew near, he issued an order for the latter's removal. Chrysostom refused to obey it, and the Emperor bade him to remain in his palace, and not to go to the church. But on Easter Eve 3,000 catechumens were to be baptised, and as the bishop's presence was necessary he went. In the middle of the service a body of soldiers rushed in, scattering the catechumens and desecrating the church.

Still Arcadius could not for some time make up his mind to sign the edict of banishment. He was prevailed upon to do so on the 5th of June, 404. In order to prevent an outbreak of the people, Chrysostom left the city secretly, accompanied only by two faithful bishops. As soon as he had gone the church took fire, and was burnt to the ground, with the senate house and other public buildings. The cause was never known, but the Empress said it was done by the Johannites, as Chrysostom's friends were called, who were unwilling that any one should preach in the same church as their bishop. In accordance with this belief, there was a persecution, in which all Chrysostom's adherents were fined, banished, or imprisoned.

Meanwhile, Chrysostom was on his way to Cucusus, in Armenia, which was about two months' journey from Constantinople. It was a bad time of year for travelling, as he had to cross the plains of Galatia and Cappadocia in mid summer. The only food he could obtain was black bread, and the water was very bad. He was seized with ague, but was forced on till he reached Cæsarea. Here he was obliged to stop, although Pharetrius, the bishop, was a friend of Theophilus, whilst his clergy were friends of Chrysostom. Pharetrius therefore dared not openly show his hate, but he persuaded some fanatical monks to threaten to burn his lodging if he did not leave it. So the poor bishop had to proceed on his way till he found a temporary refuge in the house of Seleucia, a wealthy lady. The hatred of Pharetrius again forced him to quit, and at last, at the end of August, he arrived at Cucusus. Here he found a comfortable home after his journeys. Adelphius the bishop, and others, did all in their power to aid him, and some of his own clergy sent help, and even came to him. He spent his time well, writing letters of consolation to his bishops and instructing them, sending out missions to Persia and Scythia, and doing a great deal of good in Cucusus itself.

He wrote, explaining all the circumstances, to the Bishop of Rome, who at once addressed Honorius, Emperor of the West, begging him to use his influence with his brother Emperor to restore the bishop. But the letters were seized, and never reached their destinations.

These attempts for the exiled bishop's help only excited his enemies to further cruelties, and when they saw how he was beloved by the people of Cucusus, they determined to remove him. In the summer of 407 he set out for Pityus, on the north-east shore of the Euxine, this being chosen as the bleakest spot in the Empire. The journey was to be made on foot, and the soldiers were promised a reward if he died on the road. He was hurried along to increase his sufferings, which must have been extreme from the alternate heat and cold, and at Comana it was evident that he was dying, but they urged him on till they reached a chapel five or six miles outside the city, where they allowed him to rest for the night. The next morning he was forced to proceed, but when he had travelled about four miles an attack of fever came on, and he retraced his steps to the chapel, where he died on the 14th of September, 407, in his sixty-first year.

Some of his works have been noticed in the course of this article. The greatest is his Commentaries on the New Testament. Not only for his eloquence, but for his deep interpretative insight, St. Chrysostom must be regarded as one of the greatest Fathers the Church has had.

Chubb, THOMAS.—One of the Deistical leaders at the beginning of the last century. It is not to the credit of the party to have been led by such a man, nor is it very easy to account for the notice he attracted, which was far more than he deserved, being a half-educated tradesman, with little or none of the classical and critical knowledge necessary to fit him for the place into which he contrived to push himself: knowledge whose place was, however, very imperfectly supplied by a certain readiness of thought and pen.

Chubb was born at East Harnham, near Salisbury, Sept. 29th, 1679, the son of a maltster, and himself first a glover at Salisbury, and then a tallow-chandler. Here he gave himself, perhaps, a passable education in English literature, but of Latin and Greek he knew nothing; and he formed a religious debating society, where, according to Chalmers, "the ablest disputant was the man who receded most from established opinion." The Trinitarian controversy between Drs. Samuel Clarke and Daniel Waterland (Canon of Windsor, died 1740) gave a turn to some of the proceedings of this society, and Chubb, after obtaining the approval of the Arian William Whiston, published his writing on the subject as The Supremacy of the Father Asserted (1715). This was his first book. The True Gospel of Jesus Christ (1738) and others followed, both before and after his death, in which he attempted to level down—as the phrase is—Christianity to sheer Deism, and showed plainly his want of faith in revelation and a future life. The books made some noise at the time, probably owing in a measure to their authorship, and were answered by Joseph Hallet (b. 1692, d. 1744) in The Consistent Christian, and by others.

Chubb resided for a time as house-steward in the family of Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls (1717—1738), but with this exception his life was spent in his trade at Salisbury. He died there suddenly, Feb. 8th, 1747.

Church, THE.—"The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the Sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." Such is the Anglican definition of the Church (the Nineteenth Article of Religion), dating in its present form from 1553, and unaltered at the later revision of the Articles in 1562. Nor is this definition that given merely by the Church of England, for its origin is clearly the Seventh Article of the Confession of Augsburg, drawn up by Melancthon (1530), where nearly the same words are found: "There is one holy Church to abide for ever. And the Church is a congregation of saints in which the Gospel is rightly taught, and the Sacraments rightly administered." Luther and Calvin speak to the same effect, the former in his Greater Catechism [Works, v. 628], the latter in his Institutes, i. 7; but far behind these three Protestant divines we go to the earliest of the Fathers. They do not, of course, speak in the manner of categorical definition; but the definitions in this article may be clearly gathered from them; convenient quotations and translations of such passages may be seen in Bishop Browne's Exposition of the Articles, p. 444 et seq. (2nd edit.).

The preaching of the pure Word and the due ministration of the Sacraments, are two of the so-called Notes of the Church, a third being the use of discipline; the three are set out at full length in the second part of the Homily for Whitsuntide [p. 494, ed. S.P.C.K.]: "The Church hath always three notes or marks whereby it is known: pure and sound doctrine, the Sacraments ministered according to Christ's holy institution, and the right use of ecclesiastical discipline." But more familiar to an ordinary reader will be the "notes" contained in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, that the Church is One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolic: one, because her Shepherd is one, and under Him she is one flock; holy, being founded by the holy Christ; Catholic, since she is open to the whole world; Apostolic, as built on the foundation of the Apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone.

The Church is made up of all true Christians living in this world; and joined with these, those who have departed in God's faith and fear into the next world. But though thus internally one, externally the Church is not so. She has been divided since the ninth century into the two great sections of (1) the Eastern Church and (2) the Western Church; and these again have been subdivided into many portions, which are considered under their respective heads. The division into sections is generally admitted to be an evil, and it is the conviction of this evil which has, especially of late years, led good men of all sections to pray and long for the Reunion of Christendom. [UNITY OF THE CHURCH.]

The Voice of the Universal Church, i.e. of the whole body of particular and local Churches, has never been heard in an Ecumenical Council since the Sixth General Council of A.D. 680.

The word CHURCH is used not only in the great sense which we have hitherto considered, but is also applied to the buildings in which assemblies of the members of the Christian Church are held. As the Romans applied the words curia and senatus both to the members of those bodies and to their place of meeting, so the Greeks came to use the word ecclesia in the same twofold sense. Tertullian says, "Confugiunt in ecclesiam," meaning the material Church; and St. Jerome, upon Isaiah lx., tells us that the Emperors built churches (ecclesias) with the public revenue; and there is mention of the destruction of churches in the history of the persecutions early in the third century.

These churches differed in form probably as widely in old time as do the finest of our churches now. Some were round; some were quadrilateral externally, but had a circular nave touching one end, and a chancel touching the circle at the other end, with chapels beside it. The "round church" of the Temple will be familiar to all readers who know London. Some ancient churches were formed from abandoned heathen temples, which were altered so as to be fitted for Christian worship; some were built over tombs. It is impossible, therefore, to say certainly what was the exact form of such churches, but the following may be taken as describing their general characteristics. They were removed as far as possible from all other common buildings, and surrounded with courts, gardens, or buildings belonging to the church. The porch was the outermost part, from which there was a passage into a cloister, i.e. a square court, with covered galleries round it, supported by pillars, much in the same manner as a monastery. Under these galleries stood the poor, who had the liberty to beg at the church gate. In the middle of the court there was a fountain for people to wash their hands and faces before they went to prayers. At the further end of the cloister there was a double porch, in which there were three doors, leading into the basilica, or body of the church. One part of this double porch was outside, and the other inside, which the Greeks called narthex. Near the basilica, on the outside, there were generally two small buildings, the baptistery or font, and the vestry, where the church furniture was kept. The basilica had three divisions, made by two rows of pillars, which supported the galleries on either side, the middle being the nave. Towards the farther end, eastward, stood the altar, and behind it was the presbyterium, or sanctuary, where the priests stood during Divine Service, with the bishop in the middle of them, his chair being at the easternmost end of the church. Before the altar was a sort of balustrade, or rails, called cancelli, which resembled the modern choir. At the entrance to the chancel was the ambo, or pulpit, which was a sort of raised seat, having steps on either side for the priests to go up and read the lessons. Sometimes there was one of these raised desks on each side, leaving a space open in the middle, that the altar might be seen by the congregation. The desk for the Gospel was at the bishop's right hand, and that for the Epistle at the other. The space between the desk and the altar was for the choir, who were of the inferior orders of the clergy. The roof of the sanctuary was lower than the rest of the church. This farther end was sometimes called the "Tribunal," because, in the secular basilicas, this was the place where the magistrate or judge sat, with the officers of the court about him. The floor of this part of the church was raised higher than the rest, so that the bishop walked down a decline to come to the altar.

The altar was a table made of rich materials, and placed, if possible, upon the tomb of some martyr, whence came the custom in after times never to consecrate an altar without putting some relic underneath it. There was nothing fixed immediately to the altar, but there were four pillars erected at the four corners, and from these a sort of pavilion or tent was suspended, which covered the whole, and was called the ciborium. [CIBORIUM.] Sometimes a silver dove hung over the altar, to symbolise the Holy Ghost. Churches were often enriched with mosaic-work, and with historical paintings of the Old Testament, of our Saviour's miracles, and of other religious subjects, intended to assist devotion and instruct the ignorant.

Church Building.—The manner of building churches in ancient times was for the founder to make application to the bishop for his licence. The bishop, or his commissary, came and set up a cross to mark the site, after which the founder might proceed to build. When finished it was consecrated, after which the sacraments might be ministered therein. No church can be recognised by law unless it be thus consecrated by the bishop.

Several Acts have from time to time been passed to provide further accommodation to meet the growth of population. In the reign of Queen Anne, when the Church was high in power and influence, Parliament erected fifty new churches in London, one of which is well known to every Londoner through its prominent situation—St. Mary's in the Strand. The money was raised by granting a duty of one shilling per chaldron on coals for three years. This produced £350,000. In George the Third's reign an Act "to promote the building, repairing, and providing of churches and chapels, and of houses for the residence of ministers, and churchyards, and glebes," allowed persons by deed of gift, or by will, executed three months before decease, to give lands not exceeding five acres, or goods and chattels not exceeding £500, for this purpose. By a further statute, the Treasury was authorised to issue Exchequer Bills to the amount of £1,000,000, on which the Bank might advance money for the purposes of the Act. Church Building Commissioners were appointed for ten years, for the proper spending of this money. They were to examine into the state of parishes and extra-parochial places, and to see where additional churches and chapels were most required, and to lend money out of the million raised, on condition that a proportion was added from the Parish Church rate. These rates having been legally secured, might be extended over several years. There are still parishes on which such rates are levied to pay for churches so built, but the Compulsory Church Rate Abolition Act of 1860 rendered any further levying of this character impossible. [CHURCH RATES.] The Commissioners might also make representation of the need of subdividing parishes into separate ecclesiastical districts, and when new churches were built in these, rights of marriages and funerals belonged to them as to the mother churches. No graves were to be made in new churches; free seats for the poor were to be provided. These Commissions were renewed from time to time, and fresh powers were given them, but their duties were at length transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1857.

Church Congress. [CONGRESS.]

Church Rates.—A tax formerly levied on parishes for the repair of church fabrics, and for the carrying-on of Divine worship. Dr. Hook, writing when these rates were legally enforced and recoverable like any other rate, made this defence of them: "The greater part of the property of this country has been bought and sold with an understanding that the church of the parish is to be kept and repaired by the owners of that property. Except for this liability, a larger sum would have been paid for the property. For those, therefore, who have thus profited by the existence of a church rate to refuse that rate, and so appropriate to themselves what does not belong to them, is an act, not only of profaneness, but of dishonesty."

—Ch. Dictionary. But conflicting decisions for many years kept up a continual agitation on the subject of compulsory church rates. The best legal opinion seemed to be that for the repairs of the church, the churchwardens might enforce a rate apart from the vestry, but for purposes of worship, organist's salary, etc., a vote of the majority of the ratepayers was necessary. However, the Church-Rate Compulsory Abolition Act of 1860 ended this controversy. [CHURCH BUILDING.]

Churching of Women.—Some rite answering to that now known under this familiar name has existed from antiquity; but the idea which underlay it before the Reformation, always in its title, and sometimes in its subject-matter, was the Judaic one of purification from ceremonial uncleanness rather than of thanksgiving for a mercy. The notion of such uncleanness prevailed very widely—see Ellis's Historical Letters, 3rd ser., ii. 226: "There is a certain superstitious opinion and usage among women, which is, that in case a woman go with child she may christen (that is, be sponsor to) no other man's child as long as she is in that case." In 1880 a woman with child refused to take an oath at a police-court (Notes and Queries, 6th ser., iii. 48); this was probably an unreasoning survival of the same thought.

In the English pre-Reformation office, this idea was shown by the title, "The Order of the Purification of Women after Child-birth, before the Door of the Church," by this appointment of the porch or outside of the church for the use of the office, and by the concluding formal introduction into the church with the words, "Enter thou into the Temple of God, that thou mayest have eternal life, and live for ever." In 1549, though the first clause of the title was retained, the office was to be used in the church, "nigh unto the quire door." In 1552 the title was changed to the present one, and the office to be used "nigh unto the place where the table standeth." In 1562 the latter sentence was further altered to "some convenient place;" but none can be more convenient than the altar rails, which were approved by the bishops at the Savoy Conference.

There was an early use as to dress: the woman was directed to wear a veil (occasionally church property), of such a kind as is now used at confirmation and marriage: this lasted, at least, far into the seventeenth century, and Bishop Cosin's Articles (1662) inquire if women "are decently veiled." Archdeacon Stanley, of London (1728), inquires whether they "are decent," which doubtless has the same meaning.

The office was formerly not used for unmarried women till they had done their penance, and injunctions to this effect are given by many of the seventeenth century bishops; Archbishop Grindal enjoined (at York in 1571, at Canterbury in 1576) that, even after the penance, or acknowledgment, such a churching should not take place except on a Sunday or holy day. A cleric now called upon to church an unmarried woman must at least satisfy himself that her sin is sincerely repented of.

Churchwardens are officers who were appointed originally to carry on the repairs of church buildings, to take care of the goods of the church, and to see that Divine Service is duly conducted. They have, however, no right to interfere with the manner of Divine Service, even though they deem that manner illegal; they must report to the bishop. Under the Public Worship Regulation Act one churchwarden, or three parishioners, may initiate proceedings. On the churchwardens fall the duties of rating the parishioners, of clearing the church and churchyard of loiterers during service, of preventing quarrelling and brawling. They can prevent strange preachers from occupying the pulpit unless they produce their letters of orders. Churchwardens are elected the first week after Easter, or the week following, and are chosen by the joint consent of the minister and parishioners, if that may be; but if they cannot agree upon such a choice, then the minister chooses one and the parishioners the other. In some parishes the custom has prevailed of the parishioners choosing both churchwardens, and such right is good in law. They serve for one year. During the vacancy of a benefice they take charge of the temporalities, and arrange for the conduct of Divine Service, charging the expense thereof upon the future incumbent. In mother parishes, but not in district churches, churchwardens are ex officio overseers of the poor.

Churchyard. [BURIAL.]

Ciborium.—In ancient times this word had two meanings: (1) the baldacchino, or altar canopy [BALDACCHINO]; (2) from the centre of this canopy was often suspended a receptacle for the Reserved Host, the consecrated bread of the Holy Eucharist, and this also had the name of ciborium [Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica]; another name was that of pyx, which afterwards became the more common. It was sometimes made in the shape of a dove; this emblem of the Holy Ghost was also suspended over the font. In English Roman Catholic churches it is the name given to the pyx in which the Blessed Sacrament is kept.

ANCIENT CIBORIUM.

In some "ritualistic" Churches the canister for keeping the altar-bread is called the pyx; but this is incorrect.

Circumcellions.—A fanatical section of the DONATISTS (q.v.). The name was also applied in Germany to some furious supporters of the Emperor Frederick II. in his contest with Pope Innocent IV., in the first half of the thirteenth century.

Circumcision.—Rabbi Leo of Modena gives us the following account of the ceremonies used by the Jews when they circumcise, which they never do before the eight days mentioned in the Law; but they defer it when the child happens to be ill or weak. There is a godfather to hold it during the operation, and a godmother who brings it to the place and carries it back again. The place may be any private house as well as the synagogue. Two seats are prepared with silk cushions—one for the godfather, the other designed for the prophet Elias, who is thought to assist invisibly at all these ceremonies. Friends are invited to meet the Circumciser, called Mohel, who brings a dish, wherein his instruments and other necessities are—the razor, astringent powder, rags, cotton, and oil of roses. While they are waiting for the godmother, who comes accompanied by other women, and delivers the infant to the godfather at the door (for no woman enters), those within sing some hymn or canticle, and when the child is come they cry "Baruc Habba," or Welcome. The ceremony ended, the Mohel takes a cup of wine, and after blessing it once, repeats a second benediction for the child, giving him the name chosen for him. Afterwards they repeat the 128th Psalm,

"Blessed are they that fear the Lord," etc. This being ended, the godfather hands the child to the godmother to be carried home and given to its mother.

The Circumcision of our Lord is commemorated by the Church on the eighth day after Christmas. The festival seems to have been Gallican in its origin. It is said [Dr. Barry's Teacher's Prayer Book] that the day was commonly used rather as a feast, "in protest against the riotous heathen celebration of the 1st of January, of which protest there is, perhaps, still an echo in the Collect. . . . With us now it blends with the idea of New Year's Day, tending to solemnise the opening of the year by the thought of responsibility and struggle against sin."

Cistercian Monks, or Bernardines, or White Monks.—An Order of monks who derived their name from Cîteaux, or Cîteaux (Lat. Cistercium), a village between Dijon and Chalons, in Burgundy. This Order was originally founded in the year 1098, by Robert, Abbot of Molesme, but the attempts of the first founder to gather a society together at Cîteaux had proved a failure, and when he forsook it in despair, his work was taken up by an Englishman named Stephen Harding. Here, under much discouragement, Harding laboured for some years, not wholly in sympathy with the life of labour rather than of study and meditation which the Cistercians had adopted. At length, in A.D. 1113, his perseverance was rewarded by the arrival of St. Bernard of Clairvaux, with a company of thirty young and zealous men, who came to enlist themselves as monks of the Cistercian Order. From that time it began rapidly to flourish; and St. Bernard's intellectual power and self-denying piety made him in his lifetime the most influential person in Christendom. [BERNARD, St.]

William Giffard, Bishop of Winchester in A.D. 1128, founded the first Cistercian Abbey in England, at Waverly, in Surrey. The beautiful Abbey of Tintern, on the Wye, was founded three years after. Then, in A.D. 1132, Walter l'Espece, a baron in the North, built the still more beautiful Abbey of Rievall; Roger de Mowbray, a few years later, was the founder of Byland; and Thurstan encouraged the prior of the Benedictines at St. Mary's, York, to found Fountains. The Order reached its height of power in A.D. 1145, when Eugene III., a Cistercian and pupil of St. Bernard's, became Pope. King Stephen had appointed his nephew William to succeed Thurstan at York; but the Yorkshire Cistercians persuaded the chapter of the cathedral to elect the Archbishop Henry Murdoch, Abbot of Fountains, and by the help of Pope Eugene they gained their point. It continued in favour long afterwards, and King Edward I., though he was jealous of the power of other monasteries, founded the Cistercian Abbey of Vale Royal.

The Cistercians were called White Monks from their dress, which was a white frock or cassock, over which they wore a black cloak when they were beyond the walls of the monastery. Their abbeys are still left in ruins in the lovely spots where they were first fixed by the disciples of Bernard, out of the way of the common haunts of men, in lonely mountain-valleys, where they taught the barren wilderness to smile. Bernard himself was guided by his religious love of nature to make choice of such places. "Believe me," he said to Henry Murdoch, "you will find more lessons in the woods than in books. Trees and stones will teach you what you cannot learn from masters. Have you forgotten how it is written, 'He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock?'" [Deut. xxxii. 13.] You have need not so much of reading, as of prayer: and thus may God open your heart to understand His law and His commandments." No doubt such was the feeling of many of our countrymen who dwelt at Tintern, or at Fountains and Rievaulx. And here, as the early Benedictines had reclaimed the marsh-lands, the Cistercians reclaimed the moors.

There were about one hundred houses of Cistercian monks and nuns when Henry VIII. destroyed them. Some of the most remarkable, besides those founded by King John and Edward I., already mentioned, were Furness, in Lancashire, founded by King Stephen; Lanthony, Monmouthshire; Jorval, or Jervaux, and Kirkstall, Yorkshire; Melrose, in Scotland; Vale Crucis, Denbighshire, besides several others in Wales; and Woburn, Combermere.

Clapham Sect.—A name given to a distinguished body of pious philanthropists in the early part of this century. Henry Thornton, a wealthy banker, had his residence on the borders of Clapham Common. Next door to him lived William Wilberforce, and hard by were the houses of Granville Sharpe, Zachary Macaulay, James Stephen, and John Shore, Lord Teignmouth. Successive incumbents of the parish were John Venn and Dr. Dealtry. The influence exerted by the co-operation of these men, and of the friends who came to visit them—men like Simeon and Dean Milner and Clarkson—was of vast importance in its day. The abolition of the slave trade, leading on to the abolition of slavery itself, was the work of this coterie. The Evangelical party found here their chief rendezvous. They started the Christian Observer, the only religious periodical of the day worth notice; they were the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and of Exeter Hall as a place for religious meetings; and they wrought greatly on behalf of Church Missions to the heathen. A brilliant account of the Clapham Sect and its doings will be found in No. 10 of Sir James Stephen's Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography.

Clare, St., foundress of the Order of the Nuns of St. Clare, was born at Assisi in 1194, and died there in 1253. She learned the severest asceticism under the teaching of St. Francis, who established her Order in 1221. Innocent IV. relaxed the strictness of its rules in 1246, but their rigour was revived, and even increased, in the fifteenth century by Colette of Corbie, and in 1631 the Congregation of the Strictest Observants was a yet further development of the Order.

Clarke, Samuel (1675—1729), born at Norwich, educated at the Free-school there, and afterwards at Caius College, Cambridge. His first literary works were mathematical. For twelve years he was domestic chaplain to Dr. More, Bishop of Norwich, who was his constant friend through life, and, after preferring him to the living of Drayton, near Norwich, obtained for him successively the Rectory of St. Benet's, in London, and that of St. James's, Piccadilly, on which occasion he took his D.D. degree. The first great work by which he became known was his Boyle Lectures, preached in 1704, being Discourses concerning the Being and Attributes of God. By this work and a subsequent one, on The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, he became the reviver of modern Arianism in England. He was involved in controversy from that time forward, his chief opponent being Waterland. The Lower House of Convocation in 1714 pronounced his work dangerous, and four years later Dr. Robinson, Bishop of London, charged against him. He was a gentle and amiable man, and well read, but not a powerful writer. His works were collected into four volumes by Dr. Hoadly. [DEISM.]

still well known, though, being to a great extent superseded, not now so much used as formerly. He was born about 1760, in Ireland, but was English by father's descent, and by mother's Scottish. Clarke's early education was from his father, and he was for a time engaged on the farm, and then as a linen-draper's assistant at Coleraine: but in 1777 he was brought into contact with the followers of John Wesley, and in 1778 introduced by one of the preachers to the notice of Wesley himself. At Wesley's wish he was placed at the Kingswood School, near Bristol, which Wesley had established in 1748; but he did not remain there long, for, boy as he was, Wesley made him an itinerant preacher in 1779, and in 1780 he was ordained at Bristol, at which time the unhappy young man was required to listen to seven sermons in one day. From that time, during nearly or quite the whole of his life, Clarke continued his work as a Wesleyan minister: he was of great weight and influence among his party, and in 1806, 1814, and 1822 was President of the Conference. His attitude towards the Church of England was that of the original leaders, of not desiring separation from her, and it is noticeable that he was confirmed by Lewis Bagot, Bishop of Norwich, after his ordination. He encouraged his flock also to apply to the bishops for Confirmation; when he baptised, buried, and ordained, he used the offices of the Church of England, and he communicated at her altars.

Of his literary work, the Commentary is the chief (8 vols. 4to, 1810-26), a learned work—for its time extraordinarily so—but with many fantastic notions, and in some respects not perfectly sound on the doctrine of the Sonship of Christ. His Bibliographical Dictionary and Miscellany (8 vols. 12mo, 1802-6) is of little value. A Clavis Biblica, 1820, was written for the use of two Buddhist priests from Ceylon whom he received into his house and baptised, but who afterwards relapsed; and he was at one time engaged by the Government on the publication of a new edition of Rymer's Fœdera, a design which was afterwards abandoned. His Miscellaneous Works were published in 13 vols. (1836).

Clarke spent his later years partly (from 1815 to 1823) at Millbrook, in Lancashire, where an estate had been purchased for him by his friends; he afterwards resided at Ruslip, near Uxbridge, and died of cholera in a friend's house at Bayswater, where he had gone to preach, Aug. 26th, 1832.

Clarkson, THOMAS, born March 26th, 1760, at Wisbeach, Cambridgeshire, commenced his education at the Free Grammar School there, of which his father, a clergyman, was master. Thence he went to St. Paul's School, London, and afterwards to St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1785 he gained the prize for a Latin dissertation on the question, "Is it right to make slaves of others against their will?" In collecting his materials for this essay, he had become so much moved by the wrongs of the slaves, that, although he had taken deacon's orders, he gave up all chances of preferment, and resolved to devote himself to the task of working for the suppression of the slave trade. He translated his paper into English, and through it became connected with a body of Quakers who had the same work at heart. He was introduced to Mr. Wilberforce, who was bringing the subject before the House of Commons, and, meantime, Clarkson worked in various parts of England, and also in Paris during the fiercest months of the Revolution. After more than twenty years of incessant labour, the cause was won, in 1807, by the passing of a law for the entire abolition of the slave trade, and further, in 1833, by the operation of the Emancipation Act. Clarkson died at his residence, Playford Hall, Sussex, Sept. 26th, 1846, aged 86. He was the author of several works bearing on the one great object of his life.

Class Meetings.—A Methodist arrangement whereby a congregation is divided into sections, under a leader appointed by the pastor. This leader is a sort of district visitor. He has to meet the members of his class regularly, to advise, comfort, rebuke, and to receive contributions, etc.

Clement of Rome, one of the Apostolic Fathers, and third Bishop of Rome. Some hold that he is the Clement mentioned in Phil. iv. 3, but this is improbable. No details of his life are known beyond the fact that he is said to have been martyred in the reign of Domitian. Two Epistles written by him to the Corinthians are extant. The first is occasioned, as much of St. Paul's first Epistle to the same Church was, by feuds and factions which had arisen. St. Clement exhorts to love and unity in a tone of childlike beauty and tenderness. The work is full of quotations from the writings of the Apostles, and is extremely valuable for the evidence it affords of the genuineness of the New Testament. The second epistle—the genuineness of which, however, is in dispute—is a homily rather than an epistle. Both may be read in Archbishop Wake's Apostolic Fathers. Other works which have been ascribed to him are now recognised to be spurious; they are the Recognitions, the Clementine Homilies, and the Epitome. The second of these is like a fiction, consisting partly of letters, partly of a narrative of a journey made by Clement, and what befell him. But under the romantic adventure is discernible an endeavour to teach Ebionite doctrine. Probably the work is that of an heretical teacher of the second or third century.

Clement of Alexandria, one of the greatest and noblest of early Christian writers. He was born in the middle of the second century, and became a disciple of PANTÆNUS (q.v.), from whom he learned what principles lay at the root of Gnosticism, and by this knowledge was able to do more than any one had ever done to undermine it. He saw that its intention was to search after God. He had entered into that search, and in his prayers and seekings had learned that God had sought and found him. He gathered scholars around him, and taught them to bow themselves to the Divine will, to love God and His laws, and thus he wrought a more practical effect than any teacher that the century produced. Three complete treatises of his survive, and the principle underlying them all is the same: it is not we only who are seeking God; God is also seeking us, and when we remember that we find rest. The works are (1) Logos Protreptikos, an exhortation to the heathen; (2) Pædagogus, "the Instructor"; (3) Stromata, miscellanies, a collection of information concerning new and current opinions, arranged and viewed by one who had gone through anxieties of his own, and had learned sympathy with seekers and wanderers. Dr. Kaye, formerly Bishop of Lincoln, has left a very interesting account of his writings. "He seems to me," writes F. D. Maurice, "that one of the old Fathers whom we should all have revered most as a teacher and loved best as a friend."

Clerestory.—The spelling of this word is at first sight deceptive, since it appears as if connected with clerus, the root from which "clergy" and the other familiar words of the class are derived; but it is simply the "clear storey" of any building, rising above its other parts. As most familiarly used, it is therefore that part of the nave of a church which is above the roof of the aisles; it may or may not possess a row of small windows.

Clergy, Clerics, Clerks.—These are general titles of ministers of religion, as opposed to those who are not so engaged, and who are, in relation to them, styled laymen, or the laity.* The word, in these English forms, comes from the Greek clêros, "a lot," the clergy being regarded as those of the whole Church who are especially the lot of the Lord. From very early times the word has been thus applied [Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ, I., v. 7], as by the Council of Niceæ, A.D. 325, though with some variation, since there was a time when the name was in some degree peculiar to the inferior or minor orders, in such phrases as "bishops, priests, deacons, and clerics." There is a parallel to this at the present time in the common expression of "bishops and clergy." All through primitive and Mediæval times the word may be traced, and at last, before the Reformation, it became of very wide application indeed, even a bishop's menial servants being considered as belonging to this class; in many cases, however, these had, if not actually minor orders, at least the tonsure. In modern times it is, in its ecclesiastical sense, confined to those actually in holy orders, with the one familiar exception of the "parish clerk," and an occasional use of the word in cathedral choirs. The equally familiar "business" use of the word clerk comes down from the time when most of the learning of the world was in the clergy. The legal term of "benefit of clergy," once more familiar than it is now, had the same origin, being, in the first instance, the exemption of clerics from trial by civil courts. After this it degenerated into a mere conventional plea in arrest of judgment by those who had even so much learning as was necessary to repeat the first verse of the 51st Psalm,* or some verse from the New Testament [Kerr's Students' Blackstone, p. 514]. The statute which permitted this was altogether abolished by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., cap. 28.

Clinical Baptism.—The baptism of adults on a sick-bed. This was never denied by the primitive Church to such as were in apparent danger of death; but, as it was necessarily performed by affusion, and there were then, as now, some who doubted the efficacy of all baptism except by immersion, it was not for this reason thought well of. For another reason also, and one more directly connected with it as clinical, it was not favoured—because it was supposed to show carelessness on the part of the recipient in delaying the rite; and in this point of view, if he recovered, he was generally considered as unfit for holy orders. This provision was made by the Council of Neo-Cæsarea, A.D. 314, which, however, allowed ordination in cases of great necessity or great merit. St. Cyprian (Archbishop of Carthage in the middle of the third century) handles the matter in his 69th Epistle [ad Magnum]. It may be gathered from his language that such a baptism was performed sometimes by affusion, sometimes even by aspersion (according, doubtless, to the circumstances of each case), and it is rather singular that his words have usually been translated as if the latter only were the case.

Such baptism has not been provided for in the offices of the Church of England, but it is, at present, sometimes necessary; and an office is given by Sir William Cope and Mr. Stretton in the Visitatio Infirmorum. For reception into the Church in case of recovery, which is, of course, a much rarer case, there is, so far as the writer knows, as yet no published office.

* The word lay is, however, of wider use, and is often applied by members of other learned professions in the same way as by the clergy. Thus, in Parliamentary language, "Lay Lords" are opposed to "Law Lords," and the word is also, though less commonly, used by medical men. Perhaps, also, the strange epithet "lewis," used in a similar sense by Freemasons, is a form of it.

* The verse so used was called the "neck-verse"—

Clodoald, Sr., commonly known as St. Cloud, was the son of Clodomir, King of Orleans; he lost his father in 524, in the battle which this prince gained over the Burgundians. St. Cloud was brought up in Paris, at the court of his grandmother, Queen Clotilda, with his brothers Theobald and Goutaire. Clotaire, uncle to these young princes, took them away under pretence of crowning them, and then murdered Theobald and Goutaire with his own hands, but St. Cloud was conveyed away and concealed by some lords of the court. When he was grown up, he resigned his father's dominions, entered himself as an ecclesiastic, and took leave of the world. He became acquainted with one Severinus, who lived in a little cell near Paris, and spent some time with him in monastic discipline, but it was not long before he retired into Provence for more solitude. Being discovered in this country, he returned to Paris, where he was ordained priest by Bishop Eusebius, St. Germanus's predecessor. After some time he withdrew to Nogent, on the Seine, two leagues from Paris, where he built a monastery and spent the rest of his life in it. He died about 560, and was buried in the church of the monastery.

Cloister (Lat. claustrum, "an enclosure").

—(1) A monastery. (2) The central square forming the inner court of a monastery, enclosed by the other buildings, and used by the monks as a place of study and of exercise.

Cloveshoo, a locality now unknown—some take it to be Chelsea, others Cliffe-at-Hoo in North Kent—chosen at the Council of HERTFORD (q.v.) in 673, as the place for the yearly synod of the English Church. There are only a few records left of the meetings which were successively held. The most important on record is that held A.D. 747, under Cuthbert, for reformation of abuses. See Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 360–385. At that council Festival-days were appointed for St. Gregory and St. Augustine of Canterbury.

Clovis, King of the Franks, and founder of the Frankish Empire in ancient Gaul. [CHARLEMAGNE.] He was a heathen when he was invited by the Christian clergy to invade Gaul, they being moved by the desire to extinguish the Arianism professed by the native dwellers. He was baptised at Rheims on Christmas Day, 496.

Clunian Monks.—This Order of monks was founded by Odo of Clugny, in Burgundy, and from his monastery it took its name.

These monks were only a reformed section of the Benedictines. They lived under their rule, and wore the same dress. [BENEDICTINES.] Shortly after the Conquest, William Earl Warren, son-in-law to the Conqueror, and one of his richest barons, brought these monks into England, and built their first house at Lewes, in Sussex, about A.D. 1077. In the reign of Henry I. the Order was in much esteem among the Normans, and an attempt was made to turn some of the old and native Benedictine abbeys into alien Clunian priories, but it did not succeed. The English monks were not favourable to the Order, which was rather a French than an English one. Its houses were for the most part filled with Norman or French monks, and they were all subject to the Abbot of Clugny, who sometimes, when he had interest enough with the Pope, levied contributions upon the priories in England.

There were never more than twenty Clunian monasteries in England, the principal, next to that of Lewes, being the Abbey of Bermondsey.

Codex (Lat. "a manuscript").—There are, according to Mr. Scrivener, 1,583 Codices of the New Testament known to exist. Probably others will yet be found in out-of-the-way Eastern monasteries. But very few of these MSS. contain the whole of the New Testament. The Codices are divided into Uncials, i.e. those written in capital letters, and Cursive, those in running hand. One of the most valuable, the Codex Sinaiticus, was found by Tischendorf in the monastery on Mount Sinai in 1859. [BIBLE; TEXTUAL CRITICISM.]

Colicolas (i.e. "Heaven Worshipers").

—So called on account of their using the word "Heaven" in place of "God," as is the custom of the Jews. An ancient heretical sect, of whom not much is known, but probably closely following the EBIONITES (q.v.). They were numerous in Africa, and were condemned in 408 as heathens and heretics.

Cena Domini ("The Lord's Supper").

—A name applied not only to the Holy Communion, but sometimes to the day of its institution, viz. Maundy Thursday. Also the name of a celebrated Papal Bull, claiming supremacy over all kings.

Colenso, JOHN WILLIAM, first Bishop of Natal, was born in 1814. Giving early signs of unusual mathematical abilities, he was sent, after the usual term of schooling, to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated as second wrangler and Smith's Prizeman in 1836, and became Fellow and assistant tutor of his college. After spending four years as assistant master at Harrow, he returned to his college, and there remained till he was presented in 1846 to the living of Forncett St. Mary's, in Norfolk. In this village, among a population of 300, he worked for seven years with such zeal and sympathy that his name is even now regarded there with affection by the old people. He here turned to account the experience which he had gained in tuition by publishing his elementary Algebra and Arithmetic, which had an enormous circulation. A volume of Village Sermons, published towards the end of his incumbency, were regarded at the time as models of simplicity, as well as of earnestness and of practical enforcement of duty.

In 1853 the diocese of Capetown was divided, and the sees of Natal and Grahamstown were created. By the advice of Bishop Wilberforce, Bishop Gray of Capetown offered the new sees to Drs. Colenso and Armstrong, and they were consecrated at Lambeth on St. Andrew's Day. On the eve of his departure he published a work on the Holy Communion, comprising extracts from the writings of F. D. Maurice, who had just been deprived of his professorship at King's College, London. [MAURICE.] This was a step which disquieted some of his friends, but he so defended himself that no further complaints were heard. Soon afterwards appeared his Ten Weeks in Natal, giving his first impressions of colonial life and the prospects of missionary work. But he was now full of this missionary work. He studied the Zulu tongue, wrote a grammar and dictionary of it, and translated the Prayer Book and parts of the Bible into it. These books were printed in his own house and under his own superintendence. Meanwhile he had prepared a new translation of the Epistle to the Romans, which he published in 1862, with a commentary "from a missionary point of view." It was this publication which first raised against him the cry of heresy. He had called in question the popular view of the Atonement, and also the doctrine of endless punishment. He had, moreover, raised some cavil by refusing to impose monogamy on Caffres who had a plurality of wives, as a condition of baptism. Neither the Bible, he said, nor the practice of the ancient Church sanctioned such a high-handed requirement. In proceeding with his Biblical translation, and while teaching it to the Zulus, he arrived at further changes in his opinions. It was a period of much agitation of religious thought at home, in consequence of the publication of Essays and Reviews the same year that his book on the Romans appeared. [ESSAYS AND REVIEWS.] Next year he put forth the first part of his work entitled The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua Critically Examined, a work which produced a profound sensation, for it expressed his conclusion that the Pentateuch was altogether unhistorical in character. This conclusion was arrived at chiefly by elaborate calculations he had made of dates and numbers, which, as he declared, were altogether irreconcilable by any process whatever. He said in his preface:—"If I cannot find the means of doing away with my present difficulties, I see not how I can retain my episcopal office, in the discharge of which I must require from others a solemn declaration that they 'unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament,' which, with the evidence now before me, it is impossible wholly to believe in." His mind, however, was somewhat calmed by the judgment of the Privy Council acquitting the Essayists, and he took a bolder and more aggressive line in the successive parts which followed. The numberless answers which appeared divide themselves into two methods of argument. There were some disputants who took the Bishop's details one by one and gave answers to them. Such were those of Dr. A. J. McCaul, Hebrew Professor at King's College, London, and of Dr. Wordsworth in his Commentary on the Bible. And, indeed, this method was following the Bishop's own lines. He founded his disbelief in the general history upon the discrepancies and contradictions which he alleged himself to have found. They replied upon each difficulty that it was soluble, and Dr. McCaul undoubtedly proved that the Bishop misunderstood several passages through want of knowledge of Hebrew.* But probably a more convincing mode of treatment was that of starting with the Divine element, plainly discernible in the history of Abraham and of God's dealings with the patriarchs, and treating details as containing possible errors, whether through copyists' mistakes, or even made in compilation or in editing. This was the line taken by Kingsley in his admirable volume of sermons entitled The Gospel of the Pentateuch; by Maurice, in some reviews; and by Dean Stanley, who, though in his characteristic way he vigorously defended Colenso's right to criticise details and to express his honest convictions, yet brought forth in a very striking way the religious and ethical glory of the Pentateuch in his first volume on the Jewish Church. When we look back upon the controversy, we see that the influence of Colenso upon Biblical exegesis has been marked and abiding. There is admission of possible error in the letter, but there is also a fuller and deeper recognition of that which gives the Bible its value to the sons of men, the conviction that it is, though so human, a true revelation of God. In the heat of the controversy, in the first alarm which such a novelty produced in the religious world, it is no wonder that, amidst the natural indignation

* e.g. The Bishop ridiculed the command that the priest should carry the offer of the sacrificed beasts outside the camp, and represented him as carrying it on his back. Dr. McCaul quietly showed that the Hebrew meant "shall cause to be carried," and this objection at once disappeared.

that broke out, mistakes were made and bitter things were too hastily said. Addresses poured in on the Bishops, who, having met in Feb., 1863, addressed the following letter to Bishop Colenso :—

"We, the undersigned Archbishops and Bishops of the United Church of England and Ireland, address you with deep brotherly anxiety, as one who shares with us the grave responsibilities of the Episcopal office.

"It is impossible for us to enter here into argument with you as to your method of handling that Bible which we believe to be the Word of God, and as the truth of which rest all our hopes for eternity. Nor do we here raise the question whether you are legally entitled to retain your present office and position in the Church, complicated, moreover, as that question is by the fact of your being a Bishop of the Church in South Africa, now at a distance from your diocese and province.

"But we feel bound to put before you another view of the case. We understand you to say (Part II., p. xliii., of your Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined) that you do not now believe that which you voluntarily professed to believe, as the indispensable condition of your being entrusted with your present office. We understand you also to say that you have entertained, and have not abandoned, the conviction that you could not use the Ordination Service, inasmuch as in it you 'must require from others a solemn declaration that they "unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments;" which, with the evidence now before you, 'it is impossible wholly to believe in.' (Part I., p. xii.) And we understand you further to intimate that those who think with you are precluded from using the Baptismal Service, and consequently (as we must infer) other offices of the Prayer Book, unless they omit all such passages as assume the truth of the Mosaic history. (Part II., p. xlii.)

"Now, it cannot have escaped you that the inconsistency between the office you hold and the opinions you avow is causing great pain and grievous scandal to the Church. And we solemnly ask you to consider once more, with the most serious attention, whether you can, without harm to your own conscience, retain your position, when you can no longer discharge its duties or use the formularies to which you have subscribed. We will not abandon the hope that, through earnest prayer and deeper study of God's Word, you may, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be restored to a state of belief in which you may be able, with a clear conscience, again to discharge the duties of our sacred office; a result which, from regard to your highest interests, we should welcome with the most unfeigned satisfaction.—We are, your faithful brethren in Christ.

This was signed by all the English and Irish Bishops, except Dr. Thirlwall of St. David's, as well as by those of Montreal, Sydney, Tasmania, and Jamaica. As the Bishop did not comply with the request, most or all of these inhibited him from preaching in their dioceses.

In July of that year legal proceedings were taken against him. A formal charge of false teaching was made to the Bishop of Capetown, as Metropolitan, by Dean Douglas (afterwards Bishop of Bombay), Dr. Merriman, Archdeacon (afterwards Bishop) of Grahamstown, and Archdeacon Badnall. The trial followed, the Metropolitan presiding, assisted by the Bishops of Grahamstown and Orange Free State, and on Dec. 14th the Assessors delivered their opinions. The Bishop of Graham-stown especially summed up the errors of Dr. Colenso's teaching in a forcible manner, pronouncing that his "arguments are not consistent with any creed that teaches the Divinity of our Blessed Lord, except that which is condemned by the Church as Nestorianism." This was followed by the judgment of the Bishop of Capetown himself, ending with sentence of deposition.

Against this judgment Bishop Colenso appealed to the Privy Council, and on March 20, 1865, the Judicial Committee, for that time consisting of Lord Chancellor Westbury, Lords Kingsdown and Cranworth, Dr. Lushington (Dean of Arches), and Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, pronounced the Capetown sentence to be void in law, on the ground that the Crown had no legal power to constitute a bishopric, or to confer coercive jurisdiction, within any colony possessing an independent legislature; and, inasmuch as the letters-patent purporting to create the sees of Capetown and Natal were issued after those colonies had acquired legislatures, the sees did not legally exist, and neither Bishop possessed in law any jurisdiction whatever. Upon this the Bishop returned to his see, the churches of it being vested in him, though in other respects his authority had been declared void. He achieved another legal success in Oct., 1866, in forcing, by a decision of Lord Romilly, the Colonial Bishops' Fund to pay his salary, with arrears.

From that time he came but little before the world for a long time. He published two volumes of sermons, in which, though no definite statement was made, it was seen to be at least doubtful whether he accepted certain statements of the New Testament, including the Lord's Resurrection, as historical. Probably the vagueness represented his own state of mind: that of wishing to believe, yet hindered by intellectual difficulties. His work as a bishop with his clergy was certainly a failure. The clergy dwindled in number, and diocesan organisation seems to have been nil. The Bishop of Capetown felt very bitterly that he had been defeated, and, when the Lambeth Conference met in 1867, he came to England in the hope of procuring an authoritative expression of the Conference in his favour. Here, however, he was again defeated [LAMBETH CONFERENCE], but until the end he always spoke of his action as undoubtedly and unquestionably valid, and refused to reconsider it in any shape. In 1869 he and his brethren consecrated a new bishop to Natal at the Cape, having been disappointed in the attempt to hold the consecration in England.

Once more Bishop Colenso was to appear prominently in controversy, though this time it was political rather than theological; and whatever opinions men might form of his theology, he now proved in a remarkable way his singleness of purpose and yearning after right. Though ostracised by the religious world, he was extraordinarily popular with the colonists, who admired his character and abilities, and flocked to hear him preach. But when, in 1874, the Langalibalele difficulty took place, the Bishop warmly espoused the cause of the "rebel" chief, and brought to light many acts of cruelty which had been committed by the colonists against the Caffres. Then his popularity was at an end. But he held his ground firmly; he came to England to plead the poor black man's cause, and succeeded in securing terms for him from Lord Carnarvon, the Colonial Secretary. No one but the Zulus could speak for him now; they and Cetewayo thenceforth knew him as "Father of his people." And thus to the end his life was spent. He went on translating the Bible into Zulu, and showing himself a good and brave defender of the oppressed. It is pleasing to note that one of his most uncompromising opponents, Dean Green, exchanged friendly words with him towards the end of his life, and spoke lovingly of him afterwards. He succumbed at length to the strain of the hard work which he had undertaken, and died after a few days' illness, June 20th, 1883.

Colet, JOHN (b. 1486, d. 1519), died before the English Reformation began, but he was one of its great forerunners, for he publicly urged its necessity, and the spirit of free Scriptural inquiry which led in that direction showed itself strongly in him.

He was born in London, the eldest of eleven sons and eleven daughters of Sir Henry Colet, merchant of London, and Lord Mayor in 1486 and 1495; but of these twenty-two, all but himself died infants or very early in life. His father died in 1510, and was buried in Stepney Church, but Lady Colet survived even her last son, dying at the age of above ninety. The Colets were of a Buckinghamshire family, resident at Wendover; Sir Henry was a younger son, and the elder branch was residing at Wendover when the Life of the Dean was written (1726) by Samuel Knight, D.D., Prebendary of Ely and Archdeacon of Berkshire (d. 1746).

John Colet, it is usually taken for granted, was brought up at St. Anthony's School, in Threadneedle Street, then the most considerable school in London, where his friend More afterwards was. He entered Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1483, and was B.A. 1487, M.A. 1490. He took minor orders very early, and was an acolyte (as well as an undergraduate) when instituted (Aug. 6th 1485) by Bishop Goldwell, of Norwich, to the rectorship of Dennington, in that county. To this he was presented by Sir William Knevitt, one of his mother's family, and he retained it till his death. On Oct. 2nd, 1490, he was instituted by Bishop Russell of Lincoln to the rectory of Thurning, in Huntingdonshire, on his father's presentation, but this he resigned in 1493, when he became a Prebendary of York. He was also a canon of the collegiate Church of St. Martin the Great, London, and resigned it for a prebend of Salisbury in 1503. The rectory of Stepney he also held, and resigned when made dean. Most of these preferments he held while an acolyte, or minor cleric, according to the permission of canons then in force; for he was not ordained deacon till Dec. 17th, 1497, or priest till July 28th, 1498.

Colet's academical education was of course the scholastic logic and philosophy then in vogue, and he was also a learned mathematician; but what we should now call his classical knowledge was at first confined to Latin, Greek being then scarcely known in England. It was, however, fast reviving as a study, and Colet, among other Oxford men, devoted himself to it earnestly. For this purpose he travelled in France and Italy from 1493 till 1496, and studied Greek Divinity under the learned men who were then gathered there. On returning, he went down to Oxford, and gave notice that he would lecture on St. Paul's Epistles. This was the beginning of his fame. For a young M.A. in minor orders to lecture on such a subject was an unheard-of thing, and doubtless the novelty collected for him a class at first, but it was not long before men of all standings, from doctors to undergraduates, flocked to hear him for the sake of the lectures themselves. These were cast in a thoroughly different style from the fashionable mode of interpreting Scripture, which had become almost entirely that of passing lightly over the literal sense, and giving great prominence to the allegorical, tropological, and anagogical senses: * or that of commenting rather on detached verses than an organic whole. This Colet altogether reversed, bringing forward the historical and practical meaning of the Epistle which he chose (that to the Romans), and freely and critically expounding it as that which had an actual reference to Christians of all time. These lectures, or commentaries, of Colet's on the Epistle to the Romans (some also on those to the Corinthians) exist in MS. in the University Library, Cambridge. Copies of the latter are also at Corpus Christi and Emmanuel Colleges, and at the end of the C.C.C. one are four letters on the Mosaic account of the Creation, addressed to a friend named Radulphus, who was probably Ralph Collingwood, Dean of Lichfield (1512). Short extracts from some of these lectures and letters may be seen in Seeborn's Oxford Reformers (1867). They were published, with the chief of Dean Colet's other works, by the Rev. J. H. Lupton, sub-master of his school, 1867-76. By these lectures Colet greatly helped forward the study of Scripture, and it was during their delivery that he was joined at Oxford (1497) by Erasmus, who was about his own age, and Thomas More, afterwards Lord Chancellor, who came up as an undergraduate, and was thirteen or fourteen years younger. The three worked together in their liberal studies and in the cause of progress, and have obtained the name of "The Oxford Reformers." But their association did not last long, for Erasmus left Oxford in 1499, and in the same year More also was taken away, degreeseless, by his father to study the law. Colet, left alone at Oxford, continued his lectures on St. Paul, and became known at Court as a preacher through the introduction of Archbishop Warham, when Bishop of London, 1502-3, and having taken his D.D. in 1504, was in 1505 made Dean and a Prebendary of St. Paul's.

He continued here the same work that he had begun at Oxford, preaching on all Sundays and holy days, and maintaining lectures (delivered by Erasmus, and others of his Oxford friends) both on his favourite St. Paul and on other parts of the Bible. At first, as it appears, this was out of his own pocket, but at last, in 1518, he succeeded in establishing, or rather restoring, a regular foundation for lectures to be given by the Chancellor. In 1512 Colet was made Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation, and preached before both Houses (Feb. 6th, 1512) his celebrated "Reformation Sermon." The text was "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind" [Rom. xii. 2], and the sermon was a strong appeal to clergy of all ranks, pointing out that to their worldliness and laxity the evils of the Church were owing, and that with them reformation must begin. The original—for it was, of course, in Latin—is in Knight's Life (ed. Oxford, 1823), and a translation, said to be by the Dean himself, follows.

Colet's proceedings as dean had already given some offence, but it is probable that this sermon was the immediate cause of the articles of heresy which were soon afterwards exhibited against him to Archbishop Warham by Richard Fitzjames, Bishop of London, and two others. The Archbishop, however, quashed the accusation, and refused to try the case. One more attempt Colet's enemies made against him in another way in the next year, 1513: he had preached against war both at St. Paul's and in the Chapel Royal at the beginning of Henry VIII.'s French campaign; this led them to think that the king's mind might be turned against him. Colet, however, so justified himself in an interview with the king that the latter is said to have exclaimed, "Let every man have his own doctor; this man is my doctor," whereupon, as Mr. Seebohm says, "the hungry wolves departed without their bone." Collier states [Eccelesiastical History, iii. 451] that Colet preached a second sermon, retracting, in a manner, his first, but this has no contemporary mention, and may be doubted.

Last, but not of least importance, Colet's services to education must be spoken of. In 1510, by the death of his father, Sir Henry Colet, he succeeded to considerable private property, which, with great judgment, he devoted to the foundation of St. Paul's Grammar School for boys, one of the most celebrated among the many founded at the time. A list of more than fifteen, dating from the first twenty years of the sixteenth century, may be seen in Knight, p. 90; and King Edward VI.'s schools are well known. Colet's school was, according to his own words in the statutes, "specially to encrease knowledge and worshippings of God and our Lord Christ Jesu, and good Cristen life and maners in the children. For that extent," he goes on, "I will the children learne first, above all, the catechizōn in Englishe, and after, the accidens that I made." The "catechizōn" was a short religious instruction of Colet's own, ending with a most beautiful "little prayer to the Child Jesus, the President of the school," for such is its dedication, and a bust of this Divine President was originally placed over the high master's seat. The "accidens" was the predecessor of the famous grammar of the first high master, William Lilly, the propria quæ maribus and as in presentis, which educated our fathers as late as fifty years ago. The number of boys to be taught in the school was one hundred and fifty-three, a choice singularly taken from the miraculous draught of fishes [John xxi. 11], and quaintly showing the founder's mystical turn of mind. To these children "his epistle is very pretty," as Samuel Pepys says. "Lyfte up your lytell whyte handes for me," he concludes, "whiche prayeth for you to God."

Dean Colet died of the sweating sickness, Sept. 16th, 1519, and was buried in his cathedral. Besides the works already mentioned, he was author of a Treatise on the Seven Sacraments, and one on the Angelic Hierarchies of Dionysius the Areopagite.

Coleridge, SAMUEL TAYLOR (b. 1772, d. 1834), an eminent poet, philosopher, and theologian. He was the son of a clergyman, vicar of Ottery St. Mary, Devon, and master of the grammar-school there. He was a shy and retiring youth, and being sent to the Bluecoat School, carried his habits with him, all the while reading eagerly by himself. Then he was sent to Cambridge, where he astonished all his companions, both by his knowledge and by his brilliant powers of talking; but he won little success, and suddenly left in despondency. Having with characteristic good-nature given his last penny to a beggar-man in the street, he enlisted as a soldier; but his colonel, after four months, finding out his learning and ability, procured his discharge; perhaps the more easily because he was found to bear the character of being the clumsiest rider in the regiment, bruised all over by falls from his horse. He next became a Unitarian preacher, and, in common with Southey, who soon after became his brother-in-law, was an enthusiastic admirer of the French Revolution, then in its full swing. In 1796 he published his first poems, and started a periodical called the Watchman, which was not successful. He went abroad with Wordsworth in 1798, by the generous liberality of the brothers Wedgwood, and on his return became a writer for the Morning Post. He had by this time shaken himself clear of Rationalism and Republicanism, but severe constitutional suffering unhappily led him to resort to opium for relief. The habit grew upon him, and caused him horrible bodily and mental agony for years. All this time he was writing but fitfully, and to little purpose. At length, in 1816, a kind surgeon, James Gillman, and his wife, took him into their house at Highgate, and here he spent the rest of his days. Under their tender care his health and consequent peace of mind were in great measure restored, and here he wrote his greatest philosophical works—works manifesting the deep conviction to which he had come of the cardinal truths of Christianity. The chief of these are, The Friend, a series of essays, Lay Sermons, Aids to Reflection, and Essays on Church and State. To these must be added the Confessions of an Enquiring Spirit, not published till after his death. His residence at Highgate became the resort of inquirers from far and near, who came to listen to “the old man eloquent,” as Wordsworth called him, and many of them were permanently influenced by his teaching. His disciples, among whom we must place Wordsworth, Hare, and Maurice, have had a vast influence on current theology. De Quincey called his “the largest, most spacious intellect, the subtlest and most comprehensive, in my judgment, that has yet existed among men.” Neither his poems nor his prose writings make much bulk. This has been explained by his unhappy habit of opium-eating, which paralysed his power. But it is rather attributable to his intense desire to satisfy himself, and not to put forth anything which should misinform or mislead. His great merit in theology was that he saw what was good in German divinity, and strove to bring that into harmony with the faith once delivered to the saints. He showed, single-handed, that Christianity does not depend on external evidence, as writers of the Paley school had held, but that it is a spiritual religion, that there is that gift in man which recognises it, and accepts it; that, in fact, men believe in God because God speaks to them, and tells them that He is. Christianity is not, indeed, discoverable by human reason, it is not the creation of moral consciousness, but, said he, it is “in accordance with human reason; faith is the continuation of reason, carrying the soul on when the eye of reason has reached its own horizon.” “You ask me my views of the Trinity. I accept the doctrine not as deduced from human reason in its grovelling capacity for comprehending spiritual things, but as the clear revelation of Scripture.” His opinions are best learned from his Aids to Reflection and his Literary Remains, the latter being full of the most acute and beautiful criticisms of such writers as Hooker, Leighton, Jeremy Taylor, Bunyan, of all of whom he was a devout admirer. With the exception, perhaps, of Cardinal Newman, Coleridge has been the greatest leader of religious thought in England in the nineteenth century. He died in perfect peace on July 25th, 1834.

Coleridge, DERWENT (b. 1800, d. 1883), son of the preceding, claims mention here as the Principal of the first Training College for Schoolmasters, St. Mark's College, Chelsea, established in 1841. He was the author of a volume, The Scriptural Character of the English Church, a book setting forth opinions imbibed from his father. It was not successful, never passing into a second edition, though it deserved a better fortune. Perhaps its failure disheartened him, for he never published any further theology. But his personal character and influence were great in their time, and largely guided the tone of elementary education when the movement in its favour began.

Collect.—A collect is a short prayer of a particular kind, and formed upon certain definite principles. The essentials are, that it is a prayer of a single person, offering up a single petition, and ending with a mention of Christ's mediation, or a doxology to the Holy Trinity, or both. Within these limits there are some variations, and in speaking of them, the eighty-three “Collects of the Day” will chiefly be considered.

1. The address of the collect is almost always to God the Father; one (Trinity Sunday) is to the Holy Trinity; three (Third Advent, St. Stephen, First Lent) are to God the Son; but there is none to God the Holy Ghost. Of the seventy-nine, the word “Father” is used in four cases (First Easter, Sixth Epiphany, Second and Twenty-fourth Trinity); in thirty the address is otherwise certain from the language of the collect; and the remainder may be considered as governed by analogy. The address may be simple, as “O God,” “Almighty God,” or there may be added a reference to the commemorated fact, as at the three great seasons of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide; or a Divine attribute, either in terms, as “the Protector of all that trust in Thee” (Fourth Trinity), or by implication, as “Who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves" (Second Lent); or a reference to the Divine mercy, as "who art always more ready to hear than we to pray" (Twelfth Trinity); or to the Divine purposes, as "who shewest to them that be in error the light of Thy Truth" (Third Easter); or to the present economy of God, as on the Feasts of St. Simon and All Saints.

2. The petition may also be simple, as "mercifully grant, that by Thy power we may be defended against all adversities" (Sexagesima); or it may have on one hand an expression of the reason for making it, as "forasmuch as without Thee we are not able to please Thee" (Nineteenth Trinity), or, on the other hand, of the benefit expected from its being granted, as "that . . . we may steadfastly walk in the way that leadeth to eternal life" (St. Philip and St. James).

3. The conclusion in its shortest form is the simple and familiar act of faith in our Saviour's mediation, "through Jesus Christ our Lord;" but to this is often added one of faith in the unity of the Godhead, as the familiar "who liveth and reigneth . . .;" or a more direct doxology, as in the Fourth Advent collect; or sometimes the act of faith in the Divine unity stands alone, as in the Third Advent collect, or that for Ascension Day.

Of the eighty-three collects for the day, sixty come through the Sarum Missal, more or less literally translated from the three early Roman Sacramentaries; seven of these are from that of Pope Leo I. (d. 461), twenty-one from that of Pope Gelasius (d. 496), thirty-two from that of Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604). Of the others, which were added in 1549 (these were chiefly for saints' days), four were struck out in 1552, one of two for Christmas and Easter Day, and those for St. Mary Magdalene and St. Andrew; for the last a new one was substituted. In 1662 the old Third Advent was also replaced by a new one, and a Sixth Epiphany collect was for the first time inserted;* that for St. Stephen was much expanded, and that for Easter-eve remodelled from the Scotch Liturgy of 1637.

Of the other prayers of the Church which have the name of collects, the principal are the "Second and Third Collects" at Morning and Evening Prayer; these have all come down unaltered from 1549, and are found in the same sources—the Sarum Use and the Sacramentaries of Gelasius and Gregory. The Prayer for Purity at the beginning of the Communion Service, and the six occasional ones at the end, are also called collects; these, too, date from 1549, the former coming from Sarum, as well as the first, second, and fourth of the latter; the third of these is from the Greek Liturgy of St. James, and was used by Poul-lain, a French reformer, in L'Ordre des Prières (1552); the fifth and sixth were written by the revisers. The rubric allowing the use of these "after the collects of Morning and Evening Prayer, Communion, or Litany," was inserted in 1552, and as the daily offices then ended with the third collect, their place so far is clear; the "Collects of Communion" are probably those of the day, though in the Ordination Services of the same year, as in the present ones, the Prayer of Oblation or Thanksgiving is called a collect, and one of these placed after it; the "Collects of Litany" must be the final prayers, simply because they can be nothing else. One other "collect" to be mentioned is the last prayer in the Burial Service, which is the Collect of the Funeral Celebration of Holy Communion, and should be so used on occasion at present. The word "collect" is, however, further applied, and rather broadly, in the Prayer Book; for instance, the Prayer for all Conditions of Men, and others, are so called, whereas they have no right to the title. But this does not invalidate our definitions, which are of far earlier date; it simply shows that in 1662 the true idea of a collect had been somewhat lost.

The meaning of the word "collect" will most likely be always uncertain; the derivations given of it, or rather of its Latin original, "collecta," have been of two classes, referring (1) to the nature of the prayer itself, (2) to the occasion of using it. (1) is the old-fashioned derivation, and probably the best known, as if it collected together the topics of other prayers, or, as some say, of the Epistle and Gospel. Another explanation given by Roman writers, and often adopted, is that the collect is the prayer offered by the priest alone; this, however, would make almost every prayer a collect, which it is not. On the whole, the derivation marked (2) seems fit to be recommended, and is explained at length by Canon Bright in the S.P.C.K. Commentary on the Prayer Book. We are there told that the "collecta" was the church of assembly for a procession to another church to the Holy Communion, and that the "prayer at the collecta" afterwards became the "collecta," or collect. Yet the form "collectio" is also found, which would certainly suggest the other derivation if confined to collects proper; it is, however, applied in a much wider sense, and may perhaps account for the very existence of that derivation. Collecta and collectio are both found in the Vulgate in the sense of assembly: the former Levit. xxiv. 36, the latter Heb. x. 25.

Collectarium. — One of the less known of the ancient Service-books, containing the collects for different occasions, mentioned in many inventories of Church property [Maskell's Monumenta Rituali, i., xciii., xciv.], but now of very rare occurrence.

* Previously the collect for the fifth Sunday had been repeated for the sixth.

Other forms of the name are found, as col-lectaneum and colletores.

College.—A collection of men formally joined together into one legal body for any purpose, as for worship (such as, in their original foundation, Sackville and Dulwich Colleges), or for study, either with no direct view to education (as the literary institution in the City of London known as Sion College), or with such a view as the colleges of our universities. In its beginning a university was much what a college, or at least a large college, like Trinity at Cambridge, is now—an association for purposes of study and education, in which, in process of time, the recognition of merit took the form of degrees. [DEGREES.] As this association gradually expanded, its members, for one reason or another, found it convenient to separate into smaller and subsidiary corporations, and thus, as they formed bodies living more or less in common, such "halls" came into existence as those of which four still exist at Oxford. The next step was twofold: of these halls, some earlier and some later received charters of incorporation, and became colleges, and other colleges, incorporated from the first, or nearly so, were founded; thus the charter of St. Peter's at Cambridge dates from 1284, and Balliol and Merton at Oxford are of much the same date.

It is uncertain how soon universities became practically so merged in their colleges that there was no membership of them alone; but the gradual organisation of the colleges under governing bodies of Masters and Fellows, their establishment of scholarships, and lastly, their admission of independent members, led very early to this result, and before the new university statutes of less than thirty years ago, there had for centuries been no such thing as a university education apart from a college; the extent to which the university was lost sight of being shown by the long-standing but absurd anomaly, which still exists, of a man becoming a member of a college by entrance on its books before he formally joins the university by matriculation. In the year (1858) of these new statutes it became possible for a resident M.A. of Oxford or Cambridge to open his house as a "private hotel" for university students; but these succeeded badly at Oxford, where there are now only two existing, and hardly any at all at Cambridge. The next attempt in this direction was in 1869, when the now familiar "non-collegiate students" had their birth. Cavendish College, at Cambridge, was founded by the Duke of Devonshire, Chancellor, about the same time, and its members were admitted among the other non-collegiate students till very recently, when a statute was passed by which the college was opened as a "public hostel." Selwyn College (established in memory of the celebrated bishop) is also as yet only a public hostel; but Keble College, at Oxford, is on the same footing with all the others.

The present number of colleges at Oxford is twenty-one, besides four halls and two private hostels; at Cambridge seventeen,* besides two public hostels. At Dublin there is but one college; at Durham one college and a hall; while in the University of London, and other English universities, as in Scotch, colonial, and foreign universities, colleges, properly so called, are unknown. [OXFORD, CAMBRIDGE, ETC., UNIVERSITIES OF.]

Colleges. THEOLOGICAL.—The following colleges for the training of candidates for holy orders belong to the Church of England. The number following each marks the date of foundation:—St. Aidan's, Birkenhead, 1846; St. Bee's, 1816; Birmingham, 1867; Chichester, 1839; Cuddesdon, 1854; Durham, 1833; Ely, 1876; Gloucester, 1868; King's College, London, Theological Department, 1841; Lichfield, 1857; London College of Divinity, Highbury, 1863; Salisbury, 1860; Truro, Scholæ Cancellarii, 1877; Wells, 1840.

Congregational Colleges are:—New College, London (combining Homerton, Coward, and Highbury); Western College, Plymouth; Rotherham; Cheshunt; Airedale (Bradford); Hackney; Lancashire Independent; Springhill (Birmingham); Theological Institute, Bristol; Bala. The principal Baptist Colleges are the Regent's Park and Bristol Colleges, and Mr. Spurgeon's Pastors' College at Stockwell.

Collegiants.—A Dutch sect, founded by the Brothers von Kodde in 1619, with the object of getting rid of the bitter controversy between Calvinists and Arminians which was then tormenting the Church. They received their name from calling their places of meeting "Colleges." Their basis was the principle of the inspiration of the Scriptures. This being accepted, the Bible becomes the infallible rule of life, and no confession of faith is needed. The Collegiants met regularly on Sundays and Wednesdays, for prayer and for the reading and exposition of Scripture, the latter being open to all members alike, as there was no organised ministry. Baptism was regarded as Scriptural, and was to be performed by immersion, and there were Sacramental meetings twice a year. The sect still continues to exist in Holland and Hanover.

Collegiate Church.—A collegiate church may be defined roughly as an associated body of clerics attached to a particular church, similar in many respects to a cathe-

* The name of Hall at this university, which Pembroke, Clare, and St. Catherine's have now dropped, though Trinity Hall is forced to retain it for distinction, is, and has been, a mere difference of words. A proposal, some years ago, to change the name of Trinity Hall to Bateman College (from the founder), came to nothing.

gial chapter, but without a bishop, and in some cases without a dean, at the head of it. Westminster and Windsor are the two best known of such establishments, the former originally a Benedictine Abbey, and for a short time a bishopric, the latter secular (that is, not monastic) in its foundation. Other notable ones were Ripon, Manchester, and Southwell, collected into bishoprics in 1836, 1847, and 1884, the latter not till its chapter was almost, if not quite, extinct. Others still existing as collegiate churches are Wimborne Minster and St. Katharine's Hospital, and a third is Endellion, in Cornwall, which probably owes its existence to its obscurity. It is not mentioned in the Act 3 and 4 Vict., cap. 113, which explicitly or implicitly put to death so many. For instance, some of the provisions of this Act as to churches not yet mentioned were the abolition of the deaneries of Wolverhampton, Middleham, Heytebury, and Brecon, and the diversion of the canonical estates. This, of course, was equivalent to abolishing the canonries, and the chapter of Brecon is accordingly altogether extinct, as also is the chapter of Chumleigh, in Devonshire, where the rector, a host truly in himself, held all the five canonries in his own person.

Collegiate System of the Universities.

—A system of living together, which was introduced among teachers and students of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge in the twelfth century, and which was perhaps a revival of some earlier system. It was a system which must naturally have suggested itself from the circumstances under which a great number of such students and teachers were brought together in one town, with one common object looked at from two points of view. The students were very young men, mostly beginning their university studies before they were out of their boyhood; the teachers were mostly men whose lives had been spent in monasteries where a great work of education was always carried on, and where every one lived under strict rules of discipline. It was obviously an immense disadvantage that a vast number of youths, or any number, should be left to establish themselves independently in private lodgings. "Model lodging-houses" were therefore built and endowed in university towns by munificent persons, and the teachers were naturally established as superintendents. Like monks, the members of a college had their meals together in a common hall, but this was then the custom of all large households; and the religious habits of monastic communities were copied so far as that teachers and students all met in a college chapel for Divine worship at least in the morning and the evening; but this was also a custom largely observed in domestic life (being the family prayer of our ancestors) as well as in monasteries. But the members of a college were in no sense bound by monastic vows, although it obviously became a necessary regulation that all its members should remain unmarried while they resided under its roof and had the benefit of its endowments.

Students and teachers who were members of colleges were, as they still are, subject to two sets of regulations, which are both called "statutes," the one set being the statutes of the university at large, administered by the officers of the university, such as the Vice-Chancellor and the two Proctors; the other that of their particular college, administered by officers of the college, such as the Head (under whatever title known, President, Provost, or Master), the Bursar, and the tutors. There is a separate chapel, and also a separate library, in every college; each student has one, two, or more private rooms, and some of the members who are graduates have the title of "Fellow" of the college, and enjoy endowments which provide them with an income during a limited term of years or for life, in return for which they are supposed to take part in the education and discipline of the students, or "undergraduates." Some of the undergraduates of each college are called "scholars," and enjoy endowments called "scholarships," which are often of as much value as £100 a year, and which, lasting for several years, considerably lessen the expense of their university career. All those members of a college who partake of its endowments are called members "of," or "on," the foundation.

Colleges were originally endowed by their "founders" with lands and other property (increased by later "benefactors") for the maintenance of the Head, the Fellows, and the scholars, as well as with buildings for their residence, but undergraduates who are not scholars pay for their apartments, or "rooms," and for their maintenance, or "battels," as well as for attendance. There are also college fees for "college lectures" given by "college tutors" within its walls, as well as university fees for "university lectures" given by "professors" in a more public manner. Collier, JEREMY (b. 1660, d. 1726).—A well-known writer of the Church of England, and one of the bishops of the Nonjurors. His father, the Rev. Jeremy Collier, was master of the Free School at Ipswich, and his grandfather was a Yorkshire clergyman of an old family in that county. From the school at Ipswich he was admitted (1669) at Caius College, Cambridge, and was B.A. 1673, M.A. 1676, Deacon 1676, 1677; instituted rector of Amp-ton, near Bury St. Edmunds, on the presentation of James Calthorpe, Esq., 1679. This he resigned in 1685, and became Lecturer of Gray's Inn.

At the Revolution, Collier, who belonged, as Lord Macaulay puts it [essay on Dramatists of the Restoration], "to that section of the Church of England which lies farthest from Geneva and nearest to Rome," of course adopted the side of King James, and refused the oath of allegiance to William of Orange, whereby he forfeited his lectureship at Gray's Inn. He was the first to begin the shower of pamphlets on his side with an answer to one by Bishop Burnet, which appeared in Dec., 1688, called An Enquiry into the Present State of Affairs, in which King James is styled a "deserter." Collier's answer is called The Desertion Discussed. It was rejoined to by Edmund Bohun, and Collier was arrested on suspicion of treason, imprisoned for some months in Newgate, but discharged without being brought to trial. He continued his writing against the Government, and in 1692 was again arrested, but bailed out. On bail he would not remain, considering it as an acknowledgment of the Government, but surrendered himself, and was committed, though he was afterwards again discharged untried.

The next matter which brought him into notice was the proceedings in what is sometimes known as the "Assassination Plot" of 1696: Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins, two of the conspirators, being executed on April 3rd of that year; Collier and two other Nonjuring clergy, named Shadrach Cook and William Snatt, appeared on the scaffold, and Collier gave them absolution with imposition of hands, "his brethren exclaiming 'Amen.'" Against this act a declaration was instantly published by nearly half the episcopate, condemning it in very strong language, on the ground that the Church of England countenances neither public absolution of individuals nor imposition of hands accompanying it. An indictment was issued against the three clergy in the King's Bench, and a true bill found, but they were never tried. Cook and Snatt, after a short imprisonment, were discharged, but Collier absconded; he was consequently outlawed, and remained under this sentence during the rest of his life.

After this he occupied himself for some years in literary work, of which the chief results were:—(1) his attempt to reform the stage in his Short View of [its] Immorality and Profaneness, which met with considerable success after much controversy; (2) his translation of Moreri's Historical Dictionary (originally published 1673, and afterwards greatly enlarged by successive editions, 1701–21); (3) his Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain. The last edition of this work was published in 1852, in 9 volumes 8vo, with Life by Lathbury.

On May 29th, 1713, Collier, who had long held an important place among the Nonjuring divines, was consecrated a bishop. For an account of this event, and of his subsequent proceedings, see NONJURORS. He died April 26th, 1726, and was buried in St. Pancras Churchyard.

Coligny. [HUGUENOTS.]

Collyridians.—A female sect of heretics, who appeared at the end of the fourth century in Arabia. They paid Divine honours to the Virgin Mary, eating in her honour little cakes (collyridia), shaped like the boes on a shield.

Cologne.—The seat of a bishopric since the fourth century, and always a prominent city in the religious history of Germany. The relics preserved in its churches are among the most highly prized in the Roman Church. One of its archbishops, Hermann, favoured the Reformation [HERMANN], and another, Gebhard II., openly embraced Protestantism, and was deposed. Serious differences between the Archbishop of Cologne and the Prussian Government have several times arisen of late years. The cathedral is one of the finest in the world. It was begun in 1248, and not completed till 1880.

Colonial Church.—In 1840 the Bishop of London (Blomfield) called the attention of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the fact that while England had been laying the foundations of future empires in our colonies, there was but little provision for their religious needs. The clergy, few in number, who had gone out to minister to them had been placed by the legislation of Charles II. under the control of the Bishop of London; and this was practically placing them under no government at all, and creating a Presbyterian, and not an Episcopal ministry. At that time there were only ten colonial sees, viz. four in America, three in India, two in the West Indies, and one in Australia. The first-fruit of his remonstrance was the foundation of the see of NEW ZEALAND, and next year the dioceses of TASMANIA and GIBRALTAR were created. In 1845 British America was subdivided, and in 1847, on St. Peter's Day, the first Bishop of CAPETOWN was crowned in Westminster Abbey. With him were consecrated three others, for ADELAIDE, MELBOURNE, and NEWCASTLE (Australia). "There had been no such day in the previous history of the Church, and it is literally true that no such day has since been witnessed." A notice of the first Bishop of Capetown, Dr. Gray, will be found under his name. In 1853, by his spirited endeavours, his diocese was divided, and the sees of GRAHAMSTOWN and NATAL were founded, as was that of St. HELENA in 1859. In that year Livingstone's work [LIVINGSTONE] turned attention to Central Africa, and Mackenzie was consecrated as its bishop in 1861. [MACKENZIE.] The first bishop of Grahamstown, ARMSTRONG, will come before us for another good work which he did, [PENITENTIARIES.] He went forth with good hopes, and seemed on the point of fulfilling them, but died in little more than two years. A Bishop for the ORANGE RIVER FREE STATE was consecrated in 1863, and for the MAURITIUS in 1854. The evangelisation of SIERRA LEONE was the work of the Church Missionary Society. This society commenced its labours in Western Africa in 1804, amidst almost insuperable difficulties, owing to the gross superstitions existing among the natives and to the certain prospect of sickness and death for its missionaries; the mortality in this mission has been almost without parallel. All along, the need of a native ministry was recognised, and preparations were made for the training of converts for this purpose, an institution being established at Fourah Bay, where a sound education was given to them. Until 1851 there was no bishop in Sierra Leone, and there were some 10,000 Christians, among whom a fifth at least were communicants, but a whole generation was unconfirmed. There were four native clergy. Bishop Vidal was consecrated in 1852, and died two years later. Bishop Weeks was consecrated in 1855, and sixteen months afterwards died of fever; even in this short time he had added eleven native clergy to the number. Bishop Bowen was consecrated in 1857, and died in 1859. In 1864 a native bishop was consecrated; he was Edjai, a Yoruban lad who in 1821 had been made a slave but was rescued by the officers and crew of an English ship, and was baptised in 1825 in the name of Samuel Crowther; he was educated at Fourah Bay, and ordained in 1843, and accompanied the well-known missionary Mr. Townsend to Abokuta, where he found his mother and sisters, whom he converted to Christianity. In 1867 he founded the mission in the Niger, and afterwards became bishop of that territory; there he still labours, having under him none but native ministers. They have done wonders by their example in checking the slave-trade. These are the words written by the missionary bishop who was once a negro slave, showing the practical view he takes of the position of his Church:—"The Gospel must now be followed by the plough and the workshop; industrial schools must be established. The Mahometan system of begging will thus be corrected, the folly of indolence will be exposed, and the native Christians, earning their livelihood by honest labour, will also contribute, as Christians ought to do, for the support of their Church."

We turn to another region, the great southern continent of AUSTRALIA. Our colonies there were begun in crime; our first settlers being a gang of 800 convicts, who were shipped off to Botany Bay in May, 1787. At the last moment, the Rev. Robert Johnson volunteered as a labour of love to accompany them, and for six years he worked amongst them without any help from Government. Then, at a cost of £40, he built a church, but the convicts burned it down; the Government now ordered stone churches to be built, and in 1794 sent out the Rev. S. Marsden to assist Mr. Johnson. They worked together till 1800, when Mr. Johnson returned to England, and Mr. Marsden remained the solitary chaplain for the next seven years. Next Norfolk Island was made a penal settlement, and was left utterly destitute of spiritual care. In 1834, the judge, Sir W. Burton, uttered a protest against this neglect; at the same time William Grant Broughton, who had been appointed in 1829 Archdeacon of New South Wales (that country having been joined to the diocese of Calcutta), brought the matter before the home authorities, and in 1836 he returned to Australia as its first bishop. At this time there were scattered over an immense area no fewer than 60,000 English people, more than one-third of whom were convicts, and there was hardly one clergyman to each 5,000. Bishop Broughton laboured untiringly, travelling alone over the whole colony, for there were so few clergy that one could not be spared to accompany him. In 1838 he visited NEW ZEALAND, and was instrumental in establishing a see there. [SELWYN.] In 1843 Bishop Broughton wrote:—"In my present journey I have been through one county, Durham, in the whole extent of which there is not a church, and only one clergyman; in the adjoining county of Brisbane, there is one church and one clergyman—no more. After that I shall pass through three entire counties in which there is neither minister nor ordinance of religion, and the five counties included in this enumeration contain a fourth part of the area of New South Wales, and from a sixteenth to an eighteenth of the entire population." The Church of England now sent out clergymen and money year after year, and in 1843 the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was maintaining forty clergymen in this diocese; there were forty-five churches, and a training-college for candidates for the ministry. It became necessary to subdivide this enormous diocese of SYDNEY, and for this object the Bishop resigned one-fourth of his income; on St. Peter's Day, 1847, the Bishops of NEWCASTLE, MELBOURNE, and ADELAIDE were consecrated suffragans of Sydney. The diocese of GOULBURN was taken out of Sydney in 1863, and in 1869 another subdivision took place, and the diocese of BATHURST was formed. In 1859 BRISBANE was taken out of Newcastle, and in 1867 the new diocese of GRAFTON and ARMIDALE was founded between Newcastle and Brisbane. In 1856, the Bishopric of PERTH, in Western Australia, was taken out of the see of Adelaide. Bishop Broughton continued to labour as Metropolitan till 1853. The Australian dioceses are now mostly self-supporting, and much has been done by the University of Sydney and other institutions towards the education of the colonists and the training of their own ministry.

The colonial churches of INDIA, and of BRITISH and SOUTH AMERICA, will be found under those heads. The following Conspectus of the Episcopate of the British Colonies and Dependencies is taken from the Official Year- book of the Church of England, a work which contains a valuable sketch of the history of each diocese:—

POSITION.—The position of the Colonial Churches with reference to the Mother Churches, being considerably altered by the

Natal trial [COLENSO], the Colonial Clergy Act was passed in 1874, in which it was provided that no one ordained by a colonial bishop might officiate in England without a written licence from the Archbishop of the province in which he proposes to officiate, or without subscribing the declaration contained in the Clerical Subscription Act. But these conditions complied with, such person possesses equal rights and privileges with any other clergyman.

Colours, ECCLESIASTICAL, were used from very early times in all parts of Christendom, to mark the different seasons of the Church year: the same set of colours was not, however, used alike in all parts, but different dioceses adopted different sequences. The two uses that have become most prevalent in this country are "the Roman" and "the Sarum," though many efforts were made to press the Roman use upon English dioceses, notably by Bishop Grandison of Exeter in 1337, and by Bishop Clifford of London (1406-26). The Roman sequence is as follows:—

White.—On all the chief Festivals of Our Lord and the Blessed Virgin, viz. from Christmas Eve to the Octave of the Epiphany (Saints' Days excepted), at the Celebration on Maundy Thursday: from Easter Eve to vigil of Pentecost (Saints' Days and Rogation Days excepted), on Trinity Sunday, Nativity of St. John Baptist, St. Michael and All Angels, St. Luke, All Saints' Day, and Patron Saints', and Conversion of St. Paul.

Red.—Whitsunday to following Saturday evening: Feasts of All Martyrs, on Holy Innocents' when falling on a Sunday, and on Feasts of the Holy Cross.

Violet.—The penitential colour; from Septuagesima to Maundy Thursday, throughout Advent, on all vigils, Ember and Rogation Days, and on Holy Innocents' when it falls on a week-day.

Green.—On all other Sundays and week-days.

The Sarum sequence is given in a MS. Mised at Emmanuel College, Cambridge: it closely resembles the old Gallican uses, the prevailing colours being only two, red and white.

White.—Daily from Christmas Eve to the Purification, both included; or till Septuagesima, if it falls before the Purification; daily from Easter Day to the vigil of Pentecost (the Invention of the Cross alone excepted), and on the following days: the Transfiguration, Feasts of the Virgin, St. Michael and All Angels, St. John, at Christmastide, Conversion of St. Paul, Nativity of St. John Baptist, Virgins not being Martyrs, the Octave of the Dedication of a Church, at Marriages, and at Funerals of children under seven years.

Red.—on all Sundays and Saints' Days throughout the year, when white is not specially ordered as above. On Ash Wednesday, and last three days of Holy Week; on Corpus Christi and Feasts of the Holy Cross.

(Red is the prevailing English colour both in Church and State, as in the army, etc.)

Yellow.—On Feasts of Confessors.

Black.—On All Souls' Day, and at Funerals.

Green and Violet, though not mentioned in Sarum rubrics, are yet frequently found in inventories of church furniture in the sixteenth century. In the Gallican uses the colour for the Sunday was the colour for the rest of the week, and probably this was frequently the case in England as well. In churches where there were numerous vestments, Green or Blue seem to have been used for ferial or gala days, and a sombre ash colour for Advent and Lent. In the Eastern Church, Dr. Neale says, "the colour of these vestments is perfectly immaterial, and does not, as in the Latin Church, vary with the seasons, except that in Lent it is usually red."

Columba, St., originally Colum (b. 521, d. 597).—From the time of the Saxon invasion of Britain in 449, Christianity declined. The conquerors refused to adopt the religion of the people they had vanquished. Columba was in a great measure the means of converting the inhabitants of the north. He was born at Gartan, in Donegal, belonging to the royal family of Ireland, and he early gave himself to mission work in his native land. He also concerned himself in the State affairs of his country, and was of a very hot temper. He was said to be responsible for a severe battle fought in Connaught in 561, and was sentenced to perpetual exile from Ireland. Having heard of the misery and ignorance existing in some parts of Scotland, he crossed the sea with a band of twelve followers in a wicker-work skiff covered with hides, and landed first at Colonsay, but, finding his native land still in view, he proceeded to the island of Iona (the island of the Waves), on Whitsun Eve, May 12th, 563. Here he found Christianity already established, and two so-called bishops, but Columba disputed the validity of their orders, and, after much disputation, they departed, leaving the island to the new-comers, who succeeded so well in their labours that in the course of a few years the king made Columba a present of the island, and there he established a college for the purpose of training men for missionary work. Thence he made constant excursions to different parts of the island, Inverness being the furthest point reached. The whole of the Picts of the North were won to the faith, as well as the dwellers on the Tay, and the land was dotted all over with monasteries of his foundation. He spent thirty-six years in Iona. His chief opponents—and at times they were very powerful—were the Druids, but his kindly manner and earnest words caused many of them to be his most faithful adherents. After Columba's death the college still flourished, and sent out workers, not only in England and Scotland, but also to distant foreign countries.

Columbanus, Sr. (b. circa. 543, d. 615), a native of Leinster, educated at Bangor, on the coast of Down. About 595 he and twelve brother monks travelled into France, and retired into the solitude of the Vosges, near Besançon, where he founded the monasteries of Luxeuil and Fontaine. After some years he was banished by King Theodoric, professedly on the ground that his opinions about the time of Easter, the method of tonsure, etc., were not in accord with the Frankish Church, but really for the freedom he used in reprimanding that prince for his libertinism. Columbanus then went into Italy, where Agilulf, King of the Lombards, gave him a site for a religious house at Bobbio, near Naples. Here he died on Nov. 21st, 615, after being abbot for one year. He was a man of independent spirit, and did not shrink from administering reproof to the greatest persons in Church and State when they deserved it, of which his fourth letter to Pope Boniface IV. is a remarkable instance. This letter was written at the instance of Agilulf, who countenanced those who defended the Three Chapters (q.v.), and in it Columbanus advises the Pope as to his conduct in controversy. Besides this and other letters, Columbanus wrote a Monastic Rule, a Penitential, Spiritual Institutions, etc. His works were edited by Fleming, an Irish monk, and printed at Louvain in 1667. His great distinction is that he first set the example of that missionary enterprise which was so largely followed from England and Ireland by such men as Boniface, Willebrood, and others.

Comfortable Words.—The name given both in the Prayer Book and in common speech to those texts of Scripture used immediately after the Absolution in the Office of Holy Communion. They were first inserted in the Order of Communion of 1548, and then in the book of 1549, and are peculiar to reformed liturgies, being taken (not verbally) from the English translation (1547) of the Simplex ac pia deliberatio of Hermann, Archbishop of Cologne (1545). This, however, does not contain the first of our present texts, and has, as well as the other three, John iii. 35, 36 (to everlasting life), and Acts x. 43. They were not, like ours, all to be used, but one only, at discretion.

Robert Nelson, in The Great Duty of Frequenting the Christian Sacrifice (1701) says:—"They are generally read with so great a pause between them that the communicants may have leisure to make some short reflections upon them." This is distinctly enjoined in an edition of the Scotch Office (1796) edited by William Abernethy-Drummond, Bishop of Edinburgh (1787-1805).

Commandries. [MILITARY ORDERS.]

Commemoration.—A service in memory of some remarkable event or of some distinguished person. The festivals of the Church are, therefore, commemorations. The annual recollection of the benefactors of the colleges at Oxford is known as "Commemoration," comprising, as it does in intention, gratitude to God for their works, the declaration that we still hold communion with them through the one Church of Christ, and the prayers that we may be enabled to follow their good example, and, with them, be finally partakers of the Everlasting Kingdom.

Commendam.—A living or parish commended by the Crown to the care of a clergyman for the time being. Livings were formerly held in commendam by those bishops (and rarely by any one else) whose sees were of little value. Several sees in old times had very small incomes attached to them. When such bishop was translated to a richer see, the living which he had held in commendam returned to the Crown. "Commendams" were abolished by Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 18, the poorer bishoprics having been now augmented.

Commendatory Letters.—At the first Lambeth Conference, held in 1867, the following resolutions were passed:—

Resolution I. "That it appears to us expedient, for the purpose of maintaining brotherly intercommunion, that all cases of establishment of new sees and appointment of new bishops be notified to all archbishops and metropolitans, and all presiding bishops of the Anglican Communion."

Resolution II. "That, having regard to the conditions under which the intercommunion between members of the Church passing from one distant diocese to another may be duly maintained, we hereby declare it desirable:—

"(1) That forms of letters commendatory of clergymen visiting other dioceses be drawn up and agreed upon.

"(2) That a form of letters commendatory for lay members of the Church be in like manner prepared.

"(3) That his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury be pleased to undertake the preparation of such forms."

Archbishop Longley died before this could be carried out; but a form of commendatory letter was drawn up, and is given to families of the Church of England emigrating to America.

Commendatory Prayer.—The Sarum Manual contained an office for those at the point of death, which began with the rubric, "When a soul shall be seen to labour in its departure or in the dissolution of the body, a clapper shall be struck quickly and sharply, and then all the clerics shall run together with the greatest haste, and say the Creed." On this followed the seven Penitential Psalms and a Litany, and then the formal dismissal of the soul, pronounced by the priest in words thus versified by a modern writer :—

" Go forth, O Christian soul, in peace departing, Leaving this world, with all its sin and fear;
Go without terror, doubt, or any starting,
For the Lord God shall wipe off every tear.
Go in the Father's Name, who loved and made [thee,
Go in His Name who lived and died for thee,
Go in the Spirit's Name, who still shall aid thee,
And by His side thy place for ever be."

Substantially identical with the Sarum Office is the modern Roman one, which is doubtless well known to many from its use in Cardinal Newman's Dream of Gerontius.

This office, however, was removed from our Service-books at the Reformation, and till 1662 nothing whatever was provided in its place by the Church of England. Then the four prayers at the end of the Visitation Service were added, of which the third and best known is "A Commendatory Prayer for a Sick Person at the point of departure;" there is no rubric regulating their use, and they may be, and often are, said by any person. The Commendatory Prayer, in the opinion of some, is a poor substitute for the whole of the old office—or rather, for what this would have been had it been reformed like the rest of the Prayer Book; and such a want has been so generally felt, both before and since 1662, that some form of the old office has been very commonly used by the clergy. Thus the substance of it is in the Diocæ Mori, Learn to Dye, of Christopher Sutton (Prebendary of Lincoln and Westminster, d. 1629), as early as 1600, and much of it is also incorporated in the Manual for the Sick of Bishop Andrewes. The tendency of the next century and the early part of this appears to have been to follow the lead of the revisers of 1662, and be content with collects, of which more than one are found in Bishop Taylor's works, and others, in the sermon-like style of the period, in a forgotten book by William Dodwell (son of Henry Dodwell, the Nonjuror; Prebendary of Salisbury and Archdeacon of Berkshire, d. 1785), The Sick Man's Companion (1767). In 1848 Sir William Cope and Mr. Stretton reprinted the office from Sutton, with additions from the other sources named (except Dodwell), in their Visitatio Infernorum, and the use either of this or of that in the Priest's Prayer Book, which is taken from the modern Roman form, is now common.

Communion is the denouncing of God's anger and judgments against sinners. This is the only office in the Prayer Book which has come down all but unaltered from 1549; in 1662 the wording of the sentences of cursing was slightly changed, and the final blessing added; otherwise, with the exception of the title and first rubric, there is no difference at all. In the title, however, there has been a noticeable variation, for between 1552 and 1662 the office was not enjoined on Ash Wednesday, nor, indeed, on any particular day; it was to be used "divers times in the year," at the discretion, that is, of the bishop or other ordinary. Archbishop Grindal of Canterbury in 1576 used this discretion by enjoining it on a Sunday immediately before Christmas, Easter, and Whitsunday. This was somewhat of a perversion of the Sunday feast; but the Archbishop was probably driven to it to obtain the use of the office at all.

A full account of the "godly discipline of penance" in the Primitive Church may be found in Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ, books xviii., xix. Those who stood convicted of notorious sin were formally expelled the Church on Ash Wednesday, with an office in which the seven Penitential Psalms were said, and ashes, blessed and sprinkled with holy water, placed upon their heads; they were, if truly penitent, restored in an equally formal way on Maundy Thursday. Specimens of both offices may be found in Martene (de Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus, iii. 48, 83). But at the time of the Reformation all this had sunk, in England, into mere conventionality, and the offices were used quite indiscriminately, and not as connected with penance; the Reformers, therefore, unable, as we have been ever since, to restore the ancient discipline, substituted for it the present Communion Service, discharging altogether the ceremony of the ashes, translating (from the 51st Psalm, inclusive*) such parts of the remainder of the Service as suited their purpose, and introducing in connection with the sentences of cursing the Scriptural homily. The cursing sentences were probably suggested by a somewhat similar custom which had been in use, of proclaiming four times a year the form of the Greater Excommunication (as given in Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia, ii. 286); their chief source is, as stated in the first address, Deut. xxvii.; the seventh is, but not verbatim, from Levit. xx. 10; the ninth from Jer. xvii. 5; the tenth and last is a more general summary of certain New Testament passages. The succeeding homily is, with a few lines of introduction and peroration, entirely made up of texts of Scripture, put together with striking skill (there are references to nearly twenty passages), and it quite supersedes any necessity for a sermon on the day. The prayer "Turn Thou us" is also an expansion of passages from Scripture, beginning with Lament. v. 21, and proceeding to the second chapter of Joel; many of its clauses had long been used in the Church.

The "reading-pew," where the office is to be begun, is that place where Morning and

* Till 1662 this only, out of the seven Penitential Psalms, remained in use on Ash Wednesday; but in that year the other six were resumed, and placed as "Proper Psalms."

Evening Prayer are said, either what is now called the "reading-deck" or the priest's choir-stall, but not, as has been sometimes said, the lectern where the lessons are read; the "pulpit," which is put as an alternative, and was the only place mentioned till 1662, was not what we now call the pulpit, which was rare in parish churches before the Reformation, but probably the Epistle and Gospel desk on the top of the chancel-screen; it has no corresponding place in modern churches. To begin the Communion Service, as has been advised, from the altar, by analogy with the modern use for the Epistle and Gospel, seems wrong; these were read from a separate place, more as lections than in their liturgical or eucharistical character, and the latter character is not at all that of the office we speak of. The proper place for the second part of the office is clear, viz. that where the Litany is usually said.

Commissary.—Generally, any one who holds a commission from another for the performance of special duties. Thus diocesan chancellors are frequently commissaries for instituting to livings, and in some cases the title is given in their patents; the more usual title, however, is neither chancellor nor commissary, but vicar-general. A special case is that of commissaries to execute episcopal jurisdiction within archdeaconries, either remote ones or those in the bishop's special archidiaconal jurisdiction (as the Isle of Ely still is). [See Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, s.v.] A patent of this kind may be seen in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, ii. 694; and on the general subject the whole collection of patents may be referred to. Collegiate churches also, as Westminster Abbey, in some cases appoint their commissary; and such an officer at Cambridge holds a court for those under the degree of M.A. But at present the most familiar use of the word is as applied to those clergy, or sometimes laymen, who act in England for colonial bishops in matters of business.

Commission, ECCLESIASTICAL. [ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.]

Common Prayer, BOOK OF.—So called because it instructs us to pray for all men in common, "all sorts and conditions of men," and because it is designed for the use of all descriptions of worshippers, "high and low, rich and poor, one with another."

The English Book of Common Prayer is founded upon the ancient Service-books of the Catholic Church, of which there were many [ANTIPHONAL; BREVIARY; GRADUAL; MANUAL; MISSAL; ORDINAL; PS; SACRAMENTARY]; and the principles on which it is so founded are set forth in the preface to the book. The first beginnings of the English Prayer Book may be said to date from 1542, when it was decided in Convocation to remove the names of Popes and of Becket from the Missal, and also that a chapter of the Bible should be read in English at morning and evening services. In 1544 the revised Litany was put forth. The first Book of Common Prayer was issued in 1549. It was ordered to be first used on Whitsunday of that year. "The principal differences," says Mr. Procter in his history of the Common Prayer, "between the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. and that now in use are as follows:—Matins and Evensong began with the Lord's Prayer and ended with the third Collect; the Litany was placed after the Communion Office; in some early editions it was added as a separate sheet at the end of the volume; there was no rubric to direct its use as a part of the Morning Prayer; the address to the Virgin Mary, which had been retained in Henry's Litany, was omitted, together with the similar invocations of the angels and patriarchs. The Communion Service began with an Introit, or Psalm sung as the minister was proceeding to the altar; the Commandments were not read; the prayers differed from our present form, but chiefly in their arrangement; the name of the Virgin was especially mentioned in the praise offered for the saints; the Consecration included a prayer for the sanctification of the elements with the Holy Spirit and the Word; water was mixed with the wine; the words used in delivering the elements to the communicants were only the first clauses of those now used. The sign of the cross was retained twice in the consecration of the elements, as it was also in Confirmation and Matrimony, and in the Visitation of the Sick, if the sick person desired to be anointed; a form of exorcism, and anointing, and the trine immersion were still used in Baptism; the water in the font was ordered to be changed once a month at least; in the Burial Service prayer was offered for the deceased person, and an introit, collect, epistle and gospel were appointed for a communion at a burial." The original preface beginning "There was never anything by the wit of man," etc., forms the second preface in our present book. The treatise "Of Ceremonies" was at the end of the Prayer Book.

But this book, while it displeased the Roman Catholic party, headed by Bonner, also displeased the extreme Reformers, such as Hooper, who were more and more influenced by the foreign Reformers. The result was the Second Book of Edward VI., published in 1552, a book much less like the old Service books, and more in accord with the views of the Continental Reformers. In this book were first added the introductory sentences in the Morning and Evening services, followed by the Exhortation, Confession, and Absolution. Some most important changes were made in the Communion Service. They will be best understood if we give the order as it stands in the first Prayer Book:—

Collect for Purity.
 Psalms appointed for Introit.
 Kyrie Eleison.
 Gloria in Excelsis.
 Collect for the day.
 — the King.
 Epistle, Gospel, Nicene Creed.
 Sermon, Exhortation ("Ye that mind," etc.), Offertory.
 Sursum Corda, Proper Preface, Sanctus.
 Prayer for Church Militant, Consecration Prayer, Prayer of Self-Oblation (i.e. the first in the present book after the Communion).
 Lord's Prayer, Pax Vobiscum.
 "Ye that do truly," etc.
 Confession, Absolution, Comfortable Words.
 Prayer of Humble Access ("You do not presume," etc.).
 Administration with the words as at present, but only as far as "everlasting life." (During this the "Agnus Dei" to be sung.)
 A sentence of Holy Scripture. Pax Vobiscum.
 The Collect of Thanksgiving, "Almighty and Everliving God, we most heartily thank thee," etc.
 The Blessing.

In the second book the order was arranged as it is now. In the Administration the words "Take and eat this," etc., were substituted for those previously used. Certain ceremonies were omitted in Baptism, as were the prayers for the dead in the Burial Service. The treatise "Of Ceremonies" was transferred from the end of the Prayer Book to the beginning.

In the reign of Queen Mary the Roman Catholic service was restored; in that of Elizabeth, the second book of Edward again took its place (1559). In the Communion Service the two sentences of the first and second books of Edward were both restored, and ran as now. A few additions were made, e.g. the OCCASIONAL PRAYERS (q.v.) and some alterations in the Lectionary. [LECTIONARY.]

The next epoch in the history of the Prayer Book was the HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE, in 1604. The alterations made then will be found in the account of the Conference. In 1637 came Laud's unfortunate attempt to enforce the Prayer Book on Scotland. [SCOTLAND.] In 1643 the English Prayer Book was abolished by Parliament [DIRECTORY], but restored in 1662, and once more revised at the SAVOY CONFERENCE. The present preface, "It hath been the wisdom," etc., was added then. This is the last revision which has taken effect until the alteration of the Lectionary in 1871. An attempt was made in the beginning of the reign of William and Mary to harmonise the book with the views of Baxter and his friends, and a new book was prepared, but was rejected by the Lower House of Convocation. [REVISION OF THE LITURGY.]

Commoner.—A pupil at a college, not on the foundation.

Common Life, BROTHERN OF THE.
 (FRIENDS OF GOD.)

Common of Saints signifies an Office suited for several saints' days, and not proper to one in particular. A hymn written specially for St. Peter's Day would not be suitable for St. John's Day, but that beginning "The eternal gifts of Christ the King" would do equally well for either. If a saint's day has no special office of its own, the "Common of Saints" is used, the name of the saint being inserted in certain places.

Communion.—The name given in primitive times to a hymn sung during the administration of Holy Communion. In the fourth century the verse "O taste and see" was a favourite communio.

Communion Laica.—A penance inflicted on clergy, by which they are forbidden to receive the Communion except as laymen.

Communion of Saints.—The Greek word koinōnia is translated "fellowship" in the English Bible in Acts ii. 42; 1 Cor. i. 9; 2 Cor. viii. 4; Gal. ii. 9; Phil. i. 5, ii. 1, iii. 10; 1 John i. 3, 6, 7; also in the Revised Version, in Philemon 6. It expresses the spirit of union and community of feeling which ought to exist between believers in the same Lord and Saviour. In 1 Cor. x. 16; 2 Cor. vi. 14, xiii. 14, it is rendered "communion," as expressing union not merely of Christians with each other, but with God. "The communion of the blood of Christ" expresses our union with each other only through union with Christ. Here, then, we have the twofold idea of common participation in the benefits and privileges received from Christ, and of union of all Christians with each other.

This twofold meaning of the word is brought out in the expression so common among Christian people—"the Communion of Saints," and "the Holy Communion." The Communion of Saints has from the earliest times formed one of the Articles of the Christian Creed. It signifies that all Christians everywhere have fellowship with God, with each other on earth, with the saints at rest. Christ, whose life they have within them, is the Lord both of the living and of the dead; and, as Bishop Pearson writes, "If I have communion with a saint of God as such while he liveth here, I must still have communion with him when he is departed hence; because the foundation of that communion cannot be removed by death." [UNITY OF THE CHURCH.]

Communion, HOLY.—One of the names given to the highest of all Christian services. The essential form is that used at the original institution, when the Lord "took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, saying, Take, eat, this is My Body, which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of Me. Likewise also He took the cup, and when He had given thanks, He gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of this ; for this is My Blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many, for the remission of sins. Do this, as oft as ye shall drink it, in remembrance of Me."

The notices which we have in Holy Scripture show the Holy Communion in two aspects. There is the sacrificial aspect, the perpetual memorial of Christ's death, and there is also the festal aspect, the participation in a sacred banquet. Thus the Holy Communion has been said to be "a Feast upon a Sacrifice."

The other names by which this service has been known—LITURGY, EUCHARIST, LORD'S SUPPER, MASS—will be noticed under their respective heads : the object of the present article is to give some account of the service itself as we find it in the Prayer Book. It is based mainly on the old Sarum Use, but with some modifications, which will be noticed in their place. It is preceded by four rubrics. The first was intended partly to indicate to the priest how much bread and wine he should prepare, partly with a view to the exclusion of all improper persons. This rubric has, however, all but fallen into disuse. The second and third relate to the exclusion of notorious evil-livers and of persons living in open enmity. The fourth regulates the position and preparation of the Lord's Table. The name Table is that used by St. Paul [1 Cor. x. 21], and has been constantly in use ever since. [ALTAR.] The "fair white linen cloth" has a double symbolism, representing both the grave-clothes in which the Lord was laid, and also the shining garments in which He appeared transfigured.

The service itself is divided into three parts :—

I. THE ANTE-COMMUNION.—(1) The Lord's Prayer and Collect for Purity. This collect is a Prayer of Preparation, answering to the "O Lord, open Thou our lips" in the Morning Prayer. It asks that the fear arising from conscious pollution being cast out [1 John iv. 18], we may "perfectly love" God, and so "worthily magnify" Him. (2) The recital of the Commandments, and Prayer for Pardon for the breach of them. This is in place of the old "Confession," and is intended to remind us of the first great requisite to a worthy communion, namely repentance. In the Scottish Communion Office the Summary of the Decalogue given by Christ [Matt. xxii. 34-40] is allowed to be substituted for the Ten Commandments, and occasionally in week-day services in English churches, where busy men have little time, the same substitution is heard. (3) The Prayer for the Queen, and the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel. The reading of these last is in accordance with ancient use. [LITURGY.] The use of the words before the Gospel, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," has dropped out of the rubric, but has universally remained in custom. Less frequently a thanksgiving is used after the Gospel, "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord" (or "O Christ"). (4) The Nicene Creed. (5) The Sermon and (occasionally) Exhortation to Communicants. (6) The Offertory.

II. THE COMMUNION SERVICE PROPER.—

(1) Oblation of the Elements and Prayer for the whole state of Christ's Church Militant here on earth; consisting, first, of the offering of our "Alms and Oblations;" secondly, of the commemoration of the living, including (a) the Universal Church; (b) civil rulers; (c) the clergy; (d) the congregations; (e) those in sickness or sorrow; and thirdly, the commemoration of the departed, the prayer that we may follow their good example, and may, with them, be partakers of God's Everlasting Kingdom. (2) The Exhortation, Invitation, Confession, Absolution, and "Comfortable Words." This portion comprises the special preparation of the communicants. (3) The Sursum Corda, Preface, and Sanctus. [See under each.] This portion is found in every form of Communion from the beginning. (4) The Prayer of Humble Access, "We do not presume," etc. (5) The Prayer of Consecration, consisting of three parts: (a) Introduction, the recital of the work of Christ's redemption, and of His command for its perpetual commemoration; (b) The invocation of God's blessing upon our service and acts; (c) The recital of the words of institution, accompanied by the prescribed manual acts. (6) The reception by celebrant and people. The rubric prescribing that the celebrant, after communicating himself, shall proceed to administer first to the clergy, then to the rest, only applies to those clergy present officially and vested. Those who are in the congregation are as laity.

III. POST-COMMUNION SERVICE.—(1) Prayer of Oblation. This prayer in the Old Liturgies, as in the present Scottish and American services, forms part of the Consecration Prayer. The Thanksgiving Prayer, which is placed as an alternative, is from the Eastern Liturgy. It is best used in the service after a second celebration only, or may be used in the vestry, or privately afterwards. (2) Gloria in Excelsis. The hymn also known as the "Angelic Hymn," or the Great Doxology. It was placed here probably in memory of the record, "when they had sung a hymn," etc. [Matt. xxvi. 30]. [GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.] (3) The Blessing. It is founded partly on Phil. iv. 7, partly on the ancient form of blessing in the name of the Holy Trinity.

The service is followed by several rubrics. Some of these (2, 3, 4) are directed against Solitary Communions. The 5th has been made a subject of controversy of late years, arising out of the interpretation of the words, "It shall suffice." Some have urged that this means "if there be no fine or unleavened bread," such as was in use when the rubric was written, the usual bread shall suffice.

This was the interpretation placed on the words by Archbishop Parker, 1559. But others hold that it means, "Let it be sufficient to say that common bread only shall be used." And this is the view taken in the last legal judgment of the Privy Council. But as some hold that this is a mistaken interpretation, the practice of using wafers, or unleavened cakes, is still maintained by some, on the ground that such cakes were used by our Lord at the institution. The 6th rubric forbids reservation of the elements. The 7th, 8th, and 9th give details as to the due provision of Divine worship, and the use of the alms. Then follows the declaration concerning kneeling, with respect to which see BLACK RUBRIC.

Communion of the Pre-sanctified is the reception on Good Friday, in the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches, of the pre-sanctified host consecrated on Maundy Thursday. Such reception is barred in the Church of England, inasmuch as Reservation of the Sacrament is forbidden. Consequently, there has arisen much controversy as to the correctness or otherwise of a Good Friday Communion Service. The advocates point to the Collects, Epistle, and Gospel in the Prayer Book, but the opponents, who hold that whilst the Passion itself is, so to speak, before us, the memorial is out of place, reply that the portions of Scripture referred to are intended for an Ante-Communion Service, and for the complete reading of the Scriptural account of the Passion. There is no authoritative dictum on the subject, but common practice is largely against the Good Friday Communion.

Communion of the Sick.—A special service in the Common Prayer Book for the use of those who are unable through sickness to communicate in church.

Conception of the Virgin Mary.—It had long been a "pious opinion" in the Roman Church that the Blessed Virgin was conceived without sin. But that it was not the opinion of the Primitive Church appears from the fact that Tertullian in the second century, Origen in the third, St. Basil in the fourth, speak of her as wanting in faith; and St. Chrysostom, in the fifth, goes so far as to write of the "ambition, arrogance, and vain-glory" which made her desire to speak with her Son [Matt. xii. 46]; but St. Augustine expresses himself guardedly. Though he does not deny that she was born in original sin, yet, as acknowledging her to be holy above all other women that ever lived, he holds it possible that God's grace had kept her from actual sin. St. Bernard, in the twelfth century, went farther still, and taught that though conceived in sin she was made free from it before her birth; and Duns Scotus, in the fourteenth, was the first to put forward the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in the modern sense. From that time the doctrine and the cultus of the Virgin gradually gained ground, till they culminated in the Bull Ineffabilis Deus of Pius IX. (Dec. 8th, 1854), declaring the doctrine a dogma of faith, and in the "Mariolatry" of the modern Roman Church.

It is probable that the Feast of the Conception (Dec. 8th), still marked as a "black-letter day" in the English calendar, was at first in memory of the supposed Immaculate Conception rather than of the mere historical event; for though it was earlier observed in the East, in the West it is first found at the time of the rise of the doctrine. In the East, indeed, it occurs as early as the seventh century, and is there—singularly enough, as it seems at first sight—called the "Conception of St. Anne, the mother of the mother of God,"* but that the event commemorated is the same is shown by the offices; the day is Dec. 9th, a day later than in the West. The first Western Office is found in 1493, and was almost identical with that for the Virgin's Nativity (Sept. 8th.)

In England the feast was first ordered throughout the province of Canterbury by Archbishop Simon Mepham, 1328, and inserted in the calendar for general observance by Archbishop Simon Islip, 1362; in 1549 the office was removed from the first reformed Prayer Book printed in that year, and the name of the feast expunged from the calendar. The name was not replaced in any Prayer Book till 1604, but it stands in Edward VI.'s Primer (1553), in Queen Elizabeth's Latin Prayer Book (1560), in her Orarium (1560), in her New Calendar (1561), and in her Preces Privates (1564).

The Epistle and Gospel of the Sarum Use were Eccles. xxiv. 17–22; Matt. i. 1–16. The last verse of the Epistle has been thought to be curiously prophetic of modern Mariolatry.

Conclave (literally, a "place that may be locked with a key"). A name applied both to the place where the cardinals meet for the election of a new Pope, and also to the assembly itself. The election to the Papacy must take place in the city where the last pontiff's death occurred. As many deal cellules as there are cardinals are built, with lodges and places for the conclavists, i.e. personal attendants, who shut themselves in to wait on and serve the cardinals. These little chambers have each their number, and as the figures are drawn at hazard, it often happens that cardinals of different factions lodge near one another. The cellules are made up during the nine days of the ceremony of the Pope's funeral, during which time anybody may go into the conclave and see them; they are hung on the outside with green serge or camblet, and over each are the arms of the cardinal who lives in it. They all open on a corridor. The day after the Pope's burial—that is, the tenth after his death—the cardinals, having heard the Mass of the Holy Ghost, go in procession two by two to the conclave, there to remain shut out from the world until a Pope is elected. Strict precautions are taken that no communications shall pass between them and the outer world; the object of this confinement is that the election may be free and unbiased. They all meet in the chapel every day, morning and evening, for a "scrutiny," which is done by writing their suffrages in little billets, and putting them in a chalice that stands upon the altar; when all are put in, two cardinals are chosen by the rest to read out the names, and keep an account of the number for each; and this is done until two-thirds join for the same person. Popes are usually chosen after this manner, but there are two other methods: acclamation, or quasi-inspiration, where all the cardinals cry out with one voice; compromise, where the election is entrusted to a small committee. On one occasion, in 1799, at the election of Pius VII., the conclave was confined six months before the election was completed. During the conclave each cardinal is allowed but two servants, or three at most, and this extension is only permitted to princes, or as a particular privilege.

Concordat.—A treaty between the Pope and a temporal sovereign, settling the relations of Church and State. There have been several such concordats, but the name first came into use in the fifteenth century. That was the period when modern nations had become consolidated and organised. The popes could no longer, as in the days of Hildebrand, drive emperors and kings to extremities; they had themselves to make concessions. The first concordat, so called, arose out of the Papal schism and the councils which resulted from it. The nations were resolved upon reforms in the Church, and Pope Martin V., on his election after the Council of Constance, was forced to promise them. Concordats were made with France, Germany, and England. The number of cardinals was limited, appeals to the Pope were restricted, Papal demands for money were checked, and rules were made against simony. The concordat with France was adopted by the French Church under the name of the Pragmatic Sanction (A.D. 1438), and incorporated with the law of the country. But it did not work easily; both sides were fretted by it, and a fresh concordat was made by Leo X. and Francis I. in 1516. It was strongly opposed by the Parliament, the clergy, and the university, but in the end was complied with.

In 1564, Pope Pius IV. sent several bulls to Charles IX., by virtue of which he suspended and took away the right which several churches and monasteries had to elect their prelates, and empowered the king to nominate to these promotions. The French clergy, at their assembly in 1579, and again in 1585, fruitlessly petitioned King Henry III. to revive the Pragmatic Sanction. By the Revolution of 1789 the Church was disestablished in France, but was re-established by a concordat (July, 1801) between Pius VII. and Napoleon. The number of bishops was reduced from one hundred and fifty-eight to sixty, and the right of nomination was vested in the First Consul. The clergy were to be paid at a fixed rate, all landed property going to the State. At the Bourbon Restoration this Concordat was abolished, but in 1830 it was restored again, and it still forms the basis of agreement between Rome and the Gallican Church. There have been several concordats with the German States, of which one claims mention. This was the concordat with Austria in 1855, which was altogether reactionary. It seemed to restore mediævalism, so entirely did it place everything in the power of the Papal Curia. The result was that Austria immediately began to be ostracised by the other states, and the battle of Sadowa, in 1866, resulted in cutting her off from Germany. The concordat was now powerless even in Austria, and on the declaration of Papal Infallibility, in 1870, was formally abolished.

Concurrence of Holy-days.—In ecclesiastical language, there is a difference between CONCURRENCE and OCCURRENCE; the latter term is used when two fall on the same day, as a saint's day or other holy-day on a Sunday; the former, when they fall on two days running, as when the eve of a saint's day or other holy-day is on a Sunday, or vice versa. The only way in the English Church services to observe the eve of any feast is by the use at Evening Prayer of the collect of that feast; and this Evening Prayer is technically called the "first vespers" of that feast, the Evening Prayer said on the feast itself being the "second vespers." But a second vespers always, without exception, takes precedence of a first; thus, in both the cases above-mentioned the collect of the day itself will be said first, and will be followed by that of the next day.

In 1878, the report of the Committee of Convocation on the Table of Lessons provided, in their amended tables, proper lessons for the Eves of Advent, Whit, and Trinity Sundays. These, if adopted, would be subject to rules of the same kind; they would be used, for instance, where the eve was an ordinary week-day, but would give way to the lessons of St. Andrew's Day, or St. Barnabas'.

Condignity and Congruity.—Terms used by the schoolmen to express their peculiar opinions relative to human merit and deserving.

The Scotists maintained that it is possible for man in his natural state so to live as to deserve the grace of God, by which he may be enabled to obtain salvation, this natural fitness (congruitas) for grace being such as to oblige the Deity to grant it. Such is the merit of congruity.

The Thomists, on the other hand, contended that man, by the Divine assistance, is capable of so living as to merit eternal life, to be worthy (condignus) of it in the sight of God. In this hypothesis, the question of previous preparation for the grace which enables him to be worthy is not introduced. This is the merit of condignity.

Conditional Immortality.—The Association calling itself "The Conditional Immortality Association" was founded in 1878. Its fundamental principles are, first, that "the Scriptures are Inspired of God, and the Rule of Faith and Life; and Immortality and Eternal Life are only obtainable through Personal Union with the Lord Jesus Christ, viz. that 'The Wages of Sin is Death, but the gift of God is Eternal Life in Jesus Christ our Lord.' [Rom. vi. 23.]

"By consequence it follows that the soul is not created immortal, but that the faithful receive immortality as a free gift, that at the coming of Christ the wicked shall be utterly destroyed, and "be as though they had not been."

"The death of the wicked is spoken of as their 'end'—their 'perishing'—their being 'destroyed as natural brute beasts'—their being 'burnt up, as chaff'—'cut off'—'Hotted out of the book of life'—all conveying the idea of the final termination of existence. But, though God's awful justice will be fully displayed in the doom of the ungodly, in their many or their few stripes, an immortality of suffering is nowhere taught in Scripture." (Paper issued by the Association.)

Conference.—This word is used to express (1) a meeting to discuss differences of opinion; (2) clerical meetings, divided into pastoral conferences, where clergy meet of their own free choice, and chapter or episcopal conferences, called by constituted authority; (3) sermons in defence of the Faith; (4) the annual meetings of the Wesleyans, and some other bodies.

Under the first head, there have been two remarkable conferences in England, the HAMPTON COURT and the SAVOY, which are described under their respective heads. To these may be added the two held at Lambeth in 1867 and 1868. [LAMBETH CONFERENCES.]

Confession of Sin has always been considered a very important sign, concomitant, or part of true penitence.

It may be addressed (1) to God alone, in the strict privacy of personal devotions; or

(2) Publicly, in the face of the congregation, as was the primitive practice of the Church for those penitents who had been guilty of open, or less often of secret, sins; and here a spontaneous confession usually obtained some shortening of the period, or alleviation of the rigour, of the inflicted penance.

(3) Of a similar nature to this is (a) that public general confession uttered by the whole congregation, morning and evening, in the daily offices of the English Church: a practice which (for Matins) is at least as early as the fourth century; and (b) the precisely parallel confession in the Communion Office of the same Church, which again is consonant with, and indeed derived from, the ancient liturgies, both Eastern and Western, and the modern Roman Use. In most of these the priest and his ministers make some sort of confession of guilt and unworthiness before the celebration of the Eucharist. Especially interesting is it to note the form in the Roman Ordo Missal still in use, where the priest and the ministers (representing the people) in turn make a humble confession the one to the other, and in turn pray for God's forgiveness and absolution the one for the other.

(4) Confessions were, in the early Church, also made to the bishop with his body of presbyters, especially of crimes which implicated others. But this practice would seem to have been superseded quite early in the East by the appointment of the penitentiarius (q.v.), and somewhat later in the West, when (5) the habit of private and so-called auricular confession to a priest began to spring up. This habit no doubt had its origin in the desire of resorting for advice and comfort to one whose vocation and ministry rendered him the fittest person to consult. This kind of confession is not required from members of the Church of England, but its use is contemplated, and even recommended, in special cases, as will be seen from the two following extracts from the Prayer Book. The first is from the Exhortation in the Communion Service:—

"And because it is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion but with a full trust in God's mercy, and with a quiet conscience: therefore, if there be any of you who by this means cannot quiet his own conscience therein, but requirerth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other learned and discreet minister of God's Word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's Holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice, to the quieting of his conscience, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness."

The second is a rubric in the Service for the Visitation of the Sick:—

"Here shall the sick person be moved to make a special confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter. After which confession, the priest shall absolve him (if he humbly and heartily desire it)."

General confession was all that was required in the Primitive Church, but from the beginning private confession was sometimes used, apparently under the circumstances spoken of in the rubrics which we have quoted. [See James v. 6, and Bingham's Ant., Book xv. c. 8, § 6.]

In the Roman and Greek Churches, auricular confession is obligatory before Communion. Probably this obligation took its origin in the cloister.

Pope Leo the Great was the first to make private confession a legal institution, but it was not made compulsory till the eighth or ninth century. The Synod of Liège in 710 ordered that every person should confess once a year to the priest of the parish, and the Lateran Council in 1215 confirmed this decree.

The three creeds are the recognised confessions of the Church of England. [CREEDS.] The Greek Church has an authorised "Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Greek Church." But the word in this sense is commonly applied to the standards put forth by the Protestant Communions. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

Confessional.—(1) A seat in which a priest sits to hear confessions. (2) Sometimes applied to the system of auricular confession.

Confessor.—A title which has had many connotations in ecclesiastical usage, retaining, however, more or less prominently throughout, one essential notion: that, namely, of free confession of belief in Christ.

Thus, (1) in the earliest times the term confessor meant one who confessed Christ by suffering death for Him, being in this sense synonymous with martyr (q.v.). Very soon, however, these two terms were more carefully distinguished, and so, (2) while martyr served to denominate one who suffered actual death for Christ, confessor meant one who endured any suffering short of death for Him; and in St. Cyprian's time (about 250 A.D.) such extraordinary, and often excessive, respect was shown for such a confessor's wishes and recommendations, that any lapsed person who held a certificate of penitence (libellus pacis, as it was called) written by him was often straightway re-admitted into full communion with the Church, without further investigation or period of probation—a mistake in Church discipline which St. Cyprian struggled hard, and at length successfully, to stop. But (3) confessor might also mean simply one who by his pacific, good, and upright walk, confesses Christ in every-day life, a sense in which all believers may prove worthy of the appellation; hence (4) it was applied to pre-eminent examples of this Christ-like holiness and purity of life even after a peaceful death. Thus, for instance, in the calendar of the English Church, such men as Augustine and Jerome are styled confessors. (5) Another less common use of the word seems to have been to denote singing-men, or choristers, an inferior grade of clerics, who confessed Christ with their voices in Church worship.

Again, (6) the title was transferred from one who confesses Christ to one who more especially confesses his sins and shortcomings, and so denotes a monk who, giving up the world, devotes himself to a life of penitence and self-mortification; and, (7) lastly, from one who himself makes confession it was transferred to the priest (in the Roman Church) who receives the confessions of others, but whose proper name in Latin is confessorius, or pœnitentiarius (q.v.), rather than confessor.

Confirmation.—That rite, according to the teaching of the Church of England, through which the fuller gifts of the Holy Ghost are received by those who have been baptised. The theory concerning it is that as the fulness of Christian baptism was not instituted by our Lord till the time of His Ascension, we can expect to find no formal institution by Him of a rite which must succeed it. Still, since His earliest teaching had been, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God," it is contended that anticipatory instructions concerning confirmation had been among the "things pertaining to the Kingdom of God" whereof in His last forty days He spoke with His Apostles. And as a fact, we find them almost instantly using a rite of this nature for the giving of the Holy Ghost [Acts viii. 17]; the confirmation by them of those Samaritans baptised by Philip the Deacon shows us that this gift was not received as an invariable and inseparable part of baptism; therefore, it is argued, it is a safe conclusion that when the Apostles promised this gift [Acts ii. 38], as well as baptism, to the 3,000 converts at Pentecost, they conferred it after the manner of confirmation, having first [ver. 41] baptised them. The next recorded confirmation is that of the Ephesian disciples in Acts xix. 6, and the rite is referred to in Heb. vi. 2, "the doctrine of baptism and of laying on of hands." Tertullian (150-220), Cyprian (200-258), Cyril of Jerusalem (315-386), all describe and explain the nature of confirmation as the giving of the Holy Ghost; and the earliest remaining Confirmation Office is of the date of 472, scarcely more than a century after the last date. This is in the Sacramentary of Pope Gelasius; another is in that of Pope St. Gregory the Great, 590; and after little more than another century (700), we have one for the diocese of York in the pontifical of Archbishop Egbert of York; this was first published by the Surtees Society in 1853: it is probably the same as was used by St. Cuthbert. In primitive times confirmation immediately followed baptism, both rites being administered by the bishop; and when, later, the giving of baptism fell to the priest, confirmation was differently dealt with in the East and in the West: in the former it was allowed to be given, as it still is, by the priest with episcopally consecrated chrism; in the latter it was separated from baptism. This separation was widely established by the end of the twelfth century: the age of the confirmed then and later varied from seven to twelve: the postponement of the rite to fifteen or sixteen is comparatively late. Confirmation, being thus the complement (not the completion, baptism being in itself complete) of baptism, must necessarily contain a renewal of baptismal vows, and it did so virtually in the old ministration of the rite to infants, more formally in the present usage. And since, by the nature of the case, the vows are consciously made by those who originally made them unconsciously through others, this view of the ordinance has become more and more prominent, and the form of the English Office has been modified in accordance with it. The old Sarum Use retained in full distinctness the view of the conferring of the grace of the Holy Ghost, and in all its essentials it was literally translated in 1549; but in 1552 this petition, "Send down . . . upon them Thy Holy Ghost" was changed into "Strengthen them . . . with the Holy Ghost," and another was entirely omitted: "Confirm and strengthen them with the inward unction of the Holy Ghost." However, the ancient prayer for the Holy Ghost is still retained; and this is regarded as the essential part of the office—as, in fact, the office itself, the rest being subsidiary and, profitable as it may be, unessential.

The use of CHRISM at confirmation, given up in 1549, has been already mentioned under that head; another and rather singular rite, placed in the Roman pontifical (where it still remains) about the thirteenth century, but never used in England, was the "alape"—a slight blow on the cheek given by the bishop, said by some authorities to represent the imposition of hands, by others to typify the battle to be fought for Christ.

Confirmation of a Bishop.—The ratification by the archbishop of a dean and chapter's election to a vacant bishopric. This right, which before the Reformation was in the hands of the Pope, the archbishop received by 25 Hen. VIII., cap. 20, the Act now regulating the making of bishops; it was repealed by 1 Edw. VI., cap. 2 (for appointing bishops by letters patent), but revived by 1 Eliz., cap. 1. The provisions of the Act are that on the vacancy of a bishopric the dean and chapter are (1) to certify the same to the Crown and pray licence to elect; (2) the licence, or congé d'élire, being granted, and a cleric recommended by the Crown, they are (3) to proceed to elect; if they do not elect, or do not elect the recommended cleric, within twenty days, they are liable to a premunire, i.e. forfeiture. (4) The recommended cleric, being elected and returned to the Crown, is to be (5) presented to the archbishop and two bishops, or (if elect to an archbishopric) to four bishops, for confirmation, and, unless he be already a bishop, for consecration. This confirmation is by old use performed in the Church of St. Mary-le-Bow, commonly called Bow Church; it is a very elaborate procedure, requiring the exhibition of no fewer than eleven deeds to prove categorically even the smallest step in the whole process. [See Brook's Ecclesiastical Law, s.v. "Bishop."] The most important one is the "citation of opposers;" these, of course, very seldom appear. There was a case in 1628, when objections were made to the confirmation of Richard Montagu, Bishop of Lichfield, but were overruled for want of legal form; and the cases of the bishoprics of Hereford in 1858, and Exeter in 1869, are still celebrated.* The last and formal sentence of confirmation pronounced by the archbishop or presiding bishop is that by which the spiritualities are restored; and (6) consecration, if necessary, following, completes with enthronisation (performed by the Archdeacon of Canterbury) the filling of the bishopric.

Confraternity.—An association, generally of laymen, having some religious or charitable object.

Confucius.—A famous Chinese philosopher, born B.C. 551, in the kingdom of Lu, now called the Province of Shantung, of an ancient and noble family. His father, Sholiam-hé, had a considerable office in the kingdom of Shum, but he died when his son was three years old. The widow, though very poor, encouraged her son in his love of reading, and his great ability and solid judgment got him considerable reputation from his very youth; and being mandarin, and employed in the government of the kingdom of Lu, he soon made it appear how important it was that the kings themselves should be philosophers, or make use of philosophers as their ministers. The knowledge of morals and politics, whereof he was a master, made him much esteemed in the government of the State and the establishment of laws; and young men came in crowds to hear his lectures. On his mother's death, when he was twenty-four, he retired for three years to mourn for her, and his example is still followed. Yet, notwithstanding his care, his prince's court was much disordered by several young ladies sent by the King of Shi to effeminate the monarch of Lu, and make him neglect the care of his kingdom. Confucius, finding the king would not listen to his advice, quitted his place and the Court, and retired to the kingdom of Shum, where he taught moral philosophy with such extraordinary applause that he soon had 3,000 scholars, and of these seventy-two surpassed the rest in learning and virtue; for the seventy-two the Chinese still cherish special veneration. He divided his doctrine into four parts, and his scholars into so many classes, or schools. The first order was of those who studied to acquire virtue; the second of those who learned eloquence and the art of reasoning; in the third the government of the State and the duty of magistrates were dealt with; the fourth was taken up wholly with noble discourses of all that concerned morals. This great man was extraordinarily modest, declaring openly that he was not the first inventor of this doctrine—that he only collected it out of his predecessors' writings, especially those of the kings of Yao and Shun, who lived above 500 years before his time; and he used to say there was a very holy man in the western lands, called Sifam Zen Shimguin. He died a.c. 478. His tomb at Shantung is held in deep respect. It is walled-in like a mediæval town. This philosopher has been held in such veneration in China for above 2,000 years that none can come to the quality of a mandarin without passing as doctor in the teaching of Confucius. Each town has a palace consecrated to his memory, and when any officers pass before it they quit their palanquin, and go some way afoot to show their honour for his memory. The fronts of these fine buildings have his great titles in golden letters, as To the Great Master, the Famous, the Wise King of Learning; and, in fact, the veneration amounts to worship.

The teaching of Confucius took for its ultimate end the promotion of tranquillity, and he taught that this was to be done through the faithful performance of all duties. He laid down laws for social intercourse, and made all government a paternal despotism. He was certainly one of the finest and noblest of heathen teachers—a man of practical wisdom rather than a solver of hard questions or a profound thinker. The intense conservatism of the Chinese character has hitherto refused to accept any other text-book than his writings, but probably, as the nation is, in spite of itself, forced to fall in with the other civilisations of the world, the influence of Confucius will wane.

Congé d'Élire.—The licence to elect a bishop granted by the Crown to a dean and chapter. [CONFIRMATION OF A BISHOP.] The phrase is one of the few survivals of the use of old Norman-French in legal formulæ; others are the forms of royal assent or refusal to Bills in Parliament.

Congregation.—In its widest sense this word designates the whole Church, but it is commonly used of those members of the Church who worship in a particular place.

In the Roman Church it is applied (1) to a community bound together by a common rule. Such are the Oratorians, the Lazarists, the Oblates of St. Charles, the Redemptorists, and Passionists. [See these under their respective heads.] (2) The various committees into which the cardinals are divided for the organisation of business. These congregations have plenary powers in their respective spheres, their decisions, when authenticated, being taken as though given by the Pope himself. But they may not interpret, nor go beyond the written law. The Congregations are those (a) of the Consistory; (b) of the Inquisition; (c) of the Index; (d) of the Propaganda; (e) of Rites; (f) of Relics; (g) of Indulgences; (h) of Explaining the Council of Trent; (i) of Immunities; (j) of Bishops and Regulars; (k) of Discipline; (l) of the Morals of Bishops; (m) of such Monasteries as are to be suppressed. Most of these are dealt with under their several heads. Concerning the rest, a few words only are needed. The Congregation for explaining the Council of Trent was appointed by Pope Pius IV., at the desire of the Council, for the purpose of explaining any questions of discipline or faith that may at any time arise out of the decrees of the Council. The Congregation of Immunities has before it all questions of asylum and clerical immunities. But as civil law has almost done away with such rights, this is now one of the least important of the congregations. That of Bishops and Regulars settles disputes which arise between bishops and monasteries, and that of Discipline enters into monastic management. That of the Morals of Bishops rigidly examines the character of persons recommended for ecclesiastical dignity. That which deals with suppressed monasteries is a sort of Charity Commission. It not only takes cognisance of those monasteries which have no longer the means of support, but controls the bequests of founders and benefactors. There are smaller "Congregations," and occasionally they are constituted for special purposes.

Congregationalists.—A name taken of late years by the body formerly known as INDEPENDENTS (q.v.).

"The distinctive principle of Congregationalism," says an authoritative writer of this body, "is that a Church, composed of those who give evidence to each other of their being Christians, is complete in itself, and that all questions of faith, discipline, and membership are to be settled by its members when assembled for the purpose" (Dr. D. Russell). They elect their own officers, and recognise only two classes of officials:—(1) Pastors, elders, or bishops (which terms they hold to mean all the same thing), charged with the spiritual affairs of the Church; and (2) deacons, who manage the temporal business. Each church is independent of all others, and is its own supreme court. In cases of difficulty it may ask advice of other churches, but it is not bound by that advice. Congregationalists hold themselves different from Presbyterians on this point, inasmuch as the latter conduct their business by means of synods, at which delegates appear; no such synod is recognised by Congregationalists. These hold that "the New Testament contains, either in form of express statute, or in the example and practice of apostles and apostolic Churches, all the articles of faith necessary to be believed, and all the principles of order and discipline requisite for constituting and governing Christian Churches; and that human traditions, fathers, councils, canons and creeds, possess no authority over the faith of Christians."

The Congregational Union, it will be thus seen, has no authority to control the faith or discipline of its component parts. The constitution of it opens with this "Fundamental Principle. The Union recognises the right of every individual Church to administer its affairs, free from external control, and shall not in any case assume legislative authority or become a court of appeal." The objects sought by the Union are, in the same document, declared to be "to uphold and extend Evangelical religion, primarily in connection with Churches of the Congregational order; to promote Scriptural views of Christian fellowship and organisation; to strengthen the fraternal relations of the Congregational Churches, and facilitate co-operation in everything affecting their common interests; to maintain correspondences with the Congregational Churches and other Christian communities throughout the world; to obtain statistics relating to Congregational Churches at home and abroad; to assist in procuring perfect religious equality for all British subjects, and in promoting reforms bearing on their moral and social condition." The Congregational Year-Book of 1885 gives a report of the 52nd annual meeting of the Union in May, 1884, under the presidency of Dr. Joseph Parker, from which it appears that the Congregational Churches are steadily increasing; that in London there were 262 churches, and 227 ministers in charge; throughout England and Wales, 4,347 churches; in Scotland, 102; and in Ireland, 29. The volume ends with a Declaration of Faith and Discipline, agreed to at the meeting of the Union in 1833.

Congress, CHURCH.—An annual meeting of clerical and lay members of the Church of England. Its objects, as well as its origin, are best described in the words of Archdeacon Emery, the original and present secretary:—"The first Church Congress was held in King's College Hall, Cambridge, in November, 1861. It was an effort originated by men who felt that the time had come for drawing more closely together the clergy and faithful laity of the Church of England to consult as to the best measures of Church defence and Church extension. In the original letter of invitation, dated Oct. 2nd, 1861, sent out in the name of the Committee of the Cambridge Church Defence Association, which was formed in 1859, it is stated: 'Our object in assembling this Congress is that we may bring together a number of earnest-minded men, well acquainted with the practical working of the Church of England, and, desirous of promoting its efficiency, to consult with representatives of the various Church Defence Associations throughout the country.' The first meeting was an experiment, but it was a successful one. Each year since has witnessed the assembling of a Congress, and not only have the varying schools of thought within the Church been brought into more friendly relations, and have learnt to give more respect to one another's opinions, but the possibility of working together as one in the attainment of the highest good for all has been more and more enforced and encouraged. The following are the most important rules:—'1. That points of theological doctrine and speculation be not selected as subjects for discussion. 2. That no question arising out of any paper read or subject treated at any general or sectional meeting be put to the vote. 3. That the several subjects selected for discussion be introduced by papers and prepared speeches (ordinarily not more than four), limited in length, at the discretion of the local committee, but that ample time be reserved in each session for free and open debate. 4. That the bishop of the diocese where the Congress is held be president; but in the event of the bishop not being able for any reason to preside, he be requested to appoint a deputy. 7. That none but bond fide members of the Church of England, or of Churches in communion with her, be permitted to address the Congress.' "

The following are the places where the annual meetings have been successively held:—1861, Cambridge; 1862, Oxford; 1863, Manchester; 1864, Bristol; 1865, Norwich; 1866, York; 1867, Wolverhampton; 1868, Dublin; 1869, Liverpool; 1870, Southampton; 1871, Nottingham; 1872, Leeds; 1873, Bath; 1874, Brighton; 1875, Stoke-upon-Trent; 1876, Plymouth; 1877, Croydon; 1878, Sheffield; 1879, Swansea; 1880, Leicester; 1881, Newcastle; 1882, Derby; 1883, Reading; 1884, Carlisle; 1885, Portsmouth.

Consanguinity.—Alliance by blood, in contrast with AFFINITY (q.v.). The well-known Table of Kindred (i.e. Consanguinity) and Affinity, showing what marriages are forbidden by the Church, was drawn up by Archbishop Parker in 1563, and set forth by authority.

Consecration.—The act of setting apart things or persons for Divine uses. The Prayer Book has a service for the consecration of bishops. The law of the Church concerning such consecration is very fully set forth in the preface to the Ordination Services. [BISHOP.] A canon of the Council of Nicæa orders that three bishops shall take part in a consecration. This, however, is a measure of security. A consecration by one bishop would be valid, though uncanonical.

There is no form authoritatively laid down for the consecration of churches or churchyards, and therefore each bishop has his own; but they are almost entirely alike, and are taken, with slight variations, from that drawn up by Bishop Andrewes for the consecration of Jesus Church, Southampton.

Consecration Prayer in the Communion Service.—The prayer in which the elements are solemnly blessed in the Holy Communion. It is so called in the rubric.

Consistory.—A meeting of official persons to transact business, the name itself being derived from classical times. The Roman Emperors sat in consistory. Every bishop has his Consistory Court, held before his chancellor or commissary. In the Roman Catholic Church the word is now confined to the Court of the Pope, his Ecclesiastical Senate, in which, presiding over the whole body of cardinals, he deliberates on ecclesiastical affairs. The congregation of the consistory prepares the business. An old Roman Catholic writer thus describes the meeting:—"It is held with the greatest splendour and solemnity. His Holiness presides on a throne covered with scarlet, and upon a chair of cloth of gold. The cardinal priests and bishops are placed on his right hand, and the cardinal deacons on his left.

The Public Consistory is held in the great hall of St. Peter's Palace, where princes and ambassadors of crowned heads are received. The Pope is dressed in his pontifical habit. The other prelates, protonotaries, auditors of the Rota, and other officers, sit upon the steps of the State, the other courtiers sit upon the ground. Kings' ambassadors are seated on the Pope's right; the fiscal advocates, or lawyers for the exchequer and consistory, are ranged behind the cardinal bishops. In this consistory causes are pleaded before the Pope. The Secret Consistory is held in a private chamber, where the Pope's throne is only a seat two steps high. None are admitted here but the cardinals, whose votes are taken at every debate; and in this sense the Pope is said to hold a consistory. The bulls for bishoprics or abbeys are not despatched till they are passed the consistory."

Constance, COUNCIL OF. [PAPAL SCHISM.]

Constantine the Great.—Son of Constantius Cæsar and his wife Helena; born at York, Feb. 27th, 274. His father had been appointed by Diocletian as co-emperor with himself in the West, but was only called Cæsar, Diocletian's title being Augustus. In the East, Maximian was Augustus, and Galerius, Cæsar. Very little is known of Constantine's early years, except that when his father divorced Helena, and married Theodora, he was sent to the court of the Emperor Diocletian, under whom he served against the Germans, Goths, Sarmatians, and Persians. He was present at the promulgation of the edict of the last and fiercest of the persecutions against the Christians, in 303, at Nicomedia, soon after which the palace was struck by lightning, and the conjunction of events seems to have made a great impression on him. Constantius died in July, 306, and Constantine was proclaimed his successor. Galerius, however, only allowed him the title of Cæsar, giving that of Augustus to Severus, whilst it was also claimed by Maxentius, son of Maximian, who, with Diocletian, had retired from governing. Whilst these rivals were occupied in striving to make their claims good, Constantine spent his time in looking after his Western provinces, and his first act was to show favour to the Christians. Maxentius had called his father from his retirement to help him, expecting that he would be content with the name of Augustus without power; but they quarrelled, and the father allied himself to Constantine, who married his daughter Fausta. Maximian afterwards attempted to persuade Diocletian to resume the throne, but, failing in this, he returned to the Court of Constantine and plotted against his life. The attempt was found out, and he was put to death. In 311, Galerius, who found himself dying of agonising sickness, issued an edict of toleration to the Christians, giving them permission to resume their worship and rebuild their churches, and in this he was joined by Constantine and Licinius, the latter of whom had been nominated by Galerius as one of the Augusti when Severus was killed. The death of Galerius brought on war. The four Emperors, Licinius and Maximian in the East, and Constantine and Maxentius in the West, had all acknowledged Galerius as lord paramount, but now there was no one over them. The two Western Emperors both wanted sole power. Constantine, with his army, crossed the Alps into Italy, where he met with little resistance, owing to the unpopularity of Maxentius. He took Turin, and at Milan issued a second edict in favour of the Christians, and marched southwards till within a mile of Rome, where Maxentius had prepared for battle. There, according to the well-known legend, during the afternoon before the battle (Oct. 26th, 312), he saw a cross in the sky with the inscription round it, "In this conquer," and in the night Christ came to him in a dream and told him to place His monogram on his standard. He had before been inwardly disposed towards Christianity, and from this time he accepted it, and his example was followed by the greater part of his family.

Next day Maxentius was killed, and his army routed, and Constantine entered Rome in triumph. He immediately issued a decree repealing all the edicts against Christianity made by Diocletian, and granting to the clergy immunity from taxation.

Soon afterwards Licinius also defeated his rival, Maximian, and the two victors for a while shared the government of the world together. Licinius married Constantia, sister to Constantine, but mutual jealousies arose which led to a new war. Licinius was defeated in Pannonia, and, by the cession of Illyricum, gained a peace which lasted nine years. During this campaign the Council of Arles had taken place, which Constantine attended. He spent the time of the peace in marching against the barbarians who threatened the frontiers of his empire, and gained several advantages over the Sarmatians and Goths. The war was renewed in consequence of the cruel and unjust conduct of Licinius towards the Christians; and as Constantine's army was vigorous and well disciplined through his wars with the barbarians, while that of his enemy consisted chiefly of raw levies, the battle of Adrianople, fought in July, 323, resulted in the complete defeat of Licinius. He was soon after put to death—an act for which Constantine cannot be acquitted of cruelty.

Constantine, being now sole Emperor, issued several edicts for the legal establishment of the Christian religion and the suppression of all idolatrous worship. On his return to Rome, he was so incensed by the remonstrances of the people, who were dissatisfied at the substitution of the simple rites of Christianity for the Pagan ceremonies, that he resolved to found a new capital.

After choosing and discarding many sites, he finally chose Byzantium, which had great natural advantages. He spent a large sum of money on its improvement, and called it, after his own name, Constantinople; and this, therefore, has a claim to be regarded as the first Christian city. While these things were in progress, events happened which show the dark side of Constantine's character. By his first wife, Minervina, he had had a son, Crispus, of whom and of Licinius, Constantine's nephew, Fausta was jealous, and she accused them of treason. In his rage, Constantine ordered them to be put to death without a trial. The falsehood of the accusation was discovered by Helena, Constantine's mother, and Fausta was suffocated in a hot bath, and her accomplices privately poisoned or publicly executed. At Easter, 337, the Emperor completed his Church to the Holy Apostles, and about a week later he was taken ill, and was baptised on his death-bed by Eusebius, the Arian Bishop of Nicomedia. From that time he wore only the white garment of the neophyte, and died on Whitsunday, in the fifty-first year of his reign.

Constitutions, APOSTOLICAL.—A collection in eight books of different dates, but none of them belonging to Apostolic times, though they profess to be written by St. Clement of Rome from the mouths of the Apostles. This by no means proves that the work is a forgery. In a most exhaustive treatise, Mr. B. Shaw has given reasons for believing that it is an accretion of documents upon an earlier one which may belong to the end of the first century (Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities, s.v.). They consist of discussions and exhortations, implying regulations of Church discipline, but for the most part not expressed in concise and clear-cut rules. Some deal with matters of private life; others with the liturgical forms of the Church, the sacraments, and the ministerial office. They are followed by the APOSTOLICAL CANONS (q.v.). The first six of these books are evidently from Greek sources. The Greek original is lost, but there are several manuscript Syriac translations extant. An ancient Coptic version also exists, which has been translated by Archdeacon Tattam. These books deal successively with (1) the lives of the laity; (2) the duties of bishops; (3) widows of the clergy; (4) care of the poor, virginity, domestic life; (5) martyrs, and rules for feasts and fasts; (6) schismatics and heretics. The Apostles are frequently introduced as speakers. The tone of morality is strictly ascetic. The reading of heathen authors is forbidden, a severe style of personal habit is enjoined, and Christians are exhorted to assemble in church twice a day for prayer. The seventh book is much more concise in style than its predecessors. It describes the two ways of life and of death, and then proceeds to give rules for the instruction of catechumens, and a list of bishops said to have been appointed by the Apostles. This book belongs to the third or fourth century—certainly to an earlier date than the Council of Nice. The eighth book consists mainly of two parts: one is called "Teaching of the Holy Apostles concerning Gifts;" the other, "Regulations of the same Apostles touching Ordination through Hippolytus." It appears to be a pontifical of some Eastern Church. But these Constitutions, though known in the Eastern Church, were hardly known in the Western until the sixteenth century. The book was printed at Venice in 1563, and included by Cotelierus in his Patres Apostolici, in 1672.

Constantinople.—Built by Constantine the Great (q.v.) on the site of the ancient Byzantium. It had long been felt that such a city was needed for the more complete government of the vast eastern provinces which had been added to the Empire, and also for the defence of them against the foes who lay on the eastern border. Moreover, there were memories and traditions attaching to Rome which Constantine, as a Christian, desired to put as far as possible out of sight. The city thus founded was long called New Rome, and became the seat of empire, first side by side with Rome, while after the Empire of the West had fallen, it was still the seat of the Eastern Roman Empire. When Alaric sacked Rome, in the fifth century, he called himself the Lieutenant of the Empire, meaning thereby the Empire the seat of which was at Constantinople. When Charles the Great was crowned at Rome, in 800, it was as Emperor of the West, and he and his fellow-emperor exchanged courtesies, and recognised each other's imperial dignity. Later on the Eastern Empire came to be known as the Greek Empire; but Gibbon rightly treats the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453, as the final catastrophe of the Roman Empire. Since that date Constantinople has been the capital of the Mahometan world. The "Church of the Holy Wisdom" (St. Sophia), built by Constantine, is now a Turkish mosque. The future of the city is a question much agitating the minds of politicians at the present time, but everything seems to show that, whatever be its fate, it will soon cease to be a Mahometan city. For the Church Councils which have been held there, see COUNCILS.

Consubstantiation.—The Lutheran doctrine that while the bread and wine in the Eucharist retain their natural substance, the Body and Blood of Christ are also present together with them. It seems difficult to see anything other than a contradiction in terms in this statement. Luther's explanation was drawn from the illustration of a bar of heated iron, which contains both iron and fire. "The Body of Christ is (the Bread still existing), in the Sacrament, as fire is in iron, the substance of the iron existing, and God in man the human nature existing—the substances in each case being so united, that each retains its own operation and proper nature, and yet they constitute one thing." This explanation, however, is not received as an authoritative one by his followers, who simply hold the doctrine as here stated, without attempting to define further. [REAL PRESENCE.]

Contrition.—Sorrow for sin, arising from the love of God. [ATTRITION.]

Conventicle.—In the Primitive Church, a place of assembly for worship before churches were built; a private assembly, or meeting, for the exercise of religion. The name was at first given, as an appellation of reproach, to the religious assemblies of Wicliffe, in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II., and more recently has been applied in England to meetings of Nonconformists. The Conventicle Act of 1664 forbade any person over the age of sixteen to be present at any meeting, "under colour or pretence of any exercise of religion in other manner than is allowed by the liturgy or practice of the Church of England, where shall be more than five persons more than the household." For the first two acts of disobedience there were progressive fines; for the third, banishment for seven years; and a return was punishable with death. The Act was repealed in 1689.

Convention.—In the Protestant Episcopal Church of America this is the name for the Church Synod.

1. The General Convention meets once in three years. This consists of two houses—viz. the House of Bishops, which "when there shall be three or more, shall, whenever General Conventions are held, form a separate house, with a right to originate and propose acts," etc. But in case of there not being three or more bishops, "any bishop attending a General Convention shall be a member ex officio, and shall not vote with the clerical deputies of the diocese to which he belongs. The other house is that of clerical and lay deputies, consisting of a representation of clergy and laity, not to exceed four of each for a diocese, chosen by the convention of the diocese they represent."

A Special General Convention may be called on urgent occasion "by the presiding bishop, or, in case of his death, by the bishop who, according to the rules of the House of Bishops, is to preside at the next General Convention, provided that the summons shall be with the consent, or on the requisition, of a majority of the bishops, expressed to him in writing."

2. Diocesan Conventions meet annually in each diocese, on business pertaining to their respective dioceses alone, unless in cases where, by the General Convention, their separate action is required on some point of wider interest. A Diocesan Convention consists of the bishop, with his clergy, and a lay representation from each parish in union with the convention. The qualifications required to entitle to a seat and vote in these conventions are regulated by the canons of the various dioceses, and differ according to the circumstances and usages of the dioceses enacting them.

Conversion.—This word is derived from the Latin conversio, a turning round, and is a translation in the Authorised Version of a Greek word having the same meaning. It means, therefore, a change of heart and life. In case of such a change occurring in a heathen or infidel, the term signifies an acceptance of the truth of Christianity. In a person already baptised into the Church of Christ, it is understood to mean a turning back into the forsaken path of righteousness. The expression is also used to denote a hearty instead of a merely formal acceptance of Christian truth.

Conversion of St. Paul.—A holy day set apart by the Church for the celebration of this event—Jan. 25th. "St. Paul is not commemorated, as the other Apostles are, by his death or martyrdom, but by his conversion, which was wonderful in itself, and highly beneficial to the Church of Christ. For while the other Apostles had their particular provinces, he had the care of all the Churches, and, by his indefatigable labours, contributed very much to the propagation of the Gospel throughout the world."

Convocation.—The convocation (or calling together) of the clergy is the English name of each of the two Provincial Councils of Canterbury and York. Each council consists, not only of bishops, but of representative clergy also, who form two houses (though in York the two sit together), which by a rough analogy may be said to answer to those of the Lords and Commons.

A Provincial Council is in its essence a council of bishops; and though the clergy may be, and have been, associated with the bishops from the earliest times (Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ, II., xix. 8), they are by various Churches admitted in different numbers and on different footings. The peculiarity of English Provincial Councils is the systematic and regular representation of the presbyters which prevails. Besides the bishops,* who form the Upper House, the deans and archdeacons also appear in person in the Lower House; the cathedral chapters are represented each by an elected proctor from their body; the general mass of diocesan clergy in Canterbury by two proctors from each diocese; in York by two from each archdeaconry. This makes the numbers for the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury as follows:—Upper House, 23; Lower House (24 deans, 61 archdeacons, 23 proctors for cathedral chapters, 46 proctors for clergy), 154. In the Province of York the Upper House has 9 members; the Lower House (6 deans, 19 archdeacons, 7 proctors for chapters and 37 for archdeaconries), 69.

The conflict between the clerical and lay jurisdictions in the time of Henry II. has been described under BECKET. From this it came about that the prelates gave their attendance in Parliament—then, or very shortly afterwards, beginning to assume its present form—in respect of their lay fees alone (the origin of the present legal fiction of lay baronies), and the lower clergy claimed the right to be taxed as such of their own free will, or, as it is commonly called, to tax themselves. Thus brought together for this purpose, and regularly summoned by the archbishop, they joined these bishops in synod, according to early precedent; a system of representation was gradually introduced, and thus our present Convocation came into existence. Next the Episcopal Synod fell into disuse, simply because it could not do the temporal work for which the lower clergy had been summoned, and the Provincial Councils of the English Church became constituted as they now are. The right of the clergy to tax themselves lasted till 1664, when it was waived, but without any express enactment.

Convocation is elected, and assembles at the same time with Parliament, by royal writs directed to the archbishops; these have been issued since the time of Edward I., and by 25 Henry VIII., cap. 19, Convocation is not to assemble without them. By the same Act also the royal licence is necessary for the transaction of business. The archbishops, on receiving the writs, issue their mandates, on which the capitular proctors are elected by their chapters, and the diocesan proctors by a meeting of the clergy of each diocese (usually presided over by the chancellor, as representing the bishop).

These two Provincial Councils, or Convocations, of Canterbury and York, make, when acting in concert, the National Council of the English Church, called by the 139th canon the "Sacred Synod;" and it would seem that this concerted action may be either by bishops and proctors from York actually sitting in Canterbury, as was done in 1661 (Lathbury's History of Convocation, p. 286), or by the formal ratification by either Convocation of the other's resolutions.

The last work done by Convocation before its recent revival was the condemnation, in 1717, of a sermon on the Nature of the Kingdom of Christ, by Benjamin Hoadley, Bishop of

* That is, the diocesan bishops. Suffragans have no seats; and even in the Lower House they only sit in other capacities; at present as archdeacons.

Bangor. [BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY.] Hoadley and his opinions being in high favour at Court, this condemnation led to the refusal of the royal licence to proceed to business, which was never renewed till recent times. The writs were still issued, proctors were elected, and Convocation came together, but simply pro forma, voting, for instance, congratulatory addresses to the Crown; and, very rarely, others, as one in 1776 (Annual Register, xviii. 87), on the "strange licentiousness" of the time. This, however, relates only to that of Canterbury; at York, though this also met, it was instantly dismissed, without even the ceremony of voting an address; and as late as 1866 a meeting is on record consisting of one member.

The extreme distress caused to many by the Gorham Judgment, in 1850, led to an active movement for the revival of Convocation on the part of many clergy and laity. Among the latter, the most honoured, so far as this question was concerned, was the late Mr. Henry Hoare. Much opposition, indeed, was made, and it was well known that the then Archbishop of Canterbury was entirely against the revival. The movement was so far successful in 1852, that at the meeting in April, which hitherto had been a hollow form, an animated debate took place on a motion to petition the Crown for licence to proceed to business. A reference to all the journals, friendly and unfriendly, will show that it was universally recognised that a great step was gained. In spite of the redoubled opposition, the advantage was pushed, and in 1853 regular sittings began, and have continued until the present time, the strength and influence of Convocation steadily increasing. Convocation has no power to try a clergyman for heresy or any other offence, but its expression of opinion is weighty. Thus a synodical judgment was pronounced on Essays and Reviews, on Ritual Extravagances, on the intrusion of Bishop Beckles into the Scottish dioceses. To the English Convocation, again, we owe the Revised Version of the Bible.

Of the Irish Convocation, which met but seldom, little is known, and few records are preserved; but its constitution resembled that of the English, and the four provinces of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam had in the same way their separate Convocations, though they seem to have often sat together in one synod. All, probably, that is known on the subject may be found in Bishop Mant's History of the Irish Church, ii. 159 et seq., and in the Journal of Convocation (1858), ii. 328, from which it appears that the first regular Convocation of Ireland was held in 1615, in which Articles of Religion were passed differing from the English, and Calvinistic in tone. Other meetings were held in 1634, when these articles were superseded by those of the English Church [BRAMHALL]; and the clergy, as in England, taxed themselves in 1639 and in 1661. This last, which adopted the English Prayer Book of the last revision, continued its sittings till 1666, and after that date no other was held till 1703; here, and in other meetings in 1705 and 1709, some of the chief business was the printing of the Bible and Prayer Book in Irish. In 1711 Convocation assembled for the last time, and its latest act was the passing of certain canons relating to the Irish Ecclesiastical Courts, and of a Form of Prayer for the Visitation of Prisoners. In 1713 and 1728 the royal writ, though applied for, was not granted, and these eight occasions are therefore the only ones on which the Irish Convocation has ever sat. It has been regretted that on the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland, if not before, Convocation was not revived.

The synods of the Scotch Church have never assumed the peculiar form which would entitle them to the name of Convocation; the name, if used of them, as it occasionally is, must be taken simply in its etymological meaning. They do not, therefore, come under this article. An interesting series of papers on them, by the late Dean Torry of St. Andrews, may be found in Synodalia and the Journal of Convocation (1852-55).

Convulsionists.—A fanatical sect of Jansenists in the eighteenth century. An eager Jansenist, Dean François of Paris, of saintly life and great charity, having died, his fellow-religionists, borne down and oppressed by Dubois and Fleury and the Jesuits, took advantage of his great popularity, and pretended that miracles were wrought at his tomb. Crowds flocked thither in excitement, and fell down in convulsions, exclaiming against the Bull Unigenitus. [JANSENISTS.] Stories were multiplied of miracles wrought there, and the king ordered the cemetery to be closed. But the alleged miracles continued, and the Jesuits, in despair, declared that they were wrought by the devil. The mania lasted for many years—in fact, until internal dissensions broke up the party.

Among the excesses committed by this sect in the height of its fanaticism was the voluntary suffering by women of crucifixion. Dr. Andrew Wynter, in his Borderland of Insanity, gives an account of a melancholic who contrived to commit suicide by crucifying himself.

Conybeare, WILLIAM JOHN, son of Dean Conybeare of Llandaff, author, in conjunction with Dr. J. S. Howson, Dean of Chester, of The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, and of many essays. Of the latter, the most famous was that on Church Parties, which appeared in the Edinburgh Review in 1854. He died in 1857.

Cope.—An ecclesiastical vesture of a semicircular shape, worn over the surplice or alb, fastened at the neck by an ornamental clasp, called a morse, otherwise open in the front, and reaching nearly to the feet: in this shape it is known from the earliest times. The material of the copes to be found in the inventories of ornaments made by Edward VI.'s commissioners in 1552 is very various, from cloth of gold down to simple serge. The colours varied according to the season of the Church's year: thus the Sarum Use appointed red in Advent, white at Easter, green on festal days.

The cope was widely used both at the altar and in the choir at Morning and Evening Prayer, but its altar use, strictly speaking, was confined to other offices than the celebration of the Holy Communion, although after a time it found its way into use as a Eucharistic dress: thus in our first Prayer Book (1549) the rubric before the Communion Service says:—"At the time appointed for the ministration of the Holy Communion, the priest . . . shall put upon him . . . a white alb, plain, with a vestment [i.e. a chasuble] or cope;" at the same time the rubric which follows the service says, "Though there be none to communicate, . . . the priest shall put upon him a plain alb or surplice, with a cope;" from which it is at any rate clear that though a cope might be used in which to celebrate, a chasuble was not to be used when there was no celebration. Again, the 24th Canon of 1603 provides that a cope shall be used as the Eucharistic vestment of the cathedrals, and the "Ridsdale Judgment" declared this to be the law of the Church, although very few bishops have hitherto obeyed the ruling.

Copts.—The name given to those Christians in Egypt who for more than eleven centuries have held the patriarchal chair of Alexandria, and have been the dominant sect. The term is a corruption of the name "Egypt," pronounced in Greek fashion. When the Arabs conquered that country they applied the name "Ghubt" to all the nations who strove to preserve their religion and nationality. The Coptic language is the old Egyptian written in Greek letters, and largely mixed with Greek. But it is no longer a vernacular tongue; the natives speak Arabic, and Coptic is only used, like Latin in the Roman Church, in the performance of Divine Worship. Out of the 5,000,000 population of Egypt at present, probably the Copts form a tenth.

They are directly descended from the Monophysites [MONOPHYTISTE], through their founder, Jacob-el-Baradoi, whose zeal in preaching that doctrine was so overpowering that the condemnation of it at Chalcedon was not able to put it down in Egypt. The Emperor's edicts went forth against it, but the Monophysites nicknamed the orthodox Melekites, i.e. "disciples of the king," and were in turn called Jacobites, a name by which they are still known. So bitter was the hatred between the two sides that the Monophysites welcomed the Saracen invasion as a means of delivering them from persecution. The Arabs, in return, put them in possession of the Christian churches. But when the Moslems had gained full mastery of the country, and began, according to their wont, to proselytise vigorously, some of the Copts fall away from the faith, and the rest were, and have been since, much persecuted. Though comparatively few in numbers, they have a large body of clergy, elaborately organised. They have also many monasteries, some dating from the very earliest times. Their head is styled "Patriarch of Alexandria," and is regarded as the successor of St. Mark. He is always taken from among the monks. Next to him is the abuna of the Abyssinian Church, residing at Gondar. During the Abyssinian War of 1867, it was stated by one of the correspondents that this ecclesiastic appeared in camp with a basket, offering eggs for sale. The clergy, as a body, are very poor and very ignorant. Though they recite Coptic, most of them do not understand it, and their knowledge of the Bible is confined to the Gospels and a few Psalms. Many support themselves by begging, some by thieving, and they are much given to drinking.

Three liturgies are in use, that of St. Basil on fast days, of St. Cyril in Lent, and of St. Gregory on festivals. The service is very long and elaborate. As almost the whole of it is performed standing, the congregation are provided with crutches to lean upon. Most of the churches are dirty and dilapidated. There are four fasting seasons, which are observed with extreme strictness. One remarkable feature of the ritual is the practice of unction, which the priests administer not only, as in the Roman Catholic Church, to the dying, but also when giving absolution. They have adopted circumcision, probably in deference to Mahomet. The oldest church is at Cairo. It dates from the sixth century, and is built over a grotto in which our Lord is alleged to have been kept by His mother during their residence in Egypt. Much has been done of late years to raise the condition of the Coptic Church. Some have tried proselytism, others have taken measures for training Coptic preachers. The movement was one in which the late Archbishop Tait took much interest.

Coquerel, ATHANASE (1795-1868).—An eloquent French preacher, of Liberal Protestant views. He laboured hard to unite the discordant parties of French Protestantism, and published many works, among them eight volumes of Sermons.

Cordeliers.—Franciscan friars, so called from the cord which serves them for a cincture, or sash. The name of Cordelier is said to have been given them in the war of St. Louis against the infidels, wherein the friars minor having repulsed the barbarians, and the king having inquired their name, it was answered that they were people Cordelias.—"tied with ropes." They are professed Scotists. [DUNS SCOTUS.]

Corea, MARTYRS OF.—Corea is a peninsula of China, and one of its dependencies, and a very strong hatred exists between the two. Except twice in the year, when an embassy from the King of Corea to the Emperor of China passes across the fifteen miles of neutral land lying between the two countries, they hold no intercourse, and the Coreans are extremely watchful that no stranger shall be admitted to their country. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the Roman Catholic Church has contrived to send missionaries in disguise. At the time of one of the embassies one of them was struck by the intelligence of a youth named Andrew Keemay Kim, took him back with him to China, and had him educated at Macao. When his education was completed, Kim set himself to facilitate the access of missionaries to his benighted brethren; he managed, in disguise, to pass back to Corea, but for some time after, to avoid discovery, he had to hide in the desert, and suffered great privations. In 1844 he wandered in the north of Corea, seeking an inlet for missionaries, and at length he met with some Christians, some of whom contrived with him to meet the Vicar Apostolic, Dr. Ferreol, at the southern boundary. Andrew was now a deacon, and Dr. Ferreol suggested that he should, if possible, purchase a junk, and go to Shanghai to fetch the bishop, and land him in Corea. Through immense difficulties, and in an unseaworthy craft, he reached Shanghai, and here he was ordained priest, and, with the bishop, again set sail for Corea, where they landed Oct. 12th, 1845. Andrew Kim was the first native priest. His usefulness was to be but of short duration. Endeavouring to communicate with some Chinese junks, in the hope of facilitating the transmission of some letters, he and his little band of followers were seized, and after enduring horrible tortures, he received the crown of martyrdom on Sept. 16th, 1846, in the twenty-sixth year of his age. Three days later eight men and four women were put to death by beating and strangling; the chief of the band, Charles Hiem, like Andrew Kim, having his head struck off with sabres.

Cornish Saints.—The saints whose names are preserved in Cornwall by the dedication of churches, and otherwise, are chiefly those of the Celtic calendar. Continental saints are few, and in some cases they seem to have silently taken the place of Celtic saints of similar names; English saints are hardly to be found at all; St. Werburg of Warbstow is perhaps the only instance in the county.

name in the fullest sense, as of Cornish birth and descent; thus St. CUBY was of the ancient royal stock; others came from Ireland or Wales in the fifth and sixth centuries, and have given their names to parishes and left enduring memorials behind them. The name of St. Piran, Bishop of Saighir, in Ireland, remains in Perranzabuloe, Perranuthnoe, Perranarworthal, and his oratory was discovered in 1835, when the sands shifted which had hidden it for centuries, but it was unfortunately not preserved, and is now again buried; St. Gwithian's name, who came from Ireland probably in the fifth century, is that of a parish near St. Ives; St. Uny and St. Ia, brother and sister, accompanied St. Gwithian (with others), and have given their names to parishes in the same neighbourhood—St. Uny Lelant and the town of St. Ives.*

As Cornwall received the mission of these saints from Ireland and Wales, ten missionaries in turn left that county for Brittany, first at the time of the Saxon invasion, about 450, and again later; St. Malo, or Machutus, commemorated in our present calendar on Nov. 15th, is a case in both points, for coming originally from Wales, he passed some years in Cornwall, and settling finally in Brittany, died at Archambrai, 564; the towns of St. Malo in France and St. Mawes in Cornwall both being named after him.

Cornwall, BISHOPRIC OF.—The early Church in Cornwall, as is indicated by ethnological probability, as well as by tradition, took its origin from Ireland and Wales; and the Celtic Church (that is, the Church as existing in the British Isles before Augustine came from Rome, A.D. 597) had in Cornwall one of its greatest strongholds both before and after the English invasion in the middle of the fifth century. Inscriptions show that Christianity existed in Cornwall as early as the fourth century—such are found at St. Clement's, near Truro, and at St. Just, in Penwith; but one of the first traces of Cornish bishops is at the consecration of St. Chad to York (664), when two British bishops assisted. These, it is said by Canon Stubbs [Comwall, i. 124], can hardly have come from any other place than Cornwall. At this time Cornwall was to some extent both civilly and ecclesiastically independent; for a king of Cornwall,† though probably a vassal king, is found as late as 875, and it was not till the next, or tenth, century that the bishops

* The e in this name has found its way in from the town in Huntingdonshire. Leland spells "St. Ies," and the old pronunciation is shown in the legend on the loving cup of the corporation, of date 1640—

"If any discord 'twixt my friends arise Within the borough of beloved St. Ies—"

† Durgarh, Donierth, or Dvynrth, drowned about that year, buried at St. Cleer, near Liskeard, where his monument, or part of it, remains.

submitted to Canterbury. One exception there is in Keustec, the first Cornish bishop whose name is known, whose letter, giving homage to Archbishop Ceolnoth (833-870) is at Canterbury [Haddan and Stubbs, Concilia, i. 674]; but that this was not continued is shown by the foundation (909) of the see of Crediton, when three Cornish towns were attached to the see as missionary centres for the Bishop of Crediton to visit from.

This mission, and the arms of King Athelstan, finally attached Cornwall to the rest of the realm; and Conan, a Cornish bishop, signs undoubted charters from 931 to 934, and doubtful ones as late as 939 [Haddan and Stubbs, Concilia, i. 676]. From this time the succession of bishops is fairly clear: Conan's successors were Athelgeard, about 950 (he witnesses the freeing of a serf, recorded in the Bodmin Gospels* in the British Museum); Comore and Wulfsgie, who witness similar manmissions (the latter signs a charter in 967); Ealdred and Aethelred, who sign charters 993-997, and 1001; and Burwold, on whose death, about 1045, the Cornubian see was united to the Dannonian one of Crediton under Lyving, Burwold's nephew, the bishop of the latter see. Lyving died in 1046, and was succeeded by Leofric, who transferred the see to Exeter, where the seat of the united bishopric remained for about eight hundred years. The efforts which, after Leofric, began to be made for the restoration of a bishop to Cornwall, were not successful till 1877, when Dr. Benson was consecrated to the see of Truro (q.v.), and being made Archbishop of Canterbury in 1882, was succeeded by Dr. Wilkinson.

The list thus given of the Cornish bishops must now be taken as the correct one on the authority of the documentary evidence furnished by Haddan and Stubbs; that given in Le Neve's Festi (under Exeter) is from the Catalogue of Bishops (1601) of Francis Godwin, Bishop of Hereford; he took it from the list which John Hooker (uncle to the celebrated divine) contributed to Holinshed's Chronicles (1577), but its ultimate source is unknown.

The seat of the bishopric seems to have been first Bodmin, and then St. Germans; the manmissions above referred to were performed before the altar of the monastery of St. Petroc, in Bodmin, but this was destroyed by the Danes in the year 981, and probably the see was then transferred to St. Germans. The following is a list of the bishops, with the approximate dates of their accession:—

Coronation Service.—That used for our monarchs is one of the oldest of English liturgical offices. It is based, with slight modifications made from time to time, upon the same office which was used for King Edward the Confessor. It consists mainly of these parts:—1. The recognition. The Archbishop of Canterbury—it is a relic of the ancient elective system—advancing to each corner of the sacrum, asks the people for their recognition, and is answered by the acclamations of the multitude. 2. The first oblation of the monarch. 3. The Litany. 4. The Holy Communion, in the course of which come (a) the oath; (b) the anointing; (c) the presentation of the spurs and sword, and oblation of the same; (d) investiture with the royal robes and delivery of the orb and sceptre; (e) the investiture per amulum et baculum; (f) the putting on of the crown; (g) the presentation of the Bible. 5. Enthronisation and homage.

In this Service, says Mr. Palmer, "there is an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of Christ over the whole world, and the derivation of all kingly power from Him. 'When you see this orb set under the cross, remember that the whole world is subject to the power and empire of Christ our Redeemer. For He is the Prince of the kings of the earth, King of kings, and Lord of lords, so that no man can reign happily who derives not his authority from Him, and directs not all his actions according to His laws.' It is declared that Christian sovereigns, like the Jewish kings of old, are consecrated to the fulness of their office by the religious rite of unction, and that their function is not merely secular. 'Bless and sanctify thy chosen servant Victoria, who by our office and ministry is now to be anointed with this oil, and consecrated queen of this realm.' There is a strict recognition of the prerogative of the clergy, empowered as the ministers of Christ to assert the dominion of our Lord, who exalts her to her holy dignity. 'Stand firm and hold fast from henceforth the seat and the state of royal and imperial dignity which is this day delivered to you in the name and by the authority of Almighty God, and by the hands of us the bishops and servants of God, though unworthy; and as you see us to approach nearer to God's altar, so vouchsafe the more graciously to continue to us your royal favour and protection. And the Lord God Almighty, whose ministers we are, and the stewards of His mysteries, establish you therein in righteousness, that it may stand fast for evermore.'"

Corporal.—A small square white linen cloth laid upon the larger one which covers the Lord's Table: the elements of the bread and the wine are placed upon it for consecration. It is considered to be symbolical of the linen shroud of our Lord's body, the name, of course, being derived from the Latin corpus;

"a body," and the origin of its use was a primitive rule that consecration should only be performed on linen. If the altar, therefore, was not covered, or not covered with linen, a small linen cloth was used to consecrate upon; but as the universal use of the English Church is to cover the altar for the Holy Communion with linen, the corporal would appear to be, however decent and becoming, no longer necessary.

Corporal Works of Mercy.—Works of bodily kindness. The old divines reckoned seven:—(1) Feeding the hungry, (2) giving drink to the thirsty, (3) clothing the naked, (4) sheltering the homeless, (5) visiting the sick, (6) ransoming captives, (7) burying the dead.

Corporation Act, THE, was passed in the reign of Charles II. (1662) to prevent Dissenters from holding office in corporate towns, by enacting that no person should be elected to any office relating to the government of any corporation unless he received the Holy Communion in the Church of England. The Act was repealed by 9 Geo. IV., cap. 17.

Corpus Christi, FEAST OF.—A festival of the Roman Catholic Church, in honour of the institution of the Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, held on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, and removed from English calendars at the Reformation.

It was at first a local feast, peculiar to the Church of Liège, whose bishops instituted it in 1247, with the authority of Cardinal Hugo, legate of Pope Innocent IV. An office for the day was compiled by St. Juliana, a nun of Liège, and the feast remained local through the pontificates of Innocent IV. and his successor, Alexander IV.; but in 1261 Urban IV. became Pope, who had at one time been Archdeacon of Liège, and he shortly issued a rule (dated Sept. 8th, 1262) for the universal observance of the feast. A Service was drawn up at his command by St. Thomas Aquinas. The festival was not established without the intervention of "miracles." Thus St. Juliana, in 1230, while gazing at the full moon, saw a gap in it, and received a special revelation that the moon represented the Christian Church, and the gap the want of a festival for the adoration of the Sacrament. And in 1264, a priest of Bolsena, who did not believe in the recently declared doctrine of Transubstantiation, was saying the Consecration Prayer, when drops of blood fell on his robe, and as he endeavoured to conceal them by folding it, they made images of the Host! The wonderful garment is actually shown as a relic at Civita Vecchia. The special ceremony of the day consists in carrying the Sacrament in procession, with the singing of appropriate psalm and hymns, among them the Pange lingua gloriosi Corporis mysterium, known in Hymns Ancient and Modern as "Now, my tongue, the mystery telling."

The collect in the Office of the Liturgy is now tolerably familiar in Eucharistic devotion, being that which begins "O God, who in this Holy Sacrament hast left unto us a memorial of Thy passion;" the Epistle is 1 Cor. xi. 23-29; the Gospel John vi. 55-58; the Sequence (a hymn sung between the Epistle and Gospel) is known, from its first line, as the Lauda, Sion, Salvatorem:—

"Land, O Sion, Christ thy Saviour, Land thy Shepherd and thy King,
Unto Him thy voice exalting,
Hymns and praises do thou sing."

It was translated (or rather imitated) in the seventeenth century by Richard Crashaw, in his Steps to the Temple.

Cosin, JOHN, was born at Norwich in 1594, and educated at Caius College, Cambridge; he was at first a Prebendary of Durham, next Archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire, and then Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Vice-Chancellor of that University; afterwards Dean of Peterborough. At the breaking out of the Rebellion, being remarkably loyal, he was sequestered from all his benefices; during the supremacy of Cromwell and the Bump Parliament, he followed the king's fortunes, and lived in France, where he declined joining in communion with the French Protestants. Here he gained over several Roman Catholics to the Church of England. At the Restoration he was made Bishop of Durham, in 1660; he died at Westminster in 1671, and was buried at Bishop-Auckland, in his own diocese. He was a leader amongst the Anglo-Catholics. His works are his Devotions, and A Scholastical History of the Canon of Scripture. This he wrote at Paris; it is a learned justification of the Church of England on this point, disproving by the authority of the Fathers and Catholic tradition the extension of the canon by the Council of Trent. He founded out of his own estate a public library at Durham, where his works, both printed and manuscript, are now lodged.

Cosmo and Damian, SAINTS, brothers, were martyred in the persecution of Diocletian. Little is recorded concerning them, yet they were among the most popular saints of the Middle Ages, and seem to have been regarded as special patrons of physicians. Very many village churches in England before the Reformation had altars to them.

Cotelierius, JOHN BAPTIST, Doctor of Divinity of the Sorbonne, and Royal Greek Professor, was born at Nîmes, in Languedoc, in 1628, the son of a Huguenot minister. He attained an extraordinary proficiency in languages when very young, for being at twelve years old brought into the hall of the General Assembly of the French clergy, he construed at sight the New Testament in Greek and the Old in Hebrew, and at the same time disentangled several difficulties proposed with reference to the peculiar construction of the Hebrew language, and explained the text from customs practised amongst the Jews. After this he demonstrated several mathematical propositions. On coming of age, he declined to take Holy Orders, and spent his time wholly on ecclesiastical antiquity. He was commissioned, in conjunction with Du Cange, to review the catalogus and abstracts of the Greek manuscripts in the king's library. His great work is his Collection of the Fathers, 2 vols. folio, Paris, 1672. Afterwards he published Monumenta Græca Ecclesiæ, 3 vols. 4to, furnished from the libraries of the king and M. Colbert, with a translation and with critical notes which, though not so considerable, lie as much out of the common road as those in his great work. The first volume was printed in 1675, the second in 1681, and the third in 1686. This work was left incomplete through his death, which took place Aug. 12th, 1686. He was a man of probity and candour, surprisingly modest and unpretending, while his learning and critical skill were marvellous.

Cotta.—A short surplice.

Council.—In an ecclesiastical sense, an assembly of bishops, with clergy attendant on them, convened to decide questions belonging to religion and ecclesiastical discipline. A Council is called General when all the bishops of Christendom meet, if there be no lawful excuse for absence; it is also called Œcumenical, from the Greek oikoumenê, which signifies "the habitable earth." A National Council is the meeting of the prelates of a kingdom, or province, under a patriarch or primate. A Provincial Council is held by the bishops of that diocese, under a Metropolitan. The word Synod, which in Greek and Latin signifies "a council," is applied to the assemblies of the clergy of a diocese, under the authority of their bishop. The precedent for such assemblies is found in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts, where it is related that a council was convened about the question of keeping the Law. And though it may be said that this was an application of the newly converted Churches of the Gentiles to the Mother Church from whence their faith was derived, yet, inasmuch as not only the apostles, elders, and brethren at Jerusalem, but St. Paul and Barnabas, whose work lay in remote places, had a share in the discussion, it may properly be called a Council.

It was apparently by virtue of this precedent that the succeeding bishops looked upon all Christian Churches as one, and all bishoprics as constituted that every bishop had his respective share, which he was to govern in concert with the whole college, his jurisdiction being more particularly confined to a determinate extent of country, as St. Cyprian proves at large in his book, de Unitate Ecclesiæ. When the case of any particular church required a remedy, as many bishops as could, met together to deal with the emergency. At these assemblies, in the times of primitive piety, matters were transacted without any stated ceremonies or regulations; but afterwards, when experience proved the necessity of framing rules of order, some one noted for his learning, or for the greatness of the church or city over which he presided, or for some other valuable distinction, was chosen to draw up the form of proceeding and to collect the votes. After the Roman Emperors were converted, Councils were frequently called by those princes, who were sometimes present at the debate, and when they were not, they commonly sent some Ministers of State to prevent disorder in the discussions, but leaving the determination of matters of faith and ecclesiastical discipline to the bishops. That some of the laity were delegated by the Emperors on these occasions appears by the conference between the Catholics and Donatists held before Count Marcellinus. At the first Council of Ephesus Count Didianus was sent by the Emperor. At the General Council of Chalcedon the Emperor Marcian was present. At the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, Constantine Pogonatus appeared in the assembly, governing the order of the matter debated, and of the persons that were to speak. The Acts of the two first General Councils of Nice and Constantinople are lost, but we are informed by historians of those ages that the Emperors Constantine and Theodosius interposed much in the same manner. The votes, it is said, were collected by notaries, who, when a bishop spoke, and was not contradicted, did not write down his name, but instead of that recorded, "The holy synod says." When many prelates declared at the same time for the same thing, the notaries set down, "The bishops consented and affirmed," and the points unanimously agreed to were looked upon as decisions. When any bishops argued for the negative, their sense was taken in writing, with the names of the persons, and then the presidents pronounced according to the majority.

After the Eastern and Western Empires were divided, there still remained in the West some traces of the ancient Councils, many of which were held in France and Germany under Charles the Great, and several in Spain under the Gothic kings. When the Papal power grew in the Western Church, the Pope claimed a right to convene a Council of the whole Empire, made himself president when he was there, and when absent sent his legates to preside and govern the action. The synods, being no longer overawed by the secular princes, used to meet in great numbers, and, to carry on matters with a better order, began to digest and prepare things in private that they might pass them with greater decency in the public meeting. This afterwards settled into a regular form, and thus the Councils, besides their sessions, had separate congregations, or committees, to draw up heads, and prepare them for the hearing of the whole Council. When the points or articles were many, the congregations were divided, and a committee assigned to each article. This precaution being insufficient to guard against all inconveniences, because those who were not present at the respective congregations, having different interests or opinions, used to object at the full meeting, and oppose the resolutions of the private committees, the congregations turned themselves into a general committee before the session, which general committee was in reality the conclusion of the Council, for the session which was held afterwards was nothing more than form and ceremony. In course of time private interests occasioned differences between the bishops of different nations; therefore, that the Churches of those countries which were remote from the Council might be fairly represented, and not outvoted by those who lived nearer, and were generally more numerous, it was found necessary for every nation to meet by itself and determine by the majority, and for the general decision to be formed by the majority or the plurality of nations, and not by the greatest number of votes of particular persons. This was the method observed in the Councils of Constance and Baale, but the Court of Rome having the greatest interest at the Council of Trent, this method was rejected, and the points both of faith and discipline were determined by a majority of persons. This will explain why it is that Roman Catholics and Protestants disagree concerning the number of General Councils. The latter reject all those held after Papal domination became an established fact. Thus, while Roman Catholics count twenty, Protestants allow but six General Councils. But even concerning these twenty there are divergences of opinion in the Roman Church, for while the Gallican Church accepts the whole of the Council of Constance, Rome only receives the last sessions. We have before us a list of Provincial Councils, numbering not less than 1,442. The twenty General Councils recognised by the Roman Church are the following. We note as shortly as possible the subjects of their deliberations:—

1. Nice, A.D. 325.—Called by Constantine to determine the Arian controversy, and attended by 318 bishops; it drew up the Nicene Creed. [CREEDS; HOMOUSION; ATHANASIUS; ARIUS; NICÆA.] This Council declared that the Son was begotten of the Father from all eternity, and is of one substance with the Father. A vivid account of this great Council and of the principal members of it is given in Dean Stanley's Eastern Church.

2. Constantinople.—In his zeal against Arius, Apollinarius had denied that our Lord had a real human soul, asserting, in fact, that the Divinity supplied its place. [APOLLINARIANS.] And MACEDONIUS (q.v.) had carried Arianism on to a denial of the personality of the Holy Ghost. This Council was called in 381 by Theodosius the Great to examine these questions. It re-affirmed and enlarged the Nicene Creed [CREEDS], and declared "the true body and reasonable soul" of Christ. Constantinople was recognised as the second Metropolitan see, and arranged Oriental affairs without reference to the West. By the canons 2-6 of this Council the rights of Metropolitans were enlarged.

3. Ephesus.—Called to settle the Nestorian Controversy. [NESTORIANS; CYRIL.] About 200 bishops were present. The decision on the word THEOTOKOS (q.v.) was an affirmation of the truth that our Lord, being God and man, is "not two, but one Christ," that He is indivisible, and His two natures from His conception in the womb inseparable.

4. Chalcedon, A.D. 451.—Subject: the Eutychian controversy. [EUTYCHIANS.] The Council affirmed that Christ, being one Person, is yet of two distinct natures, inseparable, but unmixed. This Council sanctioned the Patriarchal and Metropolitan constitution of the Catholic Church. The legates of the Pope of Rome, Leo, had the presidency, but the Council declared Constantinople on an equality with Rome, in spite of Leo's protests.

5. Second Council of Constantinople, A.D. 553.—Called by the Emperor Justinian to put an end to the troubles and divisions occasioned by the "Three Chapters" [MONOPHYTES], and also to the ORIGINISTIC CONTROVERSY.

6. Third Council of Constantinople, A.D. 680.—Known as the Council in Trullo, because held in the chamber called Trullus. [MONOTHELITES.]

7. Second Council of Nice, A.D. 787. [ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY.]—This Council, besides its decision on the Iconoclast question, forbade the election of bishops by princes, and enjoined that candidates for bishoprics should be examined in the Psalms, Gospels, Pauline Epistles, and Canon Law.

8. Fourth Council of Constantinople.—We come here to a dispute between the Roman and Greek Churches, for there are really two Councils: the first, held in 869, is rejected by the Greek Church; the second, held in 879, is rejected by the Roman. [PHOTIUS; FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY.]

9. First Lateran Council.—So called because held in the Church of St. John Lateran, at Rome, A.D. 1122. By this time the Papal claims were at their height. The great question of the day was the INVESTITURES (q.v.). The Council decided it, and confirmed the Concordat of Worms.

10. Second Lateran, A.D. 1139, of one thousand bishops. An endeavour to restore the unity of the Church, which was now broken by the schisms of East and West. Arnold of Brescia condemned. [ARNOLDISTS.]

11. Third Lateran, 1179, enforced ecclesiastical discipline, and anathematised the Albigenses (q.v.).

12. Fourth Lateran, A.D. 1215, set forth and sanctioned the whole scheme of Papal doctrine and polity formulated by Innocent III., in seventy decrees. Permutation of Punishment, Indulgences, Works of Supererogation, and Transubstantiation were decreed; new Orders were forbidden, the extirpation of heretics was demanded, and fresh crusades were set on foot against the Moslems and Albigenses.

13. Lyons, A.D. 1245, to determine the quarrel between Pope Innocent IV. and the Emperor Frederick II. [PAPAL POWER.] The Emperor, having been excommunicated by Pope Gregory IX. in 1239, had next year carried war to the gates of Rome. Innocent now demanded his dethronement, which was pronounced. In consequence, Louis IX. of France, and many French and other bishops, broke with the Pope, and this Council is not received by the Gallican Church.

14. Second of Lyons, A.D. 1274, passed decrees upon the election of the Pope by the Conclave of Cardinals; restricted the Mendicant Orders to four. The Greek Emperor, Michael Palæologus, sought for union with the Latin Church: the Council recognised the Primacy, but retained the Greek Creed and Liturgy. But the hope of union was defeated, and in 1282 both sides uttered fresh anathemas.

15. Vienne (Gaul), 1311.—Suppression of the TEMPLARS (q.v.).

16. Constance, 1414–18. [PAPAL SCHISM.]—More than 150 high dignitaries and 1,800 of the clergy attended. The last sessions, under Pope Martin V., are received as the sixteenth Council by Rome, the whole by France. Martyrdom of Huss (q.v.).

17. Basle, A.D. 1431.—Called to reconcile the Hussites, and to reform abuses. Re-affirmed the claim of the Council of Constance to be above the Pope. The first twenty-five sessions only are received by Rome. Pope Eugène IV. adjourned the Council to Ferrara, then to Florence, but the majority remained at Basel, and the Councils mutually excommunicated each other. Basel deposed Eugène and elected another Pope, but without avail, and the Council gradually died out. At Florence, fresh articles of re-union with the Greek Church were framed, but without avail.

18. Fifth Lateran, 1512–18. — Convoked by Julius II. Useless attempts at Church reform were made. A concordat between Pope Leo X. and Francis I. was adopted, repealing the Pragmatic Sanction. [CONCORDAT.]

19. Trent, called by Paul III., May 22nd, 1542; after long delay, was at length formally opened on Dec. 13th, 1545. The first session ended Jan. 7th, 1546; it was transferred to Bologna from March 12th, 1547, to Sept. 17th, 1549; resumed at Trent May 1st, 1561, till April 28th, 1562, when it was suspended for ten years. The first Papal legates were Dei Monte (afterwards Pope Julius III.), Corvinus, and Reginald Pole. The votes were taken, not by nations, as at Basel, but by numbers. The Protestants refused to join it; the Italian bishops were by far the most numerous, and were often violently opposed by the Spanish and French. The objects were declared to be discipline, peace, and the extermination of heresy. In 1546 the Decrees on the Canon on Tradition were passed. The next Decrees were on Original Sin, Justification, and the Sacraments (in 1547), the Eucharist, Penance, etc. (1551). The result was the triumph of the Ultramontane party. [TRENT.]

20. The Vatican, called in December, 1869, and not yet concluded. [PAPAL INFALLIBILITY; VATICAN.]

Counsels of Perfection.—A term of the mediæval casuists to express certain acts and habits which opened a way to perfect holiness, not attainable by all. These acts comprised:—1. Voluntary poverty, the discipline to correct the lust of the eye and the pride of life. 2. Perpetual chastity, in virginity or widowhood, based upon passages like Matt. xix. 11–21; 1 Cor. vii. 32; xix. 29; Rev. xiv. 5, 8. Obedience, not only to the laws of God, but to those of the Church and of an earthly superior.

Courayeur, PIERRE FRANÇOIS.—A French Roman Catholic writer, Canon of the Abbey of St. Geneviève, in Paris, who published at Brussels, in 1723, a treatise on English Orders, in which he declared that they were certainly valid. This raised such a storm of indignation among his co-religionists abroad, that he was forced to flee to England, where he died in 1776. He also published a French translation of Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent.

Courts, ECCLESIASTICAL. [ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.]

Covenant; Covenanters.—The important document known as the Solemn League and Covenant owes its origin to a Confession of Faith, drawn up by the General Assembly of Scotland in 1581, which condemned episcopal government (under the name of "hierarchy") as being not in accord with true Christian doctrine. [MELVILLE, ANDREW.] James VI., then a boy of fifteen, was compelled to sign it, and to enjoin it on his subjects. It was again subscribed in 1590 and 1596. The fatal attempt of Charles I., in 1637, to establish the liturgy in Scotland was followed by a riot, and an organisation was formed for the defence of the Presbyterian Confession, and thus was established the National Covenant. A solemn fast was called, March 1st, 1638, and, at a vast assemblage in the Church of the Greyfriars, this Covenant was eagerly subscribed, and an oath was taken to maintain religion in the same state and form which it had in 1580. The king was compelled to agree to this in 1640, and there was peace for awhile. But on the outbreak of the Civil War in England, the English Parliament sent a message to the Scots that they desired to fraternise with them in religion, and accordingly the Scotch Parliament sent their Covenant to the Parliament of England. It was received and sworn to by both Houses of Parliament and by the City of London, and ordered to be read in all the churches throughout the kingdom. Many parish registers contain the entry of its having been so taken, and sometimes the names of parishioners are subscribed to the entry. After the Restoration, Parliament voted the whole proceeding illegal, and the Covenant was ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman.

In Scotland a bitter resistance was made to the Acts which thus treated the Covenant. The Scots had been friends of Charles II. after his father's execution, had supported him against Cromwell, and proclaimed him king. He, on his side, had sworn to the Covenant. It is no wonder that his tergiversation and treachery drove them almost to desperation. They found diocesan councils established everywhere; and in the West Country four hundred ministers resigned their charges rather than submit. They were forbidden to hold meetings of their own, on pain of death, and attendants upon their ministry were fined and imprisoned. Troops scoured the country, persecuting the Covenanters, as they were called, and they, on their side, took arms in their own defence. The struggle lasted until the accession of William III., when Presbyterianism was established in Scotland. For the further movements of the partisans of the Covenant, see CAMERONIANS.

Coverdale, Miles, was born in Yorkshire in 1487, and educated at Cambridge. He became an Augustinian monk. In 1514 he took Holy Orders. About the year 1526 the doctrines of the German Reformers excited great attention at Cambridge, and meetings were held to discuss them at a house in the neighbourhood of some of the principal colleges, which house was in consequence nicknamed Germany. One of the visitors was Coverdale, and as early as 1528 he spoke publicly against the mass, the worship of images, and confession to priests. He devoted himself at an early period to the translation of the Holy Scriptures, for he was well skilled in Hebrew. In 1530 he fled to the Low Countries to escape persecution, and while there, assisted Tyndall in his translation. Before Tyndall was put into prison, Coverdale appears to have removed to Germany, where he pursued his labour of translating the Bible, and the Elector Palatine gave him the living of Bergzabern, on the Rhine. Thence he seems to have gone to Zurich, as it is supposed his first edition of the whole Bible was printed there; on the last page it is stated to have been "printed in the year of our Lord 1535, and finished the 4th day of October." It was dedicated to King Henry VIII. Soon after its appearance in print Cromwell issued injunctions to the clergy, by the authority of the king, that every parish should provide a copy of the whole Bible, both in Latin and English, to be placed in the body of the church before the following 1st day of August, 1536, "for every man that will to looke and read therein." It is stated that the king gave this translation of the Bible to some of the bishops to peruse, who alleged that there were faults in it, but admitted that it maintained no heresies. "If there be no heresies," said the king, "let it go abroad among the people."

In 1538, a quarto New Testament in the Vulgate Latin, with Coverdale's English, was printed with the king's licence. At the end of this year he went abroad again on the business of a new edition of the Bible. Grafton, the printer, had obtained permission from the King of France, at the request of the King of England, to print a Bible at Paris, on account of the superior skill of the workmen, and the better quality and lower price of paper in that country. But notwithstanding the royal licence, the Inquisition interposed, and the printers and their employers, with Coverdale, who was the corrector for the press, were summoned before the Inquisition, the whole impression of 2,500 copies being seized and condemned to the flames. But the avarice of the officer who superintended the burning, induced him to sell some chests of them as waste paper, and thus many copies were preserved. Some of these were recovered by the English proprietors, and brought to London with the presses, types, and printers, by which means Grafton and Whitchurch were enabled to print, in 1539, Cranmer's, or the Great Bible, in which Coverdale again compared the former translations with the Hebrew, and made corrections in many places, he being the chief overseer of the work. Dr. Fulke, who was one of Coverdale's hearers at St. Paul's Cross, informs us that he took an opportunity in his sermon to defend his translation against some slanderous reports then raised against it, confessing "that he himself now saw some faults, which, if he might review the book once again, as he had done twice before, he doubted not he should amend; but for any heresy, he was sure there was none maintained in his translation." He was not molested during the later years of the reign of Henry VIII., although he hesitated not to defend the memory of Dr. Barnes, who had been his old tutor at Cambridge, and who had been put to death. It is probable that he was held in estimation at court for his piety, for he was made almoner of Queen Catharine Parr, and he assisted in the translation of the paraphrase of Erasmus of the New Testament, which was carried forward under her influence. He wrote also a preface to the Epistle to the Romans. In 1547 he preached at St. Paul's Cross with such effect against certain Anabaptists that they are said to have recanted their opinions.

When Lord Russell was sent to quell the rebellion in Devonshire and the West of England, in 1549, Coverdale was appointed to attend him and preach to the people, which produced so great an impression that it was deemed desirable he should remain in that part of the country, and he was consequently made coadjutor to the Bishop of Exeter, and in August, 1551, was consecrated by Cranmer. In his licence of entry upon the bishopric, it was expressly stated that the king, Edward VI., had promoted him "on account of his extraordinary knowledge in divinity, and his unblemished character." At this time he was so poor that he was unable to pay the firstfruits which were due to the Crown, and the king, at the solicitation of the archbishop, remitted them. He exerted himself to promote religion in his diocese, preached every Sunday and holy-day, and delivered a divinity lecture twice a week in one or other of the churches of Exeter. On the accession of Mary, he was deprived of his bishopric, and thrown into prison for two years, but was at length released, at the earnest request of the King of Denmark, one of whose chaplains had been married to Coverdale's wife's sister, and had interested himself with that king in his favour. During his confinement he joined with Bishops Hooper, Farrar, and others, in publishing a Confession of Faith. On his release he went to Denmark, where the king desired him to remain; but as he was unable to preach in the Danish language, he proceeded to Geneva, where he collaborated with some other English exiles in translating and publishing what is usually termed the Geneva Bible. Of this translation it is said there were above thirty editions printed, mostly in England, between the years 1560 and 1616.

On the accession of Elizabeth, Coverdale returned to England, but at Geneva he had imbibed a dislike to ecclesiastical habits and ceremonies, which prevented his restoration to his bishopric, or the offer of any other preferment for some time. In 1559, however, he preached at St. Paul's Cross, the place at which the Court was then accustomed to attend public worship, and he assisted also at the consecration of Parker as Archbishop of Canterbury, but refused to put on the customary episcopal habits for the occasion, and wore only a black cloth gown. Grindal, Bishop of London, was much attached to him, and expressed his concern that he should be left without the means of support in his old age. Through his influence, the bishopric of Llandaff was offered to Coverdale in 1563, but he refused to accept it, on account of his age and infirmities. Grindal then presented him to the rectory of St. Magnus, London Bridge, but his poverty was such that he was unable to pay the fees of induction, and could not have taken possession had they not been remitted. He entered upon his charge, and officiated regularly for about two years, when he resigned it, but still continued to preach occasionally. In 1564 he published Certain most godly, fruitful, and comfortable letters, of such true saints and holy martyrs of God as, in the late bloody persecution here within this realm, gave their lives for the defence of Christ's Holy Gospel: written in the time of their affliction and cruel imprisonment. They were chiefly written by Cranmer, Ridley, Hooper, Taylor, Saunders, Philpot, Bradford, Whittell, and Careless, but a few were added from other persons. Coverdale lived to the age of eighty-one years, and was buried in the chancel of the church of St. Bartholomew, near the Exchange, London, on Feb. 19th, 1568. Coverdale was the last survivor of those who had been engaged in the translation of the Bible into the English language. Tyndall, Rogers, and Frith had all died in the flames—Tyndall, at Antwerp in 1536; Rogers, the first of the martyrs who were put to death in England under Mary, in April, 1555; Frith in the July following.

Cowl (Lat. cuculla).—The hood which the monk draws over his head, and which, by entirely covering all but his face, prevents him from seeing anything but what is in front of him. As the hood was thus the most characteristic part of the monk's dress, the phrase "taking the cowl" came to mean entering the monastic life.

Cowper, WILLIAM (1731–1800).—One of the chief religious poets of England, friend of John Newton, and co-author with him of the Olney Hymns, some of which have won abiding popularity.

Cramp Rings.—The ancient claim of English royalty to cure scrofula (or "king's evil") by touch is pretty well remembered, but less is now known of the similar claims with regard to epilepsy and cramp. This, however, was not by touch, but by the blessing of certain finger-rings of gold or silver, which were then distributed to the patients; or in some cases persons would take a quantity, and distribute them as occasion arose. (See Notes and Queries, 5th Ser., ix. 514.)

The origin of the custom is contemporary with the Norman Conquest. Edward the Confessor bequeathed to the Abbot of Westminster a ring, which is said to have been brought by a pilgrim from Jerusalem, and to have been connected in some way with St. John the Evangelist. This ring, being laid up in the Abbey, was, on account of the king's saintly character, resorted to for the cure of such diseases as cramp and epilepsy; and when it became an acknowledged doctrine that the Kings of England had inherited Edward's miraculous powers, they not unnaturally began to bless rings to serve the same purpose as his.

The rings were, in after times, annually blessed on Good Friday, and were made, as the household books of Henry IV. and Edward IV. show, of the gold and silver offered by the king to the Holy Cross.

The earliest Office now extant for blessing and consecrating these rings is a Latin form, used in the reign of Philip and Mary, A.D. 1554, and which will be found in Burnet's History of the Reformation, Coll. of Records, II., ii. 25, and in Wilkin's Concilia, iv. 103. It consists of the recital of the 67th and 103rd Psalms, with appropriate collects; after which the rings were consecrated by rubbing between the Sovereign's hands, with the following prayer:—

"Hallow, O Lord, these rings; sprinkle them in Thy goodness with the dew of Thy blessing, and consecrate them by the rubbing of our hands, which, for the manner of our ministry, Thou hast deigned to sanctify by the outward pouring of holy oil; that that which the nature of the metal cannot perform, by the greatness of Thy grace may be effected; through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Holy water was then poured on the rings, with prayer for a blessing on their work, and the service ended with a doxology.

Queen Mary was the last to perform the ceremony; about 1685 the office used by her was translated for James II., but never used. This was first printed in 1792, in a forgotten work called The Literary Museum, edited by Francis Godolphin Waldron (an actor); then in Pegge's Curiatia Miscellanea (1818); and afterwards in Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia (1847), iii. 335, and Stephens' Common Prayer with Notes (1850), ii. 921; but as, unlike the Healing of the Evil, the ceremony was never used by our Protestant kings, the office was never added to the Prayer Book, as that for the healing was.

There is, or was, a superstition in some parts of England that these very diseases of cramp and epilepsy are to be cured by the wearing of certain silver rings; it may possibly be a survival of the belief in the old cramp rings. If so, however, it is not easy to account for the whimsical addition that the ring must be made of nine sixpences begged from nine young people of a sex opposite to the patient's.

Cranmer, THOMAS, was born at Aslacton, near Nottingham, July 2nd, 1489, the second son of Thomas Cranmer, a gentleman of ancient descent, and his wife Agnes, daughter of Laurence Hatfield, of Willoughby, Notts. The eldest son was John of As-lacton, whose descendants were afterwards represented by the Chesters of Chicheley, extinct 1769; the third was Edmund, Archdeacon of Canterbury 1534, prebendary 1549, deprived 1554. Thomas Cranmer senior died in his son's early years; and after an early education at Aslacton, under a "rude parish clerk," the future archbishop was sent by his mother in 1503 to Jesus College, Cambridge. He was elected a Fellow of Jesus, but shortly married one of the domestics at a neighbouring inn, the "Dolphin," then opposite Jesus Lane; upon which he left college, and became a lecturer at Magdalen. His wife, however (with her child), died before his year of grace was out, and he therefore retained his fellowship; returning to Jesus College, he took holy orders about 1520, assumed his D.D. in 1523, became Divinity Lecturer and an Examiner of Theological Graduates, and in 1525 received the Archdeaconry of Taunton. In the same year a canonry of Christ Church was offered him by Wolsey, just then founding that college at Oxford, but this he declined.

In 1527, though it had been privately mentioned earlier, the divorce of Henry VIII. from Queen Catharine began to be publicly considered. Among the king's first steps was to consult six D.D.'s of Oxford and six of Cambridge, and after them the bishops, on the validity of the marriage. On the former of these committees it is said that Cranmer would have been placed, but he happened to be at the time out of residence, and thus his concern in the business was deferred. However, in 1528 and 1529, as is now shown by Mr. Brewer, Cranmer was chaplain to Viscount Rochford, Anne Boleyn's father; and in the latter year, having left Cambridge by reason of an outbreak of the plague, or sweat, he went down to the house of his niece, Mrs. Cressy, at Waltham, with two of her sons who were his pupils at Cambridge. The king, with Anne Boleyn, being near Waltham on a progress (on which he had started after the vain attempt to get his marriage annulled by the Papal legate), Edward Fox, his secretary, and Stephen Gardiner, his chaplain (afterwards Bishop of Winchester), were lodged at Mrs. Cressy's house. The divorce being discussed, Cranmer gave advice that the king should not only do as the bishops had advised before, obtain the opinions of the Universities of Europe, but follow this up by holding a court in England (Hook's Life of Cranmer, II., i. 438)—should, in fact, take matters into his own hands. Henry, on hearing this, made a remark which is variously given, either that "the man had the right sow by the ear," or "the sow by the right ear." Cranmer was sent for to Court, made a royal chaplain, and ordered to write a book in favour of the divorce. For this purpose he went down to the house of his first patron, Lord Rochford (now Earl of Wiltshire), who had lately been, scandalously enough as Anne's father, ambassador to the Emperor Charles V. on the divorce; the Emperor was Catharine's sister's son, and of course unfavourable to it. At the earl's house Cranmer compiled a treatise, which has never yet been printed, though Burnet has given the heads of chapters in the collection of records (ii. 36) attached to his History of the Reformation, and even by these heads a most important fact is demonstrated, and a very unfavourable light thrown on Cranmer's character—namely, that Henry had connected himself unlawfully with Anne's elder sister (this is proved also from other sources), and that Cranmer knew this, and deliberately set himself to prove that it did not affect the re-marriage of Henry with Anne! This book being written in pursuance of the resolve to obtain University opinion, Cranmer, Fox, and Gardiner went up to Cambridge to deal with the matter there, and on March 9th, 1530, a grace of the Senate was passed agreeing with the king's wishes. Oxford gave Henry much more trouble, and the M.A.'s would have beaten him after all if he had not obtained from Archbishop Warham, the Chancellor, an unconstitutional rescript excluding them from the Convocation. This being done, the D.D.'s and B.D.'s, on April 8th, obediently passed the desired decree. Cranmer, now thoroughly embarked in the matter, was despatched abroad, with the Earl of Wiltshire, "to dispute," as Strype says, "the matrimonial matters of his majesty at Paris, Rome, and other places." Such opinions as the king desired were obtained also from the Italian and French Universities, but in a less scrupulous way than in the case of Oxford and Cambridge, for there is evidence that bribery was in this case used [see Christian Remembrancer, April, 1868, "Report on Venetian Archives"]; and the next year (1531) Cranmer proceeded as sole ambassador to Charles V. on the subject; for this he had special letters patent, dated Jan. 24th. With the Emperor he, of course, met with no success, but with the minor German princes he had some. At Nuremberg, in 1532, he took to wife Anne (or Margaret), niece to the wife of Andreas Rosemann, now called Andrew Oslander, the Protestant Reformer; she followed him to England in 1534, but in 1539 returned to Germany when clerical celibacy was again enforced by the reactionary "Six Articles;" in 1547, when it became a second time legal, she came back to England; she survived Cranmer, and re-married first Edward Whitchurch the printer, and then one Bartholomew Scott.

On Aug. 23rd, 1532, Archbishop Warham died, and the king instantly resolved that Cranmer should be archbishop. Cranmer was loth to receive the archbishopric, as he must still do, from the Pope, but Henry insisting, he consented; the necessary bulls were obtained from the Pope, and he was consecrated at Westminster, March 30th, 1533, by the Bishops of Lincoln, Exeter, and St. Asaph. In taking the customary oaths to the Pope, he publicly protested that he understood nothing contrary to the laws of God or of the king. The probability is that his petition, dated April 11th, to exercise his office in bringing the divorce suit to an end, had been agreed on with Henry, who of course at once granted it. But Henry had married Anne Boleyn already, and Cranmer knew that he had done so. Henry and Catharine finally separated on July 14th, 1531, when the king publicly installed Anne in her place. In the last month of 1532 marriage became necessary at all risks; and it was therefore performed on Jan. 25th, 1533, Elizabeth being born on the 7th of the following September. The earlier date of Nov. 14th, 1532, assigned for the marriage by some writers, is out of the question.

Cranmer declared nullity of marriage between Henry and Catharine on May 23rd, 1533; on the 28th he confirmed that between Henry and Anne, and on June 1st (Whitsunday) he crowned Anne queen.

We may now turn to the pleasanter subject of what Cranmer did for the Reformation. For one of the chief of his services to this cause, his edition of the Bible, the reader is referred to that heading. Another thing greatly to his credit is his attempt to dissuade the Crown from annexing the monastic property, which he would have had remain in great measure to the Church for the establishment of Cathedral Schools of Divinity. The chief publications on which he was engaged during the remainder of Henry's reign were the Ten Articles of 1536, the Institution of a Christian Man of 1537, and its revision, the Erudition of a Christian Man, of 1543: all more or less copious expositions of doctrine, which were reprinted in one volume (1825), by Bishop Lloyd of Oxford, under the title Formularies of Faith. In these two last-mentioned years articles of heresy were prepared against Cranmer by his own chapter, and again even by the Privy Council, but were afterwards retracted, in consideration of his great favour with the king.

Henry VIII. died on Jan. 28th, 1547, and in his son's reign the Reformation proceeded rapidly by the successive publication of the First Book of Homilies (1547); the Order of Communion (1548); the two Prayer Books of 1549 and 1552; and the Articles of Religion of 1552, in all of which Cranmer had a hand; the "Articles" were founded to a considerable extent upon the "Thirteen," which he had drawn up some years before for an intended negotiation, not then carried out, with the foreign Reformers. In 1550 was published Cranmer's principal work, A Defence of the True and Catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament, which he followed up in the next year with a Vindication against an answer which Bishop Gardiner of Winchester had put forth; in the same year he deprived this bishop for his anti-Reformation doctrines, as he had in 1549 deprived Bishop Bonner.

Before his death, on July 6th, 1553, Edward, by letters patent dated June 21st, 1553, had settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey, the next Protestant heir after the king's sister Elizabeth (who was considered as illegitimate), and her own mother, the Duchess of Suffolk; but afterwards the influence of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, the father of Lady Jane's husband, prevailed on the king to pass the duchess over. Lady Jane was proclaimed on July 10th, and Cranmer was on her side; but when, a few days after, it became clear that she had not the least chance of establishing herself, he transferred his allegiance to Mary. It is possible, however, that he might have been leniently dealt with, for though his name was down for trial for high treason, he was not actually tried till passion led him to use some words concerning the Mass which enraged the queen. He was then attainted by Act of Parliament (his see thus becoming legally vacant), committed to the Tower on Sept. 14th, and condemned for high treason on Nov. 13th. But his life was spared, in the hope that if he could be attached to Mary's party he might be of use in the re-conversion of England, and he remained a few months in the Tower. At length it was determined to proceed against him for heresy, and the name of a disputation was given to what was to be in fact a trial, since the disputers on the Romish side held a Royal Commission, enabling them to declare their opponent guilty of heresy. Cranmer, with Bishops Ridley and Latimer, was accordingly brought down to Oxford, March 7th-10th, 1554, and imprisoned in the north city-gate, commonly called Bocardo. (This was pulled down in 1771: see Annual Register, xiv. 133.) The commission being opened on April 14th, Cranmer was condemned of heresy on the 20th; but still the capital sentence was not executed, and he was detained at Oxford for a year and a half, during which time Ridley and Latimer were burnt (Oct. 16th, 1555).

Cranmer, as a Metropolitan, was re-tried by a Papal commission, Sept. 12th, 1555, and cited to Rome. Unable, of course, to appear there, he was yet pronounced contumacious for not doing so; was excommunicated at Rome, Dec. 4th, 1555, was degraded from his orders, was handed over to the secular arm on Feb. 14th, 1556, and was ordered, under the Great Seal, Feb. 24th, 1556, to be burnt as a "heretic and heresiarch." Cranmer's weakness during the next month is well known: he was removed to Christ Church Deanery, and here the love of life led him to sign recantation after recantation, each more absolute than the last, till he had altogether denied the Protestantism he had embraced. It does not, however, appear that even if he had not withdrawn his recantations they would have saved his life; his withdrawal of them at the stake is also well known, and how he first thrust his "unworthy right hand" into the fire. [See a curious discussion on this point in Notes and Queries, 1st Ser., ix. 392, 547, 590.] "In the greatness of the flame he gave up the ghost," as Foxe touchingly says, on March 21st, 1556.

Cranmer's works, of which the most important is the Sacramental treatise already mentioned, were edited by the Rev. H. Jenkyns, D.D., 4 vols., 1833, and (for the Parker Society) by the Rev. J. E. Cox, 2 vols., 1844-1846. Lives of him were written by Strype (1694); Gilpin (1784); Todd (1831); Le Bas (1833).

Crashaw, RICHARD.—Born in London, and educated at the Charterhouse. He gained a Fellowship at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1637. He was ordained in 1641, but refusing to take the Covenant, he was ejected from his Fellowship, and went to France, where he embraced the Roman Catholic religion. Through the influence of Queen Henrietta Maria, he obtained a secretaryship to one of the cardinals at Rome, and was made a canon of Loretto. He died in 1650. Crashaw is celebrated as a writer of devotional poetry, in a style reminding one of George Herbert. He published a volume of Latin poems in 1634, and in 1646 Carmen Deo Nostro, Steps to the Temple, and The Delights of the Muses.

Credence Table.—The small side-table in the sanctuary, where the bread and wine are placed at Holy Communion before their consecration. The word has nothing to do with the root from which creed is derived, but its root is that from which the word ready comes, while the first letter represents the prefix ge, familiar to German scholars. [Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 383.]

The credence is confined to the Western Churches. In the East the elements are brought from the "chapel of prothesis (exposition)" with a special office, called the Office of the Greater Entrance; just as in England they have been, and sometimes are still, brought from the vestry or sacristy. Considered as a table, or a separate article of furniture of the nature of a table, the credence dates in England from after the Reformation. One ancient credence, indeed, of this time is said to remain at Salisbury Cathedral, but as a rule that which answered the purpose of a credence appears to have been the recess of the piscina, or a shelf or bracket within it. In fact, hardly anything is known of separate credences before the time of Archbishop Laud and Bishop Andrewes; both these prelates used them in their private chapels, and many were also placed in churches. A "credentia, or side-table," is complained of by the Puritan divines in 1641 [Cardwell's History of Conferences, page 273], and most of them disappeared in the civil wars. Some, however, still remain, as one at Chipping Warden, with the date 1627. Hickes, the Nonjuring bishop, recommends them in 1707, and they are now very commonly restored. As with many other "ornaments," the courts have given various judgments about them: in Faulkner v. Lichfield holding them illegal, but legal in the later case of Westerton v. Liddell.

Crediton. [EXETER.]

Credo.—Formal confessions of faith, so called from credo, "I believe." References are not wanting in the New Testament to the existence of formal statements of the Christian faith. The deposit (parathēkē) which Timothy was bidden to guard, in preference to the "profane babblings and oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called:" the good deposit, which he was to guard through the indwelling Holy Spirit, and the pattern of sound words which he had heard from St. Paul, can hardly have been anything else than formal and concise statements of those things which were most surely believed in the Christian Church. [1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. i. 13, 14.] It may be that we have such "forms of sound words" in 1 Cor. xv. 3-9, 1 Tim. iii. 16, Hebrews vi. 1, 2.

Many of the early Fathers incidentally mention in their writings some articles of faith, without hinting at any definite form of words, but Irenæus, writing about A.D. 180, Origen, Tertullian, and others, give forms of Apostolic doctrine more or less resembling the creeds subsequently found in use in the early Christian Churches, such as those of Jerusalem, Cæsarea, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome. All these creeds differ in length, and in the terms in which they are expressed. The Creed of the Church of Rome, commonly called the Apostles' Creed, as given by Rufinus, a priest of Aquileia, A.D. 390, runs thus:—"I believe in God the Father Almighty. And in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord; Who was born by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary; crucified under Pontius Pilate, and buried; the third day He rose again from the dead. He ascended into heaven; He sitteth at the right hand of the Father; thence He shall come to judge the quick and dead. And in the Holy Ghost; the Holy Church: the remission of sins; the resurrection of the flesh." The same writer gives also the creed in use in the Church of Aquileia, which differs from the above by adding, after the words Father Almighty, "invisible and impassable," by inserting the clause, "descended into hell," and by ending with the phrase, "the resurrection of this flesh." A copy of the Roman Creed, almost identical with that given by Rufinus, has been found written in Greek, but in Saxon characters, at the end of King Athelstan's Psalter, about the year 703. The form now in use in the whole Latin Church, as well as in the Church of England, can be traced back to the eighth century, and it is impossible to say how much older than that it may be, although there is certainly no reason for attributing it to the Apostles.

The Nicene Creed is so called because the greater part of it was put forth with the authority attaching to a General Council at Nicæa, A.D. 325. It is possible that the variety of forms observed in the earlier creeds may have been brought about in great measure through the necessity of meeting errors prevalent in this or that diocese by a definite statement of the contrary truth, and it was this necessity, arising from the doctrines of Arius, which induced the Council of Nicæa to adopt, with the addition of the phrase, "of one substance with the Father," the form of creed submitted to them by Eusebius, Bishop of Cæsarea, and of ancient use in his diocese, and to promulgate it as an authoritative regula fidei. A similar necessity, arising from the errors of Macedonius, led the second General Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) to supplement the work of the Council of Nicæa with those clauses of the creed which follow the words, "and in the Holy Ghost." These clauses, however, were not all drawn up now for the first time. Several of them are found in creeds of a date earlier than that of Nicæa, and their omission in that document is owing to the absence of dispute about them at that time.

The creed promulgated at Constantinople differs from that commonly called the Nicene Creed in our Liturgy in two points only. It did not contain the phrase, "God of God," which had appeared in the Creed of Nicæa, and was subsequently restored in the Western Church; nor had it the words "and the Son" in the clause relating to the "procession of the Holy Ghost." [FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY.]

The Creed of St. Athanasius, although designated by this name in the proceedings of the Council of Antioch (A.D. 260), is almost certainly the work of a Latin, not a Greek, author. It is found in Latin as early as A.D. 570, but the first mention of a Greek copy does not occur before A.D. 1200. St. Hilary of Arles, who died A.D. 449, is thought, with some reason, to have been its author, while much may be said in favour of the idea that it was written by Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, at the end of the fourth century or the beginning of the fifth, and that the name of Athanasius was appended to it in mistake for that of Anastatius, who was Bishop of Rome at that time. [HERESIES.]

The use of creeds in the public services of the Church was primarily confined to the occasion of baptism, when in some cases the catechumen repeated it as his confession of faith, and in others its various clauses were put to him in the shape of questions—"Dost thou believe?" etc. Subsequently the recitation of the creed in the daily offices of the Church became a recognised custom. The Nicene Creed was first so used in the Liturgy of the Greek Church about the middle of the fifth century, and in the Western Church about the year 589, but this custom was not admitted into the Roman Church till the beginning of the eleventh century.

The custom of turning to the east during the recitation of the creeds is probably to be traced to the connection between the east and the sun-rising. An ancient practice at baptism was that the catechumen, when making his vow of renunciation, turned towards the west, the region of darkness, and when professing his faith, looked towards the east, the quarter of light. In Poland it was formerly the custom for those who carried swords to draw them at the recitation of the creed, to signify that the faith was to be defended to the death.

Crispin and Crispinian, SAINTS, brothers, said to be of noble parentage. They came from Rome to Soissons about the middle of the third century, to preach Christianity; they made many converts, but after several years, on the coming of the Emperor into Gaul, their enemies laid accusations against them, and they were brought before the governor of Gaul, Rictius Varus, a most implacable enemy of the Christians. By him they were condemned, and perished by the sword about the year 287. St. Crispin is the patron saint of shoemakers, having worked at that trade for his own support. His festival is on Oct. 25th. A large church was built in Soissons in the sixth century in honour of the brothers.

Critici Sacri.—A collection of works on Biblical antiquities and interpretation by scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was published by Cornelius Bee, a London bookseller, in 9 vols. folio, in 1660, as a supplement to Walton's Polyglot [WALTON], and has been reprinted twice since.

Crosier. [PASTORAL STAFF.]

Cross.—This word has so thoroughly acquired the meaning of two lines forming angles with each other, that it is difficult to realise that it does not mean this of necessity. The most ancient cross was a stake to which the malefactor was fastened; the arms and feet were either tied with cords or nailed to the wood, or he was impaled upon it. Sometimes, for despatch, persons were crucified on trees. There are several instances of this kind of execution: the Emperor Tiberius, when Proconsul in Africa, thus executed the priests of Saturn who crucified children. The other crosses, which were made of two pieces of wood, were of two sorts; one of them was like our X, or a saltire in heraldry, and was called Crux Decussata. It is that which we call St. Andrew's Cross. Another, Crux Commissa, sometimes known as St. Anthony's Cross, was made like a T, one of the pieces of wood being set upright, and another being joined cross-wise to it upon the top. The third sort, Crux Immissa, had the cross-piece of wood somewhat below the top of that which stood perpendicularly, and this, according to the received belief of Christendom, was the kind of cross upon which the Saviour died for the sins of the world.

It was long before the cross became the formal and official sign of Christianity; but when crucifixion as a criminal punishment was abolished by Constantine, this gradually took place, and as such, the three forms of its use which have existed for many centuries, and exist now, are (1) the public (i.e. liturgical) or private marking of the cross with a manual gesture, or the impressing of it on dedicated objects, known as the Sign of the Cross; (2) the material cross of marble, stone, metal, or wood, used for devotional purposes, from the large churchyard cross or village or market cross, through the smaller ones of church altars and chancel screens, to the little "pectoral crosses," originally the mark of an ecclesiastic, but now worn indiscriminately; (3) the crucifix, being the same cross bearing the Divine Figure: this is dealt with in a separate article. Our second section may be briefly dismissed: from the earliest times the cross has been used in all such ways as have been described. Constantine, for instance, set up large crosses in the public places of Constantinople; nor are altar-crosses of much later date. The Sign of the Cross, however, requires a little notice. To begin with, it is of the most primitive antiquity. In the Church of England it is only prescribed to be used in Baptism, but it is used by some at Holy Communion, as well as privately, its object being "to remind a Christian of his profession." This custom is spoken of by Tertullian at the beginning of the third century (de Cor. Mil. iii.), and his words show that it was then a perfectly familiar thing. Cyril, Chrysostom, Augustine, and our own Venerable Bede, all testify to the practice. When used simply for such a purpose, and not as a symbol of party, and therefore of division, the practice is defended by the words of Hooker, in the Ecol. Polity, V., lxxv. 9, 10, 11. There are two black-letter Festivals of the Cross in the English Prayer Book:—(a) the Invention (Finding) of the Cross, May 3rd, on which is commemorated the alleged discovery of the true Cross, on the site of the Crucifixion, by the Empress Helena in 326. She came to Jerusalem, so runs the story, at the age of seventy, bent on finding the site of the Passion, the heathens having done what they could to hide it by throwing stones and rubbish over it, as well as by building a temple to Venus on Calvary. But one aged Jew was found, an antiquary, who possessed some historical memoirs which his ancestors had left him, and by the help of these the site was found. It was a regular custom among the Jews to make a great hole on the site of an execution, and to cast into it everything connected with the act. Accordingly, the Empress had the whole spot excavated, and at a great depth the crosses were found. One of the most exhaustive dissertations on this story is that of Cardinal Newman, in his Essays on Ecclesiastical Miracles; it is, however, shown in the Church Quarterly for July, 1881 (xii. 560), that the legend is but a transfer, and that at second-hand, of an earlier myth. The festival dates from the eighth century, and is not generally observed on this day by the Eastern Church, which substitutes the Apparition of the Cross to Constantine, near Rome, in 312; the Coptic branch of this Church has the Invention on March 6th, and the Ethiopic on May 4th. In England, though it remains as a "black-letter day," its offices were discarded at the Reformation; the Sarum Epistle and Gospel were Gal. v. 10-12, vi. 12-14, and John iii. 1-15.

(b) The Exaltation of the Cross, or "Holy Cross Day," Sept. 14th. This is connected with the former feast, the Exaltation commemorated being at first that of the cross, when Constantine, in 335, dedicated the church which he built at Jerusalem in honour of the Invention, and the feast being found in the fifth century; but more attention was afterwards paid to the second Exaltation, in 629, of the same cross, when recovered from the hands of the Persian invaders.* The Eastern Church observes the Invention also on this day, and further commemorates the Apparition again. In England, the feast, like that of the Invention, was removed at the Reformation, and remains only as a "black-letter day." As such, with the Invention and most others, it first reappeared in Queen Elizabeth's Calendar of 1561, and King James's Prayer Book of 1604. The Sarum Epistle was the same as for the Invention, the Gospel John xii. 31-36.

Crucifix; Crucifixion.—The cross used for religious purposes, as mentioned under that article, was, after a time, followed by the Crucifix, or the addition to it of the Figure of our Saviour. This, like the simple cross, was of very various character; the earliest examples now known to exist, probably of the ninth century, are private and not public ones: such are the pectoral crucifix of the French Queen Theodolinda, engraved by Smith (Christian Antiquities, s.v.), and another in 'Mrs. Jameson's History of Our Lord, ii. 328. It was, however, earlier than this that crucifixes began to appear in churches, sometimes taking the place of the altar-cross, and, later still, making their way into the construction of the building as the central part of the reredos. To the crucifix, as that to the cross, succeeded in Christian art the CRUCIFIXION: that is, the representation in painting or sculpture of the actual scene as an historical event. It is worth noting that it has never been held fitting to portray our Lord as dead. Death was swallowed up in victory, and the Saviour is shown as living. In the earliest examples there is not even any representation of suffering; the figure is simply extended on the cross, with head erect.

On this subject Canon Westcott's essay on The Relation of Christianity to Art, in his commentary on St. John's Epistles, may be consulted.

Cruden, ALEXANDER (1701-1770).—A native of Aberdeen, who would have been ordained a minister of the Scotch Church but for the development of symptoms of the lunacy which never entirely left him. In 1732 he went to London, and became a corrector for the press, and in 1737 published his famous Concordance, which still holds its ground as the best. The anxieties and expense of publication brought on such a paroxysm of his malady that he had to be placed in temporary confinement, and though his condition improved, he was continually doing and writing strange things. But in the matter of his Concordance his judgment never deserted him. He had undertaken it from no motive but deep and sincere love for the Bible, and it is pleasant to have to record that it was, after delay, so successful as to secure him a competence for life. He was always a man of holy, humble, devout, and benevolent life; and he was found dead on his knees, in the act of prayer.

Cruets.—Small vessels containing wine or water for liturgical purposes. In the Primitive Church the wine used for the Holy Eucharist was offered by the worshippers, and brought in cruets or flasks. At Charlton, in Wiltshire, the ancient custom is said to have been retained until 1638. "Each inhabitant, or at least each householder, made their own provision of bread and wine, and brought the same in several (i.e. separate) parcels, or divers pottle pots." Modern cruets, made of glass more or less elaborately mounted, are in use in some churches, and are to be identified with the "pot or stoup" of Canon 20.

* Though the history of this identical cross can be traced for a few more years, it at last vanishes from sight; and while scattered notices are found of other crosses claiming to be the true Cross, or portions of it, no credence can be given either to them or to the so-called relics which exist under the name.

Crusades.—The mediæval wars between the Christian nations of Western Europe and the Mahometans, and so called either as being Wars of the Cross (Lat. crux; Old Fr. crois) or because all who were engaged in them wore the badge of the Cross on their arms.

(1) The system of pilgrimages to the scenes of our Lord's life and death had been in existence almost, if not quite, from the beginning of Christianity, but especially so since the persecutions had ceased, and the Church had come into favour with the Imperial power of Rome. From that time Christians began to visit the holy places in large numbers, travelling together for the sake of safety and society. Pilgrim caravans were encouraged by some of the Emperors, such as Justinian, and provision was made for entertaining them hospitably at the public expense. They became so common that every large city in France and Italy provided itself with a hospital or hotel in Jerusalem or its neighbourhood for its own citizens when on their visits there. In A.D. 614 Chosroes I., the Persian invader of the Roman Empire in the East, took Jerusalem, and slaughtered its inhabitants. A few years later (A.D. 629), the Emperor Heraclius recovered it from the hands of the Persians; but it only remained seven years in those of the Christians, for the forces of Mahomet were now spreading themselves all over the East, and in A.D. 637 Jerusalem was compelled again to surrender to the Caliph Omar.

For about four centuries the caliphs and their successors kept possession of Judæa and Jerusalem. During that period pilgrimages still continued to be made, but under what restrictions there is no history to tell us. About the beginning of the eleventh century, however (A.D. 1010), Hakem, the founder of the Druses of the Lebanon, destroyed the churches, and endeavoured to destroy the Holy Sepulchre itself. He was a fierce persecutor of the Christians, and died a dark and mysterious death in the year 1021. Under his successor the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was once more rebuilt, but in A.D. 1077 the city itself passed into the possession of the Turks. This was the period when many influences combined to originate the crusades, among them the following:—

(1) There was a very widely diffused opinion, about the time when a thousand years had elapsed from our Lord's first advent, that He was on the eve of appearing a second time, and that the millennium was about to begin. In consequence of this opinion pilgrimages grew in number and frequency, although their danger had increased greatly under Turkish rule. Pilgrims were not admitted to the Holy City at all without the payment of a byzant (i.e. about twenty shillings) for each person; and very often, when the money had been paid, they were refused admission, unless some powerful European noble was among them to protect them. Some of the hardships which the Christians had thus to undergo are illustrated by the account given of the pilgrimage undertaken by Robert Duke of Normandy, the father of William the Conqueror, in A.D. 1035. He set off from home with a train of knights and barons, but walked barefoot as a pilgrim with a staff and wallet. For greater humiliation, he sent his attendants forward, and followed by himself in their path. But on his way through Asia Minor he was taken so ill that he was compelled to use a litter, on which he was carried by four Mahometans, who seem to have treated him with inhumanity, for he sent a message home by a returning pilgrim whom he met on the way in these words: "Tell my people thou hast met me where I was borne of devils to Paradise." On coming to the gates of Jerusalem, he found a great crowd of poor pilgrims unable to meet the expense of the fee exacted by the Mahometans for their entrance. For all of these he paid the byzant demanded, and then visited the holy places himself with devotion and reverence, dying shortly afterwards of poison at Nicæa, on his return to Europe.

(2) At this time also the Turks were exciting the fear as well as the hatred of Christians; for they were spreading their dominion in the most alarming manner. All over Asia and Africa the sign of the Crescent had supplanted the sign of the Cross; churches were destroyed, bishops murdered, and Christianity all but exterminated wherever they went. Having secured Cyprus, Candia, Sicily, and the southern coast of Italy, they extended their conquests to Spain, and even invaded the South of France. It seemed as if they would before long secure Rome itself, and found a Western Empire such as had been known under the Roman Emperors, but with the religion of Mahomet.

(3) There was one special pilgrimage which excited the commiseration of Christendom. The German Bishops of Mainz, Bamberg, Ratisbon, and Utrecht set off in 1064, followed by seven thousand persons of all ranks in society, and including, among others, Ingulph, English Secretary to William the Conqueror. In the following year two thousand survivors alone returned to their homes, reduced to poverty and misery by the cruelty of the Mahometans.

While these circumstances were all preparing the way for the Crusades, an individual arose capable of giving them point and application, and of taking the lead in avenging the wrongs of Christian pilgrims. A weakly, unimpressive-looking man made his appearance at Jerusalem as a pilgrim in 1094. He had been a soldier, but had retired from the army; and, seen to be leading a secluded life at Amiens, had become known among his neighbours as Peter the Hermit. Arriving at Jerusalem at the time when the Turks were in full possession of the city, his spirit was roused within him at the sight of the sepulchre of Christ in the hands of Antichrist, and at seeing the Anti-Christian crescent raising its head where the cross had such claims to ascendancy. He found that extortion and cruelty were decimating the Christians who came to offer their penitence and their prayers, that the churches lately rebuilt were again despoiled, and that nothing but insult and violence could be expected from the infidels. He consulted the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and concerted with him a plan for securing the aid of European kings, bishops, and peoples. Then, with an eloquence which excited all Europe, not only to religious fervour, but to alarm, as the real power and character of the Mahometans were understood, he called all the countries of the West to the rescue, and vast armies of volunteers appeared, who styled themselves the armies of the Lord.

The first outburst which Peter's eloquent exhortations and his denunciations of Mahometanism aroused, resulted in an expedition of an impatient, and therefore disorganised, character. An army of eighty thousand men started under his leadership, but for want of proper arrangements it was reduced to one-third by death and desertion on its way through Hungary, and nearly the whole of the remainder perished under the walls of Nicæa. But this dear-bought experience led to a regular and efficient force being sent out, under the generalship of Godfrey of Boulogne; his brother Baldwin; Hugo the Great, brother of the King of France; and Robert, son of William the Conqueror. The number of their armies amounted to a hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand, and this is called the First Crusade. Nicæa, Laodicea, and Antioch were taken, Christian rule was established in several important places, and the Holy City was recovered. Godfrey was crowned King of Jerusalem, and at his death, a year afterwards, his brother Baldwin was elected to succeed him. But the kingdom of Jerusalem was a mere garrison in an enemy's country.

St. Bernard in 1147 endeavoured to arouse the spirit of Europe to support the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, and a second expedition went forth. But treachery led to its failure, and only a small remnant returned to Europe. In 1187 the Holy City was given up to Saladin, and has never since been recovered from the Mahometans.

In the Third Crusade (A.D. 1187—92) our own Richard Cœur-de-Lion and Saladin were the most conspicuous personages. The Emperor of Germany, the King of France, and the King of England united their forces for the invasion of Palestine: but jealousies and divisions arose, and everything was ultimately left to Richard. If personal bravery could have effected the object in view, it would not have remained unaccomplished. As it was, however, the expedition ended in leaving the Holy City, as before, in the hands of the Mahometans.

Four other crusades were undertaken, in 1203, 1228, 1244, and 1270 respectively, the two last of which were led successively by the good and brave St. Louis and by Edward of England, afterwards Edward I. None after the first achieved any real triumph, and, as far as the direct object for which they were undertaken is concerned, all of them must be regarded as total and signal failures. On the other hand, it has been pointed out that if the Christian warriors had not taken their arms into Mahometan Asia, Christian Europe might have been brought under slavery. What the "Garden of the East" has become under the barbarous rule of Mahometanism is an indication of what our less fertile Europe would have become under the same deadening influence. The Crusaders were also the pioneers of commerce, since they opened up an extended intercourse between nation and nation. They helped to diffuse knowledge, and to make known those highways of travel which have proved so great an advantage to subsequent ages.

Crouched Friars, sometimes called Crouched Friars, an Order founded at Bologna in 1169. They wore a blue habit, and carried a staff surmounted by a cross; later they wore a cross of red cloth on their backs or breasts.

Cuby, St.—Cuby, Cybi, or Kebi, was a Cornish saint of royal blood, living in the sixth century; his father was Selyf, King of Cornwall, and his mother Gwen, sister to Nonna, the mother of St. David, the patron saint of Wales. Cuby resigned the Cornish crown to his brother, took holy orders, and visited first Wales, and then Ireland; returning to Wales, he was present at the synod of Llandewi Brefi, held by St. David shortly before 569; and he founded the churches of Llangybi, in the diocese of St. David's, and Llangybi, in that of Bangor, while the old name of Holyhead, Caergybi, indicates his presence there also.

Four churches are dedicated to St. Cuby in Cornwall,* one of which has given the saint's name also to the parish: that, namely, in which Tregoney stands, and where the saint is said to have made his chief abode; the others are Duloe, near Liskeard; Kenwyn, which is now a suburb of Truro; and Kea, or St. Kea, near the same city.

Cudworth, RALPH, D.D., born at Aller, in Somersetshire, 1617, died at Cambridge,

* St. Kew, near Wadebridge, formerly said to have its name from St. Cuby, really takes it from St. Kywa, virgin.

1688. In 1630 he was entered at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, took his M.A. in 1639, and became Fellow and Tutor of his college. Amongst his pupils may be mentioned Sir William Temple. In 1641 he became rector of North Cadbury, in Somersetshire, and in 1644 (in which year he became B.D.) he was made Master of Clare Hall, and the following year Regius Professor of Hebrew, when he gave himself up to the study of Jewish antiquities. He took his D.D. in 1651, and for a time left Cambridge, but returned in 1654, and became Master of Christ's College. In 1662 he was presented by the Bishop of London to the vicarage of Ashwell, in Hertfordshire, and in 1678 was made a prebendary of Gloucester. Cudworth takes a high place as an English philosopher and theologian, a place mainly won by his great work entitled, The True Intellectual System of the Universe. The germ of it had been published in two Latin theses which he put forth on taking his B.D. degree. It is this work which has caused a foremost place to be assigned to Cudworth in the ranks of those divines who are known as Cambridge Platonists [WHICHCOTE; MORRIS, HENRY; SMITH, JOHN], and sometimes as Latitudinarians. They stand between the Romanising and Puritan theologians of their time, not as trimming between them, but as endeavouring to find a common basis by searching for an eternal and unchangeable Morality at the bottom of all that is good, truthful, sincere. Cudworth called his book the "True Intellectual" system, because it is distinguished from physical systems of the universe, such as the Ptolemaic or Copernican; because it asserts that there are facts which transcend the material facts, that the unseen is greater than the visible. Hobbes, who was the fashionable philosopher of the time in consequence of his theory in favour of despotic power, as well as because of his necessitarian views, which sanctioned the corrupt morals of courtiers, had put forth his view of the Divine Being as a mere power, a view which sensibly leavened with evil the theology both of Catholic and Puritan; Cudworth asserted against him that morality is immutable, that the Will of God is essentially righteous, and that power is only its attribute and accident. It is this which forms his true canonisation among English moralists; for his protest against the low morality of his time, which infected not only published books but the popular preachers, made itself felt, though neither he nor his friends were ever powerful in the pulpit. Moreover, the striking way in which he was able to show that the best of the heathen moralists were on his side—witnesses, amidst all confusions and idolatries, for the righteousness of God—gave him great influence in the university which he represented.

His book, though written in 1678, remained unpublished for several years, in consequence of Court opposition; the second and third parts he left in manuscript. The second part, a Treatise on Eternal and Immutable Morality, was published by Bishop Chandler in 1731. Cudworth also published a notable treatise on the True Nature of the Lord's Supper, and another, The Union of Christ and the Church Shadowed. Some of his manuscripts are in the British Museum; and it is to the discredit of his university that they have never been published. He died in 1688, in his seventy-first year, and is buried in Christ's College, Cambridge.

Culdees.—An ancient religious order in Ireland and North Britain. The etymology of the name is doubtful; some suppose it to come from the Gaelic kill, "a cell," and dee, "a house," and to imply that they were dwellers in a cell-house; but there is nothing in their habits to bear out this supposition. It is more likely to be derived from the Celtic colle-dé, servus Dei, Latinised into colidei. This appears to have been the earliest order of monks among the Celts of Britain, and the name was in course of time given to all, whether in Scotland, Ireland, or Wales, who gave up the secular life for the religious. The head of the original order was the Abbot of Iona, but he ceased to be so as the order spread far and wide over Great Britain. Dr. Hook says that they included also cathedral canons, who were frequently married, but lived near their cathedral, with an abbot or prior at their head. Some of the Scottish cathedrals, e.g. St. Andrew's and Dunblane, were entirely served by them. Though originally independent of Rome, they came in course of time to adopt Roman customs as the other monks did, under the centralising influence of the Middle Ages. All trace of them disappears after the thirteenth century. An interesting account of the Culdees will be found in Mr. Skene's Celtic Scotland, vol. ii.

Cumberland Presbyterians.—An American body of Christians, founded in Kentucky in 1797, in consequence of the earnest preaching of a Presbyterian revivalist, James MacGready. The demand made for ministers was so great that the Cumberland Presbytery ordained men who were not entirely capable of meeting the requirements of the Synod of Kentucky. That synod having, in consequence, dissolved the presbytery, and many attempts at reconciliation having failed, the presbytery declared itself an independent body. It has spread out into many branches, and now numbers some 1,400 ministers and 130,000 members.

Cumming, JOHN, D.D. (1810-1881).—A minister of the Established Church of Scotland, who in his time enjoyed great popularity as an interpreter of Biblical prophecy, and was the author of many other religious books, chiefly against the Church of Rome. For many years he was minister of the Presbyterian Church, Crown Court, London.

Cummins, GEORGE DAVID, D.D. (b. 1822, d. 1876).—The originator of a division in the Episcopal Church of America. He was educated as a Methodist, but in 1846 was ordained in the Episcopal Church, and after a twenty years' ministry, was elected assistant Bishop of Kentucky. He had long been regarded as the leader of the Evangelical party in the Church, and he now set before himself two objects—the revision of the Prayer Book, and union with other Evangelical bodies; but being disappointed in the hopes he had formed, and being called to account for receiving the Communion with other denominations, in a form not that of the Church to which he belonged (Oct., 1873), he wrote to his senior bishop, declaring that he had given up hope of his Church, and must retire from its ministry. He was declared deposed from his office, and thenceforward began the movement which resulted in the REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH (q.v.).

Curate.—One to whom the cure of souls is given—that is to say, the incumbent of a parish; and in this, the correct and etymological sense, the word is used all through the Prayer Book and its rubrics: as "our Bishops and Curates, and all congregations committed to their charge." The incumbent of a French parish is still the curé, while his assistant, also with a correct etymology, is his vicaire, thus exactly reversing our familiar use of the same words in their English form.

The common modern use of the word "curate" is to describe, not the incumbent himself, but the cleric who is licensed to act under him; and, as such, it is a shortened expression for the term "assistant-curate," which is often, and should be always, used in the licences. [CURE OF SOULS.] Assistant-curates subdivide into two classes:—

(1) Assistant-curates where the incumbent is not resident. These are the only clerics of the kind really of old standing. They represent the mediæval "parish priests" [Johnson's English Canons, ii. 38], who took the duty of incumbents unable to officiate for themselves. One very frequent cause of this inability was the want of proper Orders, as appears even from the name given to the officiant, which, if the incumbent had been himself a priest, would not have become so common as it was. Thus it was with Dean Colet of St. Paul's, in his earlier days [COLER], and with John Chapel, the Rector of Ambrosden, near Bicester, who from 1303 to his death, in 1336, was never more than an Acolyte (q.v.). Now, however, by the Act of Uniformity, an incumbent must be a priest. The curates here spoken of were first statutorily recognised by 13 Anne, c. 11, which ordered (in confirmation of canon 48) the bishop's licence and regulated their stipends. These were again, and are now, regulated by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 106.

(2) Assistant-curates to resident incumbents. These can hardly be said to have existed, except in London and other large towns, before about 1830. A return made to Parliament in 1831 showed that the number of assistant-curates was nearly the same as that of non-resident incumbents. The causes which have led to the increase of the former are chiefly the growth of population, and the increased work undertaken by the clergy from a deeper sense of their responsibilities.

For Stipendiary Curate see PERPETUAL CURATE.

Cure of Souls.—The cure of the souls of men is committed to every priest at his ordination, but this right is not exercised by every priest. The right itself is called "Habitual Jurisdiction;" the exercise of the right, "Actual Jurisdiction;" and the generic term for the granting of either is "Mission." Thus, the mission of a bishop for the cure of souls within his diocese is his confirmation and consecration, and that of a priest for the cure of souls within his parish is his institution to that parish by the bishop, who, having himself the ultimate cure of souls throughout his whole diocese, commits different portions of that one cure to different priests. As it is expressed in the deed of institution, "the cure and government of the souls of the parishioners of the said parish" is in this way committed to the instituted priest, who is then "the curate" in the proper sense. [CURATE.]

Cureton, WILLIAM, D.D. (b. 1808, d. 1864), a learned Syriac and Oriental scholar, for the last fifteen years of his life Canon of Westminster and Rector of St. Margaret's. He was born at Westbury, in Shropshire, educated at Newport, and at the age of eighteen went with a Carewell exhibition to Oxford, where he became a servitor to make up for the loss of income which was occasioned to the family by his father's death. He took his degree in 1830, was ordained deacon in 1831 and priest in 1832. He was made one of the Select Preachers of the University of Oxford in 1840. In 1847 he became Chaplain to the Queen, and in 1849 was appointed Canon of Westminster, Rural Dean, and Rector of St. Margaret's. He took the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Divinity in 1858. Since 1830 he had devoted much time to the study of Oriental languages, and for this reason was chosen in 1837 to be Assistant-Keeper of the Manuscripts at the British Museum, giving up for this the post he had hitherto held as Under-Librarian to the Bodleian Library. His duties at the British Museum consisted in compiling a descriptive catalogue of the Arabic works, the first part of which was published in 1846. He had also collected material for the second part, but resigned his post in 1850. To him the task was assigned of classifying the volumes of the "Nitrian Collection," MSS. brought by Dr. Tattam from the monastery of St. Mary, Deipara, in 1841 and 1843. He published the letters of St. Ignatius, with a preface in which he expressed his opinion that this was the first instance in which they had been published in their original form, all previous editions having been much altered from the real works of St. Ignatius; and this preface was the cause of much controversy among students of theology. Other works edited by Dr. Cureton were:—Fragments of the Iliad, in 1851; The Ecclesiastical History of John, Bishop of Ephesus, in 1853; The History of the Martyrs in Palestine, by Eusebius of Cæsarea, in 1858. He also published, in 1855, his Spicilegium Syriacum. His knowledge of Oriental languages procured him memberships in various societies of which these were the study; at his death he was Foreign Associate of the Institute of France, Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and member of several other societies. In 1859 the Queen appointed him to be Crown Trustee of the British Museum. In May, 1863, he met with a railway accident, from the effects of which he died at Westminster, June 17th, 1864.

Curia Romana.—The body of officials which forms the Papal Court, consisting of the congregations of cardinals and the Cardinal Secretary of State, who is the Pope's Prime Minister, and through whom all communications are carried on between the Holy See and foreign Powers.

Curative.—A term derived from the Latin curro, frequentative of curro, "to run," "to flow;" and applied to the later Greek and Latin manuscripts, which were written in a running hand, and in smaller characters than the earlier manuscripts, known as UNCIALS (q.v.). [BIBLE; CODEX.]

Cursor.—In primitive times, when persecution was rife, and it was dangerous for Christians to make known the time and place of their meetings, the cursor was one who went from house to house to apprise the faithful of them.

Cuthbert, Sr., was born among the Picts in the Border country. He was of humble parentage, and his youth was spent in the occupation of a shepherd, but he afterwards received, it is said, a Divine vision, which induced him to apply for admission to the monastery of Melrose. This monastery was an offspring of Lindisfarne, but was now sending out branches of its own. In course of time Cuthbert became Prior of Melrose, and took much part in the question of the tonsure [TONSURE], a question which became important, as marking a distinction between the native monks and those who followed the Roman manner. Cuthbert seems to have favoured the national mode, but to have counselled acceptance of the Roman for the sake of peace. Accordingly, he went to the monastery of Lindisfarne to enforce this advice, and, having done so, he took up his abode at Lindisfarne for several years. For nine years, the ascetic disposition of his mind growing upon him, he was a hermit in one of the islands near Lindisfarne. In 684 he was elected Bishop of Hogshead, but declined the office. However, the same year he accepted the bishopric of Lindisfarne, and held it two years, after which he returned to his lonely hermitage to die—an event which took place March 20th, 687. He lies buried in Durham Cathedral.

Cyprian, Sr., was born in or near Carthage, about the year 200, and became famous as a teacher of rhetoric in that city. He did not embrace Christianity until somewhat late in life. At his baptism, he took, in addition to his former name, Cyprian Thascius, that of Cæcilius, who had influenced his conversion, and who afterwards, on his death-bed, left his wife and children in Cyprian's charge. The latter was soon ordained to the offices of deacon and presbyter; and three years later, when the see of Carthage fell vacant, he was elected bishop unanimously by the people, though five presbyters were opposed to the election. Cyprian endeavoured, after his consecration, to reform abuses which had long existed within the diocese; but after two years the persecution under Decius forced him to take refuge at a place not far off, where he remained for fourteen months. During this time he kept up a constant communication with the Church, encouraging his people to hold fast their faith, and not to renounce it, as many did, with the prospect of being allowed, when the storm was over, to return to the Church.

Upon his return to the city, in 251, he summoned a council to decide the question as to the method of dealing with the penitent apostates known as "the Lapsed," and with Libellatics—those who by payment have obtained false certificates of having sacrificed to the gods. The most extreme views were taken. Some were for re-admitting them immediately, others for refusing them finally. Cyprian took a middle view, that of re-admission after a lengthened penance, and this view became eventually that of the whole Christian Church. Great disorders were at this time caused by the NOVATIAN SCHISM (q.v.), against which Cyprian had to write much whilst he was fighting another evil that tormented his flock. For at this time the plague was raging throughout the Roman Empire, and Cyprian devoted himself to nursing the sick, burying the dead, and encouraging those who were faint-hearted. In 253 he was engaged in a controversy with the Bishops of Numidia concerning baptism by heretics, in which he maintained that the sacrament should be re-administered to those who had not been baptised by a member of the Church. Stephen, the Bishop of Rome, combated this opinion, and indeed broke off communion with the African Church; but Cyprian held his ground, acknowledging the honour due to the bishop of so great a city as Rome, but not acknowledging any power of the bishop over himself. In 257 Valerian set on foot a persecution of the Christians, and Cyprian was brought before the Proconsul Paternus. He declared himself a Christian and a bishop, steadily refused to sacrifice, or to disclose the names of his clergy; whereupon he was banished with Pontius to Curubis, a place at some distance from Carthage. Here he remained for a year, in communication with his flock, until the arrival of a new proconsul, Galerius; he was then commanded to remain in his gardens near Carthage. Thence he was taken for his trial to a place about four miles from the city, on Sept. 13th, 258. He again refused to sacrifice, in spite of earnest entreaties from the magistrate, and was finally condemned as being "a ringleader in impiety against the gods of Rome, and having resisted the attempts made by the Emperors to reclaim him." He was condemned to be beheaded, and the sentence was carried out at once, in the presence of his sorrowing people. His works are published in Clark's Ante-Nicene Christian Library. They comprise about eighty Epistles and some Discourses, "On the Vanity of Idols," "On Virginity," "On the Lapsed," "On the Unity of the Church," "On the Lord's Prayer," "On Mortality," etc. etc. Lactantius calls him "the first eloquent Christian writer." His manner is formed on that of Tertullian, but is not so rough and violent. But his works are chiefly valuable for the light which they throw on the government and belief of the Church of his day.

Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, succeeded Maximus in that office in 350. He seems at first to have had Arian tendencies; but when he broke with the Arians they procured his banishment, and St. Jerome informs us that he had but eight years' peaceable possession of his see. He assisted at the second General Council of Constantinople in the year 381, and died in March, 386. His Catecheses, or Catechetical Lectures, are extant, and are valuable for the light they throw on the doctrines and practices of the ancient Church. Some other tracts which go under his name in the Bibliotheca Patrum are mostly spurious.

Cyril, Sr., Patriarch of Alexandria, was born in that city in the latter part of the fourth century. For some years he lived as a monk in the Nitrian mountains, but in 411 was called to succeed his mother's brother, Theophilus, in the Patriarchal Chair of Alexandria, and, like him, at once showed himself fierce against anything which appeared unorthodox or irregular. He was no sooner installed than he drove the Novatians out of the city, and deprived their bishop, Theopompus, of his personal property. Soon after, the Jews having insulted the Christians at Alexandria, he put himself at the head of the Christians, ousted the Jews from their synagogue, and suffered the Christians to plunder them. He also encouraged the tumult which led to the murder of the beautiful and chaste Hypatia, the heathen philosopher. These deeds brought him into collision with the Imperial Governor of Alexandria, Orestes; the city was split into two parties, and 600 monks, marching in a body against Orestes to revenge some slight, wounded him in his coach.

But the most important epoch in the life of Cyril is his controversy with Nestorius. [NESTORIUS.] The controversy, begun at Constantinople, reached Egypt, the party of Nestorius having conveyed his sermons thither; and some Egyptian monks having declared on that side, Cyril wrote in 429 a treatise against him. Both parties appealed to the Emperor (Theodosius II.), and to the Bishop of Rome, Celestine. The latter convoked a synod at Rome (Aug., 430), and here the doctrine of Nestorius was condemned, whereupon Celestine wrote to Cyril, authorising him to excommunicate and depose Nestorius, unless he should recant within ten days. Cyril thereupon convened a synod at Alexandria, and anathematised any who should deny to the Virgin Mary the title of "Mother of God." Nestorius replied with a counter-anathema, and as the contest had now gone to extremity, the Emperor gave notice (Nov. 19th, 430) for the assembling of the third Ecumenical Council, to meet on the Whitsuntide next ensuing. The meeting-place was to be Ephesus, that city being between Constantinople and Alexandria, and, moreover, being the place where the Virgin was believed to have died. [EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF.] John, Bishop of Antioch, and the other Eastern bishops, then held a synod of their own, and deposed Cyril, and the Emperor's Court for a while confirmed this deposition as well as that of Nestorius. But by the mediation of Paul, Bishop of Emesa, a reconciliation was effected between Cyril and the Eastern bishops. Nestorius was banished, and his writings publicly burnt. Cyril held his see till his death, A.D. 444. A lively description of the times of Cyril is found in Charles Kingsley's novel Hypatia.

The works of Cyril, with a Latin translation, were collected in 7 vols. by John Aubert, Canon of Laon, in 1638. The first contains his books concerning the worship of God in spirit and in truth, and his Glaphyra, an exposition of the Pentateuch. The second contains his Commentary on Isaiah, the third that on the minor prophets, and the fourth that on St. John; the fifth and sixth take in his Thesaurus, the Dialogues upon the Trinity and Incarnation, and his Homilies and Epistles. The last gives the Tracts against Nestorius, against Julian and the Anthropomorphites, and a treatise on the Doctrine of the Trinity.

Cyril (LUCAR), born in Candia in the sixteenth century, was made Patriarch of Alexandria in 1602, and of Constantinople in 1621. He published a Confession of Faith of the Greek Church, which agrees in most points with the principles of the Reformation. Pope Urban VIII., being informed of these proceedings, and of his sending some Greek priests into Holland, left no stone unturned to countermine him, and the Jesuits prevailed so far with the Turks as to bring him several times in danger of his life in 1628; at last they got him deposed and banished, Anastasius, a Candiote, a person of bad reputation, being put in his place. But this man's character became so notorious that Cyril was restored to his see. However, being still persecuted by his old enemies, he was put in prison, and strangled by order of the Sultan in 1638. His Confession of Faith was afterwards printed in England. There is no question that he was eager and sincere in his love for his Church, and desired to conform it to the primitive faith, and to bring it into closer union with the English Church. He entered into correspondence with its leading divines—e.g. with Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury—sent youths to England to be educated, and started a printing-press. But unfortunately, no one was found to succeed him, and the only result of his work was the memory of his good example, of his purity of purpose, and of his dauntless courage. He is specially entitled to the gratitude of Englishmen for having presented to King Charles I. the famous Alexandrian Manuscript (Codex A), which is now in the British Museum.

Cyril and Methodius. [METHODIUS.]

Da Costa, ISAAC (b. 1798, d. 1860), a Jew—born in Holland, but of Portuguese family—of brilliant abilities and learning. He was converted to Christianity about the time of his majority, and became a powerful Christian apologist. His most important work is an answer to Strauss's Life of Christ, entitled The Four Witnesses. He was also a highly esteemed poet.

Dailé, JEAN, a Protestant minister at Charenton, near Paris, born at Chatellerault, Jan. 6th, 1594. He was designed for secular employment, but his inclination led him otherwise. He studied at Poitiers and Saumur, and in 1619 travelled with the grandchildren of the Sieur Philip du Plessis Mornay into Italy, Germany, Holland, and England. He was much importuned by the famous Father Paul Sarpi to settle at Venice, but declined to do so, and in 1623 was received as a Protestant minister by the Sieur du Plessis, who shortly afterwards died in his arms, and whose memoirs Dailé next year edited. He was afterwards minister at Saumur, and then at Charenton, and died in Paris, April 15th, 1670, aged seventy-six. His greatest work is his De Usu Patrum, which was translated into English, and has lately been reprinted. He also wrote a treatise to prove St. Ignatius's epistles counterfeit, and was answered by Bishop Pearson in his Vindicie, etc.

Daily Service.—It was the intention of the Church of England, in the framing of the Prayer Book, that Divine Service should be performed on every day in the year. The Preface to the Prayer Book says:—"And all Priests and Deacons are to say Daily the Morning and Evening Prayer, either privately or openly, not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause. And the Curate that ministereth in every Parish Church or Chapel, being at home, and not otherwise reasonably hindered, shall say the same in the Parish Church where he ministereth, and shall cause a bell to be tolled thereunto a convenient time before he begin, that the people may come to hear God's Word, and to pray with him." The Morning and Evening Services are called "Daily," and the Calendar appoints Daily Lessons. The custom had almost disappeared at the beginning of this century, except in cathedrals, and the revival was even objected to, on the ground that it "encouraged formalism." But so late as the early part of the eighteenth century it was very common, and it has now become the rule in most of our large towns and in many villages.

Dalmatic.—An ecclesiastical vestment—namely, the special tunic worn by the Deacon, or Gospeller, but differing very little from that which the Sub-deacon, or Epistoler, wears. The general form of the vestment is that of a loose frock with large round sleeves (not pointed, like those of a surplice), and partly open at the lower part of the sides; it differs chiefly from the surplice in being somewhat more richly embroidered, and sometimes rather longer.

The name is said to be derived from Dalmatia, the clergy of which were the first to generally adopt it; and mention is found of it as early as the time of St. Cyprian, about A.D. 250. It was also worn at coronation by mediæval Sovereigns, in token of the ecclesiastical character which they were considered to bear. Thus Walsingham, in his account of Richard II.'s coronation, mentions his investiture with "the dalmatic of St. Edward (the Confessor)," and even with a stole [Maskell, Mon. Rit., iii., xxxii.]. When Edward I.'s tomb was opened in 1774, he was found to be vested in a red silk dalmatic, with a white stole crossed on the breast. [Maskell, iii., lxxv.] The old Emperors of Germany were considered to hold the order of sub-deacon, and Maximilian (grandfather of Charles V.) is said to have often officiated as such at mass.

"The Tunicle," says Palmer, "called tunica, dalmatica, tunicolla, etc., in the West, was used in the earliest ages of the Christian Church. Originally it had no sleeves, and was then often called Colobium. The garment used by deacons in the Greek Church and all the East, and called Sticharion, seems to be the ancient Colobium. It is said that wide sleeves were added to the Colobium about the fourth century in the West, which thenceforth was often called Dalmatic; and when used by sub-deacons, Tunicle. But the shape of the garment was the same, by whomsoever it was worn. In the Middle Ages several distinctions were made relative to the use of the tunic by bishops and others; but the Greek and Eastern Churches do not use the sleeved tunic, and with them no such distinctions are in existence. The tunic was made of the same sort of materials, etc., as the cope and vestment; and the English Ritual directs it to be used by the assistant-ministers in the Holy Communion." [Orig. Lit., ii. 403.]

Damasus I., Pope of Rome, was a Spaniard. On the death of Pope Liberius, A.D. 366, the greater portion of the clergy and laity elected Damasus to succeed him, but Ursicinus, a deacon, was chosen Anti-Pope by a faction, and in the conflict one hundred and thirty-seven persons were murdered in a single day. Damasus was confirmed in the chair by the Emperor Valentinian, and the Anti-Pope was banished the city. However, he still had supporters, both at home and in the provinces, notably the Bishops of Puzoli and Parma, who, other means failing, suborned witnesses to accuse Damasus of adultery, of which charge he was cleared in an assembly of forty-four bishops, and at length he obtained free possession of the see. He called councils against the Arians and against Apollinarius, summoning the Eastern bishops to this synod by the name of sons, but they wrote back to him, and the other bishops assembled there, giving him and them no other title than that of brethren and colleagues. In his time was held the second General Council of Constantinople. He is said to have introduced the singing of psalms into the Western Church. His great work was the reopening of the Roman Catacombs, which had been closed by the Christians in the days of persecution. Damasus removed the rubbish which blocked up the entrances, made easier passages from one part to another, and, having diligently sought out the resting-places of the martyrs, had inscriptions placed over them, hundreds of which still remain. St. Jerome was his attached friend and secretary. He died in 385. A few of his letters remain.

Damiani, PETER (b. 1007, d. 1072), Cardinal and Bishop of Ostia, was a very strict Benedictine, and exerted himself strongly against the scandalous vices of the age. His Liber Gomorrhæus was so full of frightful charges against the clergy of the time, that, though it was dedicated to Pope Leo IX., the next Pope, under pretence of getting it copied, obtained possession of the MS., and would not let Damiani have it again. It appears from Damiani's letters (Ep. 13, Lib. 5), that there were ecclesiastics in his time who held it lawful for priests to be married; and though these were less profligate than the rest, the fact does not seem to have even suggested to the stern Benedictine that a relaxation from the celibate rule might have been for good. He used the most extravagant language in praise of the Blessed Virgin, and was enthusiastic in his advocacy of flagellation as a penance. [See Roberts, Ch. Hist., ii. 577.] In 1059, Pope Nicholas II. sent him as legate to Milan, to reform the simoniacal practices of that Church. Pope Alexander II. likewise sent him as legate into France, to take up the difference between the Bishop of Monte Casino and the Abbot of Cluny, concerning the privileges of that abbey. In 1068 he went as legate into Germany, to prevent the Emperor Henry's divorce from his wife Bertha. He died in 1072. His works are in 4 vols.; the first contains letters, the second sermons, the third opuscula, or small tracts; the fourth prayers, hymns, etc. He wrote with great ease, perspicuity, and force.

Damnatory Clauses.—An expression sometimes, but not very correctly, applied to the second and last verses of the Athanasian Creed. It would be more accurate to call them Minatory (warning), or Monitory (exhorting) clauses. It has been urged concerning them that they are intended to express the infinite importance to the soul of a right knowledge of God. "This is life eternal," said our Lord, "that they should know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." Those who thus defend the clauses in question urge that it is altogether false to say that it matters not what a man believes, provided his actions are honest; the very fact of a revelation of God indicating that the acceptance of that revelation in its entirety is for the soul's health. On the other hand, it is not denied that the clauses have given distress to many faithful sons of the Church, who have interpreted them as declaring that pious Unitarians and others, including men whom Christians of all denominations delight to honour, are outside the pale of salvation. To meet such feelings as these, the Convocation of Canterbury in 1879 made the following declaration :—

"For the removal of doubts, and to prevent disquietude in the use of the Creed commonly called the Creed of St. Athanasius, it is hereby solemnly declared—

"(1) That the Confession of our Christian Faith, commonly called the Creed of St. Athanasius, doth not make any addition to the faith as contained in Holy Scripture, but warneth against errors which from time to time have arisen in the Church of Christ.

"(2) That, as Holy Scripture in divers places doth promise life to them that believe, and declare the condemnation of them that believe not, so doth the Church, in this Confession, declare the necessity for all who would be in a state of salvation of holding fast the Catholic faith, and the great peril of rejecting the same. Wherefore, the warnings in this Confession of Faith are to be understood no otherwise than the like warnings of Holy Scripture; for we must receive God's threatenings, even as His promises, in suchwise as they are generally set forth in Holy Writ. Moreover, the Church doth not herself pronounce judgment on any particular person or persons, God alone being the Judge of all."

Dancers.—A sect of fanatics, which arose at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1373, whence they spread through the districts of Liège, Hainault, and other parts of Flanders. Persons of both sexes would suddenly commence dancing in the streets, houses, and even churches. Holding each other's hands, they would whirl round and round with extraordinary velocity, and continue hour after hour, till they dropped from sheer exhaustion and suffocation; they affirmed that during this violent agitation they were favoured with wonderful visions. These dancers wandered about from place to place, begging their subsistence, and they treated the priesthood, and worship, and rites of the Church with the utmost contempt, so that the ignorant clergy looked on this frenzy as the work of evil spirits, whom they endeavoured to exorcise by singing hymns, and by applying fumigations of incense during these mad performances, and they believed that their work was successful in vanquishing the devil. In the fifteenth century this religious dancing again made its appearance, but it was now looked upon as a malady which might be cured by the aid of the Church. When it appeared at Strasburg in 1418, the dancers were sent to St. Vitus's Chapel at Rotestein, where mass was celebrated for them; this circumstance was the origin of our name "St. Vitus's Dance," applied to an affection of the nerves.

Daniel, Bishop of Winchester, succeeded Bishop Hedda in 703. The death of the latter prelate was followed by the division of the see, the mother portion retaining the old name; the new division received the name of Sherborne, and in process of time became known as the diocese of Salisbury.

Bishop Daniel was one of the most learned of English prelates, his acquaintance with sacred literature being such that the Venerable Bede received great assistance from him, and acknowledged it in the preface to his History. Daniel himself wrote a History of his Province, Deeds of the West Saxons, a History of the Isle of Wight, and Lives of Bishop Cedd and of Aldhelm. But the only works of his surviving are some letters to the great St. Boniface, his pupil and friend, on the true method of converting the heathen. Daniel made a devout pilgrimage to Rome in 721, where he is said to have subscribed a declaration against any who marry "women consecrated to God." In 744 he resigned his see, "to the end," says the historian, "that he might conclude his long-lasting age in quiet repose." He became a monk of Malmesbury, where he died the next year.

Dante Alighieri, the first and greatest of Italian poets, claims a place in this volume, since not only was he a great author and politician, but he had also a profound effect upon mediæval theology. The nations which rose amid the ruins of ancient Europe emerged slowly out of barbarism into civilization. Italy was well in advance of the other nations. The nobles lived in fortified castles, surrounded by villages of oppressed serfs; the bishops were territorial lords, but the people of the cities preserved much of the ancient Roman liberty and self-government. The Italian cities became rich, proud, enterprising, and powerful. The German Emperors called themselves, and indeed were, successors of the ancient Cæsars, and their dominion was known as the Holy Roman Empire. They were, further, Kings of Italy. But the Italians hated them as foreigners, and would have, early enough, become free of them, but that they were so frequently quarrelling with each other, and at such times the weaker party invited the aid of the Kaiser, and so the subjugation was perpetuated. This want of unity continued to be the bane of Italy right down to the nineteenth century. When Pope Gregory VII. began the struggle with the Emperors, which lasted in one form or another to the Reformation, the population of the cities, on the whole, took the side of the Pontiffs, whilst the feudal nobles generally declared themselves in favour of the Imperial cause. The partisans of the Emperors were called Ghibellines, those of the Popes Guelphs, both names being derived from two rival houses in Germany. And thus the Italian Republics became, some Guelph, some Ghibelline, and fierce quarrels over and over again turned fair fields and beautiful cities into scenes of blood. In 1282 Florence, then one of the largest cities of Italy, with a large army and a population of 100,000, formed for itself a new constitution. It had two hundred cloth manufactories, and more than one hundred banks. The Florentines issued a new coin, called after them the florin, and its existence among us is a memorial, six hundred years later, of the ancient wealth of Florence. At the head of the new constitution were to be three Priors (chiefs); and at the age of thirty-five, in 1300, Dante was elected to one of these offices. He had been well educated, had lost his father at ten, had been brought up by keen politicians as a Guelph. The trials and excitements of his life belong to general biography; we have only to chronicle that his political conduct displeased his fellow-citizens, and in 1302 he was banished from Florence. In bitterness of spirit he went into a life of exile, and never returned to his native city. He had been a Guelph: he was now a zealous Ghibelline; and in 1310 he wrote to the Emperor Henry VII. urging him to turn his arms against Florence. The attempt was made, and failed. Dante went to Paris, probably to Oxford, to Avignon, to Ravenna, and at this last town he ended his life, on Sept. 14th, 1321, at the age of fifty-six. The Florentines had offered to take him back if he would appear among them in penitent's garb, but he rejected the offer with proud disdain. At Ravenna he wrote his Paradiso, as well as a devout treatise on the Psalms, a work of pious resignation and consolation, laying his cause before God for judgment, but confessing himself sinful and weak. The Florentines made several attempts to obtain his ashes, but Ravenna refused to part with the precious relic of her hospitality to the great exile. The Florentines have made him the best amends they could, by setting up a beautiful monument to him, although his bones lie elsewhere.

In his childhood Dante had seen a beautiful girl, Beatrice Portinari. Her image remained with him, the remembrance of her kept him virtuous, and in his dreams he beheld her radiant. His first poems were addressed to her. She died in 1290, but her memory still inspired his genius, and he represented her in his great poem as guiding him through the circles of heaven. That poem, the Divina Commedia, consists of one hundred cantos. The first is introductory; then come three times thirty-three, in allusion to the years of Our Lord's life on earth. These describe, separately, the three regions of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. First he descends into hell, under the guidance of Virgil, who is represented as almost a Christian, and who has such charms and power as to overawe the various demons and monsters that they meet. They descend through nine successive circles of horror, in each one finding criminals suffering for particular sins: in one covetousness, in others sacrilege, murder, treachery, ingratitude, and so on. The reality is brought out by the vision of one and another perpetrator of special deeds of horror recorded in history, and among them the poet fails not to recognise some of the Popes. The visitors emerge at length, and come to the mountain of Purgatory. This Purgatory is not—what popular Romanism at least has made it—a place of sordid traffic. It is a place such as Plato and Pythagoras imagined, where sinners, still capable of better things, can be purified from their evil. It has seven terraces, each adapted for the expiation of the seven great sins. The poet travels during the night, and in the morning reaches Paradise. But between it and himself rolls the river of Lethe; suddenly his lost Beatrice appears, and helps him to cross it. She reveals the future destiny of the Church, and darkly predicts some future events. The Paradise, the ideal of which is drawn from the Ptolemaic system, is divided into nine spheres wheeling round the earth. Beatrice conducts him through them all, and he holds converse with sainted spirits.

That Dante was an orthodox Catholic is clear; he followed closely the scholastic divinity. But he was also a vehement hater of the worldliness and corruption of the Church, and longed as earnestly as Savonarola for its Reformation. One Jesuit Father says that he might have been taken for a disciple of Wicliffe. As he walked about the streets of Ravenna, it is said that the children pointed at him with awe-struck faces, and whispered, "There goes the man that has been in hell."

Darboy, GEORGE, Archbishop of Paris, was born at Fayl-Billot, Haute-Marne, on Jan. 16th, 1813. He studied with great success at the Seminary of Langres, and took holy orders in 1836, when he was named Vicar of Saint Dixier. Three years later he was appointed to the Chair of Philosophy at Langres, and in 1841 to that also of Dogmatical Theology. In 1846, in consequence of the seminary being confided to a religious Order, M. Darboy left the diocese and went to Paris, where Archbishop Affre obtained for him the appointment of Almoner of the Collège Henri IV. and Honorary Canon of Notre Dame. M. Sibour, the next Archbishop, charged him with the direction of the Moniteur Catholique, but he gave it up for a mission for the inspection of religious instruction in the colleges of the diocese. In November, 1864, he accompanied the Archbishop to Rome, and was presented to the Pope, who conferred upon him the title of Apostolical Protonotary. In 1855 he was named titular Vicar-General of Notre Dame, and in 1859 became Bishop of Nancy. In 1863 he succeeded Sibour as Archbishop of Paris. He endeavoured to suppress the Jesuits, and voted against the dogma of Papal Infallibility, though he afterwards submitted to it. During the Franco-Prussian War he was very energetic in carrying out schemes for the relief of the sick and wounded. He was arrested by the Communists on April 4th, 1871, and kept as a hostage in the prison of La Roquette. Finding that the defeat of their insurrection was a certainty, these wretches, between seven and eight o'clock on the evening of Wednesday, May 24th, barbarously shot him, with the Curé of the Madeleine, and sixty other hostages. He died in the attitude of blessing his murderers. M. Darboy was the author of The Women of the Bible, Holy Women, and a translation of de Imitatione Christi, all illustrated, and marked with the stamp of a refined literary taste and great learning.

D'Aubigné, JEAN HENRY MERLE (b. at Geneva in 1794, d. 1872).—An eminent divine and Church historian. His father was Louis Merle, a merchant, whose grandfather having married a Mdle. D'Aubigné, of a distinguished French Protestant family, that name was added, according to Swiss custom, to the original surname. D'Aubigné completed his education at Berlin, where he studied Church history under Neander, and he was chosen pastor to the French Church in Hamburg, whence he went to Brussels, where he became famous as a preacher. In 1830 came the Belgian Revolution, in consequence of which he returned to his native land; but, dissatisfied with the course things were taking in the national Genevese Church, he separated from it, and was chosen to fill the Chair of Church History in the college at Geneva founded by the Evangelical Society. In 1835 he published the first part of his great work, the History of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century, which became very popular, especially in Britain and America. In Scotland there was an immense circulation of the book, and in 1856 the city of Edinburgh conferred on him its freedom. Two hundred thousand copies of the English translation are said to have been sold in Great Britain alone. He married an Irish lady in 1858. D'Aubigné also published The Protector (a vindication of the character of Cromwell), Germany, England, and Scotland; or, Recollections of a Swiss Minister, besides many tracts on ecclesiastical and theological matters. His history, though very frequently it is somewhat enthusiastic in its partisanship, is full of valuable information, and thoroughly in sympathy with the deep religious earnestness which unquestionably characterised the sixteenth century.

Davenant, JOHN (b. 1572), Bishop of Salisbury, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen a Fellow in 1597, and took his D.D. in 1609. About that time he was appointed Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, and was one of the University Preachers in 1609 and 1612. In 1614 he was elected president of his college, which office he held till 1621. Having attracted the notice of James I., he was sent, in 1618, to the Synod of Dort, where he was a warm supporter of the supra-lapsarian doctrine. He was appointed Bishop of Salisbury in 1621. In Lent 1630-1, he preached before the King at Whitehall a sermon in which he advanced his Calvinistic notions about predestination—a subject into which, at the suggestion of Laud, the King had declared “all curious search should be laid aside.” Davenant was in consequence summoned before the Privy Council, from which he was in the end dismissed, with a caution not to infringe again the royal mandate against the introduction of those errors into the pulpit, but he was never fully re-admitted into favour at court. He died in 1641. He left several benefactions to his college. His published works are:—Expositio Epistolæ D. Pauli ad Colossenses; Prælectiones de duobus in Theol.; Controversiæ capitibus; de Judio Controversiarum, primo; de Justitia habituali et actuali, altero, etc. (all of these being the substance of his lectures as Lady Margaret Professor); Determinationes Questionum quarundam Theologicarum, being the questions, forty-nine in number, on which he had disputed in the schools; and an Exhortation to Brotherly Love among the Protestant Churches.

David, Sr., was the son of Sandde, a descendant of Ceredig, who gave his name to the province of Cardigan, and of Nôn, or Nonna, the daughter of Gynyr of Caergawch. He was born about 446 at Hen Mynyw, near St. Bride's Bay, and baptised by Eloi, or Alveas, Bishop of Munster, at Porthclae, where legend says that a spring was miraculously produced for the purpose. David was brought up at Hen Mynyw, where he was ordained priest, and he subsequently studied the Scriptures for ten years under Paulinus, at Whitland, in Caermarthenshire. He then began to preach, and travelling through Britain, he founded twelve monasteries, one of them being at Mynyw, his birthplace, where the Cathedral of St. David's now stands. Here he settled, was joined by many disciples, including St. Aidan, and devoted himself entirely to prayer and study, refusing to mix with the world on any but the most unavoidable occasions; and he hesitated for some time before consenting to attend the Synod at Breff, which met in 519 to suppress the Pelagian heresy. St. David was summoned thither by Paulinus, his former teacher, and silenced the Pelagians by his eloquence: whereupon he was elected Archbishop of Caerleon, Dubricius having resigned in his favour. Legend says that while he was preaching, the ground upon which he stood rose under him, so as to elevate him above the heads of the people, and that at the same time a white dove descended from heaven and sat upon his shoulder. At first he declined the primacy, but accepted it on the condition that the archiepiscopal Chair should be removed to Mynew. St. David held a second Synod at Caerleon in 529, which succeeded in overcoming the Pelagian heresy, and was therefore called "The Synod of Victory." At this meeting the Canons of Bress were confirmed, and a code of rules drawn up by St. David for the regulation of the British Church. After his elevation to the primacy he proved more vigorous and hard-working than might have been expected from his former quiet life. He was, as Giraldus says, "a doctrine to his hearers, a guide to the religious, a light to the poor, a support to the orphans, a protection to widows, a father to the fatherless, a rule to monks, and a path to seculars; being made all things to all men, that he might bring all to God." His death, which took place on March 1st, is said to have been foretold by angels, and tradition also says that he died at the age of one hundred and forty-seven. The date of his birth seems very doubtful, as some declare that it took place in 446, and others in 462; but most authorities agree that he died in 544.

The cathedral of St. David stands on the westernmost point of Wales. It was formerly called "Ty Dewi," the House of David, and was held in great veneration, two pilgrimages to it being reckoned as equal to one to Rome. No trace is left of the cathedral begun in the sixth century by St. David; the foundation of the present building was laid by Peter de Leia in 1180. The lower part of the tower and the presbytery were reconstructed after the fall of the tower in 1220. Bishop Martyn built the Lady Chapel in the thirteenth century, and Bishop Gower made alterations and raised a rood-screen in the fourteenth century. Bishop Vaughan, in the sixteenth century, added a third stage to the tower in the Perpendicular style. It has been added to and improved much since then, the last restoration being carried out, after plans by Sir G. Scott, in 1862. The central tower was at that time in great danger, the supports having in many places completely crumbled away. In style, it is for the most part late Norman, and there are some specimens of Early English architecture. It is built of stone found in the neighbourhood, which, being of rich dark colours, gives a peculiarly warm look to the cathedral. The beautiful roof to the nave belongs to the sixteenth century, and was probably built by Owen Pole. It is a flat timber ceiling, with imaginary arches, from which hang pendants decorated with almost Arabian gorgeousness. [Account of Cathedral by Bishop Jones and Mr. E. A. Freeman.]

The cathedral was served by a monastery before the Reformation, but now the chapter consists of a dean and four canons residentiary.

Deacon (Gr. diaconos, "follower or helper").—The word is used in the New Testament generally to signify some ministry of the Gospel, but is once applied to magistrates [Rom. xiii. 4], and St. Paul calls himself a deacon, using the word in its widest sense. The origin of this office is related in Acts vi. On account of some complaints of neglect in the distribution of the daily charities of the Church, the Apostles gave order that the disciples should select "seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom," whom they might "appoint over this business." Accordingly, seven were chosen, among whom were Philip and Stephen; and on being presented to the Apostles, they were ordained by the imposition of their hands. So far all Christians are agreed, but beyond this point there are two quite different schools of interpretation. The Anglican Church, following the Greek and Roman Churches, and holding that the ministry of the Gospel was confined to ordained persons, believes that the deacons were intended for a higher purpose than to look after the merely temporal affairs of the Church, and that the qualifications asked for imply this; moreover, the seven were not only chosen by the people, but solemnly ordained by the Apostles; and at least two of them were engaged immediately after in ministerial labours. Stephen is found preaching in the various synagogues of the foreign Jews; and we read that "they were not able to resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spake." According to the chronology of our Bibles, this occurred in the same year in which he was ordained, if not directly upon the receiving of his official authority. The next year, Philip, another of the deacons, goes to Samaria, and preaches and baptises. Hence the term is used for the lowest of the three orders in the ministry. Those who maintain that in the practice of the ancient Church a broad distinction existed between the office of a deacon and that of a priest refer to the fact that in one of his epistles, Clement, Bishop of Rome, says that Isaiah had prophesied of bishops in the Christian Church as "overseers in righteousness," and of deacons as "their ministers in faith," adding that the Apostles established such officers. After this he continues that "the Apostles knew by our Lord Jesus Christ that there should contentions arise upon the account of the ministry." Ignatius, another of the Apostolic Fathers who flourished while some of the twelve were yet living, and was probably acquainted with them and their views respecting the constitution of the Church, in writing to the Magnesians, names bishops and presbyters, and adds, "and your deacons most dear to me being entrusted with the ministry of Jesus Christ." In another epistle he speaks of the sacred office of a deacon thus:—"The deacons also, as being the ministers of the mysteries of Jesus Christ, must by all means please all; for they are not the ministers of meat and drink, but of the Church of God." Polycarp, a disciple of St. John, says to the same purpose, "The deacons must be blameless before [God] as the ministers of God in Christ." The fourteenth canon of the Council of Nice ordered that deacons should be subject to priests, and allowed them not to sit upon the same bench. The number of seven continued a great while, and there being seven divisions, or wards, in Rome, there was a deacon allowed to each one of them. There were two degrees of deacons at Constantinople; six were of the upper distinction, and a hundred of the lower in the great Church. Heraclius increased the number to one hundred and fifty, retrenching the sub-deacons from ninety to sixty. A deacon was to be ordained by the bishop alone. On the other hand, those Nonconformists who believe that no ordination was, or is, necessary for the preaching of the Gospel, hold that the passage in Acts vi. is to be interpreted strictly as it stands; that the passages above cited from the early Fathers, when carefully considered, bear out this view; and that the work to be undertaken by the deacons is expressly spoken of as unworthy of the time of the higher Christian ministry. Accordingly, their deacons, elected by the church, attend to the temporal affairs of the church and assist the minister in his other avocations, very often preaching also in rural districts and subsidiary meetings. In some Presbyterian churches the office of deacon is merged in that of ruling elder; in others it remains distinct, and is then confined (as an office) to the distribution of alms.

Deaconesses were women in the Apostolic Church chosen to assist persons of their own sex at baptism; as a rule, they were widows, but this was not absolutely necessary. At their admission, they were presented, veiled, to the bishop, after which, apparently, they received laying-on of hands, though our knowledge on this subject must be confessed to be limited. At first they were not admitted to the office till they were sixty, but the Council of Chalcedon relaxed this rule, and allowed forty years to be sufficient. The office seems to have gradually fallen into disuse, so that by the fifth century it had entirely disappeared in the Western Church, though it continued till the twelfth in the Eastern.

Of late years, however, the office has been revived. The first instance in the present century was the female diaconate established on the Rhine by a German pastor in 1836. His object was to train nurses for the sick, and to combine a hospital and a place for training nurses, who should take certain vows. This institution was, in time, followed by similar ones in all parts of Europe, and in 1881 there were as many as fifty-three of them. The great need of women's work in poor districts is not only recognised everywhere, but the success which has already attended it is one of the most cheering signs of the times. The establishment of sisterhoods is another phase of the same devotion, but these have been for the most part started and endowed by private individuals. But they have been viewed with distrust by some members of the Church, on the ground that the bishop's power over them is circumscribed, and that they are chary of giving information concerning themselves and their rules. [SISTERHOODS.] It was largely owing to this distrust that a movement has been made of late years to extend the order of deaconesses. The Houses of Convocation, in their report on "Home and Foreign Missions," when recommending the wider and more systematic use of the services of Christian women, did not suggest the extension of sisterhoods. But they have recommended the revival of the "Apostolic Order of Deaconesses." "The challenge of the Church," said the Bishop of Winchester (July, 1883), "was that she had gone back to primitive doctrine and discipline. And if this was so, it did seem reasonable and right that they should return to the primitive system in this matter." The two Archbishops and bishops drew up certain principles and rules for their regulation, in which a deaconess is defined as "a woman set apart by a bishop, under that title, for service in the Church." To the late Dean Howson the honour is due, more than to any other man, of organising this movement. There are at present institutions for training women, first in habits of devotion, self-control, and method; secondly, in teaching, nursing, and parochial visiting. One of the most carefully arranged Constitutions for such an institution is that of the Diocese of Rochester, and therefore we give a summary of its most important features:—

"The objects of the Deaconess Institution in the Diocese of Rochester shall be twofold:—(1) To train and send forth devout women for active ministrations under the parochial clergy in the Diocese of Rochester. (2) To provide a home of rest, to which those thus sent forth may periodically return. The Institution shall comprise Deaconesses, Probationers, and Associates, and shall be under the authority and direction of the Bishop of the Diocese, assisted by a Council of Clergy and Laity, which he shall appoint triennially, for its management.

"For the purposes of the Institution, suitable premises shall be provided in South London, or its suburbs. There shall be three trustees:—A member residentiary of the cathedral body, a parochial clergyman (both to be appointed by the Bishop), and a layman, chosen by the Council. A room shall be set apart in the Home of the Institution for daily prayer and private devotion. There shall be a Warden in Holy Orders and a Head Deaconess, both to be appointed by the Bishop. The appointment of Head Deaconess shall require the confirmation of the Bishop every three years. A Deaconess must be licensed by the Bishop to work in the parish for which she has been selected. She shall be under the direction of the Incumbent in her parochial work; but she must not be dismissed from it, nor resign it, without having received from him, or given him, three months' notice, unless the Bishop shall otherwise determine. The Deaconess shall wear the distinctive dress of the Institution while residing in the Home, or in the parish to which she has been licensed. Every candidate for the office of Deaconess must reside, as a visitor, in the house for three months, and if then approved by the Warden and Head Deaconess, shall be admitted as a PROBATIONER, to receive training for a period of at least one year. This period of probation, however, shall be terminable by the Bishop at his discretion. Candidates for probation must be communicants, and shall not be less than twenty-one years of age, nor more than forty. Before admission as probationers, candidates shall be required to declare in writing—

"(a) That they intend to serve for not less than three years from their admission as Deaconesses.

"(b) That they will obey the rules of the Institution, and dutifully submit to the control of the Warden and Head Deaconess.

"All residents in the Home of the Institution shall attend the services of the church which, for such purposes, may be approved by the Bishop."

Dead, Baptism for the.—The practice of vicarious baptism among some of the ancient heretics. When any convert had died unbaptised, they baptised a living man in his stead. It was practised by the MARCIONITES (q.v.), and even earlier by the CERINTHIAN. [CERINTHUS.] St. Chrysostom thus describes it:—"After a catechumen was dead, they hid a living man under the bed of the deceased; then coming to the bed of the dead man, they spake to him, and asked whether he would receive baptism, and he making no answer, the other replied in his stead, and so they baptised the 'living for the dead.'" The idea was that whatever benefit was gained by this sacrament might be transferred to the dead man by baptising a living person in his stead. They justified this practice by saying that St. Paul authorised it in 1 Cor. xv. 29, whereas the Apostle was only referring to the existence of such a practice, by way of enforcing the doctrine of the Resurrection, saying that to practise this vicarious baptism, and then deny the Resurrection, must be illogical. [See Bishop Ellicott's New Testament Commentary on the passage.]

Dead, Communion of the.—There was a superstitious practice in the African Churches of giving the Eucharist to those who had died suddenly, and thus been prevented from receiving the Communion. It was usual to celebrate the Eucharist at funerals, and there crept in a custom of placing a small piece of the bread in the mouth of the corpse. Later this was modified by laying it on the breast and burying it with the body. A canon was made at the Third Council of Carthage forbidding this, on the ground that our Lord said, "Take, eat," and that dead bodies could neither take nor eat. A similar canon was made at the Council of Auxerre, in France, in 578. It seems that there were traces of this error in the Greek Church in the days of St. Chrysostom, as he censures it very strongly, and the Council of Trullo repeats the prohibition almost in the same words as the Council of Carthage.

Dead, Prayers for the.—We are on totally different ground here from that on which our two preceding subjects rest. We may fairly assume that Onesiphorus was dead when St. Paul uttered the ejaculation, "The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day" [2 Tim. iv. 19]. But this warrant, if we consider it one, is the only warrant in the Canonical Scriptures for prayer for the dead. The passage in 2 Maccabees xii. 46 belongs to a book which, according to the Sixth Article of the Church of England, "is not used to establish any doctrine," but it indicates that this practice prevailed among the Jews, and there is no question that such prayers were used in the ritual of the Synagogue in our Lord's time. And it is also found in Christian writers in very early times; e.g., Tertullian (circa 190) writes: "We make oblations for the departed on one day in the year" (de Cor. 3). Again, Cyprian (250) says: "We never fail to offer sacrifices for them," i.e. the dead, "as often as we celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration." These oblations and sacrifices for the dead were partly acts of intercession on behalf of the departed, and partly acts of commemoration of their faith and virtue. After a time special masses, termed Missæ de Sanctis, were composed, containing examples of such prayers. So many abuses grew up in connection with this practice, that in many places the primitive custom has ceased altogether.

It was formerly the custom to read out the names of eminent saints and martyrs who were to be commemorated during the Divine Office. The object of such prayers in the Primitive Church was not for the release of the soul from purgatory, but simply that God's mercy might rest upon the dead, that they "might rejoice for ever in the society of the saints" (336 A.D.). Again, these prayers were made on behalf especially of the most eminent saints, including the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles. It certainly was not held that these were in purgatory.

The general attitude of the Church of England on this subject seems clear. There is nothing said against such prayers, but there is no public use of them, though there have been always individual members of the Church, and those most loyal, who have used them, e.g. Dr. Johnson and Bishop Heber.

An important decision which was given in the Court of Arches in 1839, by Sir Herbert J. Fust, was that known as the Woolfrey case. A Mrs. Woolfrey put up a headstone to her husband's memory, with an inscription beginning "Pray for the soul of Thomas Woolfrey." The vicar prosecuted her, but the judge decided that there is nothing in the formularies of the Church with which this was at variance, and since then similar inscriptions are not unusual. A common epitaph of this character is, "Grant him, O Lord, eternal rest, and let perpetual light shine upon him."

Deadly Sin.—It would appear that the Sixteenth Article of the English Church, in which this expression occurs, was framed with a view to counteract an opinion originally held by the Novatians, and revived by some sects at the period of the Reformation. By maintaining that all sin after baptism was unpardonable, they not only set forth a dogma inconsistent with the tenor of Scripture, but reduced all moral offences to a level, as being equally heinous in the sight of God. The former notion is denied in the Article; and as respects the latter, while the Church teaches, in agreement with Scripture, that every sin is a grievous offence against the Majesty of Heaven, and that a curse rests on every one "that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the Law to do them"—a curse from which there is no escape but by the blood of Christ—yet she also recognises different degrees of turpitude and guilt in the catalogue of sins. "We are far from the conceit of the Stoics," says Bishop Burnet, "who made all sins alike. We acknowledge that some sins of ignorance and infirmity may consist with a state of grace, which is either quite destroyed, or at least much eclipsed and clouded, by other sins that are more heinous in their nature, and more deliberately gone about. It is in this sense that the word 'deadly' is used in the Article; for though, in the strictness of justice, every sin is 'deadly,' yet, in the dispensation of the Gospel, those sins only are deadly that do deeply wound the conscience and drive away grace."

Dean.—The derivation of this word is thus given by Bishop Kennet, in his Parochial Antiquities:—"As in England, for the better preservation of the peace and more easy administration of justice, every hundred consisted of ten districts, called tithings, every tithing of ten friborhs, or free pledges, and every free (or frank) pledge of ten families, and in every such tithing there was a constable or civil dean appointed for the subordinate administration of justice; so, in conformity to this secular method, the spiritual governors, the bishops, divided each diocese into deaneries (decennaries, or tithings), each of which was the district of ten parishes or churches; and over every such district they appointed a dean, who, in cities or large towns, was called the dean of the city or town, and in the country had the appellation of rural dean. The like office of dean began very early in the great monasteries, especially in those of the Benedictine Order, where the whole convent was divided into decuries, in which the dean, or tenth person, did preside over the other nine; took an account of all their manual operations; suffered none to leave their stations or to omit their particular duty without express leave; visited their cells or dormitories every night; attended them at table, to keep order and decorum at their meals; guided their conscience, directed their studies, and observed their conversation; and for this purpose held frequent chapters, wherein they took public cognisance of all irregular practices, and imposed some lesser penances, but submitted all their proceedings to the abbot or prelate, to whom they were accountable for their power, and for the abuse of it. And, in the larger houses, where the number amounted to several decuries, the senior dean had a special preminence, and had sometimes the care of all devolved upon him alone."

"The institution of cathedral deans seems evidently to be owing to this practice. When, in episcopal sees, the bishops dispersed the body of their clergy by affixing them to parochial cures, they reserved a college of priests or secular canons for their counsel and assistance, and for the constant celebration of Divine offices in the mother or cathedral church—where the tenth person had an inspecting and presiding power, till the senior or principal dean swallowed up the office of all the inferior, and, in subordination to the bishop, was head or governor of the whole society. His office was to have authority over all the canons, presbyters, and vicars, and to give possession to them when instituted by the bishop; to inspect their discharge of the cure of souls; to convene chapters and preside in them, there to hear and determine proper causes; and to visit all churches once in three years within the limits of their jurisdiction. The men of this dignity were called Archi-presbyters, because they had a superintendence or primacy over all their college of canonical priests; and were likewise called Decani Christianitatis, because their chapters were courts of Christianity or ecclesiastical judicatures, wherein they censured their offending brethren, and maintained the discipline of the Church within their own precincts."

The above passage explains two uses of the word dean: namely, the Dean of a Cathedral Chapter and the Rural Dean. It should be added that with the first class—cathedral deans—must be placed the deans of collegiate churches, such as Westminster and Windsor, who yet have no connection with episcopal sees. As to the rural deans, though they have no absolute judicial power, they are a sort of arch-priests among the parochial clergy. On them devolves the duty, in the absence of the bishop, of inducting those clergy who have been instituted to livings; also of inspecting churches and churchyards, and reporting to the Arch-deacon. To these two must be added a third and fourth class of dean. The third is a dean who has no chapter, and yet is representative and has cure of souls; he has a peculiar, and a court wherein he holds ecclesiastical jurisdiction; but he is not subject to a visitation of the bishop or ordinary; such is the Dean of Battle, in Sussex, whose deanery was founded by William the Conqueror, in memory of his conquest: and the dean there has cure of souls and has spiritual jurisdiction within the liberty of Battle. Deans of the fourth class are ecclesiastical also, but the deanery is not presentative, but donative, nor has the holder of it any cure of souls; he also has a court and a peculiar, in which he holds plea and jurisdiction of all such matters and things as are ecclesiastical, and which arise within his peculiar, which oftentimes extends over many parishes; such a dean, constituted by commission from the Metropolitan of the province, is the Dean of the Arches and the Dean of Bocking, in Essex; and of such deaneries there are many more.

The word dean is also applied to some secular functions. Thus the eldest member of a corporation is called dean in some places, and in this sense we are to understand the "Dean of the Sorbonne," and the "Dean of Faculty" at some Universities. In France, formerly, the rural dean had a right to the best horse and the best suit of clothes of a deceased curé, as those who were to see the dead buried were called Deans; they adjusted and settled the priest's privileges at funerals and other parts of Divine Service, assigning each of them that station and consideration which belonged to them.

Dean and Chapter.—The governing body of a cathedral. The chapter consists of a certain number of canons, or prebendaries, who are regarded as capita ecclesie, ("heads of the church"), as being the bishop's council and advisers in things spiritual. When originally formed by missionary bishops, they were his chaplains and attendants. He established himself in his seat (cathedra), and from it they went forth into the neighbouring districts to preach the Gospel. They were meanwhile supported out of his revenues. In course of time parishes were formed, and resident clergy established in them. The chapter then became stationary as the bishop's resident committee; but forming a corporation, they obtained property, and ceased to depend on him for maintenance. And being the chief representatives of the clergy of the diocese, they obtained the privilege of electing the bishop on a vacancy of the see. It must be confessed that within the memory of living men the cathedral chapters had come to consist mainly of relatives of Prime Ministers and bishops, who lived in sloth and hoarded money. But this is an abuse which has well-nigh passed away, and the conviction has now become established that the cathedral chapter ought to present to the other clergy an example of work and of learning, and to be a centre of usefulness to the diocese.

Deanery, or Deanry.—The office or jurisdiction of a dean; also the house set apart for the residence of a dean. More strictly, deanry refers to the office, and deanery to the residence. By statute 3 and 4 Vict., c. 113, s. 24, the deanry of every cathedral and collegiate church upon the old foundation, excepting in Wales, is placed in the direct patronage of the Queen, who, upon the vacancy of any such deanry, can appoint, by letters patent, a "spiritual person" to be dean, who will thereupon be entitled to installation.

Decalogue (The Ten Commandments).—The introduction of these into the Anglican Liturgy dates from the year 1552. Before that date, though placed in the manuals drawn up by the Archbishop for the instruction of the people, they were not an established part of any public liturgy. Placed as they are, with the responses, in the opening portion of the Communion Service, they take the place of the old Confiteor, or confession of sins made before communicating, in accordance with the spirit which said, "I will wash mine hands in innocency, O Lord, and so will I go to Thine altar." They may be regarded as both a guide and a stimulus to the conscience, and a petition for mercy and acceptance.

It is also ordered by the canon that the Decalogue, with the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed, be placed on the wall at the east end of the church, and it is to be regretted that this canon should have fallen of late years into abeyance. The need which led to the order has no doubt passed away, for it was unquestionably intended for the purpose of instruction at a time when books were scarce. But as a symbol there can be few nobler or truer. It is a standing witness, on the fabric of the Church, that faith, prayer, and good works are the marks of a Christian, and are means of union with the Head of the Church.

Decani side (of a choir).—In cathedrals the stall of the dean (decani) was on the right hand of one entering the choir: that is, on the south side; opposite was the stall of the chanter, or precentor, cantoris (q.v.). These names have been transferred to the two corresponding sides of the choir in all "places where they sing," or at least where they sing antiphonally.

Decian Persecution (249—250).—The Christian Church had enjoyed freedom from persecution for nearly forty years from the death of Septimius Severus; heathenism seemed to be hastening rapidly to decay, while Christianity numbered some of the profoundest scholars and philosophers of the day amongst its teachers and defenders. But this season of peace was not without bad effect on the Christians. True, they were able to spread their doctrines fearlessly, and to erect churches; and converts might be found in every walk of life—in the camp, the courts of justice, and even the Emperor's palace; but many were timid and wavering, and not prepared to come unscathed from a trial of their faith; there was no longer that marked difference between heathens and Christians in the performance of their moral and social duties which had once existed; marriages were contracted with heathens; there was a spirit of ostentation among the clergy, and even bishops neglected their flocks to engage in money-getting occupations. It was, so to speak, a respectable thing to be a Christian, and many embraced Christianity with no better motive. Cyprian, in his letters, draws a melancholy picture of this progress of corruption. Such was the state of things when Decius became Emperor, in July, 249. During his short reign he displayed many virtues, and was evidently anxious to restore the declining greatness of the Roman people by reviving ancient discipline. Probably this was one reason why he jumped to the conclusion that the Christians were obnoxious as religious innovators, and that their contempt for the heathen gods had made the Roman people atheists. The soothsayers, furious that their gains were dwindling, were always ready to inflame the minds of the unreasoning multitude, and, moreover, the hope of plunder formed no inconsiderable ingredient in the general excitement. It was known that many of the wealthy had joined the faith. At the end of 249 or beginning of 250, Decius issued an edict commanding Christians to sacrifice to the gods, and immediately there commenced the fiercest persecution the Church had yet known, and which raged over every part of the Empire. Contemporary writers draw horrible pictures of the terror and agony which the persecution caused, and yet, as has been truly said, they "shock rather than interest, rather confuse than inform us. The complicated struggles, the silent pangs of internal emotion, the sacrifice of everything which binds man to life, the sense of estranged love, the bursting of the ties of long friendship and close affection, the loss of worldly reputation—these are passed over almost untouched, while . . . all that can produce the most violent revulsion, the sword and fire, wild beasts, talons of steel, the wheel, red-hot iron chains—every varied torture, pass before us in rapid succession, and the sensation is oppressive and sickening. But, turning from scenes at the bare imagination of which the heart dies away, it is deeply interesting to mark the workings of human passion in those days of alarm and distress. Neighbour betrayed neighbour, and friend denounced friend. All feelings were deadened into apathy or absorbed into selfishness. Some, whose spirit recoiled from the task of dragging their victims before the magistrate, pointed them out with the finger; others, less scrupulous, sought them out in their place of refuge, or pursued them in their flight. The son brought information against his father, and the father against his son, and the brother exposed his brother to the horrors of the rack. Superstition had smothered the voice of nature. All was distrust and perplexity, consternation, and a sense of bitter wrong. Families were dissolved, houses were left empty, and the deserts peopled. The prisons could no longer contain the number of the accused, and most of the public buildings were converted into places of confinement. Day after day the work of carnage proceeded; it engrossed all conversation; it chased away all expression of gaiety from public and private assemblies; rank, or the infirmities of old age, or infancy, or the feebleness of the weaker sex, obtained no compassion, no mitigation of rigour." Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, and Babylon, Bishop of Antioch, were thrown into prison, and both died there. Origen was imprisoned, and remained thus till the death of Decius; his friend Gregory, Bishop of Neocæsarea, in Pontus, was obliged to fly. In Asia Minor, one bishop, Eudæmon of Smyrna, is said to have denied the faith; but many Christians here were imprisoned and put to death. Egypt became the scene of terrible cruelty and outrage. Many Christians took refuge in the mountains and deserts, and some remained there altogether, leading the life of hermits. One of them, named Paul, has acquired celebrity as being the first hermit.

The persecution was directed chiefly against the heads of the Church: Decius was jealous of them, and afraid of their power, which they owed to the love of their flocks, while his power came only from fear. In Rome the Christians numbered about fifty thousand; Fabian, who had been bishop about twelve years, was put to death, and many of his clergy imprisoned. St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, was forced to fly for his life, but from his place of refuge he kept up communication by letter with his clergy, directing them on many important points.

Out of this persecution arose two terms:—The Lapsed were those who apostatised from the faith, the Libellatici those who, having avoided this so far as burning incense or offering sacrifices was concerned, purchased certificates from the magistrates, which declared that the persons holding them were not to be held suspect. In 251 the persecution had considerably abated, and in December of that year Decius was killed in battle.

Decimes.—A tax formerly levied by the French kings upon the ecclesiastics in their dominions, and intended originally to raise money for the completing of the Crusades. In 1226, Pope Honorius III. granted a decime to Charles of Anjou for the war against the Albigenses. Similar grants were made after the Sicilian Vespers, to fight Peter of Aragon. And by reciprocal courtesy the French kings sometimes gave the Popes leave to levy decimes on the clergy to raise means for fighting the German Emperors. Then the exigencies of the French Government were held a sufficient reason for such levies. In 1516 Leo X. gave Francis I. his consent for one to be expended on an expedition against the Turks, and this agreement remained permanent. From that date there were many taxes levied on the French clergy without Papal leave. The French Revolution put an end to all such arrangements, by placing the Church on a perfectly new footing.

Decretals.—The name given to the letters of Popes bearing an answer to questions proposed to them by some bishop or ecclesiastical judge, or even by particular persons, in which they determined business according as the case required. The original name was decretals constitutum, or decretalis epistola, afterwards decretalis. Gregory IX. caused to be collected the Decretals of divers Popes, from 1150, when Gratian published his Decretalium, to 1230. These decretals are divided into five books, to which Boniface VIII. added a sixth in 1298. No genuine decretals have been discovered earlier than those of Symon, who acceded to the Pontifical chair in 385; but in the ninth century an earlier series appeared, purporting to give decretals from the time of Clement I., under the assumed signature of Isidore, a Spanish bishop of the sixth century. These were accepted and quoted in support of Papal claims for some centuries, but are now universally admitted to be forgeries.

Dedication.—Among the heathens, when a temple was built, it was dedicated to some divinity; the Consuls, Prætors, Censors, Vestal Virgins, High Priests, Decemviri, and Duumviri being concerned in the solemnity. The dedication was to be authorised by the Senate and people, and the College of the Priests were to give their consent to it. At the solemnity the Pontifex Maximus, or High Priest, having the Ceremonial in his hand, pronounced the form of consecration with an audible voice. Afterwards the Court of the Temple was consecrated by sacrifice, the entrails of the victim being laid upon an altar of green turf; then the consecrating person, entering the temple with the priests, took the statue of the god or goddess to whom the temple was consecrated, and anointing it with some rich unguent, laid it upon a couch of state. There were likewise, in process of time, plays, entertainments, and largesses given to the people upon such occasions. These dedication holy-days were anniversaries, such as the birthdays of princes and the commemoration of the building of towns.

Such ceremonies find their explanation in the religious instinct common to mankind—the inmost conviction that beneath all visible things lies an unseen and eternal foundation. That the heathen festivals were altogether mingled with error and superstition does not alter the fact that there was a feeling after God in what they did. They worshipped “they knew not what;” Christ came to teach them how to find Him whom they ignorantly worshipped. That their ceremonial of dedication came from a true instinct is proved to us by the fact that Solomon solemnly dedicated his temple to the Lord; that at its rebuilding it was again dedicated; that a festival of dedication was afterwards instituted, which our Lord sanctioned [John vii.]. There is no distinct date to be ascertained for the first dedication of Christian churches. Probably it dates from their first building. It is spoken of as customary in the time of Constantine. In course of time the anniversary feast of the saint to whose memory a church is dedicated came to be called the Feast of Dedication. [WAKE.]

Defender.—An old office and title both in Church and State. Cassiodorus, lib. ix., cap. 25, says that those who were entrusted with the care of the public, and acquitted themselves well, had this title. The patriarchal Churches had likewise their Defenders, who were obliged by their office to see that the poor had no injustice done them, and to take care of the rights and interests belonging to the Church. This office of Defender of the Church began in 423, as we learn from the 42nd canon of an African council. Those were also called Defenders of the patrimony of St. Peter who were sent by the Pope into the provinces, to take care of the dues and revenues belonging to the See of Rome, of which there is frequent mention in the epistles of Gregory the Great. This Pope made seven Regionary Defenders, i.e., to take care of the seven wards or quarters of the city, in conformity to the seven regionary deacons and sub-deacons set up before. Afterwards every parish church had an officer of this kind, called a churchwarden. The Defenders of the Church were likewise called Advocates, the office being in some places hereditary and sometimes conferred by the prince. [Can. ix. Concil. Carth.] Thus the Romans made choice of Charlemagne for St. Peter's Advocate, against the King of the Lombards; and even to this day the Emperor at his coronation is called the Church's Advocate. The Kings of England have always been styled Defenders of the Faith since the title conferred by Pope Leo X. upon Henry VIII. for writing against Luther. Pope Leo's Bull is preserved in the British Museum, but in fact the title belonged of right to the King of England before that time. Several old charters are in existence which bear it, so that Pope Leo's Bull was merely the renewal of an old dignity.

Defensor Matrimonii.—An officer in the Roman Catholic Church employed in all matrimonial suits, to prevent, if possible, a divorce being obtained. His function is akin to that of the Queen's Proctor in the English Divorce Court. He is sworn to discharge his office faithfully, to keep himself well informed of every stage in the case, and to appeal against the first sentence declaring any marriage null. The law respecting these "defenders of the marriage" is laid down in Benedict XIV.'s bull Dei Misericordiae.

Degradation.—The act of depriving a clergyman for ever of his dignity on account of crime or unworthiness. Verbal degradation was to depose a man from the exercise of his ministerial duties, though not actually to obliterate the spiritual powers conferred at his ordination. Real degradation stripped a man of his orders, and he might be then delivered over to the secular court for punishment. Often, however, rather than do this, the degraded priests were shut up in monasteries for the rest of their life. Degradation was performed only by bishops, and a form of ceremonial for this was drawn up by Boniface VIII. The bishop publicly stripped him of his clerical vestments, his head was shaved so as to obliterate the mark of the tonsure; and then the bishop addressed him in these words: "By the authority of God Almighty, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and by our own, we take away from thee the clerical habit, and depose, degrade, and deprive thee of all order, benefice, and clerical privilege."

Degrees, ACADEMIC.—Titles conferred on men who have shown proficiency in certain arts or sciences. The origin of them is traced to the legal school of Bologna, about the beginning of the twelfth century. The teachers were styled "doctors," and they formed themselves into a college, and conferred the same title on any of their pupils who satisfied them of proficiency by examination. Pope Eugenius III., in 1151, arranged for the conferring the same title on those who showed themselves skilled in canon law, making the three degrees of bachelor, licentiate, and doctor. Thus degrees were at first the privilege of adepts in civil or canon law, or both. The bachelor became such simply on proof that he had studied his subject for so long a time; on private examination he was made a licentiate; he could then wait, or proceed at once to the doctorate, for which he was required to hold in the cathedral a public disputation with learned students. This being done, he was publicly invested by the bishop or the arch-deacon with the doctor's ring and cap, and seated in the doctor's chair. His title was then recognised throughout Christendom to teach with authority. Peter Lombard seems to have been the first to institute degrees for theology in the University of Paris, and in the course of time other faculties were included, as arts and medicine. "Bachelor" became an independent degree, given after examination; then in universities a man proceeded to the degree of "Master," the name originally signifying the magister of a cathedral school; then passing on to one appointed to give theological instruction in cathedral cities. Thus in foreign universities "Master" and "Doctor" became synonymous, and "Licentiate" continued to be a distinct degree. When a distinction was made, the title of "Master" was applied to theology and "Doctor" to other studies. The Doctorate of Philosophy is a modern degree. Formerly degrees were given in England in both canon and civil law; then, as the former ceased to be a separate study the title was given "in utroque jure" (i.e., as combining both), and this title was LL.D., Doctor of Laws. This, however, is now only given by Cambridge and Dublin, Oxford and Durham having altogether dropped the double title for D.C.L., "Doctor of Civil Law." The three Universities confer degrees also in Music and Medicine. The degrees of "B.A." and "M.A." are given by the University of London by royal licence, and these degrees are held in as high respect as any, the possession of them indicating that the possessor has shown himself a well-read scholar. But there are also "bogus" degrees conferred by foreign and American universities, which are absolutely worthless. Thus a man styles himself "M.A., Univ. of —," having received it on sending £5 to this "University." The title of Ph.D. may be had for about £15, and people are still found who believe that it proves the possession of some knowledge.

It will thus be seen that Doctor of Divinity is the highest and most honourable degree which universities grant (in Latin, S.T.P., Professor of Sacred Theology), though the right conveyed in these words of all doctors to give public lectures on divinity within the limits of their University has been long in abeyance. The University of London does not confer Divinity degrees. When conferred elsewhere, they are, almost without exception, only given to persons in holy orders. This rule is invariable in most, if not all, English-speaking Universities; abroad, one or two instances of lay D.D.'s may be found, as Sir William Hamilton, Bart., the celebrated metaphysician (d. 1866), who was a D.D. of Leyden; Baron Bunsen (d. 1860) also held the degree. [See Notes and Queries, 4th S. ix. 55, 147.] At Cambridge, according to the lists in Fuller's history of the University, the last Doctor of Canon Law graduated in 1532, except one in 1556, during Queen Mary's restoration of Popery.

Deification.—The offering divine honours to a man. Pagans held that those mortals who had done great deeds on earth were enrolled among the gods. This word is sometimes applied by mediæval writers to the state of mortal man brought by holiness into perfect conformity to the Divine Will.

Dei gratiâ ("by the grace of God").—An expression added after the name of the Sovereign, to express that it is by God's will that kings reign. The phrase was first used by the Frankish emperors; and a proof of the value set upon it by the English people was given some years ago, when, florins being issued without the "D.G.," such disapprobation was shown that such coinage was recalled.

Deists.—Those who, while they confess their belief in a God, deny that He has made any revelation of Himself save by His works in nature. But they have of late years been subdivided into those who reject altogether the idea of His interference with the affairs of men, and those who believe in His continued providence. The latter class have been named Theists, though more recently, under the stress of the more fundamental controversy with Agnostics and Materialists, the word Theist has been commonly applied, as a more general one, to even Christian Apologists. Subdivisions of Deism, again, have been made, one class shading off into the other; but in all cases that which characterises them is the denial of the Divine authority and truth of the Scriptures. But there are Deists who profess to recognise in the Scriptures the highest morality which has ever been uttered by man, and others who impugn the character of Christ Himself, and deny the immortality of the soul.

The origin of Deism is to be sought in the great religious earthquake which accompanied the Reformation of the sixteenth century. That movement, in the minds of such men as Luther, Calvin, Latimer, Hooper, was the result of intense religious conviction. They revolted from the falsehoods, frauds, corruptions which defiled the Church, and raised their protest against them. The exposures which they made, and their demolition of much that had hitherto been accepted without inquiry, led on others to question the Divine authority, first of the Church, then of the Scriptures. Reactions, though necessary, inevitably bring evils in their train. The philosophy of Bacon, little as he intended it, led of necessity in the same direction. It was empirical; it demanded at every turn proofs of each opinion and doctrine, and this was applied to the statements of the miracles and other facts of the Bible, to the exclusion of the conscience, and the ignoring of the inward voice of God to men. England has been declared to be the birthplace of Deism, and its father to be Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the friend of Bacon and Casaubon. [HERBERT OF CHERBURY.] Thomas Hobbes, also a friend of Bacon, a vigorous thinker, who sold his intellect to the service of arbitrary power, maintained that Christianity was an Oriental theory evolved out of the Grecian philosophy to be an instrument of national government; that there is no binding religion but such as the State enforces; that all knowledge is from sense-perception, and therefore that nothing can exist apart from the body. [HOBBS.] From his doctrines Charles Blount gathered the views which he put forth in his Oracles of Reason, denying the necessity of Atonement and Mediation. He committed suicide in 1693, because his sister-in-law refused to marry him. John Locke aimed at the re-uniting of the various sects into which Christianity had been broken, but by minimising differences he cut away some of the most distinctive doctrines of Christianity, and without any such purpose gave a great impulse to Deism. [LOCKE.] Lord Shaftesbury (1671-1713), advocating a religion of mere morality, in his Characteristicks, mingled irony with apparent reverence for the Christian faith. John Toland (1661-1722), a vain but clever writer, made an assault upon the Jewish character of Christianity and the genuineness of the sacred records. [TOLAND.] Mandeville, in his Fable of the Bees, represented the passions and vices of men as necessary to the welfare of the State, and therefore denied the sacredness of morality. Anthony Collins (1676-1729) advanced beyond preceding Deists in his Discourses of Free-thinking and his Discourses on the Grounds and Reasons of Christian Religion. He attacked the clergy as being "narrow-minded," accused them of forging the sacred writings, and ridiculed the idea of prophecy. The former of these works was answered by Bentley with terrible severity and astonishing acuteness, and Collins's method of retreat was to re-publish an edition of his book in French, in which he altered the blots which Bentley had hit in such a way as to make it appear that Bentley was beside the mark. His second work was answered by Chandler (q.v.) and Sherlock (q.v.). Collins's works form a text-book of the French ENCYCLOPÆDISTS (q.v.). Woolston, in his Discourses on the Miracles (1727), treated them, especially the Lord's Resurrection, as idle tales, mere allegories, and was answered by Bishop Gibson in his Pastoral Letters, and by Sherlock in his Trial of the Witnesses. The effect of these works was to create a strong reaction against Deism, but it was revived by Matthew Tindal (1656-1733), perhaps the ablest Deist who had hitherto appeared. [TINDAL.] In a work entitled Christianity as Old as the Creation, he contended that the Scriptures were mere documents of natural religion, and that both miracles and ceremonials were additions of men for purposes of self-interest. He was answered by Bishop Gibson, by Waterland, and by Law. Morgan also, under the influence of motives which did him no credit (he was a dissenting preacher, who had been expelled from his pulpit), wandered through every variety of opinion, and ended in infidelity. He died in 1743. His works were The Moral Philosopher and The Resurrection of Jesus. The Apostles, he said, taught antagonistic Gospels, but St. Paul deserved respect because he was a freethinker and repudiator of the Law. It was The Moral Philosopher which called forth Warburton's Divine Legation. [WARBURTON.] Lord Bolingbroke (1675-1751), though more widely known as a politician, finds place among the Deistical writers of the seventeenth century. Having plotted in favour of the Pretender, he had to fly the country, and while in France made the acquaintance, and imbibed the opinions, of Voltaire. He applied the low and mean ideas which he had formed of national government to religion: that its root is selfishness, and that this is the mainspring of all human action. He accepted as truth the power of God, but treated His moral goodness as something beyond human cognisance, and pronounced the doctrine of immortality a useful doctrine by which to influence mankind, and a powerful aid to government, but for the enlightened natural religion was sufficient. He advocated polygamy as a means of population. Thomas Chubb (1679-1746), who was almost a contemporary of Bolingbroke, represented Deism among the lower class, as Bolingbroke in the upper. He was a glover and tallow-chandler at Salisbury, and was possessed of a good deal of readiness and fluency with the pen. [CHUBB.] He began as a writer with a Socinian treatise, The Supremacy of God the Father Asserted, and followed it with a vast number of pamphlets on Faith, Mysteries, Origin of Evil, Virtue, etc. His principal work, published in 1738, was

The True Gospel of Jesus Christ Asserted, the substance of which was that the Gospel was the revelation of the moral law of nature, the violation of which was to be repented of, or punished at the final Judgment, but that the Apostles had misunderstood and misinterpreted it. Henry Dodwell, in his Christianity not Founded on Argument (1742), endeavoured to prove that by its very nature religious faith excluded the exercise of all thought. Thomas Paine's Age of Reason [PAINE] was published in 1794, and is still circulated by the Secularists among the masses. [SECULARISM.]

The numerous treatises written by the clergy against the Deists exhibited, no doubt, more learning, but some of them were by no means satisfactory. There were no appeals to the deepest qualities of man; they were cold and unsympathetic, and too often suggested doubts in circles where before none existed. Many apostasies took place from the Church, not so much into avowed unbelief as into indifference. The ablest representative of this class was David Hume (1711-1776), who, in the uncertainty at which he had arrived respecting all human affairs, concluded it best to be independent in all things. One of the greatest means which God raised up for the deliverance of the nation from Deism was the preaching of Wesley. A great revival of spirituality was seen among the people, and infidel treatises almost disappeared, to be revived in new forms in our own day.

But though the professed literature of unbelief was discontinued, its evil results continued to be seen in the scepticism which marked the age succeeding. Gibbon's great History—a wonderful monument of learning and industry, as well as of literary power and skill—is tainted by his dislike of Christianity, as well as by a too evident love of prurience. The imitation of English customs and institutions in France which marked the period preceding the Revolution extended itself to infidel literature, and to English influence must be ascribed much of the evil which marked French philosophy.

Of the treatises in reply to the Deists we have named several in the course of this article. The other principal ones are the following:—Stillingfleet's Letters to a Deist. Baxter's Reasons for the Christian Religion, Cudworth's Intellectual System, Lord Lytton's Observations on the Conversion of St. Paul, Bishop Watson's Apology for Christianity in answer to Gibbon, and Apology for the Bible in answer to Thomas Paine's Age of Reason; Bishop Douglas's reply to Hume, Beattie's Force of Truth, Bishop Butler's Analogy (by far the greatest of all the works named), Leslie's Short and Easy Method with a Deist.

For the history of English Deism the following works may be consulted:—Leland's View of the Principal Deistical Writers; Farrar's History of Free Thought; Hunt's Religious Thought in England; Dr. Stoughton's Religion in England; Essays and Reviews, No. IV.: "Tendencies of Religious Thought in the Eighteenth Century;" Abbey and Overton's Essays on the Church of England in the Eighteenth Century.

Delegates.—Literally, chosen deputies, appointed to act on behalf of others; thus, the delegates that compose the Diocesan Conference are elected by the clergy and laity of each diocese. They are, as a rule, elected for a term of three years.

The Court of Delegates was the final court of appeal in all ecclesiastical causes; the court was composed of judges selected by the Lord Chancellor, and commissioned under the Great Seal to act on behalf of the Crown. Up to 1534 the final court of appeal was the Pope, but by 25 Henry VIII. this Court of Delegates was set up, and all appeals to Rome forbidden. In William IV.'s reign the Court of Delegates was abolished, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council appointed in its place as the court of final appeal. A great defect in the Court of Delegates was the fact that its members were selected as each appeal was presented, and hence an opening was made for the appointment of prejudiced judges to try a particular appeal.

Demetrius, made Bishop of Alexandria in 189, which See he held for forty-three years, dying about 232. He was a man of imperious nature; he took an active interest in the catechetical school of Alexandria, and appointed Origen as its head on the departure of Clement in 203. He sent him on a successful mission to the Roman Governor of Arabia in 217. Their friendship was, however, interrupted. Demetrius was jealous of Origen's popularity, and specially angry that Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, and Theoclitus, Bishop of Cæsarea, had permitted Origen, while only a layman, to preach in their churches; it wounded his hierarchical pride. He recalled him to Alexandria, and for a time their friendly relations were restored; but in 228 Origen re-visited his friends in Palestine, and was ordained priest in Cæsarea. This Demetrius could not forgive, and he convened a synod, accused Origen of heresy, and excluded him from the communion of the Church.

Demission.—The term used in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland for the resignation of a minister.

Demiurge.—The name given by some of the Gnostic sects to the creator of the world, who, according to their opinions, was inferior to the Supreme Being. The word was a philosophical term derived from classical sources, its literal meaning being "a worker for the people," hence applied to the orderly disposer or regulator of the universe. The philosophers of the Neo-Platonic school, together with the Gnostics, felt a reluctance in bringing the Supreme Being into contact with the world of matter, and hence they held that the Demiurge was working out, but unconsciously, the plans of the Supreme Being. The Demiurge was also termed by them the "Soul of the Universe."

Denarii de Caritate.—Customary oblations, anciently made to cathedral churches about the time of Pentecost, when the parish priests and many of their parishioners went in procession to visit their mother church. They were afterwards changed into a settled due, and usually charged upon the parish priest, though at first it was but a gift of charity, or present, towards the support and ornament of the bishop's See.

Denis, St.—Said to be the Apostle of France and the first Bishop of Paris. There are many traditions concerning him, but it is difficult to arrive at any certain information. It is asserted by the Greek Church that he was Dionysius the Areopagite, and sent by Clement from Rome to preach the Gospel to the Gauls. A more probable account is that he came about 250, made many converts in Paris, and was afterwards brought, with two priests, before the Roman governor, by whose order they were cruelly tortured, and put to death in the reign of Aurelian in 272. Gregory of Tours and Sulpicius Severus say that the bodies of the martyrs were thrown into the Seine, but rescued by a pious woman, named Catulla, who buried them near the scene of their martyrdom, and built a chapel over their tomb. King Dagobert, about 638, founded an abbey on the spot to the memory of St. Denis, which grew to be one of the most important in the kingdom, and was for many ages the burial-place of the French kings. His festival is observed on October 9th.

Denmark.—The conversion of Denmark dates from the beginning of the ninth century. Whilst the Northmen were ravaging Christian Europe, brave men went forth into the dreary regions whence they came, in the hope of implanting Christian civilisation among the pine forests and by the ice-bound lakes. Charlemagne had hoped to establish a bishopric at Hamburg, but did not live long enough to carry out his design. After two or three unsuccessful attempts (801–865), Anskar, a native of a village near Amiens, undertook the Danish mission. He was joined by a brother monk, Autbert, but no one else could be found to go with them on so dangerous an expedition. After two years Autbert died, but they had succeeded in founding a school at Schleswig, and in converting the king. But the people were bitterly angry; a rebellion broke out, and Anskar, feeling that his work was at an end for the present, departed for Sweden (829).

He and his companions were robbed by pirates on their way, but before long had established the faith there. In 834 Anskar was consecrated Archbishop of Hamburg, with a general commission to superintend the northern missions, and the Swedish mission was committed to one Simon, as the coadjutor of Anskar. Just three years after, the fierce Norsemen attacked Hamburg, and burnt the church and monastery which Anskar had built. Driven from his church, he did not lose heart, but travelled about his See, to hear before long that owing to similar disasters the Swedish mission was crushed. But his patience and strength of hope had a gradual effect on the people, and things began to look brighter. He rebuilt his church, and presently went forth again himself to make another attempt in Sweden, and not unsuccessfully. One of the last acts of his life, on his return to Hamburg, was to boldly face some chiefs engaged in the slave trade, and to induce them to set their captives free. But many years were to pass before the fierce Vikings declared themselves subjects of the Cross. All through the tenth century the struggle went on, and it was not until the reign of Canute that a permanent conquest was made (1019-35). Even then the Church in Denmark was never so fully organised as in Southern Europe. The canon law would not fit in with the law of the land, free as this was from the Roman admixture which the other nations had received; and the Pope was far away, and but little heard of. When the Reformation came there was no spontaneous outburst of zeal as in other lands, but the Reformed doctrines were adopted from Germany, the Roman Church was abolished, its authority abrogated, its property seized. All the bishops, with one exception, acquiesced in the supremacy of the Crown being substituted for that of the Pope. The Church of Denmark thenceforward became known as "the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Country." For a while no other religion was allowed, but the freer Constitution of 1849 gave greater freedom, and religious disqualifications were removed. The population at present comprises about two millions of the Established Church, 4,000 Jews, and perhaps as many Baptists.

Dens, PETER.—A Roman Catholic theologian, born 1690 at Boom, a small town not far from Antwerp. He was Reader in Theology at Malines for twelve years, and priest of St. Romwald's Church, and also president of the College at Malines for forty years. He died in 1775. The work which has rendered his name famous is Theologia Moralis et Dogmatica; it is a defence of every doctrine of the Romish Church, in the form of a catechism, and is very extensively used as a text-book in their colleges. Protestant moralists have severely condemned him for his casuistry.

Deodand (Deo dandum).—A personal chattel which was the immediate occasion of the death of any reasonable creature, was formerly forfeited to the Sovereign, to be applied to pious uses, or, as the name implies, "given to God." It was distributed in alms by the high almoner. According to Blackstone, it was originally designed as an expiation for the souls of such as were snatched away by sudden death, and for that purpose was given to the Church, in the same manner as the apparel of a stranger who was found dead was applied to purchase masses for the good of his soul. This may account for the rule of law, that no deodand was due when an infant under the age of discretion was killed by a fall from a cart or horse, or the like, not being in motion; whereas, if an adult person fell from thence and was killed, the thing was forfeited. The law of deodand was abolished in 1846.

Deo Gratias (Lat., "Thanks be to God").—In early times a mutual salutation by Christians. The word ago, or agas is understood—"I give," or "give." The theological use of the root from which this verb is derived is seen in the expressions, now familiar, of "an Act of Faith, or of Contrition;" though the English form of the phrase in question, "an Act of Grace," is not common by reason of the different meaning which the latter word has acquired. It is used in the offices of the Romish Church, and also in some English churches after the reading of the Gospel.

D.G.—These letters either stand for Deo GRATIAS, or, when used on coins, etc., for DEI GRATIA, "by the grace of God."

Deposition. [DEPRIVATION.]

Depravity. [ORIGINAL SIN.]

Deprecations.—These form the second of the four portions into which the Litany appointed in the Prayer Book of the Church of England may be separated, viz.: Invocations, Deprecations, Intercessions, and Supplications. In this section certain fundamental sins are deprecating, and deliverance from them, and inferentially from their results, is prayed for. After the introductory prayer, in which sin is referred to in general as past, present, and future—both the sin of our fathers and also our own, with the vengeance it may incur in time to come—the Deprecations Proper begin, broken up into groups, five in number, each followed by the prayer, "Good Lord, deliver us." The first is for deliverance from sin, its innate evils, its author, its full results; the second is for help against inward sins of the heart; the third is for preservation from outward sins of the flesh and their sources, such sins being called "deadly," not with reference to the Roman distinction of mortal and venial sins, but because of their specially dangerous character; the fourth is for protection from bodily harm and accident of various kinds, and from "sudden death;" while the fifth clause combines a wide petition against dangers—civil, ecclesiastical, and spiritual. In this last deprecation, the words "rebellion" and "schism" were added after the Restoration of King Charles II.—a prayer which the circumstances of the time explain. In the Prayer Book of Edward VI. also, after the mention of "privy conspiracy," were appended the words, "from the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities," but they were struck out of the Prayer Book of Elizabeth.

The Deprecations close with three additional clauses addressed directly to Christ, containing a brief summary of the Gospel and its chief events from the Incarnation to the Ascension of Christ, and the presence of the Holy Ghost in the Church, on which is grounded the same pathetic cry for deliverance as before, both in the shadows and sunshine of man's mortal life, in the hour of death that closes it, and in the Day of Judgment that follows it.

Deprivation.—A sentence pronounced by the legally constituted authority, whereby any ecclesiastical officer is deprived of his preferment or office. There are two kinds of deprivation, viz., deprivatio a beneficio, and deprivatio ab officio: the former is when, for some due cause, a cleric is deprived of the preferment which he holds; the latter is when the clergyman is for ever debarred from exercising his sacred office; his orders are indelible, and cannot be taken away, but by this sentence he is deposed or degraded and forbidden to exercise his powers. This must be pronounced by the Bishop. The civil power may by an Act of Parliament deprive any ecclesiastic of his office; thus by the Public Worship Regulation Act an incumbent may be deprived after three years' resistance to the decrees of the Court established by that Act.

Deputatus.—The name for an Acolyte (q.v.) in the Greek Church.

Deputies, DISSENTING.—A committee elected every year by the congregations of Protestant Dissenters of London and the neighbourhood, for watching over matters affecting the rights and privileges of Dissenters. Each congregation within twelve miles appoints two deputies, who have been thus elected annually since 1737, the organisation having been determined upon at a general meeting held Nov. 9th, 1732. The Committee watch Bills introduced into Parliament, breaches of the law, and any matters, general or particular, which may affect for good or ill the civil and religious position of Nonconformists.

Dervish.—A kind of Mahometan monks, otherwise called Mevlavis, from their founder, Mevlana. The name Dervish is derived from a Persian word meaning a door-

from door to door (compare Mendicants). They have several monasteries, and are several thousands in number. The Sultan Othman I. took a special interest in them, and to show his respect for them made their general sit on his throne. They go about almost naked, and fast every Thursday till sunset, besides the ordinary Fast of Ramadan. Every Friday and Tuesday they meet before their Superior, on which occasion one plays upon the flute, while the rest turn round with a wonderful swiftness, and this ceremony is devoutly observed to imitate their founder, who, having turned thus for fourteen days together, fell into an ecstasy, and had revelations vouchsafed to him concerning the settlement of the Order. The flute is esteemed by them as sanctified by Jacob and other shepherds of the Old Testament. They profess poverty, chastity, and obedience, but under certain circumstances have leave to go out of the monastery and marry. Some play tricks to amuse the people, some practise witchcraft, and all drink much wine and brandy to excite mirth. The public services held by them are one of the "sights" to visitors to the East. Fanatical as they are, the people witness them with the deepest earnestness. A few years ago a fearful tumult was raised in Cairo, because in the middle of one of the services one of the Dervishes declared that one of the Europeans was laughing. The Dervishes are divided into two classes—the "dancers" and the "howlers." The former are many of them persons of high rank, and if they attain the full dignity they must do so by undergoing 1,001 days of a hard novitiate, after which they receive a woollen belt, with a magic stone, the tag (white cap), and the rosary, with the ninety-nine names of God. At their public service they prostrate themselves, then whirl round and round, ring within ring, not touching each other, their hands extended wide, their eyes fixed ecstatically. The howlers sway themselves backwards and forwards, shouting incessantly, "There is no God but God." They are said to hold in great reverence a saint named Chederles, who was, as they say, a valiant knight who killed dragons and venomous beasts, and is still invisibly alive, and gives power to charm serpents and to be delivered from shipwrecks. Some authors identify this Chederles with St. George, but probably the name comes from Cheder Elias, which name the Arabians give to the prophet Elijah. The Dervishes of Egypt have placed in heaven Chederles' horse, Mahomet's camel, and the Seven Sleepers' dog. In Thevenot's travels he mentions the prophet Saleh's camel, the ram sacrificed by Abraham, Moses's cow, Solomon's ant, the Queen of Sheba's parrot, Esdras's ass, Jonah's whale, the Seven Sleepers' dog, and Mahomet's camel, among the beasts which, according to Mahomet's opinion, are to go into Paradise.

De Sales. [SALES.]

Descartes, René.—A French philosopher (b. 1596, d. 1650), born at La Haye, in Touraine, educated by the Jesuits, afterwards for a while a soldier, then, always in pursuit of knowledge, a traveller in many countries. When he was yet a student he gave signs of eager inquiry after knowledge. While a boy of nineteen, he formed the determination of renouncing all books, making his mind a tabula rasa, and starting from the beginning. At length he established himself in Holland, and began to write; but threats of persecution arising, he accepted the invitation of Christina, Queen of Sweden, to settle in Stockholm. She treated him with marked distinction, and devoted herself to study under him. But, unfortunately, she would begin at five o'clock in the morning; his health, never robust, broke down under this severe regimen, and he died of pulmonary disease in his fifty-fourth year. As one who gave a powerful impulse to mathematical and philosophical inquiry, Descartes is one of the greatest names among philosophers. In mathematics, though he wrote little, he opened fresh fields of inquiry in all directions. But it is as a religious theorist that he finds place here. In pursuance of the principle we have already described, he started from the position that nothing is to be taken for granted; that the first certainty is consciousness—Cogito, ergo sum ("I think, therefore I am"). This is the point of unity between thought and being. In man, the soul and body touch each other in the pineal gland of the brain; animals have no such gland, therefore they are not immortal. His doctrines were very popular for a while in Paris, as being a protest against the hard materialism of the preceding generation. Many of the most celebrated divines of France were his enthusiastic admirers, among them Bossuet and Fénelon, the Oratorians and the Port-Royalists. The Jesuits stood aloof and tabooed his writings, which, however, exercised great influence for many years. The leading principles contained in them were adopted and developed by Leibnitz.

Descent into Hell.—The Greek name of this place of departed spirits is Hades, meaning "the unseen world;" and it is unfortunate that the Authorised Version of the New Testament has translated by the same word, Hell, which is used for Gehenna, the place of punishment to which souls are to be consigned after judgment. However, the difference is now better understood than formerly, and the Revised Version has reproduced the word Hades where the original is such, as in Acts ii. 31, where St. Peter speaks of our Lord's "descent into hell." "His soul was not left in Hades, neither His Flesh did see corruption."

Desecration.—The pollution of a church by any revolting crime, or by homicide, has been held to render it unfit for the performance of the sacred mysteries of the faith until it has been reconsecrated.

Desk.—In churches, the reading-desk (called in the Communion Service—the only place in the Prayer Book where it is spoken of—the reading-pew) is the place in which the officiating clergyman reads the morning and evening services. The custom of erecting a desk outside the chancel for reading the prayers is not an ancient one, and dates from the sixteenth century. It was thought necessary to have a desk in such a place that the clergyman might be more distinctly heard by the congregation. From the convenient size and arrangements, however, of most of our churches, a special reading-desk has been found unnecessary, and the prayers are usually read now from the chancel. The altar desk is a small stand placed on the communion-table for supporting the service-book.

Destructionists are people who hold that the eternal punishment spoken of in the New Testament consists of an entire annihilation of those who incur that punishment. Some of them hold, also, very materialistic views as to the torments that precede the extinction of the condemned; and, moreover, that these torments are inflicted in a greater or less degree, according to the guilt of the criminals. [CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.]

Determinism.—The assertion of the powerlessness of the human will, which is declared to be determined, bounded, by a power outside itself. Such assertion may take many forms. Calvinism declares that as the only will in the universe is the will of God, the doctrines of Election and Reprobation follow as a necessity. The determinism of Islamism bounds God Himself within the iron will of fatalism, and the Positivism of our own age pronounces all human action to be the result of the circumstances in which men are placed, and which, being out of their control, frees them from responsibility. The answer made to all these theories is based on the conscience of mankind, which, it is urged, recognises within itself a freedom of will, and refuses to acquiesce in its own irresponsibility. It confesses that God is "justified when He speaks, and clear when He judgeth."

Deus miseratur.—The first Latin words of the 67th Psalm, inserted in 1552 as a second Cantic at evening prayer alternative with the Song of Simeon, or Nunc Dimittis, but familiar also in the unreformed service-books, being one of the fixed psalms at Lauds on Sundays and Holy-days, and forming a portion of the (partly) vernacular Sunday service of Bidding Prayers, or Bidding the Bedes. Though a rubric, as has been said, authorised the use of this cantic in 1552, the words of the psalm were not actually printed before Queen Elizabeth's book of 1559, and in one edition of this book two variations of reading are found: "Thou shalt judge Thy folk righteously," in verse 4; and "all the ends of the world shall praise Him," in the last verse. The version is, of course, the current one of the time, that of the "Great Bible," based upon Coverdale's. This, as is well known, is also our present "Prayer-Book version;" and the one difference is that whereas the Psalter reads "yea" in the third verse only, the canticle has it in the fifth also. The Scotch book of 1637, curiously enough, reads "yea" in the third verse only, like our Psalter, while otherwise following the Authorised Version, which has it in neither.

Deutero-canonical.—A word applied to those Books of the Bible which, in the words of the Sixth Article, "the Church doth use only for example of life and instruction of manners, but yet doth not apply them to establish any doctrine." [APOCRYPHA.]

Development.—A word applied theologically to the opinion that the faith of the Church was not fully revealed at the first, but was gradually evolved within the Church, like the principles and facts of science. When Dr. J. H. Newman left the English Church for that of Rome, in 1846, he put forth, in defence of that step, his celebrated Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine. He begins this work by declaring that Christianity is a plain and admitted fact in the history of the world; that it has a continuous history; that unless it can be shown otherwise, we have a right to assume that the Christianity of the second, fourth, seventh, twelfth, and sixteenth centuries is identical with that which Christ taught His Apostles. If any man shall assert that a spurious Christianity has taken its place, the onus probandi is with him. Therefore, Protestantism is not historical Christianity. Protestantism broke with the Christianity of the sixteenth century, and appealed against it to early ages: that is, Protestantism declared that Christianity had grown corrupt, and needed to be re-stated. But this is an assumption which has to be proved, and the proof is not forthcoming. On the other hand, the doctrines which the Reformers accepted are not all definitely contained in the New Testament, e.g. the propositions of the Creed of St. Athanasius. And the difficulty is solved thus: "The increase and expansion of the Christian creed and ritual, and the variations which have attended the process in the case of individual writers and churches, are the necessary attendants on any philosophy or polity which takes possession of the intellect or heart, and has had any wide or extended dominion. From the nature of the human mind, time is necessary for the full comprehension and perfection of great ideas; and the highest and most wonderful truths, though communicated to the world once for all by inspired teachers, could not be com-prehended all at once by the recipients, but, as received and transmitted by minds not inspired, and through media which were human, have required only the longer time and deeper thought for their full elucidation" [p. 27]. The author then proceeds to distinguish between the true development of an idea and the corruption of an idea, and brings forward certain distinctive tests by which the difference may be known. These are (1) Preservation of type or idea. The following passage will illustrate this:—"There is a religious communion claiming a Divine commission, and calling all other religious bodies around it heretical or infidel; it is a well-organised, well-disciplined body; it is a sort of secret society, binding together its members by influences and by engagements which it is difficult for strangers to ascertain. It is spread over the known world; it may be weak or insignificant locally, but it is strong on the whole from its continuity; it may be smaller than other religious bodies together, but larger than each separately. It is a natural enemy to governments external to itself; it is intolerant and engrossing, and tends to a new modelling of society; it breaks laws, it divides families. It is a gross superstition; it is charged with the foulest crimes; it is despised by the intellect of the day; it is frightful to the imagination of the many. And there is but one communion such. Place this description before Pliny or Julian; place it before Frederick II. or Guizot—Apparent divæ facies. Each knows at once, without asking a question, who is meant by it" [p. 205]. (2) Continuity of Principles. "A development, to be faithful, must retain both the doctrine and the principle with which it started." (3) Power of assimilation. "In the physical world whatever has life is characterised by growth, so that in no respect to grow, is to cease to live. It grows by taking into its own substance external materials; and this absorption or assimilation is completed when the materials appropriated come to belong to it or enter into its unity. Two things cannot become one except there be a power of assimilation in one or the other" [p. 74]. (4) Early anticipation. (5) Logical sequence. (6) Preservative additions. "A true development may be described as one which is conservative of the course of development which went before it, which is that development and something besides; it is an addition which illustrates, not obscures, corroborates, not corrects, the body of thought from which it proceeds; and this is its characteristic as contrasted with a corruption" [p. 87]. (7) Chronic Continuance. "A corruption is distinguished from a development by its transitory character" [p. 92].

These are the seven tests, and the author proceeds to apply and illustrate them one by one, with the conclusion that, tried by them, the Roman Catholic religion is the Christianity of its Divine Author developed according to His will and under His guidance.

The doctrine thus laid down was not the doctrine of previous Roman controversialists, who contended that the whole of Roman doctrine could be proved from the Scriptures. And more than one Roman Catholic writer has written against it, as have several eminent controversialists of the English Church. The following extracts are from an American writer, Dr. Richardson, in a work entitled The Churchman's Reasons for his Faith and Practice :—

"That truth which is of faith differs from that truth which is matter of science in almost every respect. It differs from it in its method of communication. It is revealed by the Spirit of God in its own fulness and perfection, and does not depend at all, therefore, for a knowledge of its objective reality upon the wisdom of man. . . . Now, that God actually has made progressive developments of revealed truth, since the first faint promise given to our first parents, and that He may hereafter develop new features in the system of grace, cannot admit of doubt. But yet, in the very nature of the case, such truth cannot admit of development, except as God, its immediate Author, vouchsafes to make it. Its method of communication is such as completely to shut out the possibility of its being subjected to the fancied improvements and developments of the helpless beings whose ignorance it was designed to enlighten, and whose obedience and love it boldly challenges.

"But, on the other hand, that truth which is matter of science, differs in these respects from the truths of faith, and so differs as to admit of progressive development, and this in every one of its departments. In fact, every advance in human science is the result, not of a new revelation from God, as in matters of faith, but of the efforts of the human mind in search after truth.

"With this fundamental distinction between truths of faith and truths of science, we come to another important question:—What are those truths which are matters of faith, and which, as such, do not admit of development? They are those great doctrinal truths, or, more strictly, those great doctrinal facts, which in the early Church were as household words, and about which there was then no dispute. They were early embodied in the Apostles' Creed, and were carried, as the epitome of Gospel truth, by the Apostles and apostolic men, to the ends of the earth. They implied no metaphysical speculations; they were the naked facts of the Gospel, so simple that a child can grasp them, so mysterious that an archangel may not fathom them. They are such as these:—The adorable and ever-blessed Trinity—the Father who loved, the Incarnate Son who died and redeemed, and the Holy Ghost who sanctifies—the system and means of grace, Divinely appointed, perpetuated, and blessed, the forgiveness of sins, the communion of saints, the resurrection of the body, the final judgment, and the life everlasting. A few such simple facts as these were the mighty instruments with which the Apostles went forth, in the power of the Holy Ghost, to convert the world to Christ. In process of time, however, another tendency appeared—a tendency to overlook the simplicity of the truths of faith; in their stead to incorporate a system of metaphysical speculations, to elevate them into confessions of faith, and to make a reception of them indispensable to salvation. Most conspicuous in the exhibition of this tendency, at the first, were the labours of the Schoolmen, and the same tendency has spread far and wide, and been continued down to our own day. The modern doctrine of development has summoned to the bar of human reason and private judgment the awful and mysterious truths of Christian Faith. The original mistake was in elevating matters of opinion to a level with matters of faith. Let the principle of development be carried out to its legitimate results, and what forbids but that every truth of natural and revealed religion shall be denied, and even the personality and perfections of Jehovah be looked upon as figments of the Schoolmen, while men in their fancied wisdom are plunged into the awful blindness and guilt of atheism, or the folly of superstition?"

Development Theory. [EVOLUTION.]

Devil. [SATAN.]

Devil's Advocate.—The name given to the official whose duty it is, in the case of a proposed canonisation, to bring forth all the evidence he can find against it, and to prevent an error being made.

Devotee.—A bigot to his own opinion, or party, or pursuit, especially in matters connected with religion; the notion of error also being generally implied in the name.

Among the various meanings of the cognate verb to devote, the idea of consecrating or setting apart by vow is prominent; hence also follows the signification of addicting oneself to a study or sect. The Crusaders, for instance, who thought heaven nearer at Jerusalem than in Europe, and who left home and country to rescue the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of the infidels, were essentially devotees. A modern devotee runs the risk of imitating their blind passion without their self-sacrificing principle, and of becoming a man who, in his religious views and objects, thinks himself alone and altogether in the right, and all others who differ from him entirely wrong.

Devotions.—It is directed in a rubric in the Communion Service of the Church of England that "the deacons, churchwardens, and other fit persons appointed for that purpose shall receive the alms for the poor and other Devotions of the people." Dr. Barry [Teachers' Prayer Book] identifies them with the "oblations" which we beseech God to accept with our alms in the Prayer for the Church Militant, and which may mean, either the bread and wine just solemnly placed on the Holy Table, or the offerings of various kinds which it was customary to bring at the Communion for the relief of the poor, the maintenance of the clergy, or repairs of the church. This sense of the word devotions has now, however, passed away, and is generally used to represent the private or public prayers of the congregation.

De Wette. [WETTE.]

Diaconate. [DEACON.]

Diaconicum.—A name for the vestry or sacristy of a church in early times, where the deacons performed their duties of preparing the holy vessels, and vestments, and lighting the incense, or any other essential preparations for the celebration of the Eucharist. This diaconicum was usually at the south side of the sanctuary, and often terminated with an apsis, and always contained an altar, on which the sacred elements were placed till they were carried to the sanctuary. Generally there was an external door. No lower minister than a deacon was allowed to enter this vestry. The treasures of the church and relics were preserved here, and the priests used it to change their vestments. The word diaconicum is also applied to a book which contained instructions for the due performance of a deacon's duties, and also for certain prayers which were said by the deacon at intervals during the service.

Diatessaron.—A combination of the first four books of the Gospel, so as to make a consecutive narrative (from Gr. dia, "between, through;" tessara, "four"). The earliest of such books was compiled in the second century by Tatian. In modern times several English writers have compiled "Harmonies of the Gospels," with a view of giving a chronological list of the events in our Lord's life.

Dick, THOMAS, LL.D. (b. 1772, d. 1857), was brought up as a minister in the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, but is best known as a popular writer on physical science. His works had great favour both in England and America, but brought him very little pecuniary return. Shortly before his death, Government bestowed on him a small pension in recognition of his literary services. He occasionally delivered popular scientific lectures. Some of his writings have been translated into foreign languages, one (The Practical Astronomer) into Chinese. His two best known books are The Christian Philosopher, and The Philosophy of Religion. Besides these he published Improvement of Society by the Diffusion of Knowledge, The Mental Illumination of Mankind, The Philosophy of a Future State, Celestial Scenery, a Treatise on the Solar System, The Sidereal Heavens, The Practical Astronomer, and an essay on Christian Benevolence contrasted with Covetousness. Dr. Dick was of an eminently unobtrusive character; his writings are simple and interesting, and attest the sincere piety of their author.

Diderot, DENIS (b. 1713, d. 1784).—A French writer, made famous in history by the great Encyclopédie of which, with D'Alembert, he was joint editor. It was begun in 1749, and he worked at it incessantly for thirty years. He was, unhappily, an atheist, sincere to fanaticism in his opinions, and he used the Encyclopédie as a vehicle for the indirect propagation of his views. [ENCYCLOPÆDISTS.]

Didymus of Alexandria (b. A.D. 308).—This erudite Father lost his sight at five years old, yet made such proficiency in classical and ecclesiastical learning, and even in mathematics, that he became the wonder of his age. He applied himself chiefly to the study of divinity, and was elected to the high honour of the Catechist's Chair in the Church of Alexandria. His great reputation brought him many pupils, of whom the most eminent were St. Jerome, St. Gregory Nazianzen, Rufinus, Palladius, and Isidore. He wrote many Discourses, but none of them remains excepting his tract on the Holy Ghost, translated into Latin by St. Jerome, and inserted in that Father's works; and a Commentary upon the Canonical Epistles, printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum, to which may be added a considerable fragment of a book against the Manichæans. Didymus was pious no less than learned. He was living when St. Jerome wrote his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, i.e. in 392. He died, according to Palladius, A.D. 395, at the age of eighty-seven. His esteem for Origen's opinions (shown in his comment on his book of Principles) was the occasion of his being condemned by the Fifth General Council, and this censure was passed, notwithstanding that he had been zealous against the Arians and died in the communion of the Church. All the ancients, not excepting St. Jerome, extol him for his teaching as well as for his personal character.

Diet.—The name given to the Assembly of the States of the Holy Roman Empire, derived from the Latin dies, "a day." Besides the Diets of the Empire, there were also the Diets of each Circle. The principal Diets connected with the history of religion are the following:—

1. Diet of Worms, 1521.—Alexander, the Pope's nuncio, having charged Luther with heresy, the Duke of Saxony said that Luther ought to be heard, to which the Emperor assented, and sent him a safe-conduct, provided that he would not preach on his journey.

Luther, being at Worms, protested that he would not recant, except they should prove him to be in error from the Word of God alone, and not by the opinions of men; thereupon the Emperor ordered him to quit Worms, and a month after outlawed him before all the Princes of Germany.

2. Nuremberg, 1523.—Pope Adrian VI.'s nuncio demanding the execution of Leo X.'s Bull and of Charles V.'s edict, published at Worms against Luther, answer was made, that it was necessary to call a council in Germany to satisfy the nation about its grievances and claims, which aimed at the destruction of the Pope's authority and the discipline of the Roman Church. It was added, that in the interim the Lutherans should be commanded not to write against the Roman Catholics. All these things were brought into the form of an edict, published in the Emperor's name.

3. Nuremberg, 1524.—Cardinal Campeggio, Pope Clement VII.'s legate, entered incognito into the town for fear of exasperating the people. The Lutherans having the advantage there, it was decreed that, with the Emperor's consent, the Pope should call a council in Germany, but that in the meantime an assembly should be held at Spire, to determine what was to be believed and practised, and that, to obey the Emperor, the princes ought to order the observance of the Edict of Worms as strictly as was possible. Charles V., being angry at this, ordered the Edict of Worms to be scrupulously obeyed, and forbade the assembly at Spire.

4. Spire, 1526.—Charles V., being in Spain, named his brother, the Archduke Ferdinand, to preside in his stead. The Duke of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse demanded a free exercise of the Lutheran religion; and the servants of the Lutheran princes had these letters embroidered on their sleeves, V.D.M.I.E., signifying Verbum Domini manet in æternum, to show publicly that they would follow nothing else but the pure Word of God. It was decreed that the Emperor should be desired to call a national council in Germany within a year, and that in the meanwhile everyone was to have liberty of conscience. Another subject of discussion was concerning help demanded by Lewis, King of Hungary, against the Turks; but whilst the Diet was still deliberating, the valiant King Lewis was defeated and killed at the battle of Mohatz.

5. Spire, 1529.—It was decreed "That in all places where the Edict of Worms against the Lutherans was received, it should be lawful to nobody to change his opinions; but in the countries where the new religion was received it should be lawful to continue in it till the next council, if the ancient religion could not be re-established there without sedition; nevertheless the mass was not to be abolished there, and no Roman Catholic was allowed to turn Lutheran. That the Sacramentarians should be banished out of the Empire, and the Anabaptists put to death, and that preachers should nowhere preach against the doctrine of the Church." Against this decree six Lutheran princes—viz., the Elector of Saxony, the Marquis of Brandenburg, the two Dukes of Lüneberg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Prince of Anhalt, with the deputies of fourteen Imperial towns, protested in writing in the Assembly two days after. They declared that they would not obey it, as it was contrary to the Gospel, and they appealed to the General or National Council, to the Emperor, and to any other unprejudiced judge. From that solemn protestation came the famous name of Protestants, which the Lutherans took first, and the Calvinists and other Reformed Christians afterwards. The princes also protested that they would contribute nothing towards the war against the Turks till the exercise of their religion was free in all Germany. This protestation being presented to the Emperor, Charles V., he said that he would settle the affairs of Germany as soon as he had regulated those of Italy. Next year he called the Diet of Augsburg, hoping thus to re-unite the princes, and to induce them to join him in an expedition against the Turks.

6. Augsburg, 1530.—At this Diet the Emperor appeared with the greatest magnificence ever seen in Germany. The Elector of Saxony, followed by many princes, presented the Confession of Faith, called the Confession of Augsburg. The conference about matters of faith and discipline being concluded, the Emperor ended the Diet by a decree, that nothing should be altered in the doctrine and ceremonies of the Roman Church, till a Council should order otherwise.

7. Ratisbon, 1541.—The object of this Diet was to re-unite the Protestants with the Roman Catholics. On the Emperor's suggestion, three Roman Catholic divines met Melancthon, Bucer, and Ristorius to draw up articles of agreement, but after a disputation of a whole month, only five or six articles out of twenty-two could be accepted, whereupon the Emperor, to end the meeting, ordered that the decisions should be referred to a General Council, or to the National Council of all Germany, or to the next Diet eighteen months after, and that in the meanwhile, the Protestants should keep the articles agreed upon, forbidding them to solicit anybody to change the ancient religion, etc. But to please the Protestants he gave them leave to retain their Reformed faith.

8. Ratisbon, 1546.—None of the Protestant Confederate Princes appeared; nevertheless, it was decreed by a majority of votes that the Council of Trent was to be followed; the Protestant Deputies opposed, and from this a war resulted.

9. Augsburg, 1547.—The Electors being divided concerning the decisions of the Council of Trent, the Emperor demanded that the management of the matter should be left to him, and it was resolved that everyone should conform to the Council's decisions.

10. Augsburg, 1548.—The Commissioners nominated to examine some memoranda about a Confession of Faith not agreeing together, the Emperor named three divines who drew the design of the famous Interim. [INTERIM.]

11. Augsburg, 1550.—The Emperor complained that the Interim was not observed, and demanded that all should submit to the Council which was to be renewed at Trent. Duke Maurice's deputies protested that their master submitted to the Council on this condition, that the Divines of the Confession of Augsburg should not only be heard there, but should also be allowed to vote. But by a majority of votes, submission to the Council was resolved upon.

12. Ratisbon, 1557.—The Assembly demanded a Conference between some famous doctors of both parties, and this was held at Worms in September between twelve Roman Catholic and twelve Lutheran divines, but was dissolved in consequence of the Lutherans' division among themselves.

Digamy (Gr. digamia, "a second marriage").—The practice of marrying a second time after the death or divorce of the first husband or wife. In early times second marriage was forbidden to all orders of clergy above the sub-diaconate, and many went so far as to say that it was a form of adultery, and unlawful for clergy and laity alike. It was, however, generally permitted to the laity, a distinction being drawn between second marriages after divorce or separation, and after death.

Dignitary is a bishop or other ecclesiastic who holds dignity—that is, an office which bestows jurisdiction. Strictly speaking, bishops, deans, archdeacons, are the only Church dignitaries, though the title is often applied to canons and prebendaries as well. In some cases, the chancellor and treasurer, together with the precentor and succentor, are also so called.

Dilapidations, ECCLESIASTICAL.—The pulling down, or suffering to go to waste, of a chancel or parsonage house. For such dilapidations an incumbent is liable when living, and his executors after his death. The Acts of 1871 and 1872 (34 and 35 Vict., cap. 43, and 35 and 36 Vict., cap. 96) provide that a local surveyor shall be appointed for each diocese by the archdeacons and rural deans, whose business it is to examine and report to the bishop. The incumbent is not bound during his lifetime to request such examination, but he may do so, and having executed such repairs as the surveyor shall have directed, he receives a certificate which frees him and his executors for five years from date. Where this certificate is not held the surveyor examines at his death, and the repairs as before are charged on his estate. An incumbent may, by consent of the bishop and patron, borrow from QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY (q.v.) the necessary funds for repairs, but the amount so borrowed may not exceed three years' net income of the benefice. The incumbent is in every case bound to insure against fire, on pain of sequestration.

Dimasrites.—The followers of Apollinaria, the name (from Gr. dimoiria "two-thirds") being given in scorn, because whilst they admitted the human body and life of Christ, they denied that He had a reasonable human spirit, alleging that its place was taken by the Divine Logos within Him.

Dimissory Letters.—The permission granted by a bishop to a candidate for holy orders of deacon or priest to receive them from some other bishop. It is an irregularity for a bishop to ordain, without such permission, any who are not of his own diocese, i.e., those (according to the old definition) not born, resident, or holding a title in it; and orders so given, in ancient times, exposed the ordaining bishop to suspension, and required a dispensation to establish them. Therefore, if a candidate wishes to be ordained by any bishop except the one in whose diocese he is to officiate, Letters Dimissory are addressed by the one bishop to the other, permitting and requesting the ordination; although at present a mere private arrangement is sometimes substituted for the formal procedure. Those ordained on college titles are, however, exempt by canon 34 from this rule.

Diocese (Gr. diokēsis).—The name originally of the great divisions of the Roman Empire. Constantine the Great divided the Empire into four dioceses, each diocese consisting of several provinces. The term diocese was then adopted to denote the great patriarchal divisions of the Church, each patriarchal division containing several single bishoprics. About the beginning of the fourth century the word passed into its present use, of denoting each single bishopric; the term province (for example, the provinces of Canterbury and York) being restricted to the greater divisions. For the first three centuries, a diocese, as we now understand the word, was called a parochia. The Church, in forming her provinces and dioceses, followed very closely the model of the Empire; thus, in the civil organisation, the Oriental diocese was composed of fifteen provinces; so, in the ecclesiastical system, the same diocese under the Patriarch of Antioch was composed of fifteen single bishoprics, the provinces and bishoprics corresponding with each other; hence arose the difference in size and dignity of the single dioceses. For, as one city or province was larger or more influential than another, so one diocese differed from another. In the middle ages, the single dioceses had increased in number to a very great extent; thus there were 300 single dioceses in Italy, many of them being confined to the walls of small cities. At the beginning of the fourth century there had been but seventeen, corresponding to the seventeen civil provinces.

In England there were, in the early days of the Heptarchy, but seven dioceses, corresponding in some measure to the seven kingdoms; but at the Council of Hertford (673), under Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, it was decreed that this number should be increased. The first step taken was to divide the diocese of the East Angles into two parts, Elmham and Dunwich; these two, however, were subsequently re-united, and the see removed to Thetford, and thence to Norwich. In Northumberland there were at first only two dioceses, York and Lindisfarne, but in 678 four or five new sees were formed, which are now extinct. In Mercia, which contained seven-tenths of the kingdom and part of another, there was at first but one diocese, that of Lichfield; in 678, however, a see was formed at Sidnacester, in Lincolnshire, and another, shortly afterwards, at Dorchester, in Oxfordshire: these two were subsequently united, and the see was removed to Lincoln. Later on, again, the dioceses of Worcester and Hereford were taken out of Lichfield, and Ely out of Lincoln; and at the Reformation, Chester, Peterborough, Oxford, and Gloucester were formed out of the same diocese of Lichfield. Lichfield and Lincoln have been further subdivided within the last few years by the formation of the new diocese of Southwell.

The diocese of Winchester at first corresponded with the kingdom of the West Saxons; it was, however, divided in 705 into Winchester and Sherborne; the latter has been subdivided into the dioceses of Exeter, Wells, Salisbury, and Bristol. In recent years, among others, Truro has been formed out of Exeter, Newcastle out of Durham, Manchester out of Chester, St. Albans out of London and Rochester. There are proposals on foot to still further subdivide the larger dioceses, in order that they may be reduced to a manageable size, and that the work of the Church may be more efficiently carried on. For particulars as to the various dioceses, see their respective heads.

Diocesan Conferences.—These were resumed in the English Church, after having for many years fallen into desuetude, in 1850. The revival was, no doubt, due mainly to the "Gorham judgment" in that year. A conviction possessed the minds of Churchmen—not only of those who disliked Mr. Gorham's views—but of men of the most moderate and non-party views, that the Church was "muzzled," and unable to express her opinions. To the late Bishop of Exeter is due the praise of having led the way in removing this disability by opening a Diocesan Synod. He was very severely criticised at the time, but persevered, and was soon followed in the dioceses of Chichester, Bath and Wells, and Oxford. At present such conferences are the rule in every diocese in England except Worcester. In 1879 the Convocation of Canterbury appointed a committee "to receive official reports of the several Diocesan Conferences of the Province, and to make such reports from time to time as may be deemed desirable." This Committee's sixth annual report, published in 1884, is full of information and practical suggestions, arranged under four heads—viz., Religious, Educational, Ecclesiastical, Parliamentary, and Social. The Constitution of the Canterbury Conference is here given, as being that of the Metropolitan See:—

The Conference shall consist of the following members. Members, being communicants:—(I.) Ex-officio, (II.) Nominated, and (III.) Elected.

I.—EX-OFFICIO CLERICAL MEMBERS.

The Dean and Canons, Residentiary and Non-Residentiary, and the Six Preachers.
The Archdeacons.
The Rural Deans.
The Proctors in Convocation.
The Warden of St. Augustine's College.
The Archbishop's Inspector of Training Colleges.
The Diocesan Inspectors of Schools.

EX-OFFICIO LAY MEMBERS.

The Lord Lieutenant of the County of Kent.
The High Sheriff of the County of Kent.
The Chairman of General and Quarter Sessions of the County of Kent.
Members of either House of Parliament, resident or representing constituencies in the diocese.
Mayors of corporate towns in the diocese.
The Registrar of the diocese.
The Archbishop's legal secretary.
The Commissary of the diocese.
The Archdeacon's registrars.

EX-OFFICIO MEMBERS, LAY OR CLERICAL.

H. M. Inspectors of Schools in the diocese.
The secretaries of the Conference.
The secretaries of committees appointed by the Conference.
The secretaries and treasurers of the diocesan Church Building Society.
The secretaries and treasurers of the diocesan Education Society.
The principal editor of the diocesan calendar.

II.—NOMINATED MEMBERS, LAY OR CLERICAL.

Twelve members to be nominated by the Archbishop.
Speakers (not more than three) invited by the Standing Committee.

III.—ELECTED MEMBERS.

Clerical and lay delegates from the clergy and communicant laity of the several rural deaneries of the diocese.

All members shall be nominated or elected triennially about the second week in October.

MODE OF ELECTION.

I.—CLERICAL DELEGATES.

N.B.—In sending out lists of names for the election of delegates, lay or clerical, the Rural Dean shall indicate any already ex-officio or nominated members of the Conference.

(1) The clerical delegates shall be elected by and out of the beneficed and licensed clergy of each rural deanery.

(2) The number of clerical delegates for each rural deanery shall be, as near as possible, one-fourth of the number of beneficed and licensed clergy therein.

(3) For the purpose of electing clerical delegates, the Rural Dean shall enclose to each clergyman a schedule of the names of the beneficed and licensed clergy of the rural deanery, with a request that he will mark the names of those for whom he votes, and send the schedule to the rural dean or bring it to the Burialdean Chapter, or Burialdean Conference of Clergy and Laity, where the election is to take place.

(4) Each clergyman shall give his vote for the full number of clerical delegates to be elected. The majority of the votes thus given shall determine the election; in cases of equality of votes the election shall be determined by lot.

II.—LAY DELEGATES.

(1) The lay delegates shall be elected for each rural deanery by and out of lay representatives to be appointed for each parish or ecclesiastical district of the rural deanery in manner hereinafter described.

(2) The number of lay delegates for each rural deanery shall be the same as that of clerical delegates therein.

(3) For the purpose of electing lay delegates the rural dean shall enclose to each lay representative a schedule of the names of all lay representatives of the rural deanery, with a request that he will mark the names of those for whom he votes, and send the schedule to the Rural Dean or bring it to the Burialdean Conference of Clergy and Laity, where the election is to take place.

(4) Each lay representative shall give his vote for the full number of lay delegates to be elected. The majority of the votes thus given shall determine the election; in case of equality of votes, the election shall be determined by lot.

(5) If any delegate, lay or clerical, on his election being notified to him by the Rural Dean, decline to act, the next name, lay or clerical, according to the nature of the vacancy, in order of majority of votes in the schedules of that deanery, shall be substituted. The same provision shall apply in the case of a vacancy caused by death, removal, or resignation, the Rural Dean immediately making the necessary notification in each case to the Archbishop.

III.—LAY REPRESENTATIVES.

(1) The Lay Representatives, being adult male Communicants, and having local connection with the rural deanery, shall be elected for each parish or ecclesiastical district by the communicants thereof, above eighteen years of age.

(2) One such lay representative shall be elected in respect of a population not exceeding 2,000, and one for each additional 2,000, or fractional part thereof.

(3) For the purpose of electing lay representatives, a meeting of the communicants of the parish or ecclesiastical district, to be presided over by the incumbent or his deputy, shall be convened by notice, read in church, and affixed to the church doors at least seven days before. The secretaries shall send to each Rural Dean two copies of the notice for this purpose for each incumbent in his rural deanery. The result of the election shall be at once notified to the Rural Dean.

(4) Lay representatives shall be summoned to all meetings of lay and clerical conferences for their rural deanery.

(5) If the same lay representative is returned for more than one parish or district, the Rural Dean shall request him to state for which he will act, and shall then send notice to the other parish or parishes to proceed to a new election.

(6) The lay representatives shall be elected triennially about the first week in October.

Diocletian Persecution.—Diocletian became Emperor about 284. During the first sixteen years of his reign, the Christians were unmolested, and it was not till the beginning of the fourth century that he began a bitter persecution. It first began in the army, orders being given that all who would not do sacrifice should be deprived of their dignity; and, in order to test the soldiers, festivals in honour of the gods were appointed. Marcellus, a centurion at Tangier, refused to comply, and threw down his arms, declaring he would rather quit the Emperor's service; he was beheaded. This was sufficient to show the feeling of the court, but the Church was unprepared for its danger; many of her ministers, as well as her people, were worldly and slothful, and there lacked the piety, wisdom, and zeal of the early martyrs to arouse them. Galerius (who, with Constantius, held the rank of Cæsar under Diocletian and Maximian as the two Augusti) was the chief instigator of the persecution; he had been trained by his mother in a bigoted adherence to paganism, and furious hatred of Christianity. Diocletian held his winter court in Nicomedia, and thither Galerius repaired in order to stir him up against the Church. He found him not wanting in desire to see Christianity extirpated, but disposed to try to do it by fraud rather than violence; but the furious disposition of Galerius prevailed, and Nicomedia was the first scene of their endeavour. On the Feast of Terminalia (Feb. 23rd, 303), a party of soldiers entered the church, plundered it, burned the sacred writings, and in a few hours levelled the building to the ground. On the following day this edict was issued:—"Men of the Christian religion, of whatever rank or degree, are deprived of all honours and dignities, are exposed to torture; every one may have justice against them, while they are debarred the benefit of the laws in all cases whatever." This was followed up by the placing of altars in the courts of justice, at which plaintiffs were obliged to sacrifice before their cases could be heard. Twice the Emperor's palace was set on fire, and the charge laid to the Christians; and by this and similar means Diocletian was roused to as high a pitch of rage as his partner. The ministers of the Church, when discovered, were put to instant death, and others, without regard to rank, sex, or age, were burned or otherwise destroyed. Peter, one of the Emperor's own household, was accused and scourged in his master's presence till his bones were laid bare; he was then rubbed with salt and bathed in vinegar, and still refusing to do sacrifice, was burnt in a slow fire. The Emperor's wife and daughters, being suspected of showing favour to the Christians, were compelled to do honour to the gods. Although many, struck with terror, apostatised, the greater number remained faithful to their Lord, and suffered martyrdom.

Orders were sent into all provinces of the Empire to exterminate the Christians, and in most places the orders were carried out with horrible faithfulness. In one instance a city known to be chiefly inhabited by Christians was surrounded by soldiers, and then set on fire in various places so as to destroy them all. Some were made to face the gladiators and the wild beasts as a sport before the Emperors; some were banished to the deserts to die of famine, and others were condemned to the mines. Some Christians saved their lives by giving up copies of the Holy Scriptures. They were known as Traditors. Galerius, anxious to become himself the chief in power, contrived at length to procure the resignation of Diocletian and Maximian; but Constantius, who ruled over Gaul and Britain, never carried on the persecution so hotly as his colleagues; indeed, he secretly favoured the Christians. His son Constantine was a hostage in the court of Galerius, but foreseeing the danger to which he was thus exposed, escaped and joined his father at York. Constantius dying immediately after, Constantine was proclaimed Emperor in 306, and at once protected the Christians in his own division. The cessation of persecution in the other parts of the Empire was accelerated by a dreadful and loathsome disease which fell on Galerius, under the agonies of which he issued an edict permitting the Christians to resume their worship in tranquillity, and requesting them to supplicate their God for his health. He died in 311. The persecution had lasted ten years. Gibbon computes those who had perished under it at 2,000. It was vainly hoped that Christianity was destroyed, but in the succeeding reign of Constantine it was made the national religion of the Empire.

Diodati, JOHN, a minister at Geneva, translated the Bible into Italian, and published it, with some annotations, in 1607. The distinguishing mark of his version was, that he studied clearness of expression and the smoothing away, somewhat too much, of ruggedness and difficulties. He translated the Bible also into French, and gave the first French translation of Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent.

Diodorus, priest in the Church of Antioch, lived in the fourth century. During the banishment of Miletius, in the reign of Valens, he took care of the people in Antioch, preserved the Catholic faith, and introduced the custom of singing the Psalms alternately. Diodorus was consecrated Bishop of Tarsus, the metropolis of Cilicia, in 378. He assisted afterwards at the Council of Constantinople in 381, and was one of those chosen specially to watch over the Eastern Church, and guard against the various branches of heterodoxy. He died in 394, and about fifty years after his death he was charged with having led the way to the Nestorian heresy. Cyril of Alexandria accuses him of having, in his controversy with Apollinarius, developed a false theory with regard to the two natures of Christ, and makes him distinguish the Word born of God, from the Son of Mary. Cyril succeeded in getting the works of Diodorus and his pupil Theodore of Mopsuestia condemned in 449. But, on the other hand, Athanasius, Basil, and Chrysostom, who had been his pupils, give him the character of a most holy bishop and a noble champion of the Catholic faith, and it is certain that the Council of Constantinople greatly commended him, and had full reliance on his sentiments. He made the Scriptures a special study, and wrote an exposition on almost all the canonical books. He is one of the earliest commentators who were content with the literal sense, apart from allegorical conjectures. He also wrote several tracts against heretics, and a discourse on Destiny.

Diognetus.—The recipient of a very beautiful Christian letter in the second century, of whose history nothing is known, nor is even the name of the author of the letter. A faded manuscript of this letter was discovered in the sixteenth century by H. Stephens, and transcribed and printed by him. The copy perished at Strasburg in the siege of 1870. The letter is deservedly included in Hefele's edition of the Apostolic Fathers. Stephens supposed that the writer was Justin Martyr, but some fragments brought to light by Dr. Cureton ascribe the letter to one "Ambrosius, a chief man of Greece;" and other research has made it sufficiently clear that this Ambrosius lived in the time of the Antonines. The Epistle to Diognetus consists of responses to queries which Diognetus had put to the author. The latter has written a former treatise To Greeks, explaining why he has given up his faith in the Greek mythology. Thereupon Diognetus asks him in what God Christians trust, seeing that they look above the universe and fear not death, and yet believe not in the gods of the Greeks nor observe any superstition of the Jews. He replies that they believe in the one God of the Jews, and also that He sent His Son into the world to teach a religion of purity and love, and that He will send Him yet again. In answer to the second question of Diognetus, respecting the nature of Christian love, he shows that it has its origin in the Son of God; and amplifies this statement into an exposition of Christian doctrine. And lastly, in answer to the question why this new faith was revealed no earlier, he replies that it had been in course of revelation through the ages, gradually unfolded, until the time of appearing came, and the glory of God shone forth upon the world.

Dionysius the Areopagite, of Acts xvii., claims mention here, as being the reputed author of some treatises on The Heavenly and Ecclesiastical Hierarchies, and on The Names of God, which were quoted against the Severians in 533. Critical examination, however, has shown that they must be of much later date than the first century. Dr. Westcott thinks them not earlier than the sixth. They were printed in 2 vols. at Antwerp in 1634. There are various legends about Dionysius, of no historical value, and he has been attempted to be identified with St. Denis of France. [DUNN.]

Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, one of the greatest men of his time for piety, learning, and eloquence. He flourished about the year 170, and not only governed his own diocese well, but wrote letters of great value to foreign churches. It is from them that we learn that St. Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome; he also says that Dionysius the Areopagite was Bishop of Athens. His letters also furnish much information concerning discipline and morality. Thus, in the letter to the Gnosians he advises the Bishop Pynitus not to put restraints upon the clergy with respect to marriage. In that to the Romans he mentions St. Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians, and takes notice that it is used on Sundays in his church. He likewise mentions that heretics have interpolated and maimed some of his letters. The Greek Menaion represents him as a martyr, and says that he was beheaded with the sword on Nov. 29th, probably in 178. None of his epistles are extant, but a catalogue of them, with extracts, is preserved by Eusebius; they were written to the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Amasians in Pontus, Gnosians in Crete, and to the Romans.

Dionysius, Patriarch of Alexandria in 248, so zealous in maintaining the orthodox religion that he wrote against Origen, his own master. During the persecution of Decius he escaped into Libya, and having returned thence, he wrote against Sabellius; but maintaining the distinction between the Divine Persons, he seemed to divide the substance, and therefore was believed to have gone to the verge of heresy. Basil writes that he laid the foundation of Arius's heresy in one of his epistles, though not intentionally; in fact, he afterwards wrote to guard against the danger he had unwittingly caused. He wrote against the Millenarians and Paul of Samosata, and opposed Nepos, who supported them, saying that though he had a great value for his merit and person, yet he honoured truth more. The part which he took in the Novatian controversy was that of a peace-maker. He was invited, in 263, to the Synod of Antioch, assembled against Paul of Samosata. Besides his epistles to Paul of Samosata, which are in the Bibliotheca Patrum, he wrote upon the Resurrection of Christ, and also made some collections of Canon Law. He died in 265.

Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian by birth, abbot of a monastery at Rome; called Exiguus, on account of the littleness of his stature, or, as some hold, of the meanness of his birth; died about 566. He was one of the most learned men that the Church has ever had. His works are: Collectio sive Codex Canonum Ecclesiasticorum, a translation into Latin of the first fifty apostolical canons, and the canons of the Councils of Nice, Constantinople, Chalcedon, Sardica; and some others held in Africa; Collectio Decretorum Pontificum Romanorum a Siricio ad Anastasium ii., Epistola Synodica S. Cyrilli & Consilii Alexandrini adcerens Nestorium, translated into Latin; Epistola Paschalis Proterii ad Leonem Latine versa, una cum Epistolis duabus ipsius Exigui Paschalis, ad Petronium & Bonifacium; Cycclus Paschalis. This last is the most celebrated work of Dionysius, for in this Cycle he computes from the Incarnation of Christ, without mentioning Olympiads, Consulates, or any other era, and was the first who began the Christian method of chronology.

Dioscorus. [EPHESUS, ROBBER COUNCIL OF.]

Diptycha.—The equivalent of this word (diptycha) is found in the ancient Greek liturgies, and signifies two tablets, or tablets joining together like the tables of Moses, on which the names of deceased persons to be commemorated in the Church were written—sometimes also of the living; chiefly of bishops, who had the first place on the tablets. It was the office of the deacon to recite these names during the liturgy, and this became the custom in the Latin as well as the Eastern Church. The time of recital varied with different churches, the primary custom being to read them after the oblation of the bread and wine (this is in a measure retained at the close of the Prayer for the Church Militant); in the Roman liturgy the commemoration of the living is made before the consecration, and that of the dead after it.

Director.—In the Roman Church, one who directs or advises others who consult him in spiritual matters. Shipley defines direction as the "ghostly counsel and advice" of the Prayer Book. In the Roman Church the Director is always a priest, and usually the confessor of the person seeking direction, a term which is generally used of advice sought on special occasion, as in the choice of a vocation, or with reference to the higher spiritual life.

Directory.—A regulation for religious worship, drawn up by the Parliament, January 3rd, 1645, when they forbade the use of the Book of Common Prayer. It was a manual of directions rather than a form of devotion, and was designed to give the minister suggestions so that he might not be at a loss in leading the public devotions of his congregation. General heads were mapped out which might be filled in at discretion, for the Directory prescribed no form of prayer, no circumstances of external worship, nor did it oblige the people to make any response beyond Amen. This work is called, A Directory for the Public Worship of God throughout the Three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Together with an Ordinance of Parliament for the taking away of the Book of Common Prayer, and the Establishing and Observing of this present Directory throughout the Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales. This Directory, when finished by the Assembly, was enforced by an ordinance of the Lords and Commons at Westminster, and on August 23rd this was followed by another injunction, "For the more effectual putting in execution the Directory," etc., in which there was an order for dispersing and publishing the Directory in all Parishes, Chapels, Donatives, etc. In opposition to this injunction of the rebels, the King sent forth a proclamation at Oxford, November 13th, 1645, enjoining the use of the Common Prayer according to Law, notwithstanding the pretended ordinances for the New Directory.

Dirge.—A hymn of mourning for the dead. The word is derived from Dirige, Domine, nos, the opening words of the antiphon in the Roman Catholic service for the dead.

Discalceati. [CAPUCHINS.]

Disciples of Christ.—The name of a sect founded by Mr. Thomas Campbell, an Irish Presbyterian minister of the "Secession" party, who, having gone to the United States, set himself the task of bringing about a union of all Christians. His idea was that the numerous divisions of Christians, unscriptural and pernicious as they were, would disappear with the growth of brotherly union and concord. He began in 1810 with a congregation at Brush Run, Pennsylvania, to whom he laid down the principle that the Bible is the authorised bond of union, as well as the rule of faith and practice. For a time things went well; then a controversy began about infant baptism, and this led to a split, Mr. Campbell being against the baptism of infants. He joined the Baptist body, but here divergencies again showed themselves, which caused a fresh separation. Since then the body has grown in America; the name which they adopted is a memorial of the idea with which they started, namely, the rejection of "sectarian" names. There are ten congregations of them in Great Britain. They are sometimes known as Campbellites, after their founder.

Disciplina Arcani.—The Discipline of the Secret, a name given by theological writers to a system pursued for some time by the early Church, by which the most important and mysterious doctrines and solemn rites of Christianity were concealed from the catechumens or unbaptised, and fully developed only to those who had been admitted to the Holy Communion. Thus it appears that the administration of baptism, confirmation, and the eucharist, the ordination of priests, as well as the mystery of the Trinity, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer, were concealed, or held more or less in reserve, till the catechumens were sufficiently advanced in elementary instruction and in position as recognised members of the Church, to render it expedient and safe to reveal to them the higher mysteries of the faith. There is abundant testimony that certain classes of catechumens were forbidden to be present in church when the prayers of the "faithful" were offered, though they were allowed to hear prayers for themselves, and also to hear sermons of a certain kind, or portions of Scripture for their instruction. St. Chrysostom remarks that they were not permitted to use the Lord's Prayer, because they had not yet liberty or confidence enough to pray for themselves, but needed the help of those who were already initiated: for "they stand without the royal gates, and at a distance from the holy rails." They were as yet considered as nothing more than foreigners and aliens, and were always dismissed from the public assemblies at an early part of the communion office. They were allowed, however, to read some portions of Holy Scripture, chiefly the moral and historical books, including some which are now classed as apocryphal. On this point, St. Athanasius says, though these latter "were not canonical books, as the rest of the books of the Old and New Testament, yet they were such as were appointed to be read by those who were new proselytes, and desirous of being instructed in the way of godliness: such were the Wisdom of Solomon, Esther, Judith, and Tobit." St. Cyril of Jerusalem, however, appears to allow them more liberty, and charges them to read all the canonical books, excepting only the Revelation of St. John; and Bede asserts that they were obliged to get some of the Holy Scriptures by heart as part of their exercise and discipline before they were baptised.

Gieseler remarks that the Disciplina Arcani reached its highest development in the fourth century, but afterwards gradually disappeared, as heathenism ceased; and he accounts for its existence, not on grounds of prudence and Scriptural example, but because Christians were too ready to find a reason for this secrecy in the nature of their holy transactions, by virtue of which they must be kept secret as mysteries from all unbaptised persons—an idea which arose out of, and was fostered by, the example of heathen mysteries. Others urge that it is more charitable to say that the primitive Church was accustomed to make some trial of the candidates for baptism, causing them to pass through a course of instruction in which they were led by certain steps from the elementary to the complete knowledge of their duties, preparatory to that initiatory sacrament. [REARER, DOCTRINE OF.]

Discipline.—This word has several meanings, which we shall endeavour to distinguish. The word signifies first instruction. "He had charge of my discipline to frame," writes Spenser. Hence it came to mean that which is taught, e.g. science, hence a system of doctrine. Hence, in its religious sense, discipline means (1) Laws which bind conduct, as distinct from dogmatic decrees which regulate faith. Such laws may be of Divine institution, as, for example, the moral law of the Decalogue. Other laws may be altered, from time to time, according to circumstances, e.g., the Roman Church has seen fit to forbid the marriage of the clergy, but does not pretend that the law of the Church was always thus. [CELIBACY.] The Twentieth Article declares the teaching of the Church of England on this subject. (2) In the Communion Service of the Church of England the putting "to open penance such persons as stood convicted of notorious sin" is called "a godly discipline," and the hope is expressed that such discipline will be restored again. This is according to the original meaning of the expression "Ecclesiastical discipline." It is still sometimes exercised in cases of flagrant immorality, so far as to the exclusion from Holy Communion, amongst nearly all Christian bodies. [See further in the article on EXCOMMUNICATION.] (3) The word is sometimes applied to acts of external mortification and self-imposed punishment. "The love of God makes a man chaste without the laborious acts of fasting and exterior discipline," says Jeremy Taylor. (4) It is applied in monastic houses to the scourge with which such mortifications were inflicted. (5) In the days of Queen Elizabeth the word was applied to certain books issued by the ultra-Calvinist party. First in order comes the Book of Discipline, drawn up by John Knox and four other ministers in 1560, the same year as the Confession of Faith was put forth. This book laid down laws for the election of ministers by the congregation, and their examination by the ministers and elders, but was mostly occupied with the maintenance of order and the punishment of offences. The second Book of Discipline, drawn up by a Committee of the General Assembly, was adopted in 1578, and is regarded as the most authoritative statement of Scottish Presbyterianism.

The fate of the Book of Discipline put forth by the English Ultra-Calvinists was very different. Unlike the clergy of Scotland, they were in a minority in England. They outwardly conformed to the Established Order, but strove to substitute for it the Presbyterian "discipline" established at Geneva. First they objected to the clerical dress, then to the whole Church ceremonial, then to the Episcopal framework of the Church. Those churches which had not the "Discipline" they pronounced to be Antichrist; ministers episcopally ordained might be profitably re-ordained according to the Discipline. The Book of Discipline had been drawn up by Cartwright and Travers on the Geneva model, and Travers had given practical proof of his conviction by submitting to be "called to the ministry" by a congregation at Antwerp, though he was already B.D. of Cambridge. The plan of the Discipline was that a classis or conference of godly ministers should be formed, to whom all who desired the ministry were first to apply. If approved by the classis and "called," they were practically ordained, but were to apply to the bishop for legal admission. Questions of ceremonial were to be settled by the classis. The classis of each neighbourhood might be grouped into a provincial synod, and the provincial synods into a national synod, which might meet in London with advantage at the time of the meeting of Parliament. It was against this party that Hooker wrote his Ecclesiastical Polity. [HOOKER.] In 1584 the Puritans pressed this Book of Discipline on Parliament, the acceptance of which would have been the abolition of the Book of Common Prayer, and the substitution of a Directory, but the proposal was rejected by the House of Commons. Two years later they tried again, but were more summarily defeated. Thereupon those who favoured it determined to uphold it by a mutual bond. Twenty-four ministers of Warwick and Northampton subscribed the Book of Discipline as binding upon them, and five hundred others are said to have joined them. But their influence in the country was small, and only revived when the mischievous policy of the Stuarts identified them with the cause of liberty.

Dispensation.—A privilege granted under peculiar circumstances by ecclesiastical authority, by which persons may be exempted from a strict compliance with certain requirements of the canons. In primitive times bishops might dispense with the length of the penance enjoined by the canons; difficult cases, such as marriage questions, were taken to Rome, and the Pope thus not only acquired great power, but found the right of dispensation a fruitful source of revenue. By a statute of 25 Henry VIII., this power was taken from the Pope, and handed over to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be used only so far as may be done without breaking the laws of God, while all greater matters must have the King's consent in Chancery.

Dispensing Power.—The Kings of England, by virtue of their prerogative, have the privilege of dispensing with some Acts of Parliament to particular persons. The case of pardoning in regard to a prisoner is in point. "The king," says Coke, "may dispense with any particular person so far as to shelter him from incurring the penalty of the statute, though it be an Act made pro bono publico," and this right of relaxing is a trust and confidence inseparably annexed to the royal person of the king. But there is a difference between a dispensation and a pardon, arising out of the difference of crime. Thus it is a crime to coin money, as being contrary to the statutes of the realm. Before the statute was made, it was no crime at all. But murder and adultery were always crimes. The one is known to casuists as malum prohibitum, the other as malum in se. The king cannot dispense with mala in se, though he can pardon them when committed. But he can make the thing prohibited merely by statute lawful to particular persons. His power was admitted by the Houses of Parliament on several occasions. But in the great struggle between Charles I. and his Parliament, the House of Commons found it necessary to declare that this power was limited. On May 13th, 1628, at a full committee of the two Houses, Mr. Glanvill thus addressed the House of Lords as spokesman of the Commons: "There is a trust inseparably reposed in the persons of the Kings of England, but that trust is regulated by law; for example, when statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in se, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties to accrue to the king, and to the informers that shall sue for the breach of them: the Commons must and ever will acknowledge a regal and sovereign prerogative in the king touching such statutes, that it is in his Majesty's absolute and undoubted power to grant dispensations to particular persons, with the clauses of non obstante, to do as they might have done before those statutes, wherein his Majesty conferring grace and favour upon some, doth not do wrong to others; but there is a difference between those statutes and the laws and statutes whereon the petition is grounded: by those statutes the subject has no interest in the penalties, which are all the fruit such statutes can produce (that is, to such informer) until, by suit or information commenced, he become entitled to the particular forfeitures; whereas the laws and statutes mentioned in our petition are of another nature; there shall your Lordships find us to rely upon the good old statute called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the ancient common laws of the liberties of England. There shall your Lordships also find us to insist upon divers other most material statutes, made in the time of King Edward III. and King Edward IV. and other famous kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful rights and privileges belonging to the subjects of this realm; laws not inflicting penalties upon offenders in mala prohibita, but laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming, ipso facto, an inherent right and interest of liberty and freedom in the subjects of this realm, as their birthrights and inheritances descendible to their heirs and posterity; statutes incorporate into the body of the common law, over which (with reverence be it spoken) there is no trust in the king's sovereign power or prerogative royal to enable him to dispense with them, or to take from his subjects that birthright or inheritance which they have in their liberties, by virtue of the common law and of these statutes." Here then the Commons expressly acknowledged that the king has an undoubted power of dispensing with laws that are made for the public in general, but they also denied his right to dispense with Magna Charta, or any other laws by which the lives, liberties, and interests of the subject are secured. For these laws, being made for the good of each several member of the community, are beyond the compass of the prerogative. This question came to a most serious issue when James II. claimed the right to dispense with the whole body of statutes against Roman Catholics. This claim resulted, after his dethronement, in the abolition of the dispensing power by the Bill of Rights (1689).

Dissenter.—A name applied in England to any one who departs from the doctrine or practice of the Established Church, and therefore including Roman Catholics, all Protestants save those who recognise Episcopal ordination, and Jews. In Scotland, where the national religion is Presbyterianism, it will include the members of the Church of England. The name, however, is generally applied to Protestant Nonconformists, and the history of the word accounts for this. Up to the time of the Revolution of 1688 non-members of the Church of England were called non-conformists, but an Act passed in that year (1 William and Mary, c. 18) calls them "their Majesties' Protestant subjects dissenting from the Church of England." The following passage from the official report furnished by Mr. Horace Mann to the Registrar-General in 1851 gives a list of the principal religious bodies in England:—

"There are in England and Wales thirty-five different religious communities, or sects, twenty-seven native and indigenous, nine foreign.* The following arrangement shows them, under certain obvious considerable and minor classes, in the order of historical formation.

* These include all the bodies which have assumed any formal organisation. There are, in addition, many isolated congregations of religious worshippers adopting various appellations, but it does not appear that any of them is sufficiently numerous and consolidated to be called a "sect."

All the above will be found in this Dictionary under their respective names, but as Mr. Mann has not named the small sects, we have compiled from the return of Places Registered for Religious Worship in 1882, and other sources, the following:—Of the Christadelphians there are about 186 congregations in Great Britain; of the United Christian Army, 6; Christian Pioneers, 1; Christian Mission Work-shippers, 6; Christian Free Gospel Mission, 8; Christian Free Union, 3; United Christians, 15; Free Church of England, 42; Reformed Church of England, 11; Members of the Church of England protesting against Rome, 1; Church of England, but not Secularian, 1; Evangelical Protestants, 3; Disciples of Jesus the Christ, 7; Disciples of Christ, 4; Theistic Church, 1; Glory Band, 4; Gospel Band, 2; Hallelujah Band, 6; Inghamites, 5; Lutherans, 8; Pedo-baptists, 4; Peculiar People, 12; Revival Band, 4; Salvation Army, 134; Spiritualists, 10; Southcottians, 1; Union Churchmen, 3; Protestant Churchmen, 1; Protestant Non-conformists, 6; Protestants Unsectarian, 1;

Protestant Trinitarian Dissenters, 3. In addition to these there are some congregations which refuse to be designated at all, one of them calling itself "Bound by no creed or confession of faith." Others are named after the towns where they meet.

Distaff Day.—The day after the Epiphany, so called because on that day weaving was resumed after the close of the Christmas Festival.

Divination.—The art of foretelling future events by special signs or tokens, through which the Deity was supposed to reveal His purpose. It was more of a business than a religion, founded on traditional routine. Various modes of divination were current among the ancients. Tentative sacrifices were offered, and the victim's approach to the altar, especially whether it was silent or uttered a cry, whether it resisted or was passive, was carefully noted. The entrails, too, were afterwards inspected for favourable or unfavourable indications; and even the very curl of the smoke, its density or rarity, and other minor details, were all considered significant and prophetic. The flight and voices of birds, again, as the word auspice indicates—derived from the Latin words avis-spicio, signifying the inspection of birds—were regarded as full of divine meaning. Some birds, also, were thought to be lucky, others unlucky; and when the beholder faced the north, a bird on the right hand, or east, was a favourable omen; on the left hand, or west, an unfavourable one. The phenomena, too, in heaven and earth, were likewise regarded as prophetic, and even some of the commonest occurrences of ordinary life. In Holy Scripture we read of Balak's messengers with the rewards of divination in their hands. Probably, therefore, the seven altars with their seven sacrifices, offered according to Balaam's desire, were part and parcel of his divining art, by which he exercised his skill, and through which he expected some sign in response. A mode of divination by arrows is alluded to by Ezekiel, and it is mentioned also by Homer. Three arrows were chosen, one of which was marked as affirmative, the second as negative, the third was left blank as neutral. These were shaken together in a vessel, and according as one or the other fell out, the will of the Deity was ascertained. If the neutral arrow was thrown out, the process was repeated till a decisive answer was returned. Similar superstitions, with modifications, have come down to modern times. The grouping of coffee-grounds or tea-leaves in a cup; the use of the hazel wand—a forked branch being specially chosen—in order to discover by its dip downwards, as held in the hand, the existence of springs or metals in the soil underneath; the ancient custom of opening the works of Virgil and Homer, or even the Scriptures, at random, as affording a clue to one's lot or destiny in the first words that met the eye, are instances in point. Astrology, too, by which we read our fate in the stars; palmistry, by which we decipher it in the lines of the opened hand; even the act of sneezing, itching fingers, burning ears, all were regarded as significant to those skilled in their interpretation: nor have such superstitions altogether died out even yet in some quarters.

Divorce.—The separation between man and wife was at one time a rare thing with the ancient Romans. It was only allowed apparently on account of unfaithfulness, and there were strict formalities to be observed, showing how sacred the law of marriage was regarded. But with the growth of luxury came laxity of principle, and divorce for frivolous reasons became common. It seems that it was even thus among the Jews. Though Moses, for the hardness of their hearts, allowed the husband to give "a writing of divorcement," there is no actual mention of such instruments being used before the days of Isaiah. In Jeremiah, and also in Malachi, they are spoken of as not uncommon. Our Saviour disallowed them all except on the score of adultery. But a question has arisen in the Christian Church whether even in this case a full divorce is warrantable. That a separation as to living together is allowable is plain, but it is not so plain whether, when a husband has parted from his wife for unfaithfulness, she is at liberty to marry again. St. Augustine confesses that the question is not clearly determined by the words of our Saviour. The Greek Church allows this, and it has been allowed by the laws of Christian Emperors (e.g. Constantine), nor did the Council of Florence, though the Roman Canon Law is different, regard this difference as a sufficient reason to hinder the coalition of the Eastern and Western Churches. The Roman Church, however, is most strict in its rules: the very fact that marriage is made a sacrament necessitates such strictness, and the broad principle is laid down that "no human power can dissolve the bond of marriage when ratified and consummated between baptised persons." If two unbaptised persons have married, and one afterwards become Christian, and the other refuses to live peaceably and without insult to the Christian religion, this marriage may be dissolved. So may that contracted by persons who afterwards agree to take up the monastic life.

In Protestant countries, where the religious bodies have come more under the civil powers, these powers claimed the right of regulating marriage and divorce. In England the old law remained for a long time; in other lands legislation on this subject soon began. Then in England, about a century and a half after the Reformation, the law was altered so that divorce for proved adultery was to be granted by Act of Parliament in each separate case, while judicial separations were pronounced by the ecclesiastical courts. But this law was felt to be unsatisfactory, for by making divorce possible only through the spending of a very large sum of money it was permissible to the rich and not to the poor. A celebrated sentence of Justice Maule, in which he bitterly satirised the existing law, had a great effect on public opinion, and in 1857 a new Divorce Court was established, with jurisdiction over all such matters. Divorce was made possible for adultery of the wife, and for adultery, with certain other offences, of the husband, and judicial separation was allowed for cruelty or two years' desertion. Divorce might be followed by re-marriage. In other countries facilities for divorce are much greater; incompatibility of temper, and even mutual consent are held to be admissible grounds. The result has been to lower the moral tone to such a terrible extent as to create a reaction towards better things. In some of the United States it is said that divorces have multiplied to a ratio of one to ten marriages. The Divorce Reform League was formed in consequence, and has been joined by many Christians of all denominations [See further under MARRIAGE.]

Docetæ (Gr. δοκεῖν, "to appear," or "seem"). This name was applied to that branch of the Gnostics (q.v.) who believed that the body of Jesus was a mere phantom, which only appeared to perform the functions of a man, and had no reality. The Crucifixion they averred to be only an appearance, and they denied the Resurrection and Ascension; indeed, their belief entirely destroyed the doctrine of the Atonement. This heresy arose chiefly out of the Greeks philosophising on the essential impurity of matter, and therefore they said that Jesus could not have a real substantial body, as a divine and heavenly being would never unite himself to what was earthly and material.

Doctor.—An account of this title will be found under Degrees. Some specific epithets were added to the title of doctor on its first coming into use; such as Doctor Angelicus, Doctor Seraphicus, etc. In the Eastern Church the word didaskalos is used instead of doctor, being the word used in the New Testament for "master" or "teacher;" but this is only given to teachers of the Scriptures. There are several sorts. In the church at Constantinople, for instance, the explainer of the Gospels was called "Didaskalos of the Gospels," while "the Apostle's doctor" meant the expounder of St. Paul's Epistles. In that Church the degree of Didaskalos is conferred by the laying on of hands.

The four great doctors of the Greek Church are Athanasius, the Defender of the Catholic Faith; Basil the Great, the patron of Monasticism; Gregory of Nazianzus, the profound divine; Chrysostom, the eloquent.

Those of the Latin Church are Jerome, the translator of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue; Ambrose, Augustine of Hippo, Gregory the Great.

Doctors' Commons is a college for the professors of the Civil and Canon Law, situate upon St. Bennet's Hill, near Paul's Wharf. It was purchased for the ecclesiastical lawyers about the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign by Henry Harvey, Doctor of Civil and Canon Laws, Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, Prebendary of Ely, and Dean of the Arches, a person noted alike for his learning and piety. Before this time the civilians and canonists were lodged in Paternoster Row, in a less convenient house, afterwards the Queen's Head Tavern. Lord Mountjoy had previously inhabited this new college, and Doctor Harvey procured a lease of a hundred years of it from the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's at an annual rental of five marks. The original building was burnt down in the great fire of London, but afterwards rebuilt. Doctors' Commons consisted originally of six courts—the Court of Arches, the Court of Audience, the Court of Prerogative, the Court of Faculty and Dispensation, the Court of Delegates, and the High Court of Admiralty. Here also lived the Vicar-General, the Chancellors of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, the Doctors of Civil Law, and the Proctors, commonly called Licentiates, or Bachelors, who were the practisers in these courts. The only courts which now exercise their functions in this quarter are the Archdeacon's Court, the Faculty Court, and the Court of Admiralty. The Prerogative Court is now merged in the Probate Court, and the Court of Delegates is transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Doctrine. [THEOLOGY.]

Doddridge, PHILIP.—An eminent Dissenting minister, born in London June 26th, 1702; died near Lisbon, Oct. 26th, 1751. At his birth he seemed more dead than alive, and was regarded as still-born; but a servant thought otherwise, and through her exertions his life was prolonged. His mother gave him his first lessons in religion from the Dutch tiles in the chimney-place of their room, in which were pictured scenes from the Old and New Testaments; and the impressions thus made were never afterwards forgotten. Left an orphan in 1715, after some hesitation and various plans, he became pastor to the congregation at Kibworth, in Leicestershire, where he devoted himself to study. As he says himself, "I live almost like a tortoise, shut up in its shell, almost always in the same town, the same house, the same chamber." From Kibworth he removed to Market Har-borough in 1725, though still keeping up his connection with the former place. A vacancy occurring at Hertford, he was recommended for the pastorate there, and two members of the congregation were deputed to hear him preach. Their report on that occasion was almost humorous, for they objected to him as a legal preacher, because the ten commandments were written on the chapel-walls, and because there was a clerk who said the Amen at the end of each prayer. In 1728 he settled at Nottingham, where, in addition to his ministerial duties, he conducted a Theological Academy, and with marked success. In 1736 the University of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Among his many publications, the following alone call for special notice:—The Family Expositor: a Paraphrase and Version of the New Testament, with Critical Notes, and a Practical Improvement of each Section. Of these several parts of the work, the Paraphrase has the disadvantage of being side by side with the original narrative in parallel columns: to use a phrase lately coined, his "elongated" version of the Gospel shows but ill in close proximity with the plain unvarnished story itself. But the fault is not so much in the author, as in the very nature of his attempt. The Critical Notes are now mostly obsolete; while the Practical Improvement, appended to each section, abounds with much piety and common sense. His next great work, The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, still maintains a place in religious literature; yet it has one flaw, inasmuch as it seems to take for granted that every man's personal experience must advance through the same stages, and run in the same channels. As for his hymns, though somewhat rugged in style, and without the copious sweetness of Dr. Watts at his best, they are never defaced by familiarities of address bordering on irreverence. As a specimen of his verse, his celebrated epigram, considered by Dr. Johnson the best in our literature, is subjoined—

"Live, while you live," the Epicure would say,
 "And seize the pleasures of the passing day;"
 "Live, while you live," the sacred preacher cries,
 "And give to God each moment as it flies;"
 Lord, in my view let both united be:
 I live in pleasure while I live to Thee.

In 1747 Dr. Doddridge published a book called Some Remarkable Passages in the Life of the Hon. Colonel James Gardiner, who fell at Prestonpans. It narrates that soldier's extraordinary conversion by means of a dream. Dr. Doddridge married in 1730 Mrs. Mary Maris, of Worcester, who long survived him.

Dodwell, HENRY (b. in Dublin, 1642).—His father had property in Ireland, but lost it in the Rebellion, and in 1648 he brought his family to England and settled in York. Henry spent five years at the York Free School, and while there lost his parents, and was left in a state of penury; but in 1654 his maternal uncle adopted him, and in 1656 sent him to Trinity College, Dublin; here he gained a fellowship, which, however, he relinquished in 1666 on account of conscientious scruples about taking holy orders. After residing some years at Oxford, he returned to Ireland in 1672 and introduced himself to public notice by publishing a theological tract entitled De Obstinatone, by his college tutor, Dr. Stearne, to which he wrote a learned preface. In 1674 he settled in London, and from this time till his death led a life of busy authorship. Many of his publications were on Popish and Nonconformist controversies; they exhibit a minute learning, and both in his writings and actions he showed a perfect conscientiousness and utter disregard for personal consequences. Dodwell was chosen in 1688 Camden Professor of History by the University of Oxford, but in 1691 had to relinquish the post, as he refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. He defended the Nonjuring bishops, and declared those to be "schismatics" who submitted, and he left the Church of England, but afterwards returned to it. He retired to Cookham, in Berkshire, and afterwards went to Shottesbrooke, where he spent the rest of his days. The works for which he is remembered were all written in the latter part of his life; among them are some chronological essays, drawn up with great ability. His principal work is considered to be De Veteribus Græcorum Romanorumque Cyclis, Obiterque de Cyclo Judaorum ac Ætate Christi, Dissertationes, &c., Oxford, 1701. In 1706 he published An Epistolary Discourse, proving from the Scriptures and the first Fathers that the Soul is a Principle naturally mortal, but immortalised actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or to reward, by its union with the Divine baptismal Spirit; where it is proved that none have the power of giving this Divine immortalising Spirit since the Apostles, but only the Bishops. This extravagant doctrine raised a great outcry against the writer. Henry Dodwell died at Shottesbrooke, June 7th, 1711. His eldest son, Henry, a barrister, published a tract called Christianity not founded on Argument, which we have noticed in the article Deists; and another son, William, a clergyman, distinguished himself by some pamphlets on miracles in the controversy with Dr. Conyers Middleton.

Dogma.—The history of the present application of this word is curious. It is derived from the Greek δοκεῖν, "to seem," and therefore signifies that which seems true to anyone—an opinion. It thus becomes applied to philosophic opinions, placita; and as the opinions of philosophers were held in respect, it came to signify opinions delivered with authority, something like "counsel's opinion" now. Hence it passed to the sense of authoritative decrees [Plato and Xenophon, apud Liddell and Scott], and is applied both in the

LXX. and New Testament to decrees issued by the State [Dan. ii. 13, iii. 10, Luke ii. 1] and in Acts xvi. 4 to the decrees issued by the Christian Church. Bishop Martensen writes, "A dogma is not a δῶγμα, not a subjective human opinion, not an indefinite, vague notion, nor is it a mere truth of reason, whose universal validity can be made clear with mathematical or logical certainty; it is a truth of faith, derived from the authority of the Word and Revelation of God; a positive truth, therefore—positive not merely by virtue of the positiveness with which it is laid down, but also by virtue of the authority by which it is sealed. Dogmatics is the science which presents and proves the Christian doctrine, regarded as forming a connected system." Hence it follows that Christian dogmatics cannot be regarded as matters of opinion, nor can they be viewed from without by a Christian teacher. He assumes at the outset the truth of Christianity, independently of all speculation. He does not investigate in order to ascertain whether what he holds is true, but in order that he may gain a deeper and firmer knowledge of the truth which he already accepts. He starts, not from doubt, but from faith, hence his province is different from that of philosophical or historical criticism. He is not wandering about in search of a faith, but stands in the midst of one; and that faith he accepts on the ground of its being revealed by God to man. This revelation was given through and by means of the Christian Church. But at this point we enter into the region of controversy. For the Roman Catholic Church claims to possess a living apostolate, with an abiding inspiration, whereby the decisions of councils and the authoritative utterances of the Pope have an authority as infallible as that of the first Apostles. The Protestant theology, on the other hand, declares that only that religion is genuine which can be shown to be Apostolic. Protestantism regards Christianity as a gospel of free grace offered to all men alike; the Roman Catholic theology regards it as a new law, an authoritative external authority to which all must bow, with a hierarchy endowed with power to settle once and for all the precepts of the faith. It makes no appeal to inward conviction, but rests all on the external canon. It therefore supplements the teaching of the New Testament tradition, i.e., the handing down through all time of the manner in which succeeding ages received the Gospel, and the form in which they held it. The Protestant replies that there is nothing which can prove that the original form has been preserved, and further that it can be shown that it has not been preserved. It is clear that the inspiration which produced the New Testament was not continued in the post-Apostolic age, that an apocryphal literature grew up, and that the oral traditions of the Apostles were exposed very early to disfigurement. But the Scriptures remained like a rock against which the ever-changing waves ceased not to toss. They have shown themselves sufficient to teach us what the dogmas of the Apostles were; these dogmas are complete. Without the Scriptures we should have had no firm hold, and it was by the light of the Scriptures that the reformers were able to cast out the corruptions and impostures which long ages had foisted upon the Church. They fell back upon the creeds which the Church had drawn up before it was divided, but rested their acceptance of them, not upon tradition at all, but upon the Scriptures of truth. To these creeds, then, and the interpretation of them, belongs the province of dogmatic theology. It treats the parts of them separately, and also regards them as a whole, setting forth their relation to each other, proves them from Scripture, examines their position with respect to philosophy and science, and states the theological results which spring from them. [THEOLOGY.]

Dominic, Sr., born in 1170 at Calaroga, a small town in the diocese of Osma, in Old Castile. At six years of age he began his education under his uncle, the Arch-priest of Gamiel de Ystan, and at the age of thirteen proceeded to the University of Palencia, where he remained for six years, devoting himself to religious austerities, and being so successful in the conversion of sinners and heretics that he attracted the attention of the Bishop of Osma, who made him a canon in 1194, and afterwards ordained him priest and made him sub-prior of the chapter. He was then sent to preach as a missionary in the provinces, and in 1204 the Bishop Diego de Azevedo, being sent as ambassador into Southern France, took Dominic with him; in their journey they came into contact with the Albigenses, revolvers against the faith and authority of Rome, and obtained permission from Pope Innocent III. to remain for some time in that country labouring for the conversion of these heretics. It was in consequence of the danger which seemed to threaten the whole Church that Dominic resolved to carry out a plan he had long formed of founding a religious order, whose chief business it should be to preach the Gospel, convert heretics, defend the faith, and disseminate Christianity. Some account of the fierce persecution which was raised against them, and of which Dominic, to a great extent, was the instigator, will be found in the article ALBIGENSES. [DOMINICANS.] He died at Bologna, Aug. 4th, 1221, and was canonised by Pope Gregory IX., July 13th, 1234.

Dominica in Albis.—In primitive times baptism was administered (see that article) on Easter eve, and the white garments worn by the baptised they continued to wear for a week and a day, till the first Sunday after Easter. On this day they very often, if not invariably, received confirmation, and laid the white robes aside: hence the day was called the Dominica in albis depositis, the Sunday of Deposition of the Albs. This custom lasted to the thirteenth century, when confirmation began to be separated, in the nature of the modern fashion, from baptism.

Dominical Letter.—The Calendar of Pagan Rome was marked throughout with a series of the first eight letters of the alphabet, which was so far identical with ours; thus showing the recurrence of the ninth day, or in our reckoning the eighth. These days were the “nundinæ,” or days of public business, originally simply market days (Smith’s Dict. of Class. Antiq., s.v. “Calendarium,” “Nundinæ”). This plan was adapted to Christian purposes by dropping one letter and so using exactly in the same way the first seven, answering in number to the seven days of the week: each recurrence of the same letter marks, therefore, the same day of the week; and from the principal use of the system to ascertain the Sundays they have acquired the general name of Dominical or Sunday letters.

But to this rule there is an exception in leap-year, every fourth year, since the intercalary day in such years, the 29th of February, is not lettered; thus these years have two Sunday letters, that from March onwards being one behind the former in order, G being reckoned as “behind” A. Again, since no year contains an exact number of weeks, common years having one day over and leap-years two, when (1) one common year follows another, the letter of the second year is one behind that of the first; when (2) a common year follows a leap-year, the letter of the second year is one behind the first’s second letter and two behind its first; and (3) when a leap-year follows a common year, the first letter of the second year is one behind that of the first, and its second letter is two behind. From this it follows that, though if the year contained an exact number of weeks the Sunday letter would be always the same, and if leap-years did not exist would renew every seventh year; as things are, the actual letter itself recurs every sixth year as a whole-year letter, or as a ten months’ and whole-year letter, and every fifth year as a two-months’ and whole-year letter, and so far the days of the month and week coincide; but at the same time, taking into account the different conjunctions of letters in the leap-years, they can only recur as an entire cycle in the same order, every $(4 \times 7 =)$ twenty-eight years; during which cycles the week-days and month-days coincide accurately through their whole length.

Since a month also does not contain (except the ordinary February) an exact number of weeks, the first letter in each month must differ; as the old-fashioned memorial couplet will show, where each word begins with the letter which marks the first day of the corresponding month—

"At Dover Dwelt George Brown Esquire, Good Christopher Finch And David Fryer."

Thus a man knowing these lines, and the Sunday letter of the year, may be to some extent independent of almanacks; the letter his prayer-book will tell him how to find. But since some men have not got prayer-books, some who have them do not read the tables in them, and some who read the tables do not understand them, it may here be stated that to find the Sunday letter for the rest of this nineteenth century, we are to add to the year its fourth part, without fractions, and to divide the sum by 7; the remainder gives the letter thus, O—A, 1—G, 2—F, 3—E, 4—D, 5—C, 6—B. For the next, the twentieth century, we are to add, besides the fourth part, the number 6, and to proceed as before. In leap-years, i.e., years (except 1900, which is a common year) divisible by 4 without remainder, the letter thus found will be the second: the first, as above, will be that next in order of the alphabet.

Dominicale.—Either a linen veil formerly worn on the head by women in communicating, or a fair linen cloth in which they received the bread, instead of in the bare palm of their hand; probably the term is more correctly applied to the former custom, as it is still to be seen in use in the north of Italy.

Dominicans.—The first order of Preaching Friars, founded by St. Dominic, and approved by Pope Innocent III. at the Council of Lateran in 1215, and confirmed the following year by his successor, Honorius III. Their founder at first adopted the rule of the Augustinian Canons, but in 1220 altered the constitution, enjoining absolute poverty and great austerities. The first monastery was established at Toulouse, through the bounty of the bishop of that diocese and Simon, Earl of Montfort. In 1218 was founded the Dominican monastery in Paris, in the Rue St. Jacques, whence they were afterwards called Jacobins. They made wonderful progress in Europe and elsewhere; indeed, the number of monasteries was so great that the order was divided into forty-five provinces, having spread into all parts of the world. "By Dominic," says Dean Milman, "Christendom was at once overspread with a host of zealous, active, devoted men, whose function was popular instruction. They were gathered from every country, and spoke, therefore, every language and dialect. In a few years, from the sierras of Spain to the steppes of Russia, from the Tiber to the Thames, the Trent, the Baltic Sea, the old faith, in its fullest mediæval, imaginative, inflexible rigour, was preached in almost every town and hamlet. The Dominicans did not confine themselves to popular teaching; the more dangerous of as yet not absolutely disloyal seats of the new learning, of inquiry, of intellectual movement—the universities, Bologna, Paris, Oxford—were invaded, and compelled to admit these stern apostles of unswerving orthodoxy; their zeal soon overleaped the pale of Christendom; they plunge fearlessly into the remote darkness of heathen and Mohammedan lands, from whence come back rumours, which are constantly stirring the minds of their votaries, of wonderful conversions, and not less wonderful martyrdoms." This order has furnished a great number of eminent writers, amongst them St. Thomas Aquinas, Savonarola, Las Casas, Albertus Magnus, St. Raymond of Pennafort, St. Peter Martyr, Cardinal Cajetan, Dominicus Soto, etc. It has also produced three Popes, sixty cardinals, three-and-twenty patriarchs, one hundred and fifty archbishops, eight hundred bishops, forty-three nuncios or legates, sixty-nine masters of the Sacred Palace, eighty-four confessors to the Kings of Spain, Castile, or Aragon, fifteen confessors to the Kings of Portugal, sixteen to the Kings of France, six to the Kings of England, and twenty-one to the Kings of Poland. St. Dominic also established an order of nuns, who followed the same strict Dominican rule as the monks. In 1221 St. Dominic sent Gilbert du Fresney with twelve brothers into England, where they founded their first house at Oxford. They founded a house in London soon after, and in 1276 the Lord Mayor and Aldermen granted them two streets near the Thames, where they erected a large monastery; hence that part is still called Blackfriars, this name being given from the colour of their dress. Their numbers increased so much during the following two hundred years that at the dissolution of the monasteries they had forty-three houses in England. [MENDICANT FRIARS.]

Dominis, MARCUS ANTONIUS DE, born in 1566, of an ancient family, at Arba, on the coast of Dalmatia. He was educated first in the Jesuit College at Loretto, then in the University of Padua. Here, while passing his novitiate for the order of Jesuits, he taught mathematics, physics, and eloquence, and wrote a work on optics, in which he pointed out that in the rainbow the light undergoes in each raindrop two refractions, and an intermediate reflection. On the recommendation of the Emperor Rodolphus, he was made Bishop of Segni in 1596, and two years later Archbishop of Spalatro, but he quarrelled with the Pope (Paul V.) on the question of the endowment of certain ecclesiastical establishments in the Venetian Republic. Being suspected of a leaning towards the Reformed Church, he thought it best to resign his archbishopric and retire to Venice in 1616, and the following year he came to England, where he was favourably received by James I., who made him Dean of Windsor. He now wrote his De Republicâ Ecclesiasticâ, to show that the Pope had no supremacy over other bishops. De Dominis, however, was restless and inconstant, and in 1622 we find him in Brussels, returned to the Roman Church, and praying forgiveness from the Pope (Gregory XV.). But some intercepted letters indicated that his recantation was not sincere; and on his arrival in Rome he was arrested, confined in the Castle of St. Angelo, and brought before the Inquisition. He died in September, 1624, before the final sentence had been given; and being convicted of heresy, his body was disinterred and burnt, and his ashes thrown into the Tiber.

Dominus Vobiscum ("The Lord be with you").—The salutation of the people by the priest.

Domitian, PERSECUTION OF.—This is supposed to have been the second of the so-called ten persecutions of the early Christians, the first having taken place under Nero, after the conflagration at Rome, and was confined to Rome. The persecution under Domitian, which, according to Gibbon, hardly deserves such a name, was marked not so much by the free use of the sword of the executioner as by frequent sentences of banishment. Victorinus and Jerome both declare that St. John was exiled and sent to Patmos during this persecution; and the latter states also that he was liberated at the accession of Nerva. The Christians were often confounded with the Jews, and from this arose many of their troubles. When Titus destroyed Jerusalem, he ordered that the Jews should pay to Rome the tribute they had been hitherto accustomed to pay to the Temple. Domitian rigidly enforced this tax, and many Christians were obliged to pay it. But the chief thing of which the Christians were accused was atheism. The heathens would not understand that religious adoration could be confined to one God, and the fact that the Christians had no temples, nor images, nor outward mysteries in their worship, encouraged the idea that they were atheists. The doctrines which they taught influenced the heart, and wherever they made way, the national paganism fled, so that the heathen priests, fearing the loss of their livelihood, circulated many calumnies against the Christians, and among them this of atheism. Acilius Glabrio was put to death on this charge in the fifteenth year of Domitian; the consul Flavius Clemens, a relative of the Emperor, also suffered, and his wife, Domitilla, was banished. Another accusation was want of loyalty, because they refused to treat Domitian as a god. Domitian reigned from A.D. 81 to 96, and this persecution took place towards the close of that period.

Domnus I., a Bishop of Antioch, lived in the third century. He was elected by a council of bishops, who met at Antioch in 269, in the room of Paul of Samosata, who was deposed on account of his heretical opinions and irregularity of life. Domnus was the son of Demetrianus, the predecessor of Paul. He did not get possession of the see till 272, as Paul, relying on the support of Zenobia, retained the episcopal residence and church belonging to it; but when the Emperor Aurelian regained Antioch from Zenobia, he confirmed the sentence of the bishops, and Paul was ejected. The episcopate of Domnus was not a long one; he died in 274.

Domnus II., Patriarch of Antioch, succeeded his uncle John in 411. He was brought up by Euthymius, the famous anchorite of Palestine. His uncle being entangled in the Nestorian heresy, Domnus besought that he might be allowed to go and extricate him, but Euthymius, knowing the weakness of his character, tried to deter him, foretelling that, in the event of his being chosen successor to his uncle, knaves would take advantage of the easiness of his temper, and get him deposed. This prediction was justified by the event. He set himself to inquire into the orthodoxy of various bishops, and was the first to impeach Eutyches about 447. Charges of heresy were laid against him, and he was deposed by Dioscorus at "the Council of Robbers" held at Ephesus in 449, and Maximus was put in his place, Pope Leo I. confirming his election. Domnus was the only bishop then deposed and banished who was not reinstated after the Council of Chalcedon. He retired to his monastery, and there ended his days in discipline and regrets at his own weakness of character.

Donaldson, JOHN WILLIAM, D.D. (b. 1812, d. 1861), a learned classical and Hebrew scholar, who first became favourably known by some very able and lucid educational works. But in 1854 he published a work called Jaahar; Fragmenta Archetypa Carminum Hebraicorum in Masorethico Veteris Testamenti textu passim tessellata, the substance of which was this: There are allusions in two places of the Old Testament to the Book of Jaahar. This book is lost, but fragments of it remain in the songs and traditions preserved in the Old Testament, and these he professed to have gathered out and arranged. The book is intensely rationalistic. Thus he considered that the Deluge was a poetical variation of the escape from Egypt, and identified Esau with Lamech. There is a very interesting account of the book in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, s.v. "Jaahar." Its vagaries were exposed by Dr. Perowne, the present Dean of Peterborough.

Donation of Constantine.—The legend runs that Constantine the Great, suffering from leprosy, was healed and afterwards baptised by Pope Sylvester, and that out of gratitude he bestowed on the Papacy the grant of Italy and the provinces of the West. In this way, it is alleged, the temporal monarchy of the Popes originated. The document that contains this story is known by the name of The Donation of Constantine; but it was forged at Rome about the middle of the eighth century, and was used first to extort from Pepin le Bref the Exarchate of Ravenna, along with twenty towns, in order to supply with oil the lamps of the Roman churches, a plea often put forth to cover the covetousness of the Papacy; it was afterwards employed in the year 777, by Pope Hadrian I., in a letter he addressed to Charlemagne, Pepin's son, in which Italy and the West were claimed, not as a gift, but as an act of restitution; and in order to show more fully the subjection of the Empire to the Papacy, of the temporal power to the spiritual, Constantine in this forgery is made to relate how he acted as the Pope's groom, and led his horse for him on one occasion.

The accredited author of this forgery was Isidore, who also composed the Falsæ Decretals, a condensed summary of the supposed decrees of previous Popes; by them the spiritual dominion of the Popes was ratified, as by the forged Donation of Constantine their temporal monarchy was affirmed. The illiterate age and warlike courts of Pepin and Charlemagne easily swallowed without investigation the imposture; which was afterwards maintained, in spite of ample exposure, because it was both mixed up with the prejudices and passions of the multitude, and with the interests of the Papacy itself. In the year 1440 Laurentius Valla powerfully exposed its falsehood; Guicciardini, the historian, followed suit; Ariosto, the poet, in his mocking vein, makes the Paladin Astolpho find it in the moon among the things lost on earth; while, with exquisite inconsistency, Pope Leo X. approved of the poem in question in a Bull that he issued. The historian Gibbon thus sums up the matter: "The Popes themselves have indulged a smile at the credulity of the vulgar; but a false and obsolete title still sanctifies their reign; and, by the same fortune which has attended the Decretals and the Sibylline Oracles, the edifice has subsisted after the foundations have been undermined. [Decline and Fall of Roman Empire, xlix.]

Donatists.—The Church of North Africa, the metropolis of which was Carthage, was, as Dean Milman notes, the first of all the Latin Churches. But from the beginning it was constantly disturbed by schisma. The first of its great writers, Tertullian, was a Montanist. Here the Novatian sect in part derived its origin. But the Donatist controversy, next to the Arian, was the most important and the most lasting of all the schisms of the ancient Church.

The origin of it is first of all to be traced in what took place during the persecution of Diocletian. There were some who endeavoured to become martyrs, by ostentatiously proclaiming their Christianity; some, perhaps, who having led abandoned lives, hoped by this to atone for them by the "baptism of blood." Amongst those who opposed this course by refusing to acknowledge such persons as martyrs, were Mensurius, Bishop of Carthage, and his Archdeacon, Cæcilian. Mensurius dying in 311, Cæcilian was chosen as his successor, and consecrated by Felix, Bishop of Aptunge. Thereupon, Botrus and Celusius, priests of the same church, who had sought the episcopate, projected a schism in disgust. When Cæcilian called for the Church plate, which had been hidden away during the persecution, the holders, who supposed that their possession was not known, refused to give it up, and the malcontents encouraged them, alleging that the episcopate of Cæcilian was void, because his consecrator, Felix, was a Traditor. [TRADITOR.] They were supported by Lucilla, a lady of wealth and influence, whom Cæcilian had offended by reproving her for kissing the bones of a martyr before receiving the Sacrament. The Numidian bishops, seventy in number, met at Carthage, and summoned Cæcilian before them. He refused to appear, saying that if they had any charge to bring against him they ought to attend and make it good; that if they objected to his consecration, they might, if they pleased, give him a new consecration. Thereupon they pronounced sentences against him on three grounds:—(1) Contumacy; (2) Consecration by a Traditor; (3) Preventing provisions being carried to the martyrs in prison. They consecrated Majorinus, Lucilla's chaplain, in his place, and sent a circular letter against him to all the African bishops. Some supported them, and some Cæcilian, and thus began a manifest schism.

In 313 Constantine, who had just become Emperor, owned Cæcilian as bishop, by formally sending him charity money and official documents. The malcontents thereupon waited on Annulinus, proconsul of Africa, who sent their petition to Constantine, praying that some bishops of Gaul might be appointed to try the cause. Constantine chose the Bishops of Cologne, Autun, Arles, and Rome, at the same time despatching an order to Annulinus to convey Cæcilian to Rome with ten bishops of his party, and the same number of his adversaries. They came accordingly (Oct. 2nd, 313), Donatus, Bishop of Casse Nigræ appearing at the head of Majorinus's party. Cæcilian was acquitted, but it was decreed that where two bishops had been consecrated to the same see, the senior bishop was to retain his post, and the other to be provided with a new see, provided always that the bishop of the Majorinus party should abandon the schism. It was hoped that this would put an end to the trouble, but the hope was vain. The malcontents petitioned the Emperor for a rehearing, alleging that the bishops in the council at Rome had not thoroughly examined all the articles of the impeachment. The Emperor accordingly summoned a more numerous council at Arles in 314. Cæcilian was again acquitted, and some canons were drawn up with a view of preventing further difficulties of the kind. Those who had been traditors of the Scriptures, of sacred vessels, or of the names of the faithful, were to be deposed if convicted on clear testimony, but mere hearsay evidence was to be rejected. False accusers were to be excommunicated, and not to be readmitted save on the near approach of death. A man of unblemished character, ordained by a traditor, was ordained lawfully. Still the enemies of Cæcilian were not satisfied. They appealed to the Emperor against the decision of the synod, and he, though reluctantly, heard the case himself, at Milan (Nov. 8th, 316). He reaffirmed Cæcilian's acquittal, and issued severe edicts against the schismatics. From thenceforward Cæcilian's episcopate was admitted by the Church. He lived until 341. Majorinus had died in 315, but his supporters continued the schism by setting Donatus in his place—not the Bishop of Cassi Nigræ before mentioned, but a namesake. He was a man of abilities and regular life, but of a haughty temper. However, by the strength of his character, and the vigour of his conduct, he kept up his party, and reinforced the schism in Africa, and is said to have requested his followers to renounce the name of Christians and to call themselves after him. They had a great number of bishops and laity in their interest, some of whom distinguished themselves unhappily in outraging the Catholics; but perceiving that all the rest of Christendom adhered to Cæcilian's commission, they declared that the true Church was everywhere sunk and extinguished, excepting in the small remainder among themselves in Africa. They likewise revived the old doctrine of the African bishops, that baptism and the other sacraments administered out of the Church were null and to no purpose. Thus they rebaptised all those who deserted from the Catholic Church to their party; they abhorred the Eucharist of the Catholics, and trampled upon the consecrated elements; defaced and burnt their altars, broke their chalices, washed the walls and pavement of their churches, and had no regard to the consecrations of bishops performed in the Catholic Church. This practice obliged the champions of the Church (having first wiped off the imputations thrown upon Felix and Cæcilian) to prove against the Donatists that baptism administered by schismatics was valid, and that they had made themselves deeply guilty by re-baptising those baptised by the Catholics. The Donatists, fancying that the Church was nowhere but amongst themselves, endeavoured to form a party at Rome, for which purpose they sent an African bishop thither, who drew a little congregation into a cave, which occasioned their being called Montenses, Campite, Rupite; and this bishop had his succession continued for some time by others of the same persuasion, who called themselves Bishops of Rome; they likewise sent off more of the same character into Spain and other places, but they grew to no considerable numbers, excepting in Africa, where they became the stronger party. They are said to have had at one time 400 bishops. The Emperor, perceiving that against such fanaticism force was no remedy, wrote to the Catholic bishops, exhorting them to gentleness towards the schismatics, and the latter in return told him that they would have nothing to do with his "fool of a bishop." The Emperor Constans despatched Paulus and Macarius to Africa, who patched up a union for some time, but Julian the Apostate declaring for liberty of conscience, the schism recommenced and continued. The Donatists, divided from the Church, proceeded to split into parties amongst themselves. The most remarkable subdivision was that of the Circumcellians; they were persons of the poorest class, who went round the cells (hence their name) of country people, begging, declaring themselves the Lord's champions, plundering Catholic churches, and robbing and murdering all who refused to acknowledge them. They carried no swords, because of our Lord's words to St. Peter (Matt. xxvi. 52), but they had heavy clubs instead, with which they beat their victims to death. For years they were a terror to the whole country around. In 410 the Emperor Honorius ordered a conference at Carthage; it was held before Count Marcellinus; a great many bishops of each party appeared, and seven on both sides were chosen to manage the dispute. After the controversy was gone through, Marcellinus gave sentence in favour of the Catholics, and forbade the Donatists' meetings. This award was confirmed by Honorius. The Donatists remained turbulent, but the instructions the people received from the Catholic bishops, and the impracticability of keeping up the schismatical meetings, made the party dwindle and decrease. Those who remained when the Vandals seized Africa had their share of suffering with the Catholics, and were almost all expelled from the country. There were, however, some of them still there in Gregory the Great's time, i.e., in the sixth and seventh centuries.

Donatives.—Certain incumbencies, of which a few still remain in England, where the patron appoints the incumbent by a simple deed under his hand and seal; no presentation to the bishop, no institution and induction by him, is required, and the patron himself is also sole ordinary and visitor. The incumbent is, however, required to be a priest, and to qualify himself by subscription and "reading-in" like other clerks, but he resigns to his patron, and may also be deprived by him. A donative is not subject to lapse, and the bishop can only compel the patron to fill it by spiritual censures. It is extinguished (by Act of Parliament) if augmented by Queen Anne's Bounty, and also (though different decisions have been given on this point) if the patron, of his free will, present his clerk to the bishop for institution.

The origin of donatives is not by any means clear; they must be supposed to have arisen in early times by leave of the bishop to certain lords of manors or others, or, possibly, by neglect of the bishop to enforce his rights, till a prescription was gradually created. Their existence at the present time is not well to be defended, and it is stated by Mr. J. B. Lee, the well-known episcopal secretary (Report on Sale of Livings, 1880, p. 52) that it was by an oversight they were not abolished at the same time with peculiars. The same report (pp. 22—25) may be consulted for an account of a particular donative in the diocese of Winchester, and also (pp. 12, 13, 86) for the bad use which may be made of them.

Donne, JOHN (b. 1573, d. 1631).—His father, an ironmonger in London, was of an old Welsh family; his mother was the daughter of Heywood, well known for his epigrams; both parents were Roman Catholics.

Donne's father dying when he was two years of age, his education devolved on his mother, a descendant of Sir Thomas More, who, being a strict devotee herself, had him carefully instructed in her own religious persuasion. At the age of twelve years he was sent to Hart Hall, Oxford, whence, according to Walton, he was soon transplanted to Trinity College, Cambridge. This latter point, however, is disputed, and what adds to the difficulty of deciphering his exact movements at this time is the fact that, while we are told he went to Oxford in 1584, and Walton says he continued at Cambridge till his seventeenth year, some of his verses found after his death speak of his being with Prince Maurice in the Low Countries in the year 1587.

Travels in France, Spain, and Italy occupied some years, and on his return home, in 1591, he set himself to consider dispassionately the differences between the Reformed and Roman Churches—a course of study which ended in his joining the English Church. About this time, too, he was admitted to Lincoln's Inn as a student of law, though he did not neglect his favourite pursuit, theology, besides occasionally composing poems and satires. His verse, though rough and deformed by the current conceits of the time, was often original and vigorous, though somewhat obscure from its ultra-metaphysical complexion. His satires especially were stinging and sharp, containing vivid pictures of contemporary life and manners, but often too coarse and immoral to be read with pleasure. A great similarity, indeed, has been more than once remarked between Dr. Donne and the great St. Augustine of Hippo. Both were flagrantly immoral in their youth, ardent in natural temperament, keenly logical in insight, and both became deeply penitent and eminent for sanctity in their mature age.

Donne, having been appointed secretary to the Lord Chancellor, made the great false step of his life by his secret marriage with the niece of the Chancellor, a daughter of Sir George More. The discovery lost him his post, alienated his wife's relations, and incensed Queen Elizabeth, who never, if she could, let "the course of true love run smoothly." Donne himself was thrown into prison, separated from his wife, who was taken from him by force, and who was only recovered to him afterwards by a troublesome suit at law.

Henceforth, for many years, Donne's life was made up of poverty, hard study, vain solicitations for employment, and the kindness and hospitality of friends. When pressed to enter the priesthood he was held back by conscientious scruples because of his former life, and for fear lest his old boon-companions should misinterpret his motives, and also from a modest feeling of unfitness for the office. All this shows how true and tender he was, even at his worst.

About the year 1609, Donne's great learning and reputation introduced him to James I. Admitted to share in the conversation at the king's private meals, his theological acumen and depth so exactly hit that monarch's fancy, that when, after the Gunpowder Plot, a new oath of supremacy and allegiance was in contemplation, he received the royal orders to write on the subject, and within six weeks he produced his work, called the Pseudo-Martyr, which was printed in the next year. After this time he was much urged by the king, who, from the first, with great sagacity, had gauged the real bent of his talents, to take holy orders. But Donne, notwithstanding his poverty, his sickly wife and large family, still nursed his scruples, hoping against hope for some secular employment, which the king as resolutely refused. At last, after much study, thought, and prayer, he believed that he had a call from Heaven, and made up his mind for the priesthood. The exact date of his ordination is uncertain; it was probably in 1615. In the previous year, standing, as he felt himself to be, on the very threshold of the Church, he composed his Essays in Divinity, founded on the opening words of the Book of Genesis, the threshold of all Revelation.

So great, however, was his modesty, that at first he would only officiate in places lying round London. Paddington, then a mere village, was privileged to hear his first sermon. But the king soon sent for him to Whitehall, where he preached, and exceeded the expectations formed of him. In 1616 the University of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity at the king's own request. Several preferments were offered him in the country, but his love for London, his birthplace and long home, made him decline all. He was first Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the king, afterwards, in 1616, he was elected Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and in 1621 he was appointed Dean of St. Paul's, to which was soon added the vicarage of St. Dunstan's in the West.

The loss of his wife, soon after he was ordained, caused him to promise his children never to marry again. Henceforth his sacred profession became his sole object. He preached regularly one sermon a week at one and another of the churches under his charge, or before the Court. Sickness nigh unto death on one occasion, continued ill health, and visibly declining strength, were the clouds that hung round his glory as a preacher, but his lustre remained unabated to the last, and he has been well called the "great post-preacher" of the Church of England.

His last sermon was at Whitehall, the first Friday in Lent, 1631. His text was, "To God the Lord belong the issues of death." So worn and emaciated was he that he seemed like a living skeleton delivering his own funeral oration; and then he went to his home, to realise his own expressed wish, either to die in the pulpit or of the pulpit." Izaak Walton's account of his death-bed is so full and touching that nothing can be added to it nor taken from it.

Donnellan Lectures.—Six lectures delivered annually in the Chapel of Trinity College, Dublin, according to the will of Mrs. Donnellan, who in the last century bequeathed £1,243 for the good of the college, appointing the provost and senior Fellows as trustees. The subject of the lectures is chosen by the trustees, and the regulations are similar to those of the Bampton Lectures at Oxford. Since 1794, when the first set were delivered, many famous works have been the result of the legacy; among others were Dr. Graves's Lectures on the Pentateuch, Archbishop Magee on Prophecy, &c.

Doorkeepers, or OSTIARII.—The lowest of the five orders which are said by the Church of Rome to be of apostolical institution; but they are not mentioned by Cyprian or Tertullian, though in the fourth century Greek writers speak of them among the orders of clergy; no author, however, tells what sort of ordination they had in the Greek Church, and in the Latin it was no more than the bishop's commission, with the ceremony of delivering the keys of the Church into their hands with the words, "Behave thyself as one that must give an account to God of the things that are kept locked under these keys." Their office consisted in taking care of the doors of the church during divine service, and some say in making a distinction between the faithful and excommunicated persons, and any that were to be excluded from the church; but it is probable that this power did not belong to them, as even heretics were permitted to hear the first part of the church service, and it would seem that their office and station was little more than that of our clerks and sextons. They had to give notice of the times of prayer and church assemblies; and as in times of persecution it was necessary to do this by a private signal, this was not improbably the origin of the first institution of this order in the Church of Rome.

Dorcas Society.—The name comes from one of the earliest Christians, mentioned in Acts ix. 36, a benefactress of the poor, who was restored to life by St. Peter. It is a common thing amongst nearly all denominations to have periodical meetings to make clothing for the poorer members of the congregation, and these working parties are often called Dorcas Societies.

Dorchester.—A village in Oxfordshire, six miles south of Abingdon, the seat of the first bishopric in the kingdom of Wessex, founded by Birinus A.D. 633. [BIRINUS.] This place was chosen in preference to the capital, Winchester, with a view of affording a better station from which to carry the Gospel inland into Mercia, which was still heathen. But the King of Wessex, Kynegils, was very anxious to have the "bishop's stool" at Winchester, and began to build a grand church there. In the next reign, this church being now finished, the King chose a monk belonging to it, named Wina, and sent him to France to be consecrated as Bishop of Winchester, assigning as his diocese the south part of his kingdom, while the north part was to remain under the See of Dorchester. The Bishop of Dorchester, Agilbert, successor to Birinus, was justly angered at this high-handed proceeding, and resigned his see. Before long Wina offended the King, and was driven away, and thus Wessex instead of two bishops had none. Presently the King invited Agilbert, who had gone to Paris, to return. He excused himself on the ground of infirmity and age, but sent his nephew, Eleutherius, who was consecrated in 670. After him came Hedda, who was canonised. He finally removed the bishop's stool to Winchester.

Dorchester did not, however, cease to be a see, for it became that of the diocese of Mercia. At one time this see was moved to Leicester, at another to Lichfield. [LEICESTER, LICHFIELD, LINCOLN.] Bishop Stubbs, in his invaluable Registrum, gives the following list of Bishops of Dorchester, after the removal to Winchester.

Dorothea.—(1) A martyr in the persecution of Diocletian. Refusing to sacrifice to idols when commanded by the Governor of Cappadocia, she was put under the care of two women who had renounced the Christian religion, and who devoted their whole life to persuading others to follow their example. They were quite unsuccessful; in fact, were so touched by her earnestness and piety that they joined the Church again, and were put to death, in consequence, in Dorothea's presence. A few days after, she was tortured on the rack and beheaded. The beautiful legend of her death forms the subject of Massinger's fine play of The Virgin Martyr. (2) A Prussian lady, who, after having borne nine children, betook herself to an ascetic life, and died in 1404. In consequence of alleged miracles at her grave, the Teutonic knights desired her canonisation; but on investigation it came out that Dorothea had denounced the order and foretold its downfall; consequently no further steps were taken. But she was still popularly regarded as the patron saint of Prussia.

Dort, Synod of.—The first general Synod of Protestants, next to the Westminster Assembly the most important, held at Dort, date 1618 and 1619, convened to consider the doctrines of the Arminians and Calvinists; but it is a misnomer to call it a Conference, for the Calvinists assumed the part of judges, the Arminians being simply put on their trial. In the conflict of parties, the only moderating element was the influence of the English delegates sent thither by James I. These were Carleton, Bishop of Llandaff; Davenant and Hall, afterwards Bishops of Salisbury and Norwich; Balcanwhall, a Scottish chaplain of the King; and Ward, professor of Divinity at Cambridge. Deputies also were present from the United Provinces, and from the Churches of Hesse, Switzerland, Bremen, and the Palatinate. Those chosen from the Reformed Church of France were forbidden by the King to attend. The Arminian views may be briefly stated under five heads:—1. That God decreed from all eternity to save those whom He foreknew as believers, and to damn those who should persist as unbelievers. Hence election was conditional, not arbitrary; and reprobation the result of men's own conduct, and not attributable to God. 2. That Christ died and made atonement for all men in general, and for every man in particular, but that only those who believed would be partakers of the benefit. 3. That faith in man cannot proceed only from the exercise of his own free will and natural faculties, because he has become corrupt through the Fall; in order, therefore, to his conversion, he stands in absolute need of the special grace of the Holy Ghost given him through Christ. 4. That all that is good in man is the immediate and only work of the Holy Ghost, from beginning to end; and, therefore, the merit is not man's, but the praise is God's alone. At the same time this grace of God, which is offered to all, does not force but only persuades men: it may therefore be resisted by the human will. 5. That sufficient grace is bestowed by God on those who are truly regenerate for their final preservation. At the same time it was at first considered an open question if such could actually fall from grace received, and relapse into a state of sin, so as to die in it; but afterwards it was agreed that such could be the case. [ARMINIANS.] On the other hand, the Calvinistic views were comprised in the following "five points," as they were called: 1. Particular Election: That God from all eternity chose the elect to be finally saved through Christ, not on the condition of their personal holiness, but by a purely arbitrary decree; while all the rest of mankind were only vessels of wrath, doomed to destruction. 2. Particular Redemption: That Christ, by His death and passion, made atonement only for the sins of the elect, not for the sins of the whole world. 3. Man's utter spiritual inability in his fallen condition to help to right himself in the least degree, so that, having inherited Adam's personal guilt, and also a corrupt nature of his own, he can but sin more and more if left to himself, and becomes subject to all sin's penalties, temporal, spiritual, and eternal. 4. Irresistible grace, by which those whom God from all Eternity elected to save, He also effectually calls in time out of their state by nature into a state of grace, not by persuasion, but by compulsion. 5. Final perseverance, in which it is maintained that those who were eternally elected, and have once been effectually called and sanctified, can never finally fall away, but must eventually be saved. The real bone of contention was whether God, by an absolute and arbitrary decree before men were born, had placed the greater part of mankind under a fatal necessity of sinning, and of being lost for ever in consequence. As corollaries, it was disputed whether Christ died for all men, or only for a few; whether man's will has any part or place in accepting God's grace or not;

whether that grace could be resisted or not; whether a final falling away after regeneration was possible or impossible. In this controversy, the Arminians were condemned almost unheard: the Calvinists triumphed for a time, not by show of reason on their side, but by sheer force. At the 136th session the canons were passed, though some of the delegates (including all those from England) strove earnestly for a modification of them, and against the condemnation of the "Remonstrants," as the Arminians were called. As Bishop Short remarks, "The decisions of this synod are far too peremptory, inasmuch as they define beyond what the revealed Word of God has declared." To which statement it may be added that the decrees of this synod are by no means regarded as binding by the Calvinistic bodies themselves; and that the points therein mooted call for the greatest sobriety of mind and the widest charity of heart.

Dositheus.—An impostor who lived about the time of Christ, and claimed to be the Messiah. He was a Samaritan. He is often falsely called a heretic: he was more properly a rival of our Saviour, and the sect he founded was a Jewish rather than a Christian one. He appears never to have had a large following, but for a long time the sect had a local existence. One of the chief doctrines of Dositheus was an over-scrupulous observance of the Sabbath. He is mentioned by Origen and Jerome, but they differ as to whether he appeared before or after Christ; and by Theophilus, a Persian writer against the sect in the fourth century; and it is noticed as late as the sixth century. Some say that Dositheus and Simon Magus were disciples of St. John, and that they quarrelled on his death as to who should be chief of their party, and then that each founded a separate sect; but the various accounts are so conflicting that it is impossible to arrive at any certainty.

Dossal.—The name given to the hanging of embroidered cloth behind the altar. It comes from the French dossier, meaning a back-panel, covered with stuff. The term is also applied to the hood of a cope and the back of a chasuble.

Donai, ENGLISH SEMINARY AT.—When the violent conduct of the Popes had destroyed any remaining hope of the reunion of England with Rome under Queen Elizabeth, the leaders of the Roman party determined to establish seminaries for the purpose of training young men who should become missionaries in England to bring the people back to the faith. The first of these was founded at Donai by William Allen, a Fellow of Oriel, and afterwards a cardinal. He established others at Rome and in Spain. From Donai a stream of proselytisers was poured into England, many a one of whom perished as a traitor, not, however, because he held Roman doctrines, but because he promulgated the Pope's Bull of excommunication and deposition against the Queen. [RECUANTS.] The English seminary at Douai still flourishes, a branch of the Benedictines. [DOUAI VERSION; BIBLE.]

Doxology.—A hymn of glorification to God—Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost—commonly used after each Psalm to declare belief in the Unity of the Godhead in the Trinity, making public acknowledgment that the glory and majesty of each Person of the Trinity is equal. Another doxology is that at the close of the Communion Service—Glory to God in the highest, etc.—called in the Greek Church the Greater Doxology, or Angelic Hymn. It is usual to sing a metrical doxology after a hymn. St. Basil says that it was an old custom amongst the Christians to use the Gloria Patri at candle-lighting in acknowledgment of thankfulness for the benefit of light after the sun was set. This doxology was continued in the Church to preserve the Nicene faith against the Arian heresy, for the Arians, who refused to pay the same adoration to the Son and Holy Ghost as they did to the Father, altered the form of the doxology thus: To Thee, O Father, be honour and glory, by, or for, Thy only begotten Son, in the Holy Spirit. It is told of Leontius, an Arian Bishop of Antioch, that in order to conceal his heterodoxy he used to pronounce the doxology softly, except the last words, world without end, which he spoke aloud so as to be heard by those who were near him. The use of the doxology in the Church of Rome is said to have been introduced by St. Jerome. Origen, in his tract concerning prayer, observes that the ancient Christians began with a sort of doxology, the next part of their devotions being Eucharistical, then Confessionary, after that Petitionary, and concluding with a repetition of the doxology.

D'Oyly, GEORGE, D.D. (b. in London, Oct. 31st, 1778; d. Jan. 8th, 1846), was educated at Benet College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen a Fellow, and afterwards became Moderator of the University, and "Christian Advocate." He was made chaplain-in-ordinary to George III. in 1810, and three years later domestic chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury (Manners Sutton), and at length rector of Lambeth and of Sundridge, in Kent. He wrote much in connection with religious movements and societies, but his chief literary work was the commentary on the Bible written in conjunction with Bishop Mant, and known as D'Oyly and Mant's Bible. He was the person who first suggested to Sir Robert Peel the foundation of King's College, London, in which religious and secular knowledge should be combined. He wrote a Life of Archbishop Sanocroft, which he published in 1821.

Drontheim.—The seat of the first Christian bishopric in Norway. In the Cathedral of Christ Church, which was never finished, and which is partly in ruins, the body of St. Olaf, the patron saint of Norway, was preserved in a costly shrine. [NORWAY MISSIONS.]

Druids.—The ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls and Britons. The derivation of the name is a disputed point. It has generally been supposed to come from a Greek word signifying an oak, because that tree was considered sacred; Pliny, too, says that the Druids never sacrificed except under an oak tree. On the other hand, an objection to this derivation of the name has been raised on the ground that we have no reason to suppose that the ancient Britons were acquainted with the Greek tongue. Yet in Cæsar's Commentaries we are told of the Druids, that though they did not think it lawful to commit their lessons to writing, but handed them down by memory only, at the same time, in almost all other matters, both in public and private transactions, they employed Greek letters. This fact does away with the objection stated. Supreme in all matters of religion, the Druids intervened with authority in all public and private differences; made, expounded, and executed the laws; were exempt from military service and payment of taxes; while their persons were considered inviolable and sacred. Whoever did not abide by their decisions was put under their interdict; could not be present at the sacrifices offered; was regarded as peculiarly impious and wicked; was shut out from the company and converse of his fellows, and could enjoy no share in the honours of the State. There was always one chief Druid, endowed with supreme authority. When he died, he was succeeded in his office by the next best man, but if none such existed, and there were several found with equal qualifications, the choice was decided by vote; in some cases by an appeal to arms. The Druidical religion, according to Cæsar, originated in Britain, and was imported thence into Gaul. Tacitus tells us that its headquarters were at Mona, the modern Anglesea; where he also states that they had groves consecrated to a savage superstition, inasmuch as they thought it right to besmear their altars with the blood of their captives, and to consult their gods by inspecting the entrails of the men thus slain. As, however, it was unlawful to commit their tenets to writing, but little can be positively known concerning them. The immortality of the soul, and its transmigration after death, were part of their creed. In their schools, too, which were much frequented by the youth, and at which some continued as scholars for twenty years together, all the natural sciences, as then known, were taught. Cæsar tells us that astronomy, geography, the theory of the universe, and the existence and authority of the gods, were among the reasonings and traditions of these "Men of the Oak."

Druses, THE.—A Syrian sect. Their founder was Hakem, the third of the Fatimite Caliphs, a madman and a tyrant, born at Cairo, A.D. 985. He was about eleven years of age at his accession to the throne. In the year A.D. 1000 Hakem began openly his mad career. Women were ordered to keep to their houses after dark, and shops were forbidden to remain open. Ridiculous regulations, under pain of death, were issued, as to the dress of men in the public baths; Jews and Christians had to wear a fantastic habit to distinguish them from Moslems; no one was to be seen in the streets after sunset; wine, when discovered, was to be poured out in the streets, and the vessels containing it to be broken; and on one occasion all the dogs in Cairo were killed by his orders because one of them had yelped at the Caliph's horse. In the earlier part of his reign Hakem had been a strict believer, endowing and adorning mosques and colleges, and favoured the Shiah sect while he persecuted the Sunnis. In his zeal, too, against Christians, he razed to the ground the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and also made the attempt, without success, to destroy the cavern-tomb of the Saviour. His plea was the disgraceful scenes that attended the imposture of the Holy Fire at Easter. Soon, however, Hakem became ambitious of divine honours, and of founding a new religion. Accordingly, he proclaimed himself the Deity Incarnate; numbered at one time sixteen thousand followers; and instituted religious services in his own worship. In these absurd pretensions he was assisted by two Persians, Ed Darazi—whence the name of Druses is derived—and Hamza, their chief instructor in doctrine. Hakem was assassinated in A.D. 1021, at the instigation of his own sister. In matters of doctrine the Druses recognise only one God, and hence style themselves Unitarians. They regard His nature as incomprehensible, neither to be grasped by the mind nor expressed in words. The Deity, according to their creed, has appeared in human form at nine previous epochs; and the last of all, the Avatar to close the series, was Hakem himself. His death in A.D. 1021 they regard only as a mysterious disappearance; and they confidently look for his return in power and victory. Universal Intellect, according to them, is the first creation of God. Hakem was that Intellect Incarnate, and is still the source and channel of all knowledge and grace. At the second Advent it will be his prerogative to distribute rewards and punishments. One of their peculiar notions is that there is always the same number of men living in the world; a sort of debit and credit account being kept between Life and Death. They also hold the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and believe that all previous religions were but types of the one true faith, viz., their own — were allegories, in fact, whilst theirs is the substance. The Druses still are found in the ranges of Lebanon, and are at hereditary feud with the Maronites, a Christian sect in the same region.

Drusius, JOHANNES (b. 1550, d. 1616).—A native of the Netherlands, whose father, being banished for his religious opinions, came to England; and thus his son came to be educated here, and became Hebrew Professor at Oxford in 1572. But in 1576 he returned to his native country, and was made Hebrew Professor at Leyden. His annotations on the Old Testament found a place in the Critica Sacra.

Dualism.—The theory held by the Manicheans of the existence of two principles contrary to each other, as good and evil, God and the world, spirit and matter, soul and body. It establishes these contraries as eternal principles, and its disciples believe in the election of some few people to happiness, and the condemnation of all others.

Dudith, ANDREAS (b. at Buda, 1533; d. at Breslau, 1589), was one of the most learned and eminent men in the sixteenth century. He studied in the most famous universities, and travelled through almost all the countries of Europe. He accompanied Cardinal Pole to England on the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, and on his return to his country was made Bishop of Tinia, and one of the Emperor Ferdinand's privy councillors. He was sent to the Council of Trent in the name of the Emperor and the Hungarian clergy, and he there spoke with so much energy against several abuses of the Church of Rome that the Pope requested the Emperor to recall him. Ferdinand complied, but, nevertheless, promoted Dudith to the bishopric of Chonat. He afterwards married one of the maids of honour of the Queen of Hungary, and resigned his bishopric. The Pope excommunicated him, but Dudith treated the sentence with contempt. He retired to Cracow, and after a time embraced the Protestant religion. Some say that he became a Socinian, but others deny it. He was well versed in philosophy, mathematics, physics, history, theology, and the civil law; and he was an enthusiastic admirer of Cicero.

Duff, ALEXANDER, D.D., born at Pitlochry, in Perthshire, in 1808, and educated at St. Andrews, under Dr. Chalmers. In 1829 he resolved to go out to India as a missionary from the Church of Scotland, and set sail from Portsmouth in October. He was shipwrecked near the Cape of Good Hope, but after a voyage of eight months reached his destination, Calcutta, in May, 1830.

Here he laboured till 1843 to promote the moral and spiritual welfare of the people of India, making one journey home to kindle a deeper interest in his native land with regard to the Indian missions. Several of his addresses have been published. In 1837 he received the degree of D.D. in recognition of his valuable labours. At the disruption of the Scottish Church in 1843, it was found necessary that her foreign missionaries should decide to which branch they would attach themselves. Dr. Duff resolved to cast in his lot with the Free Church; and as the property of the mission belonged to the Established Church, he had to start afresh; but in this he was eminently successful. He founded schools, which were attended by hundreds of pupils; asylums for orphans, and colleges for the more intelligent Hindoos. In 1850 he paid another visit home, and was appointed Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church, which met in Edinburgh in May, 1851. He was instrumental in establishing the Calcutta Review, a quarterly periodical of great ability. His health at last giving way, he was obliged in 1864 to leave India permanently: he returned to Scotland, and became the manager of the foreign work of the Free Church. He took a deep interest in South Africa, and specially in the Livingstone mission. In 1867 he became Professor of Theology in the Free Church. He was for some time President of the Scotch Colportage Society. He died at Edinburgh in 1878. He was the author of many works on Missions:—Missions the Chief End of the Christian Church; India and Indian Missions; Missionary Addresses; The Indian Rebellion, its Causes and Results; The Jesuits, their Origin, etc.

Dulcinists. [APOSTOLICALS.]

Dulia.—One of the three grades of worship allowed by the Roman Catholic Church. Dulia is the homage paid to saints and angels; hyper-dulia is the veneration due to the Blessed Virgin alone; and latría, that due to each Person of the Trinity.

Du Moulin, PIERRE (b. 1568, d. 1658), the most brilliant controversialist of the French Reformed Church. He was educated at Paris, at Cambridge, and at Leyden, and in 1599 became pastor of Charenton and chaplain to Catharine of Bourbon. The Pope was very anxious to gain this princess to the Roman Catholic faith, and for this purpose employed the most subtle and learned of his clergy, especially Du Perron, then Bishop of Evreux, and Father Cotton. With them Du Moulin had many encounters, of which he gives some account in a book entitled The Novelty of Popery opposed to the Antiquity of True Christianity. The most celebrated of his disputations was with Palma Cayet. It began May 28th, 1602, and the conference lasted for a fortnight. The questions agitated were propounded by Cayet himself: Of the Sacrifice of the Mass, of the Adoration of the Pope, and of the Veneration of Images. Du Moulin gained a complete victory; and the doctors of the Sorbonne, perceiving that their cause was discredited, contrived to break up the conference. For many years he was intimately connected with James I. of England, and when that king published his Confession of Faith, which was attacked by Coeffeteau, Du Moulin wrote a French book in his defence, Défense de la Foy pour Jacques I., and another in Latin, De Monarchia Pontificis Romani. Another controversy took place about 1609 between Du Moulin and Father Gontier, a Jesuit, on the doctrine of transubstantiation, and Gontier, having declared that he had confuted him in divers points held by the Protestants, Du Moulin published a report of the whole conference, entitled Véritable Narré de la Conférence entre les Sieurs Du Moulin et Gontier. When Ravaillac murdered Henry IV. many accused the Jesuits of having employed him, and in support of this view Du Moulin put forth a famous book called Antiocton, in which he fathered the King's death on Cotton in this anagram: PERRAUX CORON, PERCÉ TON ROI; to which the Jesuits replied with an anagram on his name: PERRAUX DU MOULIN, ERIT MUNDO LUPUS. He was pressed by several universities, especially Leyden, where he had studied for a time, to occupy their Chair of Theology, but he would not give up the church of Paris. After the death of Henry he had a bitter controversy with Tilennus, Professor of Theology at Sedan, about the effects of the union of the two natures of Christ. In 1615 James I. invited Du Moulin to England to help him in a plan he had formed of uniting all the Reformed Churches in Christendom. During this visit he was made a D.D. at Cambridge. On his return to France, the Jesuit Arnoux, court preacher and confessor to the King, attacked the Confession of the Reformed Church; Du Moulin replied to him, and wrote his masterpiece of controversy, Bouclier de la Foy. He was chosen, with four others, by the Protestant Church to go to the Council of Trent, but they were forbidden by the Council of State, on pain of death, to leave France. In 1620 he was sent to the Protestant Synod of Alais, in Languedoc, of which he was made President. Hearing that it would be dangerous for him to return to Paris, he went to Sedan in 1621, and succeeded Tilennus in the Chair of Divinity. From here he wrote a long letter to the Protestants at Rochelle, counselling them not to fight against the King; but they disregarded his advice. James I. once more invited him to England to write a defence against Du Perron, now Cardinal. He went in March, 1624, and on James's death returned to Sedan, where he lived for thirty-three years in comparative retirement, though he never quite gave up religious controversy.

Dunkers.—A Baptist sect, founded in 1724, in Philadelphia, by a German named Conrad Peysel, or Beissel. Their chief settlement is called Euphrata, in allusion to the lament of the Hebrew captives. They practise great austerities, and wear a peculiar dress resembling that of the Dominican friars. They are also called Tunkers and Dippers.

Duns Scotus, JOHN, was born about 1265, died about 1308. England, Scotland, and Ireland have each claimed him for a countryman; it is, however, supposed that while Scotus indicates his Scottish descent, he was chiefly educated in England. The first elements of learning were imparted to him by some Franciscan monks who had been struck with the boy's intelligence while tending his father's cows. He was then sent by them to Merton College, Oxford, where in due time he became a Fellow, and entered the order of Franciscans. He was very learned in theology, law, mathematics, logic and metaphysics, astronomy, and natural philosophy. In 1301 he became professor of theology in succession to his master, William de Varro. His prelections were attended by crowds, the students at Oxford then exceeding 30,000. In 1305 he obtained the degree of doctor, and removed to Paris, where he greatly distinguished himself by a public defence of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary against St. Thomas Aquinas. He is said to have confuted two hundred objections to the doctrine, and to have brought a cloud of proof to establish it. The result was the conversion of the whole University, and the passing of a rule that none hereafter should be admitted to a degree there who did not swear to uphold this doctrine. He was called the Subtle Doctor, on account of his metaphysical acumen, by which epithet he is generally known amongst the Schoolmen. In 1308 he was called to Cologne to oppose the heresies of the Beguins, and to found a new university. He was received in the city with acclamation, but his career was cut short, for he died the same year, of apoplexy. Scotus has been esteemed the glory of the Franciscans, as Aquinas was of the Dominicans, and from their controversy arose the schools of the Scotists and Thomists, whose disputes lasted for so long. As regards his scholastic teaching, he was an advocate of Realism against the opposite system of Nominalism. As such, he contended that Universals, as distinguished from Particulars or Individual Things, had an objective or external reality, and that logic, therefore, was conversant about things and realities; while the Nominalists declared that Universals had but a subjective existence only, and that logic in consequence was conversant only about words and names. In maintaining these views, Scotus carried Materialism to the most transcendental length, discovering the existence of Matter not only in angels and spirits, but even in the Deity Himself. The works ascribed to Duns Scotus are very numerous. The most famous, next to his commentaries on the Bible and Aristotle, is his commentary on the sentences of Peter Lombard, called the Opus Oxoniense, of which the Opus Parisiense is an abridgment. In 1639, his works were collected and published at Lyons (12 vols., folio), by Luke Wadding, under the title, R. P. F. Joannis Duns Scoti, Doctoris Subtilis, Ordinis Minorum, Opera omnia quæ hujusque reperiri potuerunt, collecta, recognita, notis scholiis, et commentariis illustrata, etc. This does not, however, contain all the works of Scotus, and a complete copy of this edition is exceedingly scarce.

Dunstan, St.—No man was more honoured by the generation in which he lived, and for many following generations, than St. Dunstan. On the other hand, no man has been more charged with fraud, imposture, and cruelty by the writers of later ages. Dunstan was born of a noble family in the west of England, not far from Glastonbury, in A.D. 925, the year in which Athelstan succeeded to the throne. He showed in childhood such an extraordinary love for books and music, that his parents determined to give him all the educational advantages in their power, and he was sent to Canterbury to be under his uncle Ethelm, the Archbishop, who introduced him into the court of King Athelstan. That king became so attached to him, and promoted him so rapidly, that he was regarded with bitter jealousy by his fellows, and retired from court, and went for a while to the monastery of Fleury, near Rouen, in France. On his return, King Edmund appointed him one of his chaplains, and, though he was then not more than about twenty-one years of age, gave him the ruined abbey of Glastonbury to restore, and to assemble a society of monks under the rule of discipline which he had learnt abroad. The sudden and violent death of Edmund, immediately after, prevented Dunstan from at once proceeding with this work, to which he might also have thought his own age unequal. He continued to live for some years longer at the court of King Edred, with whom he was in great favour; and it was not till A.D. 954 that his foundation of Glastonbury was finished. Among the first monks who joined his society was Ethelwold, who afterwards became Bishop of Winchester, and for his great zeal in the same cause was called "the Father of Monks." Another was Oswald, who was made Bishop of Worcester, and Archbishop of York. Through Dunstan's influence the King now restored the Abbey of Abingdon, which was put under the charge of Ethelwold, and continued one of the most famous Benedictine abbeys till the time of Henry VIII. While, however, these three friends were planning great things, King Edred died, in 955, and was succeeded by Edwy, the eldest son of Edmund, a weak and vicious youth, so much so that before long the men of Mercia and Northumberland revolted against him, and placed his brother Edgar on the northern throne. Edwy was no friend to monkhood; and in the year following his accession, he banished Dunstan beyond the sea. It is said that on his coming to the throne he gave a feast to his nobles. The Danes had brought in an ill custom of drinking to great excess, and this custom the Saxons unfortunately learnt from them. Even Alfred is said to have suffered all his life afterwards from the excesses he was obliged to submit to at his coronation-feast; and Edred, at the foundation of Abingdon Abbey, remained all day drinking mead with his nobles. Edwy withdrew from this heavy-headed revel; but only that he might pay a visit to a married woman, Elgiva, with whom he was too intimate. His departure gave great offence to his nobles, and they deputed Dunstan to go and remonstrate with him and bring him back. He did so; and finding him in the company of the woman and her daughter, Dunstan, using something between force and persuasion, led him back to the banquetting hall. For this Edwy took occasion in the following year to banish Dunstan. He also took back the lands which Edmund and Edred had given to Glastonbury and Abingdon, and broke up those establishments; and in the third year of his reign he married Elgiva, who appears to have been his cousin. The Roman Church, from the time of Pope Gregory, had disapproved of marriages between persons so related; and in the laws of some of the Saxon kings it was forbidden. By degrees the following Popes carried it further, and by forbidding marriages among cousins in very remote degrees, turned the law to great abuse. At that time, however, the opinion in England being that marriage of first cousins at least was unlawful, this match of King Edwy was a new offence; and Archbishop Odo, who then presided at Canterbury, and had the authority of the law to interfere in such cases, obliged the newly-married couple to separate from each other. There are some strange stories of cruelty, invented by the writers of legends in later ages—as that Odo caused Elgiva to be branded in the forehead, and, on her attempting to join the King, to have the tendons of her legs severed; and, finally, that he had her put to death. But as it is certain that the Saxon law gave no bishop any power to require anything from a culprit of any rank but the doing of penance, and as the earliest accounts contain nothing of the kind, and there is no authority for it but a legend written one hundred and fifty years afterwards, we may unhesitatingly pronounce this to be a fiction. Edwy was on bad terms with his people; some of them rose in rebellion against him; and a party of these are said to have slain Elgiva in a tumult at Gloucester. The King himself died at an early age, in October, A.D. 959. On the death of Edwy, his brother Edgar became King of all England. Two years after his accession Odo died, and Dunstan, who had been before recalled from banishment, and was in great favour, was made archbishop. It seems that he had been entertained by Edgar before his brother's death, and had been made Bishop of Worcester and of London, which were both in the province of Mercia. Being now possessed of great power and influence, and aided by many powerful noblemen, as well as his two friends Oswald and Ethelwold, who held the two other most important Sees of York and Winchester, he had for nearly twenty years full scope for executing his great designs. The King, Edgar, was scarcely yet more than twenty-one, and in what regarded the Church suffered Dunstan to rule matters almost as he pleased. And then Dunstan's greatness came out. "Dunstan," says Mr. Green, "stands first in the line of ecclesiastical statesmen, who counted among them Lanfranc and Wolsey, and ended in Laud." "The noblest tribute to his work," says the same eloquent writer elsewhere, "lies in the silence of our chroniclers. His work indeed was a work of settlement, and such a work was best done by the simple enforcement of peace." It was by his justice to both sides that Northmen and Danes became friends instead of enemies. [See Green's History of the English People, i. 96.] In the course of Dunstan's administration about forty monasteries were built or restored, and most of them richly endowed. Among these were the old foundations of Ely, Peterborough, Tewkesbury, Malmesbury, Glastonbury, Evesham, Bath, and Abingdon; the new abbeys of Ramsey, Hunts; Tavistock and Milton Abbots, Devon; Cerne Abbots, Dorset; and many more. The rage for these new monasteries was so great that a change now took place at many of the cathedral churches. Here the bishops had formerly held a monastery in some places near the cathedral, where such priests as had taken the habit of monks lived with the other monks; but the other clergy, who were not under the rule, resided in private houses of their own, having an estate for their common maintenance, such as the deans and cathedral clergy have now. Thus, at Canterbury there were the secular clergy, who were in one society at the cathedral of Christ Church, and the monks, who were in another at St. Augustine's. Dunstan did not attempt to change this arrangement in his own See; but Oswald turned out all the clergy at Worcester who would not become monks; Ethelwold did the same at Winchester; and their example was followed by Elfric, after Dunstan's death, at Canterbury; by Wulfstine, Bishop of Sherborne, and other bishops. Dunstan died May 19th, 988. A small portion of his tomb is to be seen in Canterbury Cathedral, but a more interesting relic of him remains in the cathedral library—namely, a manuscript written by him, and his autograph in a beautiful hand.

Dunwich.—The first bishopric of East Anglia. For many years after the conversion of Kent by Augustine, the East Angles remained heathen. When King Ethelbert died in 616, Redwald, King of East Anglia, became Bretwalda. For reasons of State, however, when Ethelbert was dying, or dead, Redwald went to Kent and received baptism; but his wife remained a heathen, and he was but a half-hearted Christian. His son, Eorpwald, was prevented from receiving the faith by his nobles, but his half-brother, who succeeded him in 631, and who had been educated in France, was a Christian. At the beginning of his reign, Felix, a Burgundian monk, came into his kingdom, and was consecrated a bishop by Archbishop Honorius. His See was fixed at Dunwich, as being a flourishing sea-port, busy and populous. Bishop Felix presided over the See for seventeen years, and was a great preacher and evangeliser. He set up a school at Dunwich, which became famous, and as his episcopate lasted through the reign of several kings, his position became almost as royal in the eyes of the Angles. During the episcopate of Bisi, his third successor, Theodore of Tarsus began his memorable primacy [THEODORE OF TARSUS], and through his influence Bisi, who was grown old, was induced to resign, and Theodore divided the See into two, one for the North Folk, the other for the South Folk, fixing the "bishop's stool" for the former at Elmham, and keeping that of the latter at Dunwich (A.D. 673). Of the history of the two Sees in the years succeeding we know little, as, indeed, of the kingdom itself, for the fens and morasses on the west secluded it from the rest of the country almost as much as the sea shut it in on the east. But the coming of the Danes in the eighth century was followed by their permanent settlement in East Anglia in the ninth. It was their first settlement in this country. In the wars that ensued the brave East Anglian King Edmund was slain in 870 [EDMUND]; and the Danes set themselves so fiercely to root out the Christian faith that they destroyed the great religious houses which had sprung up in East Anglia—Peterborough, Crowland, Thorney, and Ely. The Peace of Wedmore, in 878, between King Alfred and the Danish chief Guthrun, brought brighter times; the Danes kept East Anglia, and became Christians. There are few records as yet of the progress of the Church in this part, but it was probably steady; Odo, the Archbishop of Canterbury in 942, was a Dane. Evil days, however, returned. Fresh Danes kept arriving, and the treacherous massacre of St. Brice's Day in 1004 was terribly avenged in East Anglia. The country was laid desolate churches were pillaged, clergy and monks massacred. The Abbey of Peterborough, which had risen from its ruins with fresh splendour, was again robbed. The accession of Cnut in 1014 brought peace to the Church. The troubles arising out of the struggle between Regulars and Seculars, which lasted till the Conquest, made themselves felt also here. The notorious Stigand thrust himself into the East Anglian See, as well as into those of Winchester and Canterbury. He was deposed from all by William the Conqueror. The See of Elmham was moved to Thetford in 1078, and to Norwich in 1094. [Norwich.] [See Dr. Jessop's admirable history of the See of Norwich (S.P.C.K.).] The following list of the Bishops of Dunwich, as far as they are known, is from the Bishop of Chester's Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum :—

Dupanloup, FELIX ANTOINE PHILIBERT, Bishop of Orleans, an eloquent and eminent prelate, perhaps the most prominent of his generation, was born in Savoy, 1802; died at Laincy, in Loiret, October, 1878. He was ordained priest in 1825, became, in 1827, chaplain and confessor to the Comte de Chambord, and at the Revolution, in July, 1830, was almoner to the Dauphin. In 1841 he was nominated to one of the Chairs of Theology in the College of the Sorbonne, and in 1849 consecrated Bishop of Orleans, being decorated the following year with the insignia of the Legion of Honour. As a preacher Dupanloup stood in the foremost rank, and was the author of several works of importance, one of his best being L'Education. His literary attainments gained him admission to the French Academy. He opposed the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, and very severely censured the Life of Jesus of his old pupil Rénan.

Dupin, LOUIS ELLIES (b. at Paris, 1657; d. 1719), was of Norman descent. He became doctor of the Sorbonne in 1684. He is celebrated as being the author of the Bibliothèque universelle des Auteurs ecclésiastiques, the first volume of which was published in 1686; this work, with supplements, amounts to sixty-one volumes. Dupin was a man of indomitable energy, undertaking much, and seemingly always able to carry through what he undertook. He was made Professor of Philosophy at the Royal College, but, when the Bull Unigenitus was published, he was banished as a Jesuit to Chatellerault by Louis XIV., but allowed afterwards to return to Paris, though not to resume his professorship. He was in communication with Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, and also Peter the Great, with the object of a possible union being brought about between the French, English, and Greek Churches. He was the editor of the Journal des Savants, and also a contributor to Moreri's Biographical Dictionary.

Duplessis-Mornay, PHILIP (b. 1549, d. 1623).—A prominent leader of the French Protestants. His writings against the Spanish oppression in the Netherlands exposed him to the hatred of the Roman Catholics at Paris, and he barely escaped death in the Bartholomew massacre. He fled to England, where he spent several years. He wrote a book in French concerning the truth of the Christian religion, against Atheists, Epicures, Paynims, Jews, Mahometans, and other Infidels. This was in part translated into English by Sir Philip Sidney. He published a treatise containing the reasons why the Council of Trent could not be admitted in France. He was sent by the King of Navarre to the National Synod of Vitry, in Brittany, and he was also present at the General Assembly of the Protestants held at Montauban in 1584, by permission of the King, and drew up a form of their complaints against the violation of the edict for peace, which he presented to the King at Blois. He became Henry's most intimate adviser, and, in the civil wars for religion, did him and the Protestants many important services, both with his sword and pen, having answered a virulent book published by the League of the House of Guise against the King of Navarre, called the English Catholic. After the death of the Duke of Guise, he was instrumental in bringing about a reconciliation between Henry III. and Henry of Navarre, and was made Governor of Saumur. Here he built a church in 1590, and obtained a grant from the King to found a university there in 1593. By this time Henry had succeeded to the French throne, and had changed his religion. Duplessis wrote to him, expostulating on this sudden change, and desiring the continuance of his favour for the Protestants, and he succeeded in gaining for them some justice in the carrying out of edicts for their protection. In 1598 he published a book on the Institution of the Lord's Supper, and against the Mass. The Jesuits petitioned Parliament that it might be burned, and Du Perron, Bishop of Evreux, taxed Duplessis with having falsified many of his authorities; thereupon Duplessis requested that the King would have every passage in his book examined by commissioners. It was decided that there should be a conference between Duplessis and Du Perron. This was held at Fontainebleau in presence of the King, several bishops, Councillors of State, and other noblemen. After the first day Duplessis was taken so ill that they could proceed no further; whereupon the King declared that "the diocese of Evreux hath vanquished that of Saumur." Duplessis called this decision "a spark of fire," and said that "the Bishop of Evreux's fly was made an elephant." He wrote in the latter part of his life a work called The Mystery of Iniquity, an attack on the Pope. In 1621, when the religious war commenced, he retired to his estates.

Duplication.—The ritual word describing the act of a priest who celebrates the Holy Communion twice in a day. The earliest notice of this is a canon of the Church of Armenia, ascribed to the fifth century, which reprobates the practice very strongly—"May his lot be with the crucifiers." But there is some doubt of the genuineness of this; and at a later period it was allowed, and even enforced in the case of a priest having more churches than one [Canon of Council of Merida, A.D. 666]. At the same time, other authorities forbade it altogether, and some, on the other hand, ordered that a priest should not celebrate oftener than thrice a day [Canons of King Edgar, A.D. 960; Johnson's Collection, i. 420]. The use of the mediæval Church of England was not to forbid it altogether, but only to allow it in cases of necessity, as for the sick, or at a marriage. In some cases, a priest celebrating twice did not himself communicate more than once; but this was always condemned, as by the Council of Toledo, A.D. 681. The Apostolical Canons order every cleric present to receive, thus including the celebrant, and it is quite contrary to propriety for a priest to celebrate otherwise; still, the practice condemned at Toledo is occasionally used even in the Church of England; and in the Church of Sweden, according to Mr. Seudamore [Notitia Eucharistica, p. 693], the celebrant rarely communicates at all. A modified form of this prohibition was a canon of the Council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, which forbade a priest to celebrate twice in a day at the same altar. In the West there seem to be very few other traces of this, but in certain branches of the Eastern Church it is even now the use [Seudamore, p. 173].

Durand, WILLIAM, OF ST. POURÇAIN, Bishop of Purg-en-Velay, 1318, and of Meaux, 1326, died 1332. He was the most brilliant of the schoolmen of the fourteenth century. From his ardent contention that there is no human authority above the human reason he received the name of Doctor Resolutissimus. Starting from man as the centre, he built up his system of theology, so rejecting the teaching of Anselm and Aquinas, that theology is the science of God. He wrote a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, and a treatise on the subjection of the Clergy to the Civil Power, and is regarded as a pioneer of the Reformation.

Durand, WILLIAM, known as the "Speculator," from his book Speculum Juris (1230-96), was a learned writer on canon law. His Rationale Divinorum Officiorum was one of the first works ever printed, and one of the most splendid specimens of typography. There is a very fine copy in the Twysden Library, in the possession of Sir J. Sebright. The first part of this work was translated into English by the late Dr. J. M. Neale, under the title of The Symbolism of Churches and Church Ornaments. This sentence of Durand about the sacrament is sometimes quoted: "Verbum audimus, beneficium sentimus, modum necimus, presentiam credimus."

Durham.—The See of Durham was founded in 995 by Bishop Ealdhun, who removed thither from Chester-le-Street in that year. Lindisfarne was the most ancient representative of the See, having been founded by Oswald of Northumbria in 635. Aidan, its first bishop, was sent thither from Iona. From 665 to 678 the See was vacant, and then Eata became bishop both of Lindisfarne and Hexham; but in 685 he removed to the latter place, and was succeeded at Lindisfarne by the famous St. Cuthbert. [LINDISFARNE.] In 875 Bishop Eardulf and his monks fled from the island See on the approach of the Danes, carrying with them the body of St. Cuthbert, and after wandering about for seven years, settled at Cuneageaster, or Chester-le-Street [q.v.]. This then became the seat of the bishopric till its removal to Dunholm,* or Durham, in 995, by Bishop Ealdhun, who had to fly from the Danes, like his predecessor of a century before. He built here a stone church, and placed in it the shrine of St. Cuthbert. The bishopric of Hexham was merged in this See in 820, but how is not explained. [HEXHAM.] During the episcopate of Walcher (1071-80), Durham Castle was founded by William the Conqueror, and the Prelate of Durham, a prince-bishop with a shadow of the sovereign power enjoyed by some of the German Sees. Mr. E. A. Freeman remarks that if all bishoprics had possessed the same rights England could never have remained a consolidated monarchy, but would have been disintegrated like mediæval

* This modern form, Durham, of the old Dunholm, is of French origin, being the Norman softening of the word into Duresme. Dunholm is derived from the Norse dun, "a hill fort," and holm, "a lake, or river island" [Taylor's Words and Places]. It is stated in N. and Q., 1st S., ii. 108, "that the Bishops of Durham, down to the present day (1850), take alternately the Latin and French signatures Duram and Dunelm." But this custom is now dropped, and the latter signature alone used. Both were, of course (like Antuar, Ebor, and all such other signatures), abbreviations of the Latin adjectives ending in mus, and agreeing with episcopus, "bishop," understood. This is a matter which, owing to its disuse by several bishops, is much forgotten, though perhaps it may be remembered how a newspaper once turned "A. W. Boffen," the Bishop of Rochester's signature, into "Mr. Boffen, the bishop's apparitor."

Germany. Its powers were much curtailed by Henry VIII. Surtees, in his History of Durham, gives, as the possessions of the See, the chief part of the country between the Tees and the Tyne, the districts of Bedlington, Norham, Holy Island, and Craike, together with Hexhamshire, the city of Carlisle, and a district in Teviotdale. Henry I., however, deprived the See of the latter possessions. Bishop Carleph, in 1093, commenced the present cathedral. It was not finished till 1480. The site of it is perhaps the most imposing in England, standing, as it does, sheer upon the face of the cliff above the river Wear. A famous monastery was attached to the See of Durham, which was resigned in 1540. Bede was one of its monks.

Durham, UNIVERSITY OF.—The idea of founding a northern University in the ancient city of Durham was started in the reign of Henry VIII., but this came to nothing. The same idea was revived by Cromwell, who had taken some steps towards it, when his death put an end to the scheme. It was once more revived, and carried out, by the Dean and Chapter of Durham in the year 1833, and in the episcopate of Van Mildert. In the previous year an Act had been passed enabling the Dean and Chapter to appropriate an estate at South Shields for the endowment of a University, that estate being calculated to produce £3,000 per annum. By this Act, the Government of the University rested in the Dean and Chapter, the Bishop being Visitor. Bishop Van Mildert's scheme was to make provision for the Warden, and two Professors of Divinity and Greek, by annexing these posts to prebendal stalls in the Cathedral of Durham. In 1835, a statute was passed by the Dean and Chapter, with the sanction of the Bishop, entrusting the ordinary management of the University to the Warden, a Senate, and a Convocation; the Dean and Chapter reserving to themselves the office of Governors, and to the Bishop the office of Visitor. The Senate consists of the Warden, the Professors of Divinity, Greek, Mathematics, and Hebrew, the two Proctors, the heads of University College and Hatfield Hall (the latter named after Bishop Hatfield, of Durham, a liberal benefactor to Durham College, in Oxford; he died in 1381), and six other members of Convocation. The Convocation consisted originally of the Warden, and a certain number of Doctors and Masters of Divinity, Law, Medicine, and Arts, from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; at present, in addition to the original members, it consists of Doctors and Masters of the University of Durham, who conform to the regulations prescribed. The first work of the new Senate was to draw up a scheme for the regulation of the studies and general business of the University; this scheme was submitted to Convocation, and approved by it in 1836. In 1837, a Royal Charter was issued incorporating the University, and seven days after, viz., June 8th, 1837, the first degrees were confirmed. Owing to the appointment of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the intentions of Bishop van Mildert and the Dean and Chapter were not fully carried out. But the Commissioners dealt liberally with the University, and by an Order in Council of June 4th, 1841, the office of Warden was annexed to the Deanery of Durham; the Professorships of Divinity and Greek were attached to canonries in the cathedral. The Professor of Mathematics was made Professor of Astronomy also, with an increased salary. A new professorship of Hebrew and Oriental languages was established; and the six Fellowships already in existence were increased to twenty-four. The Commissioners, in order to provide funds for these appointments, assigned certain estates to the University which formerly belonged to the Dean and Chapter; grants of money have also been conferred on the University from time to time, under an Order of Council. At the same time that the University was opened, University College was established, for combining discipline and instruction after the manner of colleges in Oxford and Cambridge. At first several houses near the castle were used for the reception of students, but in 1837 the castle itself was assigned to the University, under an Order of the Queen in Council, and is held in trust by the Bishop of Durham. Bishop Hatfield's Hall was opened in 1846, and Bishop Cosin's Hall in 1851; the latter Hall, however, is not now in existence. It was named after Bishop Cosin, translated to Durham in 1660; he was a great theologian and a munificent benefactor. In 1870 students were admitted without being attached to any college or hall. In the same year the Newcastle-upon-Tyne College of Medicine was taken into union with the University, and was henceforth called the Durham University College of Medicine. Particulars as to the courses of study may be seen in the Durham University Calendar. No religious test or subscription is required on matriculation, nor for degrees, scholarships, or Fellowships.

Dutch Reformed Church.—The course of the Reformation in the Netherlands led to the revolt of the nation from Spanish rule, and the establishment of its independence (1579). This was followed by the foundation of a Protestant University at Leyden, and the interdiction of the Roman Catholic religion. Protestantism at once assumed a strong Calvinistic aspect, owing to the French influence brought to bear upon it, and at the provincial Synod of Dort, in 1674, the Heidelberg catechism was adopted. Calvinism passed, as has been so commonly the case, into Rationalism, and the doctrine of many of the ministers of the present Dutch Church is but a modified Deism. At the time of the first colonisation of America, ministers were sent from Holland in response to the appeals of the Dutch settlers there, and as these settlers were mostly from Amsterdam, the ministers were placed under the Classis (Presbytery) of that city. But the difficulty and loss of time in communication caused this to be felt as a burden, and a bitter division took place in America between the Coetus and Conferentie parties. The former "were willing to yield a just tribute of gratitude, and a definite submission to the Church in fatherland. But they had deeply felt the inconvenience and serious difficulties, not to say degradations, of being placed in this implicit subordination and entire control, so inconsistent with the Christian liberty of presbytery. They had been deeply affected with the evils growing out of the mortifying necessity of sending all the cases of ecclesiastical controversy, and difficulties in discipline, to Holland, to be adjudicated there, where none of the parties could be on the spot to give testimony, or plead their own cause. And it was no small ground of complaint that parents must be subjected to the painful separation for years from their sons sent to Holland for education for the ministry, not to mention the burden of expense to which they were also subjected by sending abroad those who were educated here to be ordained in Holland to the holy ministry. In a word, the Conferentie party maintained the high importance of Holland education, and ventured to uphold the exclusive validity of Holland licence and Holland ordination. The Coetus party advocated the necessity of a home education, a home licence, and a home ordination. These, they said, were equally good for them, and equally valid for every purpose, as those in fatherland." This was the state of things in 1737, and for several years before. That year it was proposed not to renounce absolutely all dependence, but to form a home assembly for counsel. This was conceded, but it was found insufficient. It gave no home right to ordain, nor to try ecclesiastical cases. Consequently the question was reopened, and after much animosity had been spent, harmony was restored by the establishment of independence in 1772. The body thus established is still an important one in America.

Duvergier. [PORT-ROYALISTS.]

D.V.—Deo Volente, "God willing;" so St. Paul to the Ephesian Jews in the Vulgate of Acts xviii. 21: "I will return again unto you, Deo volente."

Dwight, TIMOTHY.—An American Presbyterian divine, born at Northampton, in Massachusetts, in 1752; died, 1817. His mother was the daughter of the celebrated theologian, Jonathan Edwards. At the early age of seventeen, having taken his B.A. at Yale College, Newhaven, he became master of the grammar school in that town, and one of the tutors at Yale before he was twenty. He was ordained in 1777; and the war having stopped the college courses, he became an army chaplain for the next year. Then, on the death of his father, he returned to Northampton, and in 1795 became President of Yale College, and Professor of Theology, which offices he held till his death. He was much esteemed, both as a tutor and a preacher. Over-study caused him to become nearly blind, and from the age of twenty-three he was never able to read for more than twenty minutes at a time. His preaching, therefore, was from concise notes, but his memory was remarkably good, so that he could afterwards dictate his sermons to an amanuensis. His chief work is his Theology Explained and Defended, a course of 173 sermons delivered in term time during four years (this work has gained popularity in Great Britain as well as America). He also wrote The Conquest of Canaan, finished when only twenty-one; and some volumes of religious poetry which are now forgotten.

Dyce, WILLIAM, R.A., claims mention in this volume, both as a religious artist and author. He was born at Aberdeen in 1806, the son of a physician, who intended him for his own profession, but the youth, having taken his M.A. degree at Marischal College, showed such a passion for art that his father allowed him to follow it. After careful study and two visits to Italy, during which he imbibed those habits of reverent and solemn study of religious subjects which he retained through life, he settled for awhile at Edinburgh, and gave himself to painting portraits, especially of children. In 1836 he exhibited his first picture in the Royal Academy of London, and in 1838 was made superintendent of the new Government School of Design at Somerset House. His picture of Joash shooting the Arrow of Deliverance secured for him the Associateship of the R.A. His picture of the Baptism of King Ethelbert adorns the House of Lords; and he continued to paint sacred pictures until within two years of his death. One of his best known works is the splendid series of frescoes in All Saints' church, Margaret Street, the most successful attempt which has been made at painting in an Anglican church. He was also an accomplished musician, one of the founders of the Motett Society, and a composer of anthems in the style of Palestrina. He was one of the principal revivers of Gregorian and Plain Song music in the Church of England, and in 1844 published a very handsome edition of the Common Prayer, with Plain Song music. He died in 1864.

Eadie, John (1810-76), a celebrated Biblical critic and theologian, was born at Alva, in Stirlingshire. He was educated at Glasgow University, and then began to study for the ministry at the Divinity Hall of the Secession Church, since called the United Presbyterian. In 1835 he was ordained minister to the Cambridge Street church in Glasgow, and here he became popular as a preacher, specially for the power he had of making Biblical criticism attractive and intelligible. He was pressed to undertake important charges elsewhere, but he refused to leave Glasgow, and in 1863, he, with part of his congregation, formed a new church in Lansdowne Crescent, where he ministered till his death. His scholarship was very extensive, and as early as 1843 he was chosen by the Secession Church to be Professor of Biblical Literature and Hermeneutics in their Divinity Hall. In 1844 Glasgow University gave him the degree of LL.D., and that of D.D. was conferred on him by St. Andrews in 1850. Although preaching and lecturing must have occupied much of his time, he was a very prolific author. He published a Biblical Cyclopædia, an edition of Cruden's Concordance, an Early Oriental History, discourses on The Divine Love, and on Paul the Preacher, commentaries on the Greek text of St. Paul's Epistles, a Life of Dr. Smith, and lastly, a History of the English Bible. His wonderful knowledge of the various English versions, as well as his critical acquaintance with the original, caused him to be chosen to assist in the revision of the New Testament published in 1881.

Eagle.—It is a frequent custom to have the lectern, on which the Bible is placed in churches, in the form of an eagle. "Also ther was lowe downe in the Quere another Lettern of brasse, not so curiously wroughte [as one for the Epistle and Gospell], standing in the midst against the Stalls, a marvellous faire one, with an eagle on the heighte of it, and his winges spread abroad, whereon the Monkes did lay their bookes when they sung their legendes at mattins or at other times of service" [Rites of the Church of Durham, p. ii., quoted by Maskell]. Having been one of the Pagan objects of worship, the eagle was not used in Christian ornamentation until it was adopted to symbolise St. John. By some it has been spoken of as a symbol of our Lord; Aringhi mentions it with this signification, and Martigny quotes a passage from St. Ambrose where there is the same idea.

East, PRAYER TOWARDS THE.—This custom undoubtedly existed in the early Church, and is probably to be traced to the fact that the Sunrise, or "Dayspring" (Orion) was consecrated in Christian minds as a perpetual symbol of Christ. "The East is the figure of Christ," writes Tertullian, "and therefore both our churches and our prayers are directed that way." And Clement of Alexandria: "They worshipped towards the East because the East is the image of our spiritual nativity, and hence the light first arises and shines out of darkness; and the day of true knowledge, after the manner of the sun, arises upon those who lie buried in ignorance." And Augustine: "When we stand at our prayers we turn to the East, whence the light of heaven arises." In very many Western Christians there cannot but be a natural feeling of veneration for the land where Christ appeared in the flesh for our sakes; and so the simple and natural custom has been retained throughout the greater part of Christendom. [EASTWARD POSITION.]

Easter.—The greatest festival of the Christian Church. The Resurrection of Christ therein commemorated was the restoration of life to the world which sin had ruined, and it was the faith in this Resurrection which converted the world to Christianity. The name Easter, according to Bede, is derived from Eostre, a Saxon goddess, whose festival was the great Spring Festival; others derive it from oster, a Saxon word signifying "to rise." Its ancient name, both in East and West, was Pascha (i.e. Passover), the "Pascha of the Resurrection." This sacred festival has had existence from the very earliest ages of the Church; and indeed it is the great day of religious joy, celebrating the conquest over sin and death. It was an Eastern custom, still retained in the Russian and Greek Church, to hold a midnight service, and on the threshold of Easter Day Christians greeted each other with the salutation, "Christ is risen;" the Easter- or Pasch-egg was the symbol of life out of what seemed dead. The freeing of slaves and captives at this time was customary; and, above all, it was the great day of Baptism and Holy Communion, and restoration of penitents to Church privileges.

There were great disputes in the early Church as to the day on which Easter should be kept; while it seemed naturally to be connected with the Lord's Day, some wished to celebrate it annually on the third day after the 14th Nisan, and thus continue its connection with the Jewish Passover; the Western Church took the former view, and the Eastern Church the latter. [QUARTODECIMANS.] At the Council of Nicee, 325, it was finally settled that Easter Day should always be the Sunday nearest to the calculated anniversary of the actual Resurrection, being determined by the Paschal moon, the full moon next after or upon March 21st. The earliest date, therefore, for Easter Day is March 21st; and the latest, April 25th.

The festival of Easter begins with Easter Even. In the early Church the first part of that day was observed by the Church as a strict fast, the afternoon being one of the principal times for baptism. In the Anglican service the Epistle and Gospel both contemplate the Saviour with Body buried in the Grave, while His Spirit visits the Unseen World. Nevertheless, even the evening service is in part the anticipation of the coming festival. The Second Lesson (as does the Collect) sets forth our Baptism into Christ's Death as a spiritual Resurrection to newness of life.

The Service for Easter Day has one special feature, not occurring elsewhere in the Prayer Book, viz. the Anthems to be used instead of the Venite. They are placed before the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel. In the Prayer Book of 1549 they were directed to be said or sung before Matins, with a Collect, as an Introductory Service. In 1562 they were placed in their present position. Bishop Barry thus defines the spirit of these anthems:—"The anthems as they now stand dwell, first, on the sacrifice of the true Passover for us, and call us to keep the Feast of our Redemption in purity and truth, thus linking together the commemoration of Good Friday and the Easter Communion; next, on the spiritual Resurrection of the present, through unity with the Risen Lord; and lastly, on the Resurrection of the future, of which His Resurrection is the earnest and the ground." The Proper Psalms for the morning are typical of the kingly and priestly offices of Christ, and of His triumph over death and hell. The First Lessons are an account of the institution of the Passover, and of the victory of the Red Sea. The evening Psalms praise God for His glory and condescension, for the deliverance which that of the Red Sea prefigured, and for the glory bestowed on the Stone which men despised and refused.

The importance of the festival is marked by the appointment of its continuance on Monday and Tuesday.

Eastern Church represents that branch of the primitive historical Church which flourished in the eastern part of the Roman Empire. It can boast of a greater antiquity, a larger extent of territory, and a more powerful influence in the early history of the Christian Church, than can the Western. The foundation of the Church was in the East. The twelve Apostles were all Easterns; from Jerusalem and Judæa the Gospel spread to all nations. So that the Eastern is the Mother Church, and the Western the Daughter Church. The terms Church, Bishop, Priest, Deacon, Liturgy, Eucharist, Baptism, etc., are all of Greek or Eastern origin. The first great Councils of the Church—Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon—were all held in the East; it was there that the great controversies of the faith raged so fiercely. Even in Rome itself, until Gregory the Great, the Popes were all Easterns. The Emperor Justinian went so far as to attempt to make Rome subject to Constantinople.

The immense extent of the Eastern Church, occupying the whole of Asia and large parts of Europe and Africa, was divided into four Patriarchates—viz., Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; after the separation of East and West, Moscow was made the fifth Patriarchate, to take the place of Rome.

The present population of the Orthodox Eastern Church has been reckoned to be upwards of seventy millions.

THE PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE.—The city of Constantinople, named after its founder, the Emperor Constantine, having been created the capital of the Eastern Empire, its bishops soon began to increase in power. At first the bishopric was subject to the Exarch of Heraclea; but by the canons of the Second General Council it was enacted "that the Bishop of Constantinople have the prerogative of honour next after the Bishop of Rome, for Constantinople is new Rome." The Sees of Alexandria and Antioch were thus reduced in dignity to make way for Constantinople; so far, however, the dignity of Constantinople was simply honorary, but by degrees its bishops assumed authority over the dioceses of Thrace, Pontus, and Asia; and under Theodosius the Younger, Eastern Illyricum was added to its sway; and by the 28th Canon of Chalcedon (451) the Bishop of Constantinople first obtained the title of Patriarch; equal privileges with Rome were conferred on Constantinople, and her jurisdiction over Pontus, Asia, and Thrace was confirmed. The Popes of Rome stubbornly resisted on all occasions the rising power of her rival in the East, but without success. In the time of Acacius, who held the See of Constantinople (471-489), the supremacy of the See became complete; and finally Pope Innocent III., in the Council of Lateran, yielded to the above canons, against which his predecessors had steadily protested. Meanwhile Russia and Bulgaria had yielded submission to Constantinople. In the sixth century the title of Œcumenical Patriarch was claimed by the occupants of the See, but the claim was vigorously opposed by Gregory the Great and other Popes of Rome; the title, however, remains attached to the See of Constantinople to this day.

In the seventh and eighth centuries Mohammedanism made great inroads into the Eastern Church, whole districts of the Patriarchate of Constantinople, as well as of the other Patriarchates, being subdued to the infidels. Meanwhile the jealousy existing between Rome and Constantinople was increasing in intensity, and events were tending towards an open rupture; thus Leo III., Emperor of the East, called "the Isaurian," by his decrees against images gave great offence in the West, and caused the connection between Eastern and Western Churches to be severed about A.D. 730. The interference of Rome in Bulgaria in the following century increased the existing ill-feeling. Another controversy of long standing between the two Churches was that of the Double Procession of the Holy Spirit. [FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY.] It was probably only the rivalry and jealousy of the two Sees that prevented the question being amicably settled; the crisis came in 1053, Leo IX. being Pope of Rome, and Michael Cerularius Patriarch of Constantinople; each Church excommunicated the other, and the rupture became complete.

The encroachments of Rome into the jurisdiction of the Eastern Church were manifested by the setting up of a Latin Patriarchate at Jerusalem in 1099, and in Constantinople itself in 1204-61. The Emperor Michael Paleologus having succeeded in driving the Latins out of Constantinople, sought to effect a reunion of East and West in 1274; the attempt failed, for neither clergy nor people would submit to Rome. Again, in order to resist the Turks, John Paleologus (1341-91) and Manuel Paleologus (1391-25) sought reunion, but again without success. A final effort was made at the Council of Florence in 1439, when the Emperor John VII., together with the Patriarch of Constantinople and twenty-one Eastern bishops, signed a decree of union or submission to Rome, on condition of receiving aid against the Turks. The Eastern Church as a whole, however, entirely repudiated this agreement, and Constantinople, after a stubborn resistance, fell into the hands of the Turks in 1453. The Church of St. Sophia was turned into a mosque; but the Christians were tolerated, and their Patriarchs treated with considerable respect. The Sultan now appointed the Patriarch who had been nominated, and, unfortunately for the Church, the custom arose of bribing the Sultan to appoint a particular candidate. The Church in Constantinople gradually sank under the oppression of its Mohammedan rulers, but many held fast to their faith, and the Church, having passed through much affliction, has in the present century made much progress, and a brighter future seems before it. About twelve millions of Christians are subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople.

OFFSHOOTS OF CONSTANTINOPLE.—Russia.—The conversion of Prince VLADIMIR (q.v.) in 992 gave the first great impetus to the spread of the Christian Church in Russia. The Metropolitans at first dwelt at Kieff, thence they moved to Vladimir, and in 1320 to Moscow. The Conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, the natural enemies of the Russians, made the subjection of the Russian Metropolitan to the Patriarch of Constantinople an embarrassing one, for the Metropolitan could not be consecrated without the consent of the Porte. In 1582 Jeremiah, Patriarch of Constantinople, raised Job, Metropolitan of Russia, to the dignity of Patriarch. The Czar of Russia, however, was displeased with the power of the Patriarchs of Moscow; accordingly, in 1721, a Holy Governing Synod was established to supply the place of the Patriarch. It consists of five or six bishops, one or two other ecclesiastics, and several laymen, all appointed by the Emperor.

For nearly 250 years the schism of the Uniate greatly troubled the Church in Russia; this schism was fostered by Rome, ever willing to weaken the power of the Eastern Church. It arose in 1590, from two dissolute Russian prelates, who joined the Roman Communion, and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the Pope. The number of Uniate rose to four or five millions; but in 1839 the remnant of them, about two millions in number, were received back into the Eastern Church. At present there are in Russia about 43,000 churches, 34,000 priests, 1,600 deacons; 435 monasteries, 113 convents, and about 60 bishops. The parish clergy never receive any tithe; their income being derived from Easter offerings, fees, and glebe. Catherine II. confiscated much of the property of the National Church, but the late Emperor did much to endow the poorer dioceses. In the election of bishops, the Holy Synod nominates three persons to the Emperor, who chooses one. The total number of Christians subject to Moscow is about fifty millions.

Greece.—Previous to the War of Freedom there were in Greece twenty Metropolitans, two archbishoprics, and nineteen bishoprics. In 1828 the newly established Government of Greece rejected the authority of the Patriarch of Constantinople, but the Church was divided on the question; the matter was settled in 1833, when it was agreed by thirty-six Greek prelates that the Church of Greece, while remaining in full communion with the Eastern Church, is independent of all external authority; and that a permanent Synod be established, composed entirely of archbishops and bishops appointed by the king, after the model of the Russian Church. The country was divided into ten bishoprics: the Synod consists of a president and four members, all bishops, a secretary, royal commissioner, and supernumeraries.

Armenia is at present the most important Christian communion in the East, after the Russian. The Church was planted in Armenia by St. Gregory the Illuminator, towards the end of the third century, who was consecrated bishop in 302, after enduring much severe persecution. Originally the Church was subject to Cæsarea in Cappadocia: the Primate dwelt at Etchmiadzine, but afterwards removed to Tovin, and finally settled at Etchmiadzine. The Armenians rejected the Council of Chalcedon, and confirmed this rejection at their Synod of Tovin. On the subjection of Armenia to the Turks many abuses crept into the Church; simony was very prevalent. In addition the Church of Rome set up her communion, and attracted many adherents. The Armenian Church continued to grow more and more corrupt, coming to the lowest depths of degradation under Lazarus, her Primate, who died in 1751. By the treaty of 1828 Etchmiadzine was added to Russia, and under her influence the state of the Church was improved. The Armenian Church is recognised by the State, and retains its freedom and self-government. Proposals for union with the orthodox Eastern communion have been made in the present century, but so far without success. The Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople is supreme over all Armenians within the Turkish Empire. The Armenians are spread over Russia, Persia, and Turkey; they have sixty-seven bishops of all ranks. In Russia alone they number over 300,000 adherents, and possess 965 churches.

Servia has an independent National Church, in full communion with the Orthodox Eastern Church. It is governed by a Metropolitan at Belgrade, and has three other bishops. The people elect their own Metropolitan, but the election must be confirmed at Constantinople.

The Georgian Church in Asia Minor was at one time subject to the See of Constantinople, in communion with the Orthodox Eastern Church, but now under the Holy Synod of Moscow. It has a Metropolitan at Tiflis, and four other prelates.

Patriarchate of Alexandria.—Up to 381, Alexandria ranked next to Rome. In that year it had to give place to Constantinople. The Patriarch of Alexandria reigned supreme over Egypt and Ethiopia. St. Cyril was the most illustrious occupant of the See. The temporal and spiritual power of the Patriarch was excessive. St. Cyril first assumed the title of Patriarch; formerly the Bishop was termed Pope. The present title is Pope and Patriarch, and Œcumenical Judge; it was his province to proclaim every year the date of Easter to the whole Church. Formerly possessing 100 prelates, there is now only the Patriarch. The cause of this decline was, first of all, the setting up of the Coptic or Jacobite communion, which drew away many Orthodox; and secondly, the inroads of Mohammedanism.

The Jacobite or Coptic Church has thirteen bishops; their Patriarch resides at Cairo. There is probably the only communion in which translations are forbidden in accordance with the Nicene Canon.

The Orthodox in Egypt have only three monasteries, the Copts have twenty-six.

Patriarchate of Antioch, consisting of Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, and Cyprus.—Antioch, whose See is supposed to have been founded by St. Peter, was the earliest of the Patriarchal Sees. In the height of its glory it had 250 bishops; now it has less than twenty, and its Patriarch resides at Damascus. No part of the Church has suffered more from heresy and schism; first the Patriarch Paul of Samosata, then Arians, then Nestorians, then Monophysites, then Saracens, then Roman emissaries, conspired against her. About the year 1100, a Latin succession of Patriarchs was begun, and lasted till Antioch finally fell into the hands of the Turks; there are now only a few hundred Christians in the city. Formerly the whole of Chaldaea was subject to Antioch; but when Chaldaea embraced Nestorianism the union was severed. In Cyprus, which was formerly subject to Antioch, there is now an independent Church, subject to no external authority, but in communion with the Orthodox Easterns. The Archbishop of Cyprus is styled the "Most Blessed Despot." The number of Orthodox Easterns in the whole diocese is said to amount to 26,000 families.

The Bishop of Seleucia ruled as quasi-Patriarch over Chaldaea. The Church here soon fell into a wretched state. Nestorianism and simony were prevalent. The Nestorian Patriarchs moved to Bagdad, thence to Mosul, near Nineveh. At the beginning of the eleventh century there were twenty-five Metropolitans ruling, from China to the Tigris, and from Lake Baikal to Cape Comorin. The invasion of the Turks nearly caused the annihilation of the Nestorians; but they took refuge with their Patriarch in Kurdistan. There they suffered two massacres. About 1460, a Roman succession of bishops was started. In 1551 polygamy and divorce were prevalent for a time among these Nestorians. There are now about sixteen prelates.

The Church in India, supposed to have been founded by St. Thomas.—The Church was known as the Church of Malabar. Nestorianism made its way into this Church in the tenth century. The Christians here became so powerful that at one time they chose their own king. Ecclesiastically they were dependent on the Metropolitan of Persia; they had but one bishop, who was assisted by an archdeacon. In 1502 the Christians of Malabar put themselves under the protection of the Portuguese. Funchal, in Madeira, was made the seat of the Primate of All the Indies. Then Goa was made the seat of a Metropolitan and Archbishop. The attempts to bring the Church into subjection to Rome caused many Christians to resort to the Jacobite or Coptic Church; and Jacobites or Monophysites they still remain. The total number of Christians is about 200,000, but they are mostly Roman Catholics. The Jacobites in the diocese of Antioch at one time boasted of 123 prelates; at the end of the sixteenth century they were reduced to twenty. There is also a Roman succession of bishops dating from 1646. The Maronites, about Mount Lebanon, in communion with Rome, have nine prelates.

Patriarchate of Jerusalem.—At the destruction of Jerusalem, Cæsarea became the civil metropolis of Palestine, and, accordingly, the ecclesiastical metropolis was also fixed at Cæsarea; and from henceforth the Bishops of Jerusalem were known as the Bishops of Elia Capitolina. A Gentile bishop, Mark, was the first occupant of the new See. A kind of honorary pre-eminence belonged to Elia, as the canons of the first General Council expressly admit. By the end of the fourth century, however, Jerusalem had succeeded in asserting its equality, at least, with Cæsarea. Juvenal, Bishop of Jerusalem, at the beginning of the fifth century, advanced the dignity of the See to almost Patriarchal authority. Jerusalem suffered greatly from its capture by the Saracens; her bishop, Sophronius, unluckily appealed to Rome for aid, with the result that a rival communion of Latins was set up in his midst; the Latin schism being as harmful as the Saracen power. At the recapture of the city by the latter, the Greek Patriarchs, who had been driven out by the Latins, again became resident. They now live in Constantinople. The present number of Orthodox Christians is between fifteen and twenty thousand. There are about seventy parish priests, and about the same number of churches.

Characteristic features of the Eastern Church.—The one doctrinal test is the Nicene Creed, to which all the Eastern Churches are deeply attached. The insertion of the filioque, it will be remembered, was the chief cause of separation between East and West. The Apostles' Creed is entirely Western, and has no place in the East. The Athanasian Creed is found in their office-books, but is not used in public worship. They acknowledge seven sacraments. In baptism trine immersion is considered essential, and is followed immediately by baptismal unction administered by the priest, and corresponding to confirmation. Forty days subsequently, the child is admitted to infant communion in one kind. Leavened bread is used in Holy Communion. The cup is given to the laity, who, as a rule, communicate but once a year, confession being a necessary condition. The priests communicate daily. While the Eastern Church has held steadfastly to the Catholic faith, she has rejected the purely Roman doctrines of Purgatory, Supremacy of the Pope, the Immaculate Conception, and Indulgences. On the other hand, she agrees with Rome in holding the doctrine of "Invocation of Saints," and this is the essential point of difference between her and the Church of England. Parish priests must be married; but second marriages are forbidden. The bishops, being all taken from the monasteries, are unmarried. In their public worship the people stand during the prayers, and while communicating. The altar is entirely hidden by the Iconostasis, a solid screen, on which icons or sacred pictures are fixed.

Owing to the isolation of the Eastern Church, and her oppression by the Mohammedan power, she has not produced, in mediæval or modern times, such an array of great scholars as she boasted in earlier ages; she has produced no such giants as Chrysostom, Basil, Athanasius, Cyril; nor can she compare with the Western Church in scholars and divines; but, notwithstanding, there are names illustrious in the history of the Christian Church, such as Michael Psellus, a brilliant scholar, who died in 1105; Archbishop Theophylact, of Bulgaria, a commentator of lasting reputation (d. 1112); Euthymius Zigabenus (d. 1118); Nicetas Acominatus (d. 1206), Nicholas, Bishop of Methone (d. 1200). But the most eminent of all is Eustathius (see EUSTATHIUS), Archbishop of Thessalonica (d. 1198), a voluminous and learned commentator. On the other hand, the mass of Eastern ecclesiastics, from the difficult positions in which they are placed, have not the reputation of being well educated.

Eastward Position.—A question has arisen in the Anglican Church of late years, and been discussed with a good deal of earnest feeling, as to the position of the celebrant at the Lord's Supper. The question turns upon two things—(1) the rubrics, and (2) the leading principles of the Church Worship.

1. There are two rubrics bearing on the matter. The first (a) is that immediately preceding the Lord's Prayer at the beginning of the service, the second (b) that before the Consecration Prayer.

It has been contended by some that in (a)

by the north side is meant the north end of the western end, and that the priest is following the rubric by facing eastward, but standing at the northern end. But, as the judgment of the Privy Council very pertinently remarked, every square table has four sides, and therefore this interpretation could not be accepted. The circumstances under which the rubric was drawn up have to be taken into account. It first appeared in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. (1552). In the first book the priest had been directed to stand "afore the Table," but betweenwhiles all altars had been demolished, and the name had been erased from the Prayer Book; the table was placed with ends east and west, and the longer sides north and south. The celebrant, therefore, in standing on the north side, was really taking his position "afore" or "at the middle of the table," and so far the celebrant who faces eastward is obeying the spirit of the rubric. The table was restored to its "altar-wise" position by Laud, and it is contended by advocates of the Eastward Position that it was taken for granted that the celebrant would move with the table, and stand as aforetime in the middle. The controversy with respect to (b) turns on the words "before the table" and "before the people." As regards the former of these two phrases, there certainly seems prima facie evidence that the Eastward Position must be intended, especially when the rubric before the words, "It is very meet," etc., is read in conjunction with it, "Then shall the priest turn to the Lord's Table," etc. With regard to the second expression, "break the bread before the people," does it mean that he is to turn so that the people may see him actually perform the manual acts, or see him as their representative? There is no doubt that in a church which has aisles he is more visible to the whole congregation standing "in the midst of the table" than at one side. The answer must be sought by inquiring into what we have called the second question. Framers of the Liturgy professed to follow, so far as they could, the use of primitive times. And the Commission to the Revisers of the Savoy Conference, which put forth our Prayer Book in its present shape, bade them "to review the Common Prayer, comparing the same with the most ancient Liturgies which have been used in the Church in the most primitive and purest times." Now, in the course of that revision, the Puritans took up this question, and argued that it is most convenient for the minister to turn himself to the people all through the ministration of public worship. To which the bishops replied, "The minister's turning to the people is not most convenient throughout the whole ministration. When he speaks to them in Lessons, Absolution, and Benedictions, it is convenient that he turn to them. When he speaks for them to God it is fit that they should all turn another way, as the ancient Church did."

It is on this answer that the defence of the "Eastward Position" is rested. The minister is the representative of the people. He speaks not to them, but to God. He makes himself one with them, and offers the memorial on their behalf. The Consecration Prayer, as any one may see by looking at it, is addressed not to the people, but to God. Standing before the people, then, means standing where they may all see him offering their prayer with his own.

The Eastward Position is the practice not only of the Church of Rome, but of all the Eastern Churches, of the Lutheran Churches of Scandinavia and Denmark, and of the Prussian Evangelical Church. The Folkestone judgment left the question open in the Church of England, and since that judgment was delivered it has become a very usual practice.

Ebbo.—In the year 822 Harold Klak visited the Court of Louis le Débonnaire, to implore his help against the inroads of Godfrey, King of Lethra. Louis granted this petition, and prepared a formidable army. Ebbo, who was Bishop of Rheims at the time, asked leave to organise a small band of missionaries which should accompany the army, and thereby insure comparative safety. At the end of three years Ebbo returned to France with Harold and all his family, whom he had converted, and whom he baptised at Mayence. Ebbo then determined to take great pains in seeking out a priest to go back to Denmark with the converts, who should constantly remind them of the profession they had made. His choice fell on a monk named Anskar, an account of whose work among the heathen Norsemen will be found under Missions.

Ebionites.—Heretics of the first and second centuries. Some historians have stated them to be so named from their founder, Ebion, but this appears to be a mistake. There is no evidence whatever of the existence of Ebion; the name is probably from a Hebrew word signifying "a poor man," and to have been given to this sect because they declared themselves followers of the poor and despised Nazarene. They were a Jewish sect, who, laying hold of the humility of the Saviour, to the exclusion of all other truths concerning Him, denied His Divinity, and corrupted the Gospel into a Judaised theory. They are said to have called themselves disciples of St. James, to have accepted only the Gospel of St. Matthew, and to have eliminated the miraculous elements even of that. Whether or not the assertion of some early writers is true that this Gospel was originally written in Hebrew, they seem to have possessed some version of it in Hebrew, and it was known as "The Gospel according to the Hebrews," and sank into contempt and oblivion along with many other heretical writings of that age. Some of them held that our Lord was the son of Joseph and Mary, others that He had an angelic nature. They taught to abstain from meats, and to observe Jewish rites; rejected the authority of St. Paul, whom they called an apostate; made Saturday and Sunday equal holy days; called their meetings synagogues, not churches; and celebrated their mysteries with unleavened bread. It has been thought by some that it was against this rising sect that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written. They gradually became merged in some of the obscure Gnostic sects of the second century.

Ecclesiastical. "relating to the Church."—The Greek word ecclesia, from which this is derived, meaning something which is "called out," signified in classical Greek "an assembly of citizens summoned by the crier." Hence it came to be used in the New Testament as the name for the assembly of those whom God called forth to bear witness to His Truth and His eternal Son, the Church. Like that word, it is used to denote both the living body of Christians and also the buildings in which they meet. The derivations of the Greek word are the names common to all the languages of Southern Europe, derived as they are from the Latin.

Ecclesiastical Commission.—This was established by the Whig Government, with the sanction of Archbishop Howley, in 1835, and several subsequent Acts have added to its powers. Its object was thus set forth in the original draft of instructions:—"To consider the state of the several dioceses of England and Wales, with reference to the amount of their revenues, and the more equal distribution of episcopal duties, and the prevention of the necessity of attaching by commendam to bishoprics benefices with cure of souls; to consider also the state of the several cathedral collegiate churches, with a view to rendering them more conducive to the efficiency of the Established Church; and to devise the best mode of providing for the cure of souls, with special reference to the residence of the clergy in their respective dioceses."

The Ecclesiastical Commission consists of all the bishops: the Deans of Canterbury, St. Paul's, and Westminster; five Cabinet Ministers, three judges, and twelve laymen, who must be Churchmen, of whom two are appointed by the Primate, and the rest by the Crown. The Commissioners began by lowering the incomes of seven of the richest Sees to the extent of £22,800, to be given to those which had hardly any endowment, abolishing several canonries, and other ecclesiastical preferments, and throwing the income into the common fund. This early proceeding brought them under the keen satire of Sydney Smith, whose letters to Archdeacon Singleton are among the wittiest of his writings. It is now universally agreed that some of the opening proceedings were more zealous than wise. Thus it would have been better to have left no cathedral canonries unless with a purpose of making them useful. The race is hardly yet extinct of cathedral canons whose only recognisable qualification is that they are relatives of bishops, and whose work is little or nothing. As has been pointed out by the Archbishop, and by Mr. Beresford-Hope, it was quite feasible to attach to each canonry some important duty, such as the supervision of education of the people, and also of candidates for orders, or preaching duties, and the like; such arrangement would have been a permanent strength to the Church. The Commissioners have power, with consent of the bishop, to rearrange archdeaconries and rural deaneries. But all arrangements must be approved by the Queen in Council. When any is so approved, it is gazetted, and then has the power of an Act of Parliament. By 19 and 20 Victoria the Church Building Commissioners were merged in the Ecclesiastical Commission, which has now in consequence acquired the further power of dividing or uniting existing parishes, and making new districts.

Ecclesiastical Courts.—The history of the courts which have exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction in England may be divided into four periods:—[1] the Anglo-Saxon period up to the Norman Conquest; [2] from the Norman Conquest to the Reformation; [3] from the Reformation to 1832; [4] from 1832 to the present time. It is necessary, before beginning to trace the history of Ecclesiastical Courts in England, to bear in mind [i.] that the Church of England, in common with all other branches of the Church of Christ, has had from its beginning an organised system of self-government, both as to faith and morals, and [ii.] that the acceptance of the Church of England as the national religion has involved a recognition by the State of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction as an integral part of the Church system. Hence the judgments of the Ecclesiastical Courts have been enforced by the civil power of the State; and thus the connection between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions had its beginning. It is quite evident that one of the two parties in this compact may possibly overstep its proper boundaries, and invade the rights of the other.

ANGLO-SAXON PERIOD.—It is clear, in the first place, that the source of legislative authority in the Church was distinct from the source of authority in the State; for the Church, in its origin, lay outside the State, and an important part of its ecclesiastical laws were the canons of the General Councils of the Universal Church, in which individual States had no voice.

The Courts during this period were:—The Bishop's Court, in which the bishop personally settled disputes which did not require legal decision. The Metropolitan Court of the Archbishop, who exercised authority over all the dioceses in his province. His authority was recognised by the bishops and by the kings. The Abbot's Court, exercising jurisdiction over his own community. Then there were Provincial Synods, consisting of archbishops, bishops, abbots, and other clergy, to decide questions of importance affecting the interests of the Church. Occasionally the King or the great lords attended.

Ecclesiastical jurisdiction was often, but not always, exercised in the moots or assemblies of the men of the shire and hundred. Civil as well as ecclesiastical suits were decided at these assemblies. The sheriff, ealdorman, and bishop seem to have been the presiding officers. It is probable that the bishop sat as the guardian of the interests of the clergy, and the sheriff and ealdorman as representing lay interests; each seems to have respected the authority of the other. The decision at these moots was by the process of compurgation or by ordeal. The question of appeal from this court is very doubtful. If the ecclesiastical procedure followed the secular custom, it would be possible for the appellant to commence a new suit against the judges in the same court. There is no evidence of appeals to Rome, but probably, following the custom of other branches of the Church, there would be occasional appeals to the Metropolitan or to the Provincial Synod. Sentences decreed in the shire-moots would be carried out by the shire officers; sentences decreed in the purely ecclesiastical courts, by the archdeacon and his subordinates invested with civil authority to do so.

FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO THE REFORMATION.—During this period the Church was, as a general rule, permitted to make its own laws, though from time to time the Crown or Parliament interfered to restrain some particular Act or Acts relating to solely temporal affairs when it was thought that the Church was going beyond its province. William the Conqueror, in particular, exercised a strong controlling power over ecclesiastical legislation. It was by his means that the whole system of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was organised and enlarged. His first step was to take away ecclesiastical causes from the shire-moots, and to restrict them to purely ecclesiastical tribunals. Thus he enacted—

“That no bishop or archdeacon shall henceforth hold pleas touching ecclesiastical laws in the hundred-courts, nor draw to the judgment of secular men causes which pertain to the government of souls. Whoever, according to episcopal laws, is summoned for any cause or fault, is to come to the place chosen or named by the bishop, and there make his answer, and not according to the hundred, but according to the canons and episcopal laws, is to do right to God and his bishop.”

The next step was to create Archdeacons'

Courts. They had special control over the fabric and furniture of churches. Appeal was allowed from these courts to the Bishop's Court.

Soon afterwards a Chancellor's Court was created in each diocese. The chancellor, or chief official, was delegated by the bishop to exercise part of the bishop's own jurisdiction, the bishop reserving a certain part to himself. There was no appeal from the official to the bishop.

Diocesan Courts were held in each diocese under the Chancellor as official principal. They were courts of first instance, and appeals from Archdeacons' Courts were also heard. Appeals from the Diocesan Courts were carried to the Provincial Courts.

The Provincial Courts of Canterbury were four:—

[i.] The Court of the Official Principal, otherwise known as the Court of Arches, was the Consistory Court of the archbishop. It was held in St. Mary-le-Bow. This Court heard appeals on all ecclesiastical questions from the Diocesan Courts; the official principal was styled Dean of Arches, and sat as an independent judge, possessing all the judicial power of the archbishop.

[ii.] The Court of Audience, “the domestic and familiar court of the archbishop,” held later at the Consistory Court at St. Paul's. The judge of this court was called the Vicar-General, and he sat as the delegate of the archbishop.

[iii.] The Prerogative Court of Canterbury exercised jurisdiction in testamentary matters. The Official Principal or Vicar-General must have had charge of this court originally; afterwards it was presided over by a judge with the title of master or commissary. The court was originally held in the archbishop's palace, but after the Reformation it moved to Doctors' Commons.

[iv.] The Court of Peculiars. The judge of this court was the Dean of Arches. He exercised jurisdiction over the thirteen parishes in the diocese of London, which, as Peculiars of the archbishop, were exempt from the Bishop of London's jurisdiction.

The Provincial Courts of York were the Prerogative Court and the Chancery Court, corresponding to the Prerogative and Arches Court of Canterbury.

In cases of heresy the accused was brought either before one of the above courts or before a special commission issued by the archbishop.

Laymen were not allowed to act as judges in any ecclesiastical court; but this rule was occasionally broken, as Archbishop Chichele testifies (about 1416).

The procedure in these courts was almost identical with that of the Roman law, and remains the same to this day. All the legal proceedings of the suits were carried out under the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical judge, it being a rule that "no matter touching the government of souls should be tried by a secular tribunal;" but, on the other hand, in order to enforce the sentences pronounced, it now became necessary to apply to the Crown for a writ of significavit to be issued to the sheriff to enforce them. As a rule, but not always, the application for a writ was a merely formal proceeding, and was granted readily.

Ecclesiastical jurisdiction was exercised over laity as well as over clergy, and took cognisance of questions of doctrine, morality, marriages, testaments, legitimacy, intestates' property, fiduciary and pledging contracts, promises and keeping of oaths, and libels. In cases of heresy, the case was always tried by the bishop or archbishop; the ecclesiastical sentence was excommunication; then, by the statute 5 Richard II., the chancellor was authorised to arrest the condemned on the bishop's certificate, and by 2 Henry IV. the bishops themselves were allowed to arrest and imprison the offender, and if he proved obstinate he was, by 2 Henry V., to be handed over to the sheriff to be burnt.

Appeals: From the date of the Conquest, the system of appeals became developed. There was first of all the appeal ex gravaminibus, or extra-judicial appeal, by which a defendant, feeling that justice was denied him during his trial, might appeal to a higher ecclesiastical authority; as soon as notice of appeal was given, all further proceedings in the trial would be void. A great portion of the recorded appeals to Rome were of this character.

Judicial appeals were from a definite sentence of one court to the superior court, the final Court of Appeal being vested in the archbishop; but if the archbishop "failed to do justice," appeal was made to the king to stay all proceedings, or to order a re-hearing of the case by the archbishop.

By the leave of the king, up to the time of Henry I., appeals might be carried to Rome, but in Henry II.'s time appeals to Rome were possible without permission from the king; by the common law, however, the king could forbid any subject to leave the kingdom, and could prevent any papal or foreign sentence from being received in England. Again, by the Statutes of Præmunire, only such appeals to Rome were lawful as the secular tribunals of the kingdom were incompetent to deal with. None of these appeals had any reference to matters of doctrine, ritual, or morals, but were confined to debatable questions of marriage, testaments, disputed elections, etc.

Prohibitions became general in Henry III.'s reign, by which the king stayed all proceedings in ecclesiastical courts, when they were encroaching upon the province of the secular courts, or when "the rights of the subject" were interfered with. By 13 Edward I. such prohibitions could not be issued where "mere spiritual" matters were being tried.

THIRD PERIOD: FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1832.—Great changes were made at the Reformation both in ecclesiastical law and in the constitution of Ecclesiastical Courts.

Henry VIII in 1531 compelled the clergy to acknowledge him as supreme head of the Church of England, so far as is allowed by the law of Christ; and by the Act of Supremacy, 1535, this title is confirmed by Parliament. In 1533 the supremacy of the Crown in all cases whatsoever is enacted by Parliament, but the preamble of the same Act speaks "of the authority, fitness, and usage of the spirituality to administer the laws spiritual;" and "of the parallel authority of the temporality to administer the laws temporal;" and "of the alliance between these two jurisdictions." By the Act of Supremacy Henry recovered from the Papacy the authority properly belonging to the Church of England, but which had been usurped by the popes: henceforth the Crown becomes the usurper in ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Henceforth Convocation could only meet by the king's command, and the power of legislation was taken from it. The ancient Church courts were all preserved, but the bishops had to accept a commission from the king's Vicar-General, an entirely new official, before they could exercise their jurisdiction; thus yielding to the assumption that the king is the source of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Otherwise the constitution and procedure of the Church courts remained as before, with the exception that laymen might act as ecclesiastical judges.

A new court of appeal, called The Court of Delegates, was set up by Act of Parliament in 1534; it was abolished by Mary, but revived by Elizabeth in 1559. [DELEGATES.] Only seven appeals which in any way remotely affected doctrine are known to have come before this court, and in no one case did that court reverse the decision of the regular ecclesiastical courts in matters of doctrine. Owing to the fact that it was not a properly constituted Church court, it has been held by many that it was not intended for appeals in purely spiritual matters; in other branches of ecclesiastical law, such as marriage and testaments, its jurisdiction was complete and final. The court was abolished in 1832, and its jurisdiction handed over to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The royal commissioners who advised this change of tribunal do not seem to have contemplated the possibility of appeals on matters of doctrine being brought before the Privy Council. "It was created for the consideration of a totally different class of cases" (Lord Brougham). But as questions of doctrine are decided now by that tribunal, the power of self-government in matters of faith and morals which the Church of England, in common with the rest of the Catholic Church, once enjoyed, and which is an essential part of her constitution, is disputed and taken from her. The maintenance of this tribunal is also held by many to be a violation of the Reformation settlement, or at least to be no part of it.

The Court of High Commission, created in 1558 as a supreme court in ecclesiastical matters, had jurisdiction over "all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences," etc. The Crown appointed "such persons being natural born subjects as the Sovereign shall think meet" to exercise this jurisdiction. Elizabeth, in issuing her first commission, appointed eighteen persons, and this formed a precedent for subsequent ones. The court was open as a court of first instance. It proceeded on suspicion, information, or presentment. There was no appeal from its decisions (except for a short time in the reign of James I.). Important cases of doctrine were decided by this court; but it also took cognisance of almost every kind of ecclesiastical offence. After existing for over eighty years, it was abolished by the Long Parliament in 1641.

FOURTH PERIOD: SINCE 1832.—Under the Church Discipline Act, 1840, the bishop may issue a Commission of Inquiry consisting of five persons, one being a clerical official of the diocese, in the case of a beneficed clerk accused of any grave offence; if a primâ facie case is made out against the accused, it rests with the bishop to take further proceedings; if the accused plead guilty, the bishop may pronounce sentence forthwith. Another course is for the bishop, assisted by three assessors, to judicially hear and determine the cause, and pronounce sentence if necessary. The third course is for the bishop to send the case to the Court of Arches, from which court appeal lies to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Such archbishops and bishops as are members of the Privy Council are to be on the Judicial Committee for hearing such appeals; but, by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of 1876, the archbishops and bishops are to act only as assessors.

The Public Worship Regulation Act [1874], 37 & 38 Vict., cap. 85, enables the archdeacon or either of the churchwardens, or three parishioners who shall declare themselves bonâ fide members of the Church of England, to lay a complaint before the bishop against an incumbent. Such complaint is limited to three points (1) alterations in the fabric; (2) unlawful ornaments or neglect of lawful ornaments or vestures; (3) neglect of rubrics, or alterations or additions to rubrics. Whereupon the bishop exercises his discretion whether further proceedings shall be taken. If the parties agree to leave the case in the bishop's hands, he decides the question, and there is no appeal. If the parties refuse to submit to the bishop's direction, he sends the case to the archbishop, who directs the judge, appointed by this Act, to hear and decide the case. If the case is proved, the judge issues a monition; if the monition is disobeyed, the penalty is inhibition from performing Divine Service in the diocese for a period not exceeding three months; if at the expiration of that time the incumbent does not in writing undertake to obey the monition, the inhibition remains in force for three years, after which the benefice of the defendant becomes vacant. Appeal from this court lies to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The judge of the court constituted by this Act is to be either a barrister of ten years' standing, or an ex-judge of one of the Superior Courts, and is to be judge of the provincial courts of Canterbury and York. He is also to become Official Principal of each province, as the offices become vacant, and so be enabled to pronounce any ecclesiastical sentence.

The Royal Commission appointed in 1881, on the motion of Archbishop Tait, to inquire into the constitution and working of the Ecclesiastical Courts, made their report in 1884. Their recommendations were grouped under three heads:—[1] Procedure in cases of misconduct and neglect of duty; [2] in cases of heresy and breach of ritual; [3] general and miscellaneous. The Commissioners felt that the offences under the first two heads should be regarded under distinct aspects, the Church Discipline Act of 1840 having treated them all alike. The majority of the Commissioners were in favour of giving the bishop an absolute veto upon the proposal to prosecute a clerk, with a view of preventing frivolous or vexatious proceedings. The Commissioners also recommended a different constitution of the Diocesan Court for ritual questions from that for moral offences: in the latter case the bishop and chancellor or the chancellor alone; in the former, the bishop with a legal and theological assessor, the latter to be chosen by the bishop with the advice of his dean and chapter. An appeal to lie from the Diocesan to the Provincial Court, the latter to consist (at the discretion of the archbishop) of the official principal alone, or of the archbishop with the official principal as assessor, and any number of theological assessors, not exceeding five, who are to be either bishops or university professors. An appeal to lie from the Provincial Court to the Crown, which shall appoint a permanent body of lay judges learned in the law, five being summoned for each case in rotation, who are to declare themselves members of the Church of England.

Such is a short summary of a laborious and learned document, which, it is needless to say, has been subjected to the most minute and careful criticism since its promulgation. It is a large volume, full of the most valuable historical information. The late lamented Archbishop Tait was largely responsible for the rough draft of it, and his death before the labours of the Commissioners were completed was undoubtedly a very serious blow. The report has been debated in Convocation, as well as by learned adepts in law and ecclesiastical history, and the impression has, we believe, grown ever stronger within the Church itself, that it would be, on the whole, a wise and just arrangement. Among what is known as the "High Church" party the lay judges of the final appeal seem to be viewed with most disfavour. Had Archbishop Tait lived, in all probability the report would by this time, with whatever modifications, have become law. At present it has considerable moral influence on the minds of those who wish well to the Church in its controversies, but no attempt has been made to make it law.

Eck, JOHANN MAIER VON, born in Schwab, November, 1486. His father was a peasant, but the boy was educated by his uncle, Martin Maier, a priest. Johann studied at Tübingen (where he took the degree of Master of Arts in 1501) and Cologne, and afterwards went to Freiburg to study and teach. In 1510 he became professor of theology at Ingolstadt, where he lived until his death in 1543. In 1518 he opened a dispute with Luther at Leipzig, which he began by criticising Luther's theses, and in which they debated about the Pope's supremacy, indulgences, penance, and purgatory. Eck was conquered before George, Duke of Saxony, in 1519; but in January, 1520, he appealed to the Pope, Leo X., who entrusted him with the publication of the Bull Exsurge Domine. It was received with such indignation in the places where he attempted to publish it, that he escaped with difficulty, and was scarcely able to publish it in Ingolstadt. He had in 1519 been engaged in a controversy with Carolostadius concerning free will. In 1525 Eck published the Enchiridion Locorum Communium aduersus Lutherum, a series of tracts on most of the subjects contested between Papists and Protestants, which, though it caused much excitement, failed to produce any lasting result. In 1526, a meeting was arranged between Eck and Zwingli, the Swiss Reformer, at Baden, in Aargau, which resulted in the strengthening of Zwingli's cause. At the Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, Eck argued against the Protestant Confession, and in 1541 assisted at a Conference at Ratisbon, where he dissented from Pflug and Groppe with reference to the Union Articles. A tract which he wrote on the subject was published in Paris in 1543. Among his other works were two discourses on the Sacrifice of the Mass, and various controversial pamphlets.

Eclectics [Gr. elegō, "to select"].—A school of philosophers, which arose about the beginning of the third century at Alexandria. They took their origin from the heathens. Potamon of Alexandria, who lived in the days of Augustus and Tiberius, is received as their founder. Tired of the negotiations of the Pyrrhonists, he attempted to gather out of the mythologies something which the understanding could lean upon. The Eclectics professed to be seekers after truth, and, for the purpose of finding it, they refused to accept indiscriminately the authority of others without first proving it themselves. They selected truths from the teaching of different philosophers, and blended them together so that each man formed his own theology. Eclecticism arose from the prevailing discontent with definite schools of thought, all of which were found in some way unsatisfactory. The germs of the principle are found in the writings of Clement of Alexandria and others, but it was formed into a definite system by Ammonius Saccas (A.D. 193–242), his contemporary, a sack porter to the corn-ships of Alexandria. The aim of the original Eclectics was to reconcile part of the doctrines of Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle with those of Christianity, and the Emperor Alexander Severus symbolised the idea by setting up statues of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and our Lord upon the same level. They succeeded in accomplishing their purpose to a certain extent, but only by means of taking away from Christianity all its most important truths, doing away with the doctrines of inspiration, miracles, etc. Out of Eclecticism came the doctrine of Neo-Platonism, which was started by Ammonius, and developed by Plotinus and Porphyry. Although neither of these systems has much in common with Christianity, the study of them led the Eclectics to a closer acquaintance with its truths, which had before been passed over as unworthy of the notice of philosophers, and by this means some were brought to adopt Christianity as a whole.

The name has been applied in our own time to some members of the Broad Church school, who are unwilling to hold absolutely the opinions of any party, but prefer to be guided by their own conscience and common sense.

Edhemites.—A sect of the Mohammedans, founded by Ibrahim Edhem, who devote themselves to an ascetic life.

Edmer, or Eadmer.—An English Benedictine of St. Saviour's monastery in Canterbury, afterwards Abbot of St. Albans, and lastly Bishop of St. Andrews. He lived in the reign of Henry I., about 1120. He wrote the history of his time, in six books, from 1066 to 1122; this work he calls Historia Novorum, and reports at length the disputes between Henry I. and Anselm. Edmer also wrote the Lives of St. Anselm and St. Wilfrid, and several tracts.

Edmund, ST., KING AND MARTYR [b. 841, d. 870]. He was the son of the King of Saxony, and was chosen by Offa, King of East Anglia, to succeed him. He landed in England in 866, near Hunstanton, and there is a ruined chapel in the little village of St.

Edmunds, close by, which is said to have been founded by him. He was crowned on Christmas Day by Humbert, Bishop of the East Angles, and reigned peaceably for fifteen years, when his kingdom was invaded by the Danes, headed by two brothers, Hingwar and Hubba. They spent the winter of 866 in England, and fortified themselves at Thetford. King Edmund made a gallant fight against them, but was overpowered by superior numbers, and retreated to Eglesdene, now Hoxne, in the northern part of Suffolk. Thither he was pursued by his enemies, and made prisoner. They offered him life and liberty if he would abjure his faith and rule under them. On his steadfast refusal they beat him with clubs, and afterwards bound him to a tree and shot him to death, after which they cut off his head and threw it into the wood. Legend says that when his people took down his body from the tree, they sought for his head, and at length found it guarded between the paws of a wolf, who gave up his treasure and then retreated with doleful mourning. This story is often represented in mural paintings and on carved wood screens in East Anglian churches. Until 1849 there stood in the park at Hoxne a very ancient oak, twenty feet in circumference, and it was always regarded with especial interest because old tradition had declared that this was the tree at which St. Edmund was slain. That year it fell, and in the course of its breaking up an arrow-head was found imbedded in the trunk, and the old tradition seemed to be confirmed. He was buried at Hoxne, and a little wooden chapel was built over his grave, on the site of what is now called the Abbey. Thirty-three years later his remains were removed to Beadricsworth, where Sibert, the founder of Westminster Abbey, had built a beautiful church. During a Danish war in 1010 St. Edmund's body was conveyed to London, and legend says that as the bones passed through Cripplegate "the lame were restored to the use of their limbs." In 1013 it was carried back to Beadricsworth, and under the church of St. Mary it still rests; but the name has been changed from Beadricsworth to Bury (i.e., "town") St. Edmunds. Cnut founded a splendid monastery in memory of the martyred king, which became the chief religious centre of Eastern England. The shrine of St. Edmund was visited by many royal persons, and is memorable in history as the place where the English barons banded themselves together to obtain the Great Charter from King John. This saint is commemorated on Nov. 20th.

Education.—This word is derived either from educare, "to bring up," or from educere, "to bring out"—probably the former. The consideration of what man is will show what requires to be maintained and developed in him. He has to do his duty in this world, he has
